Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Albert F. Ross, Judge.

Action for negligence by Louise Osborn Kell and others against W. K. Jansen and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Geis & Hogle, of Willows, for appellants.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs were the owners of certain land in Shasta county across which a natural stream known as the east fork of Clear creek ran in a southwesterly direction to its confluence with Clear creek which ran along the west side of the property. The only access to the house occupied by the Kells upon the premises was by a road leading from a county road and crossing the east fork over a bridge which Mr. Kell had constructed. Plaintiffs also owned a water right appurtenant to their property, and water for the irrigation of some fifteen or twenty acres of their land was diverted from the said east fork at a point above the upper or northerly line of their property by means of a headgate, dam and ditch.

Defendants were engaged in gold dredging, and in the summer of 1939 they purchased some five acres of the Kells' land lying on the north side of the east fork, for the purpose of dredging same, after which it was reconveyed to plaintiffs. Operations were begun about August 15th, and continued for eight days, during which time the channel of said east fork was dredged from a point near its confluence with Clear creek, to a point beyond the boundary of plaintiffs' land, and extending beyond the Kell diversion dam. In the course of these operations the original channel of the stream was changed, the old channel being filled up with tailings. Also the Kell dam and headgate and a part of their ditch were destroyed. The bridge was moved from its original position, the channel which it had formerly spanned was widened by the dredging operations, and the bridge was then set back across the new channel. When the fall and winter rains came the channel of the stream was unable to carry the waters with the result that the bridge was washed out and plaintiffs' ditch was further damaged.

Charging that the damages sustained by plaintiffs because of their loss of the bridge and diversion works were due to the negligence of defendants in the manner in which their dredging operations were carried on, and their negligent deposit of tailings on the banks and in the natural channel of the stream, plaintiffs began this action. Trial was had by the court sitting without a jury, and at its termination findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, followed by judgment awarding plaintiffs $1,287 for damages to the bridge, $471 for the loss of their dam and headgate, $35 for a fill, and $234 for the destruction of 234 feet of their diversion ditch.

Defendants have appealed contending that the evidence is insufficient to show negligence on their part, that the damages suffered by plaintiffs were due, rather, to an act of God, to-wit: an excessive flood that occurred about the first of March, 1940, and that damages were improperly assessed.

The trial court found that in the course of the dredging operations tailings were negligently deposited behind the dredger used therein in the natural channels of Clear creek and the east fork thereof, and that the dredging operations and the negligent deposit of tailings as aforesaid changed, altered, obstructed and destroyed the natural channels of the streams; that during the course of said dredging operations and as a proximate consequence of the negligent deposit of said tailings in the streams the dam and headgate of plaintiffs were entirely destroyed and rendered useless and as a further proximate consequence at least 234 feet of plaintiffs' ditch were entirely destroyed. As to the bridge it was found that it was removed from its original location and later negligently replaced by defendants, and that thereafter as a proximate consequence of the acts of defendants in altering, changing and obstructing the natural channel of the east fork said bridge was washed away and entirely destroyed, and the banks of the creek greatly widened. As to the claim of defendants that these damages were due to the unprecedented floods that came late in February or early in March, 1940, the court found that prior to said time there had been normal high water which had washed the tailing deposits into the channel and changed the course of the creek in such a manner as proximately to result in the said injuries; that prior to said flood the normal high waters had begun to wash away the tailing piles upon which the bridge was negligently placed and that the washing away of said bridge was proximately contributed to by the high waters flowing down the east fork prior to said flood.

[1] Appellants cannot contend seriously that there is a total absence of evidence to support the court's finding of negligence on their part; they do to some extent argue the weight of it, but such matters are for the trial court. It may be noted, however, that defendant Clark testified that they agreed with the Kells that they would not mine up their ditch or their dam, that after their operations the dam was useless unless they put in a few days to open it up, that they tore out the willows where the headgate was, though the willows would be a protection to the ditch in high water, that their caterpillar probably mashed down the banks of the ditch a little, that they mined both sides of the creek, that tailing piles were left, that they had agreed to leave the road and bridge in as good condition as it was formerly, that the stream at the bridge which was formerly twenty feet wide was sixty feet wide after the dredging, that tailings were left across certain portions of the east fork, that the level of the creek bed was raised and that when the bridge was replaced after they took it out it was set back on tailing piles. Mr. Kell testified that tailings were piled on both sides of the stream fifteen feet higher than the original water flow, that the bridge was replaced across an entirely new channel with no bulkheads, just on top of the tailing piles, that the channel was moved about forty feet from the south side to the north side of the creek, and that the water level was raised about four feet. Mrs. Kell testified that the old channel of the creek was closed with tailings and their ditch spread out over the flat, that the old channel was covered with tailings, that the dredger operated close enough to the ditch to tear some of it down and defendants made no effort to make a substantial ditch but built one of tailings that went down with the first high water, that the banks of the original ditch were solid, and as to the bridge that it was originally a good substantial one, that its original site was buried under tailings and that when it was replaced the sills were not put on bedrock and no bulkheads were built.

[2] There was, therefore, ample evidence to sustain the trial court's findings of negligence.

In Salstrom v. Orleans Bar Gold Mining Co., 153 Cal. 551, 555, 96 P. 292, it was said that no matter how carefully a miner may conduct his mining operations, he has no lawful right to flood or wash away his neighbors' land, or deposit mining debris thereon to its injury, and that if by the deposit of such debris in the stream he causes such a result, he is liable for the resulting damage; and the fact that he uses all care for his neighbors' property, consistent with the successful conduct of his mining operations, is immaterial. (With citations.)

[3] As to the contention of defendants that even though they were negligent the extraordinary floods of 1940 would have washed the bridge out anyway, as many other bridges in the vicinity were destroyed, and therefore the eventual destruction of the Kell bridge and other works must be attributed to that act of God, the rule of law in this state, as enunciated in Chidester v. Consolidated Ditch Co., 59 Cal. 197, is that while no one is responsible for that which is merely the act of God, or inevitable accident, "But when human agency is combined with it, and neglect occurs in the employment of such agency, a liability for damage results from such neglect." Also, see, Smith v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corp., 59 Cal.App. 647, 649, 211 P. 843; Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 792, 127 P. 50.

In the instant case the trial court found that the injuries to plaintiffs' dam, head gate and ditch were proximately contributed to by the deposit of tailings in the creek prior to the flood conditions which defendants designate as the act of God; that prior to said flood there had been normal high water which had washed the tailing deposits into the channel and changed the course of the creek in such manner as proximately to result in said injuries; and as to the loss of the bridge, that prior to said flood conditions the normal high waters had begun to wash away the tailing piles upon which the bridge was negligently placed and the washing away of the bridge was proximately contributed to by the prior high water.

[4] These findings are sustained by the evidence. Mr. Kell and Mr. Maupin both testified that several days prior to the big flood the water was washing the tailing piles on which the bridge had been placed; and defendant Clark admitted that prior to the flood he had been warned that the water was washing around the bridge and that he had certain repairs made in an effort to shear the water away from washing out the approaches. He also admitted that prior to the flood the creek bed had filled up with tailings to a certain extent and that there had been an overflow into a swale, and that he sent men to put in a sack dam; also that he ran the bulldozer down the channel and pushed the tailings out on the sides of the creek; and the testimony shows that the normal high waters washed tailings down and covered up the dam, covered the headgate and filled the ditch. There was ample evidence, therefore, that the negligence of defendants in their operations combined with the unprecedented flood to complete the destruction of plaintiffs' diversion works, ditch and bridge.

Appellants further contend that damages were improperly assessed; that the measure thereof should have been the diminution in the fair market value of plaintiffs' property, but that the court measured the damages by the cost of replacement.

[5] The rule laid down in Green v. General Pet. Corp., 205 Cal. 328, 336, 270 P. 952, 60 A.L.R. 475, is that if the cost of repairing the injury and restoring the premises to their original condition amounts to less than the value of the property prior to the injury, such cost is the proper measure of damages; and if the cost of restoration will exceed such value then the value of the property is the proper measure. Citing Salstrom v. Orleans Bar Gold Mining Co., supra.

Also, see 36 Am.Jur., section 229, page 443, section 230, page 444, and Erceg v. Fairbanks Exploration Co., 9 Cir., 95 F.2d 850, 852. In 18 R.C.L., section 144, page 1249, it is said that where injuries are remediable the cost of repairs or restoration may properly be the measure of damages. The testimony for plaintiffs was that the value of their property before the injuries complained of was $3,700 to $4,000: the cost of restoration was found to be $2,027, therefore the latter was the proper measure of damages.

As to the amount of the damages it appears to have been within the evidence presented and we cannot say that it is excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

SECURITY-FIRST NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. BROAD et al.

L. A. 17945.

Supreme Court of California.

July 29, 1942.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑314(12)

Where trial court and parties treated executor's proceedings for interpretation of will as proceedings to determine persons to whom distribution should be made, a judgment determining testator's heirs and the validity of bequests was appealable. Probate Code, § 1240.

2. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)

On appeal from judgment in proceedings for interpretation of a will, Supreme Court was not required to determine question raised by amicus curiae whether judgment would be conclusive on persons not appearing or not represented in the proceedings, especially in absence of an objection by appellants.

3. Wills 🔑860

Where will executed three days before testator's death made specific and residuary bequest to charities and testator's friends and bequeathed to the friends all money remaining in estate after payment of testator's indebtedness and cost of administering estate, and bequests to charities were invalid, the friends could not share in such bequests but were entitled to receive only the portion of cash on hand at date of testator's death which remained after payment of indebtedness and cost of administering estate, exclusive of expenses of maintaining estate during period of administration. Probate Code, §§ 41, 42.

4. Wills 🔑858(2)

Under amendment to statute respecting bequests to charitable institutions, the material change in wording of statute manifests that legislature intended a change in respects in which previous language was amended, and to protect designated heirs against hasty and improvident gifts to charity, and that the testamentary disposition should be unaffected where testator does not leave any of the designated heirs. Probate Code, § 41.

5. Wills 🔑858(2)

Under statute providing that property bequeathed to charitable institutions contrary to statutory restrictions "shall go to the spouse" and certain other designated heirs of testator, meaning must be given to quoted language, and it is intended that in event of a bequest contrary to restrictions such heirs shall take. Probate Code, § 41.

6. Wills 🔑858(2)

Where will executed three days before testator's death made specific and residuary bequests to charitable institutions, and testator left no surviving spouse, brother, sister, descendant or ancestor, and did not mention surviving nephews and nieces in will, the bequests to charities were invalid and property so bequeathed was distributable to nephews and nieces in accordance with laws of succession. In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank A. Leonard, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of William J. Broad, deceased, wherein Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, a national banking corporation, as executor, etc., filed a petition for interpretation of deceased's will, and William Broad and R. F. Pierce and others, contestants, filed an answer to the petition. From an adverse judgment, R. F. Pierce and others appeal, opposed by the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, as executor, etc., and William Broad.

This is an appeal from a judgment on a petition of the executor for the interpretation of the will of the decedent.

The controversy involves the construction and application of section 41 of the Probate Code as amended in 1937 (Stats. 1937, p. 1435). That section provides: "No estate, real or personal, may be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, by a testator who leaves a spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor surviving him, who, under the will, or the laws of succession, would otherwise have taken the property so bequeathed or devised, unless the will was duly executed at least thirty days before the death of the testator. If so executed at least thirty days before death, such devices [sic] and legacies shall be valid, but they may not collectively exceed one-third of the testator's estate as against his spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor, who would otherwise, as aforesaid, have taken the excess over one-third, and if they do, a pro rata deduction from such devises and legacies shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of the estate. All property bequeathed or devised contrary to the provisions of this section shall go to the spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor of the testator, if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid but for such devises or legacies; otherwise the testator's estate shall go in accordance with his will and such devises and legacies shall be unaffected."

William J. Broad executed his last will and testament on April 8, 1939. He died three days later. By his will he forgave to his friends, Arthur and Florence Brock, their indebtedness to him, with the exception of the sum of $6,000. The $6,000 owed by the Brocks he bequeathed in equal shares to Grace Methodist Church, Redlands, California, and David and Margaret's Home, La Verne, California. He forgave his friends, R. F. and Alberta Pierce, the indebtedness owed by them and in addition bequeathed to them "all money remaining in my estate after payment of my indebtedness and the cost and expenses of administering my estate."

The only other provision of the will which requires mention is the bequest of "all of the rest, residue and remainder" of the estate in equal shares to twelve named legatees, including the Pierces, Grace Methodist Church of Redlands, David and Margaret's Home of La Verne, and Volunteers of America.

The decedent left no spouse, brother, sister, descendant or ancestor surviving him but did leave several nieces and nephews, none of whom was named in the will with the possible exception of Martha Broad Berry who was designated therein as a cousin. The appraised value of the estate was $28,331.49. After the expiration of six months from the first publication of notice to creditors the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, named in the will as executor, filed a first account current, together with a petition for partial distribution and a petition for interpretation of the will. R. F. and Alberta Pierce filed an answer to the petition for interpretation and objections to the account and petition for distribution. William Broad, a nephew of the decedent, also filed an answer.

By their answer the Pierces sought to have the court interpret the will so as to authorize distribution to them of all moneys remaining at the time of final distribution, including all assets which could be converted into cash, after payment of specific bequests and costs of administration.

The answer of William Broad set forth a claim of sole heirship as a nephew of the testator; that as sole heir he would be entitled to have distributed to him the bequests and devises to the three charitable institutions, and that the Pierces would be entitled only to the portion of the money on hand at the date of death which remained after payment of indebtedness and the cost of administering the estate. After a hearing on the petition and answers the court found that the decedent left as his heirs at law three nephews and five nieces, descendants of a deceased brother and a deceased sister; that Grace Methodist Church of Redlands, David and Margaret's Home of La Verne, and Volunteers of America were charitable institutions within the meaning of section 41 of the Probate Code and were not exempt from its provisions. § 42, Prob. Code. The court determined that by reason of the death of the decedent within thirty days after executing his will and the survival of the nieces and nephews, the specific and residuary bequests to the three named charitable institutions were invalid, and that the property thereby bequeathed should be distributed to the nieces and nephews in accordance with the laws of succession. The court further concluded that the Pierces were entitled under the specific bequest to receive only the portion of cash on hand at the date of the death of the testator which remained after the payment of indebtedness and the cost of administering the estate, exclusive of the expenses of maintaining the estate during the period of administration. Judgment was entered that the named nieces and nephews would be entitled to take in designated proportions the property bequeathed to the charitable institutions, namely, the $6,000 owed by the Brocks and three-twelfths of the residue.

The Pierces have appealed from the judgment. It is their contention that the charitable bequests should devolve to them under the specific bequest of moneys on hand; or that the $6,000 bequest should fall into the residue and become distributable to all the residuary legatees including themselves, with the exception of the charitable legatees, and that the portion of the residue otherwise distributable to the charitable institutions should be distributed to the surviving heirs at law.

[1-3] Preliminary to a discussion of the merits we note that the judgment was properly appealable as one determining the persons to whom distribution should be made. § 1240, Prob. Code. The court and the parties treated the proceeding as one for that purpose. The question raised by amicus curiae whether the judgment appealed from would be conclusive on persons not appearing or not represented in the proceedings, or whether such persons would be precluded on final distribution from asserting rights to a distributive share not in accordance with the court's adjudication, is not a question which need be determined on this appeal especially in the absence of an objection by the appellants, and no such objection was made by them. There is no merit in the appellants' contention that the court erred in its conclusion that the legacy of money was limited as ordered in the judgment. The language of the legacy provision, read and considered with the other provisions for specific and residuary bequests, fully supports the court's construction of the specific legacy.

The principal question for determination is the correctness of the court's interpretation and application of section 41 of the Probate Code. That section was founded on former section 1313 of the Civil Code. As originally enacted section 1313 declared void any bequest or devise for charity contained in a will executed within thirty days of the testator's death, or any disposition to charity of more than one-third of the estate by a testator leaving heirs at law. By express provision the property involved in any such void bequest went "to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law." In Estate of Russell, 150 Cal. 604, 89 P. 345, it was held that under that section and section 1332 of the Civil Code (now § 126, Prob. Code), the property mentioned in such a void legacy passed to the residuary devisee and not to the heirs unless a contrary intention appeared in the will.

In Estate of Dwyer's Estate, 159 Cal. 680, 689, 115 P. 242, it was stated that the legislative restriction on bequests to charity was not intended as a mortmain statute or as declaratory of any public policy relative to charitable dispositions by will, but that its purpose was to protect the heirs at law against hasty and improvident gifts by the testator of his entire estate to charity and to the exclusion of those who in the judgment of the Legislature had a better claim to his bounty.

In 1933 the matter of the Estate of Garthwaite, 131 Cal.App. 321, 21 P.2d 465, was decided. There the testatrix left no heirs. She executed a will within thirty days preceding her death whereby she left her entire estate in trust for charitable uses. The sole question was whether that disposition was void under section 1313 of the Civil Code (reenacted in 1931 as section 41 of the Probate Code). It was contended that since the testatrix left no heirs the bequests should be deemed valid. It was held, however, that the testamentary disposition was void under the plain language of the statute. In 1937 the Legislature amended section 41 to read as first above quoted. Subsequently the matter of the Estate of Mautner, 38 Cal.App.2d 521, 101 P.2d 520, was decided. The facts were similar to those involved in the Garthwaite case. In accordance with the amended statute an order distributing property to a charitable organization was affirmed.

It is the contention of the appellants and of amicus curiae that the purpose of the 1937 amendment was only to obviate the result declared in the Garthwaite estate and to produce the result declared in the Mautner estate, namely, that when there is surviving no spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant, or ancestor, the restrictions of section 41 do not apply and the property should go in accordance with the will, but that when such heirs do survive, property bequeathed in excess of the restrictions passes into the residue by virtue of section 126 of the Probate Code and the decision in Estate of Russell, supra. In other words a construction is urged which would be in accordance with the language as it read prior to the amendment of 1937, that all dispositions contrary to the restrictions "shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee * * * or heirs, according to law." The amended section does not invalidate the bequest or devise to charitable uses. It provides that "all property bequeathed or devised contrary to the provisions of this section shall go to the spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor of the testator if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid but for such devises or legacies; otherwise the testator's estate shall go in accordance with his will and such devises and legacies shall be unaffected."

[4-6] Such a material change in the wording of the section plainly indicates that the Legislature intended a change in the respects in which the previous language was amended. People v. Weitzel, 201 Cal. 116, 118, 255 P. 792, 52 A.L.R. 811; Loew's, Inc., v. Byram, 11 Cal.2d 746, 750, 82 P.2d 1. Undoubtedly the Legislature intended the change to accord with the result in the Mautner case, to the effect that the testamentary disposition should be unaffected where the testator did not leave any of the designated heirs. Also in accord with the obvious design to protect those heirs against "hasty and improvident gifts to charity" (Estate of Dwyer, supra [159 Cal. 680, 115 P. 245]), the Legislature provided that property bequeathed or devised contrary to the restrictions "shall go to the spouse," etc. Meaning must be given to the language thus employed. It was plainly intended that in that event such heirs should take. How they should take is then stated: "if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid", that is "if" they "would otherwise have taken" said property "under the will, or the laws of succession," and "to the extent" that they "would otherwise have taken" said property "under the will, or the laws of succession." With this intention and purpose in mind we find no difficulty in concluding that the court was correct in determining that the surviving heirs should take under the laws of succession.

The judgment is affirmed.

GIBSON, C. J., CURTIS and CARTER, JJ., concurred.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. The majority opinion assumes that the bequests to the charitable institutions were invalid and that the problem resolves itself into determining whether the heirs or the residuary legatees should receive the property. There can be no question, however, as to whom such property shall go until it is first determined whether the gift to the charities is invalid. Section 41 of the Probate Code as amended in 1937 provides as follows: "No estate, real or personal, may be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, by a testator who leaves a spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor surviving him, who, under the will, or the laws of succession, would otherwise have taken the property so bequeathed or devised, unless the will was duly executed at least thirty days before the death of the testator. If so executed at least thirty days before death, such devices [sic] and legacies shall be valid, but they may not collectively exceed one-third of the testator's estate as against his spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor, who would otherwise, as aforesaid, have taken the excess over one-third, and if they do, a pro rata deduction from such devises and legacies shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of the estate. All property bequeathed or devised contrary to the provisions of this section shall go to the spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor of the testator, if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid but for such devises or legacies; otherwise the testator's estate shall go in accordance with his will and such devises and legacies shall be unaffected."

A bequest to charity is invalid under this section only if, in addition to the death of the testator within thirty days after the execution of the will, the testator leaves surviving him designated heirs, "who under the will, or the laws of succession, would otherwise have taken the property so bequeathed." The death of the testator within the thirty-day period and the survival of the designated heirs are not alone sufficient to invalidate the bequest. There remains the question whether the named heirs would "otherwise" have taken the property under the will, or the laws of succession "but for such devises or legacies." In other words, if the charitable bequests had not been made, to whom would the property go under the will, or, if the will does not cover this contingency, to whom would the property go under the laws of succession? If the property would go to spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor the bequest to charity is invalid. If it would not go to any of these but to more remote kin or strangers to the blood it is valid. The property cannot go to the designated heirs, and the charitable bequest is therefore valid if (a) the testator does not leave surviving him a nephew, niece or nearer heir (Estate of Mautner, 38 Cal.App.2d 521, 101 P.2d 520; see Estate of Garthwaite, 131 Cal.App. 321, 21 P.2d 465 for the opposite rule before the 1937 amendment to section 41), or (b) if he has so framed his will that his nephews, nieces, or nearer heirs would not take what would otherwise be a defeated gift to charity.

Under section 41 as it read before the 1937 amendment, a void charitable devise passed to the residuary devisee and not to the heirs, in the absence of a contrary provision in the will. Estate of Russell, 150 Cal. 604, 89 P. 345. The 1937 amendment to section 41 makes it plain that charitable bequests and devises are no longer to be sacrificed to the enrichment of residuary bequests or devises given to strangers to the blood or to heirs more remote than nephew and niece. That purpose is clearly set forth in section 41 as follows: "All property bequeathed or devised contrary to the provisions of this section shall go to the spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor of the testator, if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid but for such devises or legacies; otherwise the testator's estate shall go in accordance with his will and such devises and legacies shall be unaffected." The same result is accomplished by that portion of section 42 reading as follows: "Bequests and devises * * * made by a testator leaving no spouse, brother, sister, nephew, niece, descendant or ancestor surviving by whom the property so bequeathed or devised would have been taken if said property had not been so bequeathed or devised, are excepted from the restrictions of this article." If none of the designated heirs can take the property, the restrictions on charitable bequests do not apply and the property goes in accordance with the testator's will. The very reasons therefore that exclude the heirs make a charitable bequest valid as against residuary legatees.

In the present case the decedent left nieces and nephews surviving him. The validity of the charitable bequests therefore depends upon whether the property would go to such heirs but for those bequests. If the residuary bequest to the charities had not been made there would be an intestacy as to one-fourth of the residue and the nieces and nephews would inherit that property under the laws of succession. That bequest therefore is invalid, and as property bequeathed contrary to the provisions of section 41, it must go to the nieces and nephews. If the specific bequest had not been made the $6,000 would be included in the residue under Probate Code, section 126, for it is not otherwise bequeathed by the testator's will. The will contains a residuary clause, which does not include the nieces and nephews and they are not otherwise provided for in the will. It is clear therefore that the nieces and nephews cannot take such property under the will. Had there been no residuary clause they would have taken under the laws of succession and the specific bequest would therefore have been invalid. Since there is a residuary clause, however, they can take under the laws of succession only to the extent that the residuary bequests are not effective. The residuary clause left one-fourth of the residue to three charitable organizations, two of which were legatees of the $6,000 bequest. The residuary share of the charitable organization was therefore augmented by one-fourth of the $6,000 that would have gone to the other residuary legatees had the bequest to such organizations not been made. That one-fourth cannot go to the other residuary legatees because it was not bequeathed to them. It cannot go to the charitable organizations because there are heirs who would have taken under the laws of succession had it not been bequeathed to the charity. One-fourth of the $6,000 should therefore go to the nieces and nephews under the express terms of section 41 that "All property bequeathed or devised contrary to the provisions of this section shall go to the * * * nephew, niece * * * of the testator, if and to the extent that they would have taken said property as aforesaid but for such devises or legacies."

The remaining three-fourths of the $6,000 bequest is a valid gift to charity by reason of the following express terms of section 41: "* * * otherwise the testator's estate shall go in accordance with his will and such * * * legacies shall be unaffected" and section 42: "Bequests * * * made by a testator leaving no * * * nephew, niece * * * surviving by whom the property so bequeathed * * * would have been taken if said property had not been so bequeathed * * * are excepted from the restrictions of this article."

It is immaterial that the charities may benefit by a reversal of the judgment although they are not appellants in this proceeding. If the part of a judgment appealed from is so dependent upon the remainder that it affects the whole, the appeal is from the entire judgment, and the appellate court must do as justice requires. Estate of Murphey, 7 Cal.2d 712, 62 P.2d 374; Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 125 P. 904, Ann.Cas.1913E, 1319. The present appeal cannot be limited to the determination in favor of the heirs, for that determination is dependent upon the holding that the gifts to charity are void. Furthermore, proceedings to determine to whom distribution shall be made are in rem and no judgment in personam is given in favor of one party against another. Edlund v. Superior Court, 209 Cal. 690, 289 P. 841. See, also, O'Day v. Superior Court, 18 Cal. 2d 540, 116 P.2d 621; Lilienkamp v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 293, 93 P.2d 1008. The object of the proceedings is to ascertain the persons entitled to share in the estate, and in the words of the Edlund case, "It will not be questioned that justice and sound policy require that the estates of decedents be distributed to persons rightfully entitled thereto * * *." [209 Cal. 690, 289 P. 843.]

The judgment should be reversed.

DOUILLARD et al. v. WOODD.

L. A. 18275.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 3, 1942.

As Modified Sept. 2, 1942.

1. Wills 🔑740(3)

In action on alleged oral contract to divide defendant's legacy with plaintiffs, evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding that defendant made such agreement.

2. Wills 🔑740(3)

Promises of testatrix' heirs not to contest her will constituted "valuable consideration" for contract by another heir to divide her legacy under will with promisors.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Valuable Consideration".

Wills 🔑740(3)

Exchange of mutual promises between one receiving both special and residuary legacies under will and every other residuary legatee was unnecessary to validate contract for division of special legacy among all legatees in consideration of such other residuary legatees' promise not to contest will, as any one of residuary legatees, not a party to agreement, might enforce it as third party beneficiary.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)

In action on alleged oral contract to divide defendant's legacy under will with plaintiffs, defendant's positive testimony that she made no such contract merely presented for determination by trier of facts an irreconcilable conflict with plaintiffs' and other witnesses' testimony as to such contract.

5. Appeal and error 🔑989

An appellate court's power respecting any question as to sufficiency of evidence begins and ends with determination as to whether there is any substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, to support trial court's fact finding.

6. Novation ⟜1

Specific and residuary legatees' memorandum of agreement, specifically limited to division of property distributable under will to residuary legatees and not inconsisten on its face with specific legatee's prior oral contract to divide special legacy with residuary legatees, did not constitute "novation" of such contract.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Novation".

7. Wills ⟜741

Receipts for signers' distributive shares of residue of testator's estate under will applied only to their rights under terms of will, and hence did not constitute "waiver" of their right to enforce agreement by executrix as specific legatee to divide specific legacy with residuary legatees, though receipts recited that certain property was accepted in full settlement, payment and release of all claims against estate as legatee or otherwise and against executrix, in absence of evidence that any legatee signing receipt intended to waive his rights against specific legatee in her individual capacity.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waiver".

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clarke, Judge.

Action by Emile A. Douillard and others against Melanie D. Woodd on an alleged oral contract to divide a legacy with plaintiffs. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Prior opinion, 120 P.2d 73.

Daniel A. Knapp and Fred W. Heath, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas Higgins, Jr., and J. M. Clements, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Following the administration of the estate of Emily S. Donahue, the respondents, who were legatees under her will, sued the appellant, the principal beneficiary of it, upon an asserted oral contract by which Mrs. Woodd agreed to divide her legacy with them. The appeal is from a judgment rendered in accordance with the respondents' complaint.

All of the parties are heirs of Mrs. Donahue, who bequeathed $10,000 to her daughter, Mrs. Woodd, "in appreciation of her devotion and service to me in many ways for many years." After directing that each grandchild and great-grandchild be paid $50 from her estate, Mrs. Donahue devised the residue of her estate to Mrs. Woodd and the respondents in stated shares. The probate court decreed distribution accordingly.

According to the complaint, Mrs. Woodd orally agreed with the respondents that if they would not contest the will she would divide her legacy of $10,000 between herself and them in the same proportions designated by Mrs. Donahue for the division of the residue of her estate. By way of answer, Mrs. Woodd denied that she made that agreement. She also pleaded three affirmative defenses: (1) That before distribution of the estate, all of the legatees entered into a written novation of all prior agreements, and that under such novation, they are not entitled to the relief sought in their complaint; (2) that the alleged contract violated Section 1973(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring an agreement to be in writing where, by its terms, it is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof; and (3) that the legatees, by the terms of the written receipts of their distributive shares of the estate, waived any right to enforce the asserted agreement.

The trial court found that Mrs. Woodd made the contract alleged by the respondents in consideration of their forbearing to contest the will of Mrs. Donahue, and that these legatees had performed their part of the agreement by permitting the estate to be administered, without contest, in accordance with the terms of the will. Upon the issues raised by the affirmative defenses of Mrs. Woodd, the court found that there was no novation or waiver of any rights under the oral contract and that the contract does not violate the statute of frauds. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings concerning the making of the oral contract and that there was no later novation or a waiver of rights under it; also that the court committed prejudicial error in sustaining objections to certain evidence offered by her. The respondents insist that the evidence is sufficient to support the trial court's findings on all of the issues. And according to these heirs, the questions to which the trial court sustained objection were directed to discussions relative to the division of the residue of the estate and had no bearing upon either the issue of whether an agreement had been made by the parties or whether a novation had replaced the original agreement to divide the special legacy.

When the case was before the District Court of Appeal, a controversy arose concerning the transcript. The appellant charged that much of the testimony stated in the bill of exceptions settled by the trial judge is incorrect. The District Court of Appeal appointed a referee to examine the record, and upon his report, it settled a supplemental bill of exceptions, which corrected the bill settled and allowed by the trial judge to make it conform to the reporter's transcript, and added certain testimony and rulings which had been omitted.

Considering only the testimony as corrected by the supplemental bill of exceptions, there is substantial evidence to support the judgment. Four of the respondents and the wives of two of them testified positively that Mrs. Woodd agreed to divide the $10,000, as charged in the complaint, provided they did not contest the will. Two other witnesses testified to separate conversations with the appellant, on which occasions Mrs. Woodd told them that she intended to divide her legacy among the other heirs as soon as she received it.

[1-5] Although the terms of the contract are not too clearly established by this evidence, the testimony in its entirety supports the finding of the trial court that Mrs. Woodd agreed to divide her $10,000 legacy with the respondents. The promise on their part not to contest the will constituted a valuable consideration for this contract. Bacon v. Kessel, 31 Cal.App.2d 245, 87 P.2d 857. It was not necessary that mutual promises be exchanged between the appellant and every legatee; any one of the respondents, not a party to the agreement, as a third party beneficiary, might enforce the agreement made for his benefit. Garratt v. Baker, 5 Cal.2d 745, 56 P.2d 225; Woodhead Lumber Co. v. E. G. Niemann Investments, 99 Cal.App. 456, 278 P. 913; Bryan v. Banks, 98 Cal. App. 748, 277 P. 1075. And although Mrs. Woodd testified positively that she made no such contract, this only presented to the trier of fact an irreconcilable conflict which it was his duty to determine. Under such circumstances the power of an appellate court, so far as any question as to the sufficiency of the evidence is concerned, begins and ends with a determination as to whether there is any substantial evidence contradicted or uncontradicted which will support the finding of fact. Raggio v. Mallory, 10 Cal.2d 723, 76 P. 2d 660; Bellon v. Silver Gate Theatres, Inc., 4 Cal.2d 1, 47 P.2d 462; In re Winzeler's Estate, 42 Cal.App.2d 246, 108 P.2d 720; In re Filippi's Estate, 9 Cal.App. 2d 407, 49 P.2d 892.

[6, 7] The appellant contends, however, that even though such an agreement may have been entered into by her, yet the "Memorandum of Agreement" signed at a later time by all of the legatees constituted a novation of the contract. But the memorandum is specifically limited by its terms to a division of the property "to be distributed to us as residuary legatees" and on its face this writing is in no way inconsistent with the separate agreement on the part of Mrs. Woodd to divide her special legacy among them. For the same reason, the receipts signed by the respondents for their distributive shares of the residue of the estate may be held to apply only to their rights under the terms of the will, even though these documents recite that certain property is accepted "in full settlement, payment and release of all claims against said estate as legatee or otherwise, and against the executrix." There is no evidence to show that, in signing such a receipt, any legatee intended to waive his rights against the appellant in her individual capacity.

[8-10] The only remaining objections of the appellant relate to the exclusion of certain evidence offered by her at the trial. These questions were directed to the appellant by her counsel and related to the negotiations leading up to the signing of the contract for the distribution of the residue among the legatees. Under this contract, Mrs. Woodd agreed to accept a large building, whose appraised value exceeded her residuary share, and to pay the difference between the value of her residuary share and the value of the building into the estate to equalize her share.

Referring to the negotiations preliminary to this agreement Mrs. Woodd testified: "All through the meeting it was that I should take the big building, because I had the $10,000.00 to buy it * * * they wanted me to use my $10,000.00 for it." The appellant now complains that the court erroneously sustained objections to subsequent questions specifically asking whether each legatee had then told her that she could make up the difference for the large building out of her $10,000. The witness clearly included all of the legatees in her testimony and the court stated, in sustaining the objections to continued questioning along this line, that "there is sufficient for the record on that now." A trial judge is not bound to allow cumulative testimony upon the same point and as the record shows that he understood Mrs. Woodd as having testified generally to the same facts concerning which answers were sought particularly, the appellant has no cause for complaint. Nor is there any merit to the contention that the facts related by her established a novation. Essential requirements for a novation are a recognition of the pre-existing contract and an intention to substitute the new agreement for the old one. Civ.Code, §§ 1530–1532.

[11] Before the taking of evidence was concluded, counsel for the appellant offered to show by the testimony of the appellant and "by other witnesses" that the respondents affirmatively took positions which were entirely inconsistent with and directly negatived the asserted agreement to divide the appellant's legacy. But the appellant did not state the names of these witnesses nor the facts to which any one of them would testify. A mere general offer of proof without producing the witness or stating the evidence whereby the fact in issue is to be proved, or, if the witness be present, without putting a question to him in such form as to give opportunity for objection, is not correct trial procedure and it affords no ground for appeal. Rose v. Doe, 4 Cal. App. 680, 89 P. 135; Biddick v. Kobler, 110 Cal. 191, 42 P. 578; Dohrman v. J. B. Roof, Inc., 108 Cal.App. 456, 291 P. 879; Liberty Bank v. Ernst, 93 Cal.App. 560, 269 P. 959.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARRISON v. ADAMS et al.

L. A. 17675, 17706.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 3, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)

Where appeal was on the judgment roll alone, finding that assignment of interest in judgment to assignor's wife was made for valuable consideration was presumed to have been supported by substantial evidence.

2. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑8(1)

A court of equity will compel a set-off when mutual demands are held under such circumstances that one of them should be applied against the other and only the balance recovered.

3. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑8(2)

The insolvency of one of two parties having mutual demands, affords sufficient ground for invoking equitable principle of set-off.

4. Judgment 🔑883(9)

A judgment debtor who has by assignment or otherwise become owner of judgment against the judgment creditor may go into the court in which the judgment against him was rendered and have his judgment offset against the creditor's judgment.

5. Judgment 🔑883(13)

The fact that a claim of a plaintiff has not been reduced to judgment is no obstacle to its allowance as a set-off against a judgment against the plaintiff and such a set-off may be compelled even against an assignee of the judgment who took without notice and for value.

6. Judgment 🔑883(13)

A judgment debtor may set-off claims against the creditor which were acquired after assignment of the judgment to a third person but prior to notice to the debtor of the assignment. Code Civ.Proc. § 368.

7. Judgment 🔑883(9, 13)

In order for an assignee of a claim or judgment to use it as a set-off against a judgment against him, the assignee must be the beneficial owner of the claim or judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 368.

8. Judgment 🔑883(9)

In order for an assignee of a judgment to use it as a set-off against a judgment against him, "mutuality" is essential, that is, the judgments must be between the same parties in the same right. Code Civ.Proc. § 368.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mutuality".

9. Judgment 🔑883(9)

In determining whether demand of assignee of a judgment against assignee's creditor, and the creditor's judgment against assignee are "mutual" so that they may be set off against each other, equity will look to the real parties in interest. Code Civ.Proc. § 368.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mutual".

10. Judgment 🔑883(9)

There may be a set-off of judgment where the real and beneficial owner of one of them is the debtor on the other, although an assignee for collection is the nominal owner of the first judgment.

11. Assignment 🔑121

An assignment for collection vests legal title in the assignee which is sufficient to enable him to maintain an action in his own name, but the assignor retains the equitable interest in the thing assigned.

12. Assignment 🔑89

A "fiduciary relationship" exists between an assignee under an assignment for collection, and the assignor, and the assignee is a "trustee" or "agent" of the assignor.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent", "Fiduciary Relationship" and "Trustee".

13. Set-off and counterclaim 🔑52(1)

If an assignee for collection should attempt to set-off the assigned chose in action against his individual obligation he would be violating law forbidding a trustee from using trust property for his private or individual purposes. Civ.Code, § 2229.

14. Judgment 🔑883(13)

Allowing a judgment debtor to set-off against judgment creditor's claim, a claim assigned to the judgment debtor for collection would violate rule requiring mutuality of parties in order to authorize set-off.

15. Judgment 🔑883(13)

Where insolvent judgment creditor assigned his interest in judgment to his wife for valuable consideration, and thereafter payee of a note executed by the judgment creditor assigned the note to the judgment debtor for collection only, under contract providing that payee should receive ⅔ and the debtor ⅓ of the amount collected, the debtor who had no notice of the assignment of the judgment to the creditor's wife, was not entitled to use the note as set-off against the judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 368.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by R. E. Harrison against Henry J. Adams and others to set off an amount due on note against judgment obtained by named defendant against the plaintiff. From a portion of the judgment and from the whole of the same judgment, plaintiff appealed and the appeals were consolidated. Upon the death of the plaintiff, Charlotte R. Harrison as executrix of his estate was substituted as plaintiff.

For prior opinion, see 118 P.2d 43.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for appellant.

Dempster McKee, of San Diego, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The judgment from which the plaintiff has appealed must be reversed if a chose in action, which has been assigned for collection, may be used by the assignee as a set-off against the judgment creditor of the assignee. The record in L. A. 17675 shows a notice of appeal from a portion of the judgment. Under a second notice of appeal from the whole of the same judgment, a transcript was filed under L. A. 17706. The two appeals have been consolidated, and following the death of R. E. Harrison, the appellant, the executrix of his estate was substituted for him.

In a previous action, Henry J. Adams obtained a judgment against the plaintiff for $11,000. Harrison appealed, making a cash deposit with the county clerk to stay execution. Adams assigned the judgment to F. N. Meyers for the purpose of distributing its proceeds in accordance with a contract for attorneys' fees. Harrison was served with notice of this assignment.

Subsequently, Adams assigned his interest in the judgment to Verda Adams, his wife, giving notice to Meyers of the assignment. However, Harrison had no notice of the second assignment until after the present action was commenced.

Following these assignments, one Russell assigned to Harrison, for the purpose of collection, Adams' promissory note for $3,800 which was then due and payable. Later, the judgment against Harrison was affirmed. Harrison then commenced the present action, naming Adams and Meyers as defendants, to set off the amount due upon the note against the judgment obtained by Adams. At the time of filing it, Harrison secured an order restraining the clerk of the superior court from paying to Adams or Meyers any part of the money deposited by him in lieu of a bond on appeal. Subsequently, by stipulation, all of the deposit was paid to Meyers except $4,600, which is held pending the final determination of this action, and Verda Adams was substituted for Meyers as a party defendant.

These facts are undisputed. In connection with them, the trial court found that the assignment from Adams to his wife was for a valuable consideration and that Adams was insolvent both before and after the assignment. Judgment was rendered for Harrison against Adams for the amount of principal and interest on the note, approximately $4,600, with costs, and for Verda Adams against Harrison for her costs, directing the clerk to pay to her the amount of the deposit held by him.

Unquestionably the judgment against Henry J. Adams is proper, but, in view of Adams' insolvency, the question vital to the success of Harrison in realizing upon it is whether he can reach the interest of Verda Adams in the money held by the county clerk, or conversely, whether Verda Adams took her title subject to the rights of Harrison, and Russell, his assignor, upon the note.

[1] At the time of the assignments made by Adams, California had not enacted the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act, Stats. 1939, p. 1667, Civ.Code §§ 3439–3439.12. But many years before, this court held that a transfer of property without consideration by a person insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, is void as to creditors regardless of the intent of the debtor. Atkinson v. Western Development Syndicate, 170 Cal. 503, 150 P. 360. However, Harrison cannot successfully challenge the assignment made to Verda Adams because his appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and the finding that it was made for a valuable consideration must be presumed to have the support of substantial evidence to that effect.

[2-5] Concerning the rights of the appellant to the money on deposit as against the assignee of the judgment for a valuable consideration, it is well settled that a court of equity will compel a set-off when mutual demands are held under such circumstances that one of them should be applied against the other and only the balance recovered. The insolvency of the party against whom the relief is sought affords sufficient ground for invoking this equitable principle. Machado v. Borges, 170 Cal. 501, 150 P. 351; Coonan v. Loewenthal, 147 Cal. 218, 81 P. 527, 109 Am.St.Rep. 128; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 596; Russell v. Conway, 11 Cal. 93; California Cotton Credit Corp. v. Superior Court, 127 Cal.App. 472, 15 P.2d 1108; City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 73 Cal.App. 782, 239 P. 302; Arp v. Blake, 63 Cal.App. 362, 218 P. 773. And a judgment debtor who has, by assignment or otherwise, become the owner of a judgment or claim against his judgment creditor, may go into the court in which the judgment against him was rendered and have his judgment offset against the first judgment. Machado v. Borges, supra; Coonan v. Loewenthal, supra; Haskins v. Jordan, 123 Cal. 157, 55 P.

786; McBride v. Fallon, 65 Cal. 301, 4 P. 17; Hobbs v. Duff, supra; Porter v. Liscom, 22 Cal. 430, 83 Am.Dec. 76; Russell v. Conway, supra; Arp v. Blake, supra; and see annotation in 121 A.L.R. 478–542. The fact that the demand of the plaintiff has not been reduced to judgment is no obstacle to its allowance as a set-off against a judgment. Machado v. Borges, supra. Such a set-off may be compelled even against an assignee of the judgment who took without notice and for value. Machado v. Borges, supra; Coonan v. Loewenthal, supra; Haskins v. Jordan, supra; McBride v. Fallon, supra; Porter v. Liscom, supra; Cohen v. Bonnell, 14 Cal.App.2d 38, 57 P.2d 1326; Bank of America v. Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., 122 Cal.App. 554, 10 P.2d 478; Arp v. Blake, supra.

[6] And it has been held that under section 368 of the Code of Civil Procedure the debtor may set off claims against the creditor which were acquired after the assignment of the judgment to a third person but prior to notice to the debtor of the assignment. Arp v. Blake, supra; and see McKenney v. Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 326, 132 P. 75; St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 286, 35 P. 876; McCabe v. Grey, 20 Cal. 509. "Whatever may be the rule as to notice in other states, however much or little the courts may have permitted themselves to be influenced by equitable considerations in favor of the assignee, the fact remains that in this state there is no room for the exercise of discretion upon the question. The rule is one rigidly fixed by statute * * *." Haskins v. Jordan, supra, [123 Cal. 157, 55 P. 788].

[7-10] But the assignee must be the beneficial owner of the claim or judgment in order to use it as a set-off against a judgment against him. Jones v. Chalfant, 55 Cal. 505; see cases collected in note, 121 A.L.R. 478, 523. And mutuality is essential, that is, the judgments must be between the same parties in the same right. Machado v. Borges, supra; Kaye v. Metz, 186 Cal. 42, 198 P. 1047; Petersen v. Lyders, 139 Cal. App. 303, 33 P.2d 1030; California Cotton Credit Corp. v. Superior Court, supra; Hobbs v. Duff, supra; Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 84 P. 263; and see cases collected in note, 121 A.L.R. 478, 514. In determining whether demands are mutual, equity will look to the real parties in interest. Thus there may be a set-off of judgments where the real and beneficial owner of one of them is the debtor upon the other, although an assignee for collection is the nominal owner of the first judgment. Heine Piano Co. v. Bloomer, 183 Cal. 398, 191 P. 900.

[11-14] An assignment for collection vests legal title in the assignee which is sufficient to enable him to maintain an action in his own name, but the assignor retains the equitable interest in the thing assigned. National Reserve Co. v. Metropolitan Trust Co., 17 Cal.2d 827, 112 P.2d 598; Morrison v. Veach, 190 Cal. 507, 213 P. 945; Bechtel v. Baglieto, 13 Cal.App.2d 495, 57 P.2d 192; Elam v. Arzaga, 122 Cal.App. 742, 10 P.2d 805; Koepple v. Morrison, 84 Cal.App. 137, 257 P. 590. Such an assignee has been referred to as the trustee or agent of the assignor (Weiner v. Luscombe, 19 Cal.App.2d 668, 66 P.2d 151; Elam v. Arzaga, supra; Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 P. 550), and a fiduciary relationship exists between them. Elam v. Arzaga, supra. If the assignee for collection should attempt to set off the assigned chose in action against his individual obligation, he would be violating the elementary rule of the law of trusts which forbids the trustee from using trust property for his private or individual purposes. Civ.Code, § 2229; Purdy v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 521, 163 P. 893; Bermingham v. Wilcox, 120 Cal. 467, 52 P. 822; and see Levy v. Drew, 4 Cal.2d 456, 50 P.2d 435, 101 A.L.R. 1144. Also, a trustee, or one bearing a similar fiduciary relationship, may not set off a claim due the trust estate against his own personal obligation. Hobbs v. Duff, supra; Estate of Hildebrandt, 92 Cal. 433, 28 P. 486; Flynn v. Seale, supra; see annotation in 121 A.L.R. 478, 517. And to allow a judgment debtor to set off a claim assigned to him for collection would be violative of the rule requiring the mutuality of parties; it would, in effect, permit the collection of a debt due to a third party, in this case, Russell, against whom no corresponding right of set-off exists on the part of the judgment creditor.

[15] The respondent urges, however, that where an equitable action for a set-off is being maintained because of the insolvency of the creditor, equity will allow a set-off, even though the demands be not mutual. But what equity exists in behalf of the judgment debtor when he seeks to collect, not his own claim, but a claim to which another is beneficially entitled? In the present action, Harrison must account to Russell for two-thirds of any amount he receives upon the note of Adams. Harrison does not own a separable interest in it and his beneficial interest is contingent upon collection. If the money held by the county clerk in connection with the case of Adams v. Harrison was owned by Adams, it might be subjected to the judgment rendered against Adams in the present action. But at the time the action was commenced, the money in custodio legis belonged to Verda Adams, and was therefore not subject to the judgment obtained by Harrison for the benefit of Adams.

The appellant contends that since the court in Del Monte Ranch Dairy v. Bernardo, 174 Cal. 757, 164 P. 628, held that an assignor for collection could not use the claim as a set-off after the assignment, the assignee must have that right or none exists. But that conclusion could only apply where the assignee claims the right to set off his assignor's demand against a debt owed by his assignor. In such a case to allow an assignee to set off, for the benefit of his assignor, the assignor's equitable right against the assignor's creditor would be consistent with the rule that, in determining whether claims are mutual for the purpose of set-off, equity will look to the real parties in interest. Hobbs v. Duff, supra; Heine Piano Co. v. Bloomer, supra. But the principles stated in the Del Monte Ranch case have no application to the present action, where there is no claim that Russell, the assignor for collection, has any right of set-off against Adams.

The appellant cites Hammell v. Superior Court, 217 Cal. 5, 17 P.2d 101, as determinative of the right of an assignee for collection to apply the assigned chose as a set-off against his personal obligation. In that case counsel advanced the argument that, inasmuch as the amounts sued for in the complaint were made up of several claims assigned to the plaintiff for collection, the superior court did not have jurisdiction because there were, in fact, separate plaintiffs. In rejecting the contention, the court held that, for the purposes of jurisdiction, since the plaintiff had the capacity to sue in his own name and the aggregate amount demanded fell within the jurisdiction of the court, no further inquiry would be made into the character of the plaintiff's ownership. That decision is of course inapplicable to the present action where the character of the ownership of the claim upon which set-off is sought determines the rights of the parties.

Finally, says the appellant, it makes no difference to the judgment creditor whether the assignee is one for collection or holds both the legal and the equitable title; his only concern is that he should receive a full release from the debt. Such a holding would ignore the fundamental basis of equitable set-off, which is the right to balance mutual demands between the parties to the action, by allowing a stranger to collect his claim through a nominal party. Moreover, in the present case, this stranger is asserting rights against a bona fide purchaser for value.

The judgment is affirmed.

PUCCETTI v. GIROLA et al.

S. F. 16711.

Supreme Court of California.
July 16, 1942.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Aug. 10, 1942.

1. Deeds 🔑31

Codal provision that any person in whom the title of real estate is vested who shall afterwards from any cause have his or her name changed must in any conveyance of such real estate set forth the name in which he or she derived title thereto, abrogates the common-law rule that whatever the name in which the true owner conveyed the property the conveyances as between grantor and grantee transferred the title, and precludes any conveyance that would appear in the record as a wild deed from giving rise to multiple chains of title. Civ.Code, § 1096.

2. Deeds 🔑31

The codal provision that any person in whom title of real estate is vested who shall afterwards from any cause have his or her name changed must in any conveyance of such real estate set forth the name in which he or she derived title thereto is "mandatory". Civ.Code, § 1096.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mandatory".

Where corporation changed its name after taking title to land, but in deeding the land did not set forth the name under which land had been acquired as required by statute, the deed did not pass title, but title remained in the corporation in absence of reformation of the deeds or an adjudication of the identity of grantor. Code Civ.Proc. § 751a; Civ.Code, § 1096.

4. Execution 🔑53

Where corporation changed name after acquiring title to land and in making a voluntary conveyance of the land failed to state the name under which title to the land had been acquired as required by statute, the land was subject to levy of execution on judgment against corporation and passed to judgment creditor by virtue of sheriff's sale and deed. Civ.Code, § 1096.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(1)

In action by judgment creditor who had purchased land at execution sale to quiet title against grantee of judgment debtor because deeds to grantee did not state name under which land had been acquired and because deed was in fraud of creditors, finding that deeds to grantee were not entirely voluntary was without support in the evidence. Civ.Code, § 1096.

6. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑87(1)

Where accounts assigned had been marked closed several months before the purported assignment, they were presumably valueless and their cancellation would not constitute "consideration" for deeds as against creditor of grantor.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Consideration".

The consequences that ordinarily follow the observance of the separate identity of a corporation and the persons who compose it are disregarded when it is necessary to protect the rights of third persons or to prevent injustice.

8. Corporations 🔑542(1)

Assignment of accounts against family corporation by officers and directors to their mother who canceled indebtedness in consideration of conveyances by corporation against which a creditor subsequently obtained judgment constituted merely a "colorable consideration" and did not constitute "value" so as to render conveyances invulnerable to attack by judgment creditor.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Colorable Consideration" and "Value".

9. Mortgages 🔑154(4)

Where mortgagor had no valid legal interest in property, mortgagee acquired no security for its mortgage, where a search of the record would have revealed no predecessor in interest of record to mortgagor's grantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Alberto Puccetti, for whom Gemma Puccetti, as administratrix, etc., was substituted against Madeline Girola and others to quiet title to certain land. From a judgment for the defendant Madeline Girola, who had filed a cross-complaint, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Prior opinion, 119 P.2d 200.

Jesse G. Benson, of Oakland, for appellant.

John J. Beck, of Los Angeles, Altman & Ellis, John C. Altman, and Willard L. Ellis, all of San Francisco, and Donahue, Richards & Hamlin and A. R. Rowell, all of Oakland, for respondents.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

On April 21, 1931, Alberto Puccetti commenced an action against Girola Bros., a corporation, Henry Girola, its president and sole stockholder, and others for fraudulently inducing him to purchase stock in a subsidiary corporation. Before that suit was filed, Girola Bros. had changed its name to Madalay, Inc., and while the action was pending, it conveyed by quitclaim deeds certain real property to defendant Madeline Girola, a director of Girola Bros. and the mother of Henry Girola. The deeds, recorded by Madeline Girola, set forth Madalay, Inc., as grantor, but failed to set forth the name in which Madalay Inc., derived title to the realty as required by section 1096 of the Civil Code. On November 1, 1933, Puccetti obtained a judgment, and on July 9, 1937, recorded an abstract thereof and a writ of execution levying upon all the right, title, and interest of the judgment debtors in the property. On August 18, 1937, Madeline Girola executed a mortgage on the property to defendant State Finance Company who recorded it on October 8, 1937. On November 8, 1937, Puccetti purchased the land at an execution sale and on that day recorded the sheriff's certificate of sale. On December 9, 1938, he recorded the sheriff's deed conveying the property to him. He then brought this action to quiet title to the land, claiming that the conveyance to Madeline Girola was void because it failed to comply with section 1096 of the Civil Code and because it was in fraud of creditors.

The trial court made findings in favor of defendants and granted the cross-complaint of Madeline Girola, quieting title in her. Puccetti has appealed from the judgment. Following his death during the pendency of the appeal, his administratrix, Gemma Puccetti, was substituted as plaintiff and appellant.

It is admitted that the conveyance from Madalay, Inc., to Madeline Girola failed to comply with section 1096 of the Civil Code, providing "Any person in whom the title of real estate is vested, who shall afterwards, from any cause, have his or her name changed, must, in any conveyance of said real estate so held, set forth the name in which he or she derived title to said real estate." Appellant contends that the requirements of this section are mandatory and that a deed in violation thereof does not pass legal title. Respondents argue that the section must be construed to have the same effect as the recording statutes embodied in sections 1213–1218 of the Civil Code, so that a conveyance in disregard thereof can be attacked only by a subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer for value without notice of the change of name by the original owner.

[1, 2] Section 1096 was originally enacted in 1874 following a suggestion of the court in Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am.Dec. 347. In that case, land had been conveyed to Jeremiah Fallon in his nickname, Darby O'Fallon. He conveyed the land in his true name before the enactment of the recording act, and following its enactment he made another conveyance in the name under which he had derived title. In a suit between the successive grantees, the court held that the first grantee was entitled to prevail under the common-law rule that whatever the name in which the true owner conveyed the property, the conveyances as between grantor and grantee transferred the title. Recordation of the first deed was held to be constructive notice to subsequent purchasers even though a search of the record would not have disclosed the earlier deed, which was out of the grantor's chain of title.

Section 1096 seeks to prevent any opportunity for fraud in comparable situations by requiring a grantor who conveys land by a name other than that in which he derived title to recite the change of name in the conveyance. It thus abrogates the common-law rule relied upon in the Fallon case by precluding any conveyance that would appear in the record as a "wild deed" from giving rise to multiple chains of title. Its language is mandatory and nowhere suggests that compliance is excused when a subsequent purchaser has notice of the change in name. It was placed in the chapter entitled "Transfer of Real Property" and grouped with other sections under the heading "Mode of Transfer." Section 1095 in the same chapter provides in similar language that "When an attorney in fact executes an instrument transferring an estate in real property, he must subscribe the name of his principal to it, and his own name as attorney in fact," and it has been held that failure to follow the mandate of that section renders a deed void. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 337; Mitchell v. Benjamin Franklin Bond. & Indemnity Corp., 13 Cal.App.2d 447, 57 P. 2d 185.

[3-8] The deeds from Madalay, Inc., to Madeline Girola were therefore inoperative to pass legal title, and title remained in the grantor corporation, in the absence of a reformation of the deeds to comply with Civil Code section 1096 or of an adjudication of the identity of the grantor under section 751a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The property was thus subject to Puccetti's levy of execution and passed to him by virtue of the sheriff's sale and deed. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Freelon v. Adrian, 161 Cal. 13, 18, 118 P. 220. Had Madeline Girola paid value for the conveyance, she would have an equity in the land that would take priority over the rights of a subsequent purchaser at an execution sale with notice of her interest. Whitney v. Sherman, 178 Cal. 435, 173 P. 931; Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 P. 579, 21 L.R.A. 33, 33 Am.St.Rep. 209. See, also, cases cited in 11 Cal.Jur. p. 123. The trial court's finding, however, that the deeds to Madeline Girola were not entirely voluntary is without support in the evidence, which presents no conflict.

Both Madeline Girola, the grantee, and Josephine Girola, secretary of the grantor corporation, testified that no money was paid and no property transferred by the grantee in consideration of the conveyance. The claimed consideration was alleged to have arisen from the following transaction: Henry, Joseph, and Josephine Girola, who were all members of the Girola family and directors of Girola Bros., received salaries from a subsidiary corporation, which they deposited in the bank accounts of Girola Bros. A large part of this money they drew out in cash, and another part of the money was expended by the corporation for the household expenses of members of the family. The books of the corporation showed that it owed them, at one time, a total of $54,523.46. All these accounts, however, were marked as closed on January 1, 1932. On April 28, 1932, the parties met in the office of their lawyer, where Henry, Joseph, and Josephine Girola executed gratuitous assignments to their mother, Madeline Girola, of the amounts that the books showed the corporation owed them. Madeline Girola immediately executed a cancellation in favor of Madalay, Inc., of the amounts so assigned and received a conveyance of the property. Since the accounts assigned to Madeline Girola were marked closed several months before the purported assignments they were presumably valueless, and their cancellation would not constitute consideration for the deeds. Moreover, even if these accounts had been subsisting the consideration would have been furnished in substance and effect by the grantor. The consequences that ordinarily follow the observance of the separate identity of a corporation and the persons who compose it are disregarded when it is necessary to protect the rights of third persons or to prevent injustice. D. N. & E. Walter & Co. v. Zuckerman, 214 Cal. 418, 6 P.2d 251, 79 A.L.R. 329; Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 227 P. 723; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673. See, also, cases cited in 6A Cal.Jur. 80. The presence of a colorable consideration does not alter the nature of the transaction or the fact that Madeline Girola failed to give value for the deeds.

[9] The parties stipulated that a lien asserted by the defendant Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association and arising from a deed of trust executed by Girola Bros. before the transactions involved herein is a good and subsisting lien and that it will remain so regardless of the outcome of this action. Defendant State Finance Company also asserts a lien by virtue of a mortgage executed by Madeline Girola after the alleged conveyance to her by Madalay, Inc. Since Madeline Girola acquired no interest in the property, however, the finance company acquired no security for its mortgage. Trout v. Taylor, 220 Cal. 652, 32 P. 2d 968; Promis v. Duke, 208 Cal. 420, 281 P. 613; Gould v. Wise, 97 Cal. 532, 32 P. 576, 33 P. 323. The finance company dealt with Madeline Girola at its own risk except for the protection offered by the record, and a search would have revealed no predecessor in interest of record to Madeline Girola's grantor, an omission that would put a prudent person on inquiry.

The judgment is reversed.

CURTIS, Justice.

Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for damages for injuries arising out of an automobile collision.

The two automobiles involved approached from opposite directions on a narrow, winding highway and met in a headon collision on a curve in the road. There was no white line marking the middle of the highway. A bank extended upward on the east or defendants' side of the road, and there was a steep slope extending downward on the west or plaintiffs' side of the road. The plaintiffs testified that the defendants' automobile was on the wrong side of the road and traveling at an excessive rate of speed immediately preceding the collision, while plaintiffs' automobile was on the proper side of the road and traveling at a slow rate of speed. Plaintiff Matthew Speck, the driver of the car, testified that just prior to the impact he swerved slightly toward the center of the road to avoid going over the bank. The defendant driver also turned in and the automobiles came to rest approximately in the center of the road. Philip Sarver, the driver of the defendants' car, testified that at all times he was driving on the proper side of the road at a moderate speed, while just before the collision plaintiff Speck was driving on the wrong side of the road. After the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs, a motion for a new trial was made by the defendants and denied by the trial court.

Upon this appeal it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the plaintiffs were free from negligence. In other words, it is contended that plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. It is also urged that the court erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury, and that there was prejudicial misconduct on the part of plaintiffs' attorney preventing defendants from having a fair trial.

There is no necessity for a detailed discussion of appellants' first contention. From the brief recital of the facts herein and from the other evidence disclosed by the record, it is apparent that the jury was justified in making its implied finding that the plaintiffs were free from contributory negligence. The evidence is conflicting on this issue and the jury's implied finding thereon is conclusive on appeal. Taylor v. Oakland Scavenger Co., 17 Cal.2d 594, 110 P.2d 1044; Flores v. Fitzgerald, 204 Cal. 374, 268 P. 369; Smith v. Rothschild, 3 Cal.App.2d 273, 39 P.2d 464; Wynne v. Wright, 105 Cal.App. 17, 286 P. 1057.

The instruction complained of is as follows: "In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that the plaintiffs did everything that reasonably prudent persons would have done under the circumstances for the protection of their safety. The presumption that plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence is, in itself, a species of evidence which continues with the said plaintiffs throughout the trial of this action and unless and until overcome by evidence to the contrary. This presumption in favor of said plaintiffs must prevail until and unless it is overcome by satisfactory evidence to the contrary."

[1, 2] The rebuttable presumption that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns is declared in section 1963, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure. An instruction as to the existence of this presumption may properly be given to the jury in certain situations. See Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 94 P.2d 590; Ellison v. Lang Transportation Co., 12 Cal.2d 355, 84 P.2d 510; Downing v. Southern Pacific Co., 15 Cal.App.2d 246, 59 P.2d 578.

Such an instruction, however, should not be given where the evidence introduced by the plaintiff discloses the acts and conduct of the injured party immediately prior to or at the time in question. See cases last cited and also Mundy v. Marshall, 8 Cal.2d 294, 65 P.2d 65; Paulsen v. McDuffie, 4 Cal.2d 111, 47 P.2d 709; Rogers v. Interstate Transit Co., 212 Cal. 36, 297 P. 884. In the instant case the plaintiffs testified in regard to the events leading up to the collision. Plaintiff Matthew Speck, the driver, explained all of his actions. Under such circumstances there was no room for the presumption in this case. What was said in Rogers v. Interstate Transit Co., supra, is equally applicable here. It is there stated at page 38 of 212 Cal. at page 885 of 297 P.: "At the trial of this action, plaintiff not only testified as to the circumstances of the collision between the car he was driving and the autostage of the defendant, but he produced witnesses who gave evidence, both direct and on cross-examination, of his acts and conduct just before and at the time of the collision. Whether the plaintiff took ordinary care of his own concerns while operating his car at that particular occasion was a matter of evidence established by the plaintiff and witnesses called by him in support of his claim that he did. In the face of this evidence, there was no room for any presumption. If the evidence on his part showed that he was negligent, then it cannot be said that the jury, notwithstanding this evidence, might presume that he was not negligent, or that he took ordinary care of his own concerns, which amounts to the same thing. On the other hand, if this evidence showed that plaintiff was not negligent in the operation of his car at the time of its collision with defendant's stage, then that fact was before the jury, not as the result of any presumption, but in response to testimony of witnesses testifying in the case. In either event, the jury, in determining whether the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, would look to, and be governed by, the evidence before the court, and not by any presumption." In view of the foregoing, the giving of the instruction complained of was error.

The question still remains whether the instruction was prejudicial under all the circumstances of this case. We are satisfied that it was not. There was considerable testimony on both sides on the question of contributory negligence, and, as previously stated, there was ample evidence to support the jury's implied finding that the plaintiffs were not negligent. The instruction itself was qualified by the phrase "in the absence of evidence to the contrary." Under it the jury was therefore free to accept the contrary evidence and to return a verdict thereon in favor of the defendants. Contributory negligence was fully and properly defined by the court, and the jury was instructed: "If you find from the evidence that plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as defined in this instruction, however slight such contributory negligence on their part may have been, then you should return your verdict for the defendants, and each of them." The jury was further instructed: "Plaintiffs were at all times called upon to exercise ordinary care for their own safety and, if they failed to do so, and such failure was a proximate cause of injury or damage to them, they cannot recover and your verdict must be against them and in favor of defendants." The jury was also told: "Whether the parties did, or did not, use ordinary care is for you to determine from the facts testified to and, if you conclude from the evidence that plaintiffs did not use ordinary care and that their lack of ordinary care contributed proximately to their injury or damage then your verdict must be against the plaintiffs and in favor of defendants." In consideration of the qualification in the instruction itself and in view of the other instructions quoted above, the defendants did not suffer any prejudice by the giving of the instruction. Under such circumstances the error is not prejudicial and does not warrant a reversal. California Constitution, article VI, § 4½; Ellison v. Lang Transportation Co., supra; Tuttle v. Crawford, 8 Cal.2d 126, 63 P.2d 1128; Rogers v. Interstate Transit Co., supra.

Any asserted misconduct on the part of plaintiffs' counsel in implying that defendants' counsel was withholding photographs of the scene of the accident may not be said to have been prejudicial. The trial judge admonished the jury to disregard the statements. Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 163, 239 P. 1061; House v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, 35 Cal.App.2d 336, 342, 95 P.2d 465; Gerberich v. Southern California Edison Co., 26 Cal.App.2d 471, 476, 79 P.2d 783. Nor did plaintiff Matthew Speck's statement on the witness stand that defendant Philip Sarver had stated he was insured constitute prejudicial misconduct under the facts of this case. Speck's statement was made incidentally during testimony as to a conversation which occurred between him and Sarver in which Sarver tended to admit fault. The statement was not made in response to any question by counsel attempting to inject the fact of defendants' insurance into the case. The proper rule governing the reference to insurance in the instant case is found in Packard v. Moore, 9 Cal.2d 571, 580, 71 P.2d 922, 927, wherein this court adopts the following statement from Hughs v. Quackenbush, 1 Cal.App.2d 349, 37 P.2d 99: "While courts have condemned repeatedly attempts to bring before the jury the fact that insurance exists, their condemnation extends only to cases where there is an 'avowed purpose and successful attempt' to bring the fact before the jury. It does not extend to cases where the information comes in, incidentally, in attempting to prove other facts, or where the record does not show that the particular answer was sought or anticipated." See, also, Hatfield v. Levy Brothers, 18 Cal.2d 798, 117 P.2d 841.

The judgment is affirmed.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

I concur for the reason that the rules as to the nature of rebuttable presumptions upon which the foregoing opinion is based have been fixed by many decisions of this court, and any modification of such rules should be effected by the Legislature, and not by overruling at this time the cases establishing them.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

I dissent.

After properly instructing the jury that the defendants had the burden of proving the plaintiffs guilty of contributory negligence, the court proceeded to instruct them that there was a presumption against the existence of facts it was defendant's burden to prove, and that this presumption could be weighed as evidence of their non-existence. This instruction was prejudicial error, for it enabled the jury to tilt the scales against the defendant by arbitrarily attributing more weight to the presumption than to the evidence against it, no matter how extensive or persuasive. Evidence is marshalled to no avail against a presumption under such an instruction, for it is impossible to prove the non-existence of the fact presumed when the jury is free to regard the presumption as superior to any proof against it. So long as the presumption is regarded as superior it is inviolate, and the most exhaustive proof cannot disturb its invulnerability. The rule that rebuttable presumptions may be weighed as evidence is so arbitrary, and its consequences so mischievous that it becomes imperative to set forth to what lengths it has departed from the function and purposes of such presumptions.

When one of the parties to a lawsuit has the burden of proof upon a particular issue, he must establish the existence of the necessary facts by preponderance of the evidence, persuade the jury that it is more probable that these facts exist than that they do not. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 2061, subd. 5, 1826, 1981; Murphy v. Waterhouse, 113 Cal. 467, 45 P. 866, 54 Am.St. Rep. 365; Ergo v. Merced Falls, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 334, 119 P. 101, 41 L.R.A.,N.S., 79; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25. In a civil suit the burden of proof is the maximum requirement that can be placed upon a party who undertakes to prove the existence of facts. In some instances the courts and legislatures have found it necessary to lend assistance to the party bearing the burden of proof. In certain types of cases they have set up rules, designated as rebuttable presumptions, to the effect that when such a party establishes the existence of certain primary facts, the additional facts necessary to prove his case will be presumed to exist, unless the opposing party offers proof that they do not exist, in which case the jury must determine the existence or non-existence of these facts from the evidence. Rebuttable presumptions do not shift the ultimate burden of proof, but impose upon the party without the burden of proof the burden of going forward with the evidence after his opponent has introduced evidence sufficient to establish the existence of certain primary facts. Wigmore, Evidence, 3d Ed., §§ 2487, 2489, 2491; Thayer, A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 314, 315, 317. See Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 398, 22 P. 871; San Francisco v. Tillman Estate Co., 205 Cal. 651, 272 P. 585. They are employed for various reasons. See Morgan, Instructing the Jury on Presumptions and Burden of Proof, 47 Harv.L.Rev. 59, 77; American Law Institute, Code of Evidence Tentative Draft No. 2, (1941) p. 211: (1) To require the litigant with greater access to the facts in dispute to make them known. Thus, if a plaintiff bailor, with the burden of proof, establishes that he delivered property in good condition to a defendant bailee and received it back in a damaged condition, a presumption arises that it was damaged because of the bailee's negligence, and the latter must then come forward with proof that his negligence did not cause the injury. Alpine Forwarding Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 2 Cir., 60 F.2d 734; Rustad v. Great Northern R. Co., 122 Minn. 453, 142 N.W. 727. (2) To assist in solving a dilemma when there is little or no evidence available to prove or disprove a particular fact. Thus, if a person has been continuously absent and unheard from for seven years, he will be presumed dead in the absence of evidence to the contrary, so as to enable a court to distribute his estate. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 26. (3) To facilitate a finding in accord with the balance of probability. Thus, it is presumed that a person found to have met his death by violence did not commit suicide in the absence of contrary evidence. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 1; see Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; 95 A.L.R. 887. (4) To encourage a finding consonant with judicial judgment as to sound social policy. Thus, it is usually presumed that a marriage has been lawfully contracted in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 30.

Rebuttable presumptions are thus no more than procedural devices for the fair apportionment between the litigants of the burden of going forward with the evidence. If the party against whom a presumption operates fails to come forward with substantial evidence tending to prove the nonexistence of the facts presumed, his opponent with the burden of proof is entitled to an instruction that the facts exist. If he does come forward with such evidence, the jury must decide upon the existence of the facts. Wigmore, supra, §§ 2487, 2489, 2491; Thayer, supra, 314-315, 317; 1 Jones, Evidence, 2d Ed., 54.

In the majority of jurisdictions the presumption disappears from the case when evidence is introduced contrary to the facts presumed, and the issue goes to the jury with the primary burden of proving the facts still upon the party who originally assumed it. See cases cited in 22 C.J. 156, note 34; 31 C.J.S., Evidence, § 119; Wigmore, supra, § 2491; Jones, supra, § 32. Some courts, however, hold that a presumption continues to operate until the party against whom it applies introduces evidence that persuades the jury that the non-existence of the facts presumed is as probable as their existence when considered with evidence as to their existence introduced by the litigant in whose favor the presumption operates. O'Dea v. Amodeo, 118 Conn. 58, 170 A. 486; Beggs v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 219 Iowa 24, 257 N.W. 445, 95 A.L.R. 863; Clark v. Diefendorf, 109 Conn. 507, 147 A. 33; Gillett v. Michigan United Traction Co., 205 Mich. 410, 171 N.W. 536; Klunk v. Hocking Valley Ry. Co., 74 Ohio St. 125, 77 N.E. 752. See Morgan, Instructing the Jury Upon Presumptions and Burden of Proof, 47 Harv.L.Rev. 59; McBaine, Presumptions: Are They Evidence? 26 Cal.L.Rev. 519, 533. If the opposing party introduces no substantial evidence to combat the presumption, the court will instruct the jury that the facts exist as a matter of law. If he introduces such evidence the case goes to the jury with instructions that if it disbelieves the evidence of the opposing party, the presumption stands and the verdict should be in favor of the party with the burden of proof. If, however, the jury believes it as probable that the facts do not exist as that they do, it should find in favor of the party against whom the presumption operates.

This view of the effect of presumptions is the sounder one. Under the majority rule the purpose of a presumption can be defeated by perjured testimony that is not believed by the trier of the facts; the mere introduction of evidence, however unreliable, suffices to dispel the presumption. Under the minority rule the presumption remains until sufficient contrary evidence is introduced that the trier of the facts is willing to believe.

In either case, it is clear that a rebuttable presumption is only a procedural device to aid the party with the burden of proof. It would be meaningless if applied against him because he already has the greater burden of introducing sufficient evidence to prove the existence of the facts by the preponderance of the probabilities. Such presumptions cannot constitute actual evidence, as would the observations of witnesses or physical objects or occurrences. They are merely rules establishing the existence of a fact as a matter of law in the absence of credible evidence to the contrary, and apportioning the burden of going forward with the introduction of such evidence. The overwhelming majority of decisions in other jurisdictions agree that rebuttable presumptions cannot be evidence, however, they may disagree as to when they disappear from the case. See cases cited in 95 A.L.R. 880.

Certain cases in California, however, have held that the court should instruct the jury to weigh presumptions as actual evidence along with the testimony in determining the existence of facts, and that presumptions may be directed against the party with the burden of proof. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co. et al., 212 Cal. 540, 299 P. 529; see cases cited in 18 Cal.L.Rev. 418; 20 Cal.L.Rev. 189. See 95 A.L.R. 883. It is a mental impossibility to weigh a presumption as evidence. Juries can decide upon the probable existence of a fact only by a consideration of actual probative evidence bearing thereon. A rule of law that the fact will be presumed to exist in the absence of evidence cannot assist them in determining from an examination of evidence whether or not the fact exists. It is impossible to weigh a rule of law on the one hand against physical objects and personal observations on the other to determine which would more probably establish the existence or non-existence of a fact.

The burden of proof may well be impossible for a litigant to sustain if a presumption is applied as evidence against him. He must, under such a rule, establish the existence of certain facts by a preponderance of the probabilities, while a presumption persists that these facts do not exist and the jury is free to weigh this presumption as evidence upon which to find that the facts do not exist despite physical evidence that they do.

Even when a presumption treated as evidence is applied in favor of the party with the burden of proof, the results are incongruous. The other litigant is in effect informed by the court that his opponent has the burden of proving the facts by the preponderance of the probabilities but there is a presumption that the facts thus to be proved are true, and the jury is free to find on the basis of this presumption that the facts do exist despite physical evidence that they do not. The presumption should serve only to force the party without the burden of proof to come forward with evidence contrary to the facts presumed, not somehow to outweigh the very evidence that he introduces to prove his point.

The California cases have treated presumptions as evidence primarily on the ground that certain code sections compel this result. See McBaine, supra, 26 Cal.L. Rev. 519, 557-561. Code of Civil Procedure section 1961 states: "A presumption (unless declared by law to be conclusive) may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect; but unless so controverted the jury are bound to find according to the presumption." Section 1963 lists 40 rebuttable presumptions that "may be controverted by other evidence." These sections embody the general rule that a rebuttable presumption establishes the existence of a fact unless credible evidence contrary to the fact presumed is presented. They in no way establish that the presumption itself is evidence. The references to "other evidence" serve to distinguish evidence controverting the presumption from evidence of the primary facts that give rise to the presumption and from evidence that may be introduced in support of the fact presumed.

Section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The jury, subject to the control of the court, in the cases specified in this code, are the judges of the effect or value of evidence addressed to them, except when it is declared to be conclusive. They are, however, to be instructed by the court on all proper occasions: * * * 2. That they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds." Certainly there is no statement here that a presumption must be treated as evidence. This section does no more than establish the rule that gives to presumptions greater vitality than they would have if they disappeared upon the introduction of any evidence contrary to the facts presumed. It provides in effect that a rebuttable presumption remains in the case and controls the determination of a jury that disbelieves the evidence contrary to the fact presumed.

Finally, section 1957 provides: "Indirect evidence is of two kinds: 1. Inferences; and 2. Presumptions." This section is a broad classification of indirect evidence and is not concerned with the legal effect of a presumption. At the time of its adoption in 1872, legal writers used the terms presumptions and inferences interchangeably to apply to a logical deduction that could be drawn from a set of facts. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence (Redfield Ed.) 21; 1 Phillipps, Evidence, 3d Ed., 436, 437; 1 Starkie, Evidence, 3d Ed., 404. See Thayer, supra, 546-548; Wigmore, supra, § 2491; McBaine, supra, 26 Cal.L.Rev. 519, 521-527. That this meaning of presumption was intended by the Legislature, when it enacted section 1957 in 1872 is indicated by section 1832, enacted at the same time, which states: "Indirect evidence is that which tends to establish the fact in dispute by proving another, and which, though true, does not of itself conclusively establish that fact, but which affords an inference or presumption of its existence. For example: a witness proves an admission of the party to the fact in dispute. This proves a fact, from which the fact in dispute is inferred." This section defines indirect evidence as an inference, but uses the terms "inference" and "presumption" as synonyms. Section 1957 does not therefore establish rebuttable legal presumptions as evidence in view of other sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which specifically set forth the effect of legal rebuttable presumptions. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1959, 1961, 1963. A construction of these sections to the effect that rebuttable presumptions may be weighed as evidence would in all likelihood render them unconstitutional. Manley v. State of Georgia, 279 U.S. 1, 49 S.Ct. 215, 73 L.Ed. 575; Western & Atlantic R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 279 U.S. 639, 49 S.Ct. 445, 73 L.Ed. 884; Morrison v. California, 291 U.S. 82, 54 S.Ct. 281, 78 L.Ed. 664; New York Life Insur. Co. v. Gamer, 303 U.S. 161, 58 S.Ct. 500, 82 L.Ed. 726, 114 A.L.R. 1218. See, also, People v. Murguia, 6 Cal.2d 190, 57 P.2d 115. See McBaine, supra, 26 Cal.L. Rev. 519, 551, note 66 and authorities there cited.

The rebuttable presumptions enumerated in the codes as well as those established by the courts do not require any set procedural formula to give them effect. If the litigant against whom a presumption operates has the burden of proof, an instruction by the court to the jury that such litigant must establish the facts by a preponderance of the probabilities imposes upon the litigant an even greater burden than that required by the presumption. No mention of the presumption is necessary. If the presumption operates in favor of the party with the burden of proof, the court should instruct the jury that upon the setting up of certain preliminary facts the presumption applies in favor of the party with the burden of proof who is entitled to the verdict unless the other litigant comes forward with credible evidence contrary to the facts presumed. Once such evidence is produced and believed, the jury should weigh it against any evidence introduced in support of the facts presumed and decide in favor of the party against whom the presumption operates if it believes that the non-existence of the facts is as probable as their existence. Nothing need be said about weighing the presumption as evidence. When the evidence against the presumption is clear, positive, uncontradicted and of such a nature that it cannot rationally be disbelieved the court should instruct the jury, as it would regarding inferences, that the non-existence of the fact presumed has been established as a matter of law. Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868; Engstrom v. Auburn Automobile Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059.

There is no agreement in the California cases on the proposition that rebuttable presumptions should be weighed as evidence. The Smellie case, supra, was preceded by a line of decisions holding that presumptions were not evidence. Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279, 375; Nieto's Heirs v. Carpenter, 21 Cal. 455, 489; Larrabee v. Western Pacific Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 747, 161 P. 750. The courts have consistently held that the presumption of innocence from crime cannot be used as evidence in a criminal proceeding. People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 77 P. 777. The Smellie case held that Code of Civil Procedure section 1963, subd. 4, which presumes "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns" should be weighed by the jury as evidence of absence of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. Later cases have limited the application of this presumption to situations where there are no eyewitnesses to an accident, holding that "where it is possible to call eyewitnesses to testify positively to the facts and circumstances surrounding the accident, the presumption is not applicable." Downing v. Southern Pacific Co., 15 Cal.App.2d 246, 59 P.2d 578, 583;

Rogers v. Interstate Transit Co., 212 Cal. 36, 297 P. 884. Still other cases have held that this presumption and similar ones in favor of one party are dispelled when the details of the accident are disclosed by the testimony of that party or his witnesses. Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; Mundy v. Marshall, 8 Cal.2d 294, 65 P.2d 65; Kelly v. Fretz, 19 Cal.App.2d 356, 65 P.2d 914; Paulsen v. McDuffie, 4 Cal.2d 111, 47 P.2d 709. Certain decisions have indicated that the person whose conduct is in question must be dead before the presumption can operate in this manner. Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 94 P.2d 590. In effect these cases hold that the presumption drops out of the case because there is evidence bringing into question the fact presumed. There is in them an inarticulated admission that the character of evidence is foreign to presumptions, and that however often it has artificially been grafted on to them it can be shed with equal facility. Confusion is rife, however, because presumptions have not been clearly divested of their artificial character. They appear now as themselves and again in the guise of evidence. The court has sometimes seen through the disguise when the injustices it would have concealed revealed themselves immediately and boldly. As often as not, however, the court has failed to perceive the injustice through the disguise. It is time to have done with the confusion and inconsistency engendered by its vacillation between the acceptance and the repudiation of presumptions as evidence.

It is pure ritualism that a precedent should gather as much respect from a long life of inconsistency as it would from a long life of certainty, and earn the right to survive merely because it has survived so long. One looks to precedent for certainty, the substance of its vitality. If instead it offers only confusion it loses its right to endure indefinitely. The confusion in the California cases as to the function of rebuttable presumptions can be eliminated only by repudiating the erroneous view that such presumptions may be weighed as evidence. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, and the cases following it should be overruled.

In the field of evidence and procedure everything is gained and little lost by overruling an irrational precedent. Nothing is taken away, as it might be in the substantive law of property and contracts, upon which one is entitled to rely. Certainly the parties in an automobile accident cannot reasonably contend that they operated their vehicles in reliance on the rule in the Smellie case. That rule was a judge-made rule and should be laid at rest where it originated. It would be most inappropriate to shift the responsibility for its demise to the Legislature, for it involves not questions of policy, but technical questions of procedure that are peculiarly within the province of the courts. If the court can view with equanimity a legislative repudiation of the rule, its own adherence to the rule springs no longer from a conviction of its rightness, but from a willingness to endure its wrongness until others less suited to the task take the initiative in its repudiation.

REXSTREW et al. v. CITY OF HUNTINGTON PARK et al.

L. A. 18270.

Supreme Court of California.

July 30, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1942.

1. Mandamus 🔑168(4)

Evidence that city had ample funds to pay salaries of policemen and firemen whose positions were ostensibly abolished for economy purposes, that four of six policemen dismissed and one of three firemen dismissed were re-employed within comparatively short time, that young probationary fireman was retained, and that dismissed policeman's duties were performed by school traffic officer not within civil service ordinance, authorized mandamus compelling reinstatement of dismissed policeman and fireman. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1401, Act 1402, and Act 5233, § 852; St.1939, p. 1987.

2. Officers 🔑69

The power to abolish a position may not be used to effect discharge of employee protected by salutary provisions of civil service regulations unless such power is exercised in good faith.

3. Appeal and error ⚿1010(1)

A trial court's finding of fact, supported by substantial evidence, would not be disturbed on appeal.

4. Statutes ⚿158, 159

Repeals by implication are not favored and are recognized only when there is a conflict between two or more legislative enactments.

5. Municipal corporations ⚿76, 78

Where the Legislature, in 1935, expressly ratified ordinances creating civil service systems, 1937 re-enactment of general statute providing that city council should appoint all city employees who should hold office during pleasure of council did not impliedly repeal such ordinances, especially in view of 1939 statute again expressly ratifying ordinances. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1401, Act 1402, and Act 5233, § 852; St.1939, p. 1987.

6. Mandamus ⚿177

Where policeman and fireman were improperly dismissed and were ordered reinstated in mandamus proceeding, and, after dismissal, all firemen and policemen had been subjected to salary decrease, such decrease was properly deducted in awarding accrued salary to dismissed policeman and fireman.

7. Mandamus ⚿177

Where policeman and fireman were improperly dismissed and were ordered reinstated in mandamus proceeding, any remuneration received by them from other gainful employment since their dismissal should be deducted from accrued salary awarded them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clark, Judge.

Mandamus by Stanley E. Rexstrew and another against the City of Huntington Park and others. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

For prior opinion, see 120 P.2d 136.

Christopher J. Griffin, City Atty., of Huntington Park, for appellants.

John J. Hamilton, Clyde E. Grafton, and Charles X. Arnold, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

In this proceeding in mandamus the trial court entered a judgment reinstating respondents Rexstrew and Cantonwine, respectively, to the positions of fireman and policeman in the city of Huntington Park, California, and directing payment of their salaries from the date of dismissal from service until their reinstatement. The defendant city and its officers have appealed from the judgment.

Huntington Park is a city of the sixth class. Municipal Corporations Act, Stats. 1883, p. 93, as amended, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, Act 5233. In 1932 the electors of the city passed an initiative ordinance (No. 767) by which they inaugurated a civil service system for the employees of the fire department. In 1934 a similar initiative ordinance (No. 821a) was enacted for the members of the police department. In 1935 the Legislature conferred express authority on municipalities to enact such legislation for the selection, classification, suspension and discharge of appointive employees. Stats.1935, ch. 48, p. 380, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 1401. At the same session the Legislature ratified all existing municipal ordinances creating civil service systems. Stats.1935, ch. 136, p. 485; Stats.1939, ch. 579, p. 1987; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937 and Supp.1939 Act 1402. This express ratification established the validity of the two initiative ordinances relied on by respondents. City of Sacramento v. Adams, 171 Cal. 458, 464, 153 P. 908; City of Redlands v. Brook, 151 Cal. 474, 478, 91 P. 150.

The record shows that on or about June 10, 1938, the personnel of the fire department was increased by two new members, Snoeberger and Peterson. On August 22, 1938, approximately two months later, the city council passed a resolution (No. 1758) which recited that "for purposes of economy to effect a reduction of expenses in the Police and Fire Departments" the number of members of those departments should be reduced, and nine persons were ordered discharged. The resolution also recited that the employees so named were those who could best be spared from their respective ranks and departments in order to bring about the required reduction in personnel. A few minutes before this resolution was passed, the chief of police and the chief of the fire department were requested, respectively, to name six members of the police department and three employees of the fire department who were least qualified for their positions. The names submitted by them were those set forth in the resolution, among which were included Cantonwine from the police department and Rextrew from the fire department. At the time they were dismissed, Rexstrew had been a member of the fire department for ten years and Cantonwine had been employed in the police department for about six years. Snoeberger was not named among those dismissed from the fire department and has remained in his position since his appointment. Peterson was dismissed pursuant to the resolution but was reemployed in April, 1939. It further appears that several of the six members dismissed from the police department have since been reemployed in that department.

The trial court found that respondents, following their dismissal, made repeated attempts to obtain reinstatement by application to the civil service board, the city council and the heads of their respective departments, and that they brought this action after such endeavors had failed and within five months after their discharge. There was ample evidence to support the finding that they were not guilty of laches.

The trial court also found that respondents were not dismissed for the purpose of effecting necessary economy, that there was no lack of work in either department to warrant their discharge, that there were ample funds in the city treasury with which their salaries could have been paid for the fiscal year 1938–1939, and that they were not discharged in good faith, but for the purpose of enabling appellants to replace them by persons more favored by the governing officers of the city.

The members of the city council contend the resolution was passed in good faith and only for reasons of economy. They claim that shortly before the resolution was passed they received an audit showing a deficit in the city funds for the year closing June 30, 1938, and that in order to make up such deficit they reduced the personnel in the fire and police departments instead of raising the tax rate.

[1] Contrary to appellants' contention that the dismissal of respondents was necessary to effect economy, the evidence and inferences deducible therefrom adequately support the trial court's finding that such discharge was not in fact made necessary because of lack of funds, but was for the purpose of replacing respondents by other persons. The city treasurer testified that at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1938, there was in the general fund the sum of $83,064.70, and in the reserve "water" fund the sum of $59,656.66. Appellants admit such sums were on deposit as reserve funds at that time. During the examination of the city treasurer, counsel for appellants stated, "I will stipulate we had plenty of money to pay these salaries." There was evidence that, following the dismissal of Rexstrew, Snoeberger, a younger man who had been employed in the fire department only two months previously, was retained, and that Peterson, the other probationary employee and likewise a younger man, was subsequently reemployed. The evidence also showed that after Cantonwine's dismissal his duties as patrolman were performed by a school traffic officer whose classification was not within the provisions of the police civil service ordinance. Moreover, of the six members dismissed from the police department, four were given reemployment therein and some within two months after their discharge.

[2, 3] The power to abolish a position may not be used to effect the discharge of an employee protected by the salutary provisions of civil service regulations, unless such power is exercised in good faith. Livingstone v. MacGillivray, 1 Cal.2d 546, 553. 36 P.2d 622; Childress v. Peterson, 18 Cal. 2d 636, 117 P.2d 336; Winslow v. Bull, 97 Cal.App. 516, 523, 275 P. 974. Here respondents held their respective positions under tenure acquired through the adoption of the civil service ordinances. Each had attained the status of a permanent employee and neither was charged with misconduct or any dereliction of duty referred to in the ordinances. The trial court's findings that the positions were not abolished in good faith, being supported by substantial evidence, will not be disturbed by this court.

[4, 5] Appellants also claim that section 852 of the Municipal Corporations Act, as reenacted in 1937, Stats.1937, p. 1811, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 5233, which provided that the city council should appoint all city employees, who should hold office "during the pleasure of said city council," operated as an implied repeal of any previous limitation placed on the power to dismiss by the fire and police department ordinances. Repeals by implication are not favored and are recognized only when there is a conflict between two or more legislative enactments. Railroad Commission v. Riley, 192 Cal. 54, 57, 218 P. 415, and cases there cited. Section 852 of said act has been in effect in substantially the same language since the incorporation of the city. It was not materially different at the time the fire and police ordinances were enacted. The Legislature having expressly ratified the ordinances in 1935, it cannot be held they were intended to be repealed by implication at the next session of the Legislature by the reenactment of a section of a general law. Moreover, it appears that subsequent to the commencement of this action, and at the 1939 session of the Legislature the ordinances were again expressly ratified. St.1939, p. 1987.

[6] The evidence shows that commencing on September 1, 1938, all members of the fire and police departments of the city were subjected to a ten per cent decrease in salary, which is still in effect. The trial court properly deducted that percentage in awarding accrued salary to respondents.

[7] The record fails to disclose, however, whether respondents have received remuneration from other employment since their discharge. If they have been gainfully employed, any remuneration received from such employment should be deducted from the accrued salary due them. Wiles v. State Personnel Board, 19 Cal.2d 344, 121 P.2d 673; State Board of Equalization v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 467, 127 P.2d 4.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause is remanded for the purpose of taking evidence on the question whether respondents have received remuneration from other employment since their dismissal, such amount, if any, to be then deducted from the accrued salary awarded under the trial court's judgment. The trial court shall then issue its writ of mandate requiring the reinstatement of respondents, with accrued salary from the date of their discharge, less any sum received by them as salary from employment subsequent to their dismissal. Since respondents remain the prevailing parties, they are entitled to their costs on this appeal.

BURR et al. v. PACIFIC INDEMNITY CO. et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
July 21, 1942.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 20, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⚷931(1)

The appellate court is justified in assuming that trial court's fact findings, not attacked in appellants' briefs, were amply supported by evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⚷931(1)

On appeal from judgment for plaintiff, evidence must be taken most favorably to plaintiff in determining sufficiency thereof to support trial court's fact findings.

3. Highways ⚷113(4)

In action against highway tunnel contractor for labor and materials furnished by plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding of facts showing that parties never entered into binding written contract in that there was no meeting of minds.

4. Highways ⚷113(4)

When highway tunnel contractor refused to pay person furnishing labor and materials any part of money due him under their oral or implied agreement, he was legally justified in ceasing work and suing contractor for value of work and materials already furnished.

5. Highways ⚷113(1)

Where proposed written contract to perform work for and furnish materials to highway tunnel contractor was never legally executed, other party thereto was not bound by provisions of such contract that extra work could be charged for only when contracted for in writing signed by tunnel contractor, that he might retain amount sufficient to meet subcontractors', laborers' or materialmen's claims, and that such other party could not cease work until ten days after default in any payment and after giving five days written notice.

6. Appeal and error ⚷684(4), 688(1)

Where points, made by motion to dismiss action and motion for leave to reopen case so as to set up additional defense by amendment to answer and produce evidence in support thereof, appeared only in clerk's transcript, setting out notice of such motions, and purported affidavits and counter affidavits, such matters cannot be considered by appellate court, in absence of record showing that motions were made or presented to trial court or of what evidence was presented to such court in support of or opposition to granting of motions.

7. Appeal and error ⚷614

Only the trial judge can certify on appeal the evidence presented to him on trial or hearing of motion, and purported affidavits, appearing in clerk's transcript and certified only by clerk, cannot be considered by appellate court.

8. Appeal and error ⚷907(1)

The appellate court must assume any state of facts which will support trial court's action, in absence of proper record affirmatively showing otherwise.

9. Appeal and error ⚷688(1)

Where record on appeal did not show that motion to reopen case, so as to set up additional defense by amendment of answer, was presented to trial court or what evidence was presented in support of or opposition to granting of such motion, presentation of affidavit in support of defendants' motion for new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence of facts stated in previous motion cannot benefit them on appeal.

10. Highways ⚷113(4)

In action against highway tunnel contractor for work done and materials furnished by plaintiff, evidence held to justify trial judge's finding that conduit was damaged by plaintiff's subcontractor's negligent operation of tractor and that owner of conduit was not contributorily negligent, so as to require deduction of amount of such damage from amount of plaintiff's judgment as off-set.

11. Set-off and counterclaim ⚷28(1)

In action against highway tunnel contractor for work done and materials furnished by plaintiff, amount of partial payment to plaintiff's subcontractor for hauling dirt held properly deducted from amount of plaintiff's judgment as off-set.

12. Costs ⚷252

The provision of Public Works Act for award of reasonable attorney's fee as costs to prevailing party on trial of action thereunder limits such fee to trial and does not warrant allowance of further fee on appeal. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6423, § 2.

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by P. L. Burr and another against the Pacific Indemnity Company and others for the value of work, labor, and materials furnished by plaintiff Burr. From a judgment for plaintiff Burr, defendants appeal, and, from so much of the judgment as failed to allow such plaintiff certain additional sums, he appeals.

Affirmed.

Courtney L. Moore and Walter A. Dold, both of San Francisco, for plaintiffs and appellants.

Theodore M. Stuart, of San Francisco, for defendants and appellants.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Two cross-appeals are herein presented on the one typewritten transcript: (1) An appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, P. L. Burr, and (2) an appeal by plaintiff, Burr, from that part of the judgment only which failed to allow him as part of his recovery two additional items of $481.38 and $2,140.

The action arose out of work done by Burr for defendant DuPuy in the construction of the Broadway low level tunnel for Joint Highway District No. 13, and was for work, labor and materials furnished by said plaintiff. The amount of the judgment for plaintiff is not attacked by defendants, and we are entitled to assume that it is supported by the evidence. Defendants urge two grounds for reversal which are thus stated in their opening brief:

"1. Can a contractor quit an uncompleted job, and recover the reasonable value of work and labor performed when he quits in direct violation of the terms of his written contract?

"2. Can two persons jointly maintain a lawsuit for work and labor performed as contractors on a construction job when only one of them has a contractor's license, when the other has no license, and when the two of them have not a joint or combination license as required by the Contractors' License Law?"

Under point one defendants in their opening brief assume, without argument or discussion, that the work sued for by Burr was done under a written contract and that certain provisions of that contract were violated by Burr when he quit the job with his work unfinished on October 15, 1937. This assumption flies directly in the teeth of findings V and VII made by the trial court in the following language:

"V. That the said plaintiff and the said DuPuy on June 30, 1937, and July 1, 1937, attempted to enter into a written agreement under which the said plaintiff was to furnish said labor, materials and supplies, and there was then prepared a portion of said agreement in typewriting with ink interlineations and four separate letters; all to be signed or initialed by the plaintiff P. L. Burr and the said defendant DuPuy. That the said plaintiff Burr and the said defendant DuPuy verbally agreed that all of the said writings combined would constitute their written agreement, one of which was the 'breakdown' on which the monthly payments were to be computed. Thereupon the said Burr signed or initialed all of said papers and the said DuPuy signed or initialed all thereof except the fourth letter (referred to in the evidence as the 'disputed letter') which said letter the said DuPuy accepted and approved and agreed to sign and mail to said Burr; that thereafter said DuPuy falsely represented that he had signed and mailed the same to said Burr; that the said disputed letter contained material provisions and agreements without which the said attempted written agreement was incomplete and failed to accomplish a complete meetings (sic) of minds or become a binding written contract; that said DuPuy has repudiated the obligations of said disputed letter."

"VII. That although the said attempt to enter into an agreement in writing failed the said plaintiff and the said defendant DuPuy proceeded with said work as though the prices, terms of payment and times of payment set forth in the said various writings were effective and represented to that extent the agreement of the parties; and, in furnishing the said labor, materials and supplies, the said defendant DuPuy well knew that the said plaintiff was proceeding upon the understanding that the agreed prices, terms of payment and times of payment were those set forth in the said various writings; and the said defendant DuPuy recognized his obligation to pay said prices at the times and in the amounts so specified. That the said agreed prices were and are the reasonable value of the said labor, materials and supplies."

[1] These two findings are in no way attacked in defendants' opening brief, and in their closing brief they content themselves with a general statement that both parties recognized from July 1 to October 15 that they were conducting their operations under a contract. In this state of the briefs we would be justified in assuming that finding V and VII above quoted find ample support in the evidence. Robben v. Benson, 43 Cal.App. 204, 213, 214, 185 P. 200; Royal Realty Co. v. Harvey Inv. Co., 95 Cal.App. 352, 360, 272 P. 805; Brovelli v. Bianchi, 136 Cal. 612, 69 P. 416; 2 Cal.Jur. 877.

[2, 3] An examination of the transcript shows that this assumption is correct. Taking the evidence most favorable to plaintiff (in accordance with the time honored rule governing appellate courts) it appears that a typewritten contract to be executed by Burr and DuPuy was prepared by an attorney acting for DuPuy; that this contract was supplemented by three letters signed or initialed by both parties; that Burr submitted to DuPuy a fourth letter (called in finding V the "disputed letter") stating that he would not sign the formal contract unless DuPuy agreed to and signed this fourth letter; that DuPuy promised to sign the letter and thereupon the formal contract was signed by Burr, and DuPuy had his pen in hand prepared to sign the letter when they were interrupted by a third party; that DuPuy then said that he would sign the letter later and mail it to Burr and that Burr before leaving said: "Now that is the condition because I do not want to go on with this contract and will not go on with this contract unless that letter is satisfactory and according to our agreement." The "disputed letter" was never signed by DuPuy although several times afterwards he promised Burr that he would sign it. Meanwhile Burr entered upon the performance of the work, and progress payments were made to him until October 15 when DuPuy refused to pay him anything further and Burr thereupon quit the job.

The evidence above recited having to do with the "disputed letter" is corroborated by certain witnesses, who represented the bonding company which furnished Burr's bond on the representation of DuPuy that he had signed or would sign the "disputed letter." Their testimony further shows that when it finally became apparent that DuPuy had not signed and would not sign the "disputed letter" the bonding company refused to be bound by its bond and returned the check for the premium to DuPuy.

That under the facts found by the trial court in finding V no binding written contract was ever entered into is such a simple truism of the law of contracts as to require no citation of authority. In the language which is familiar to every first year law student there was no meeting of the minds.

[4] When DuPuy on October 15 refused to pay Burr any part of the money then due him under their oral or implied agreement Burr was legally justified in ceasing work and suing for the value of the work and materials already furnished. Porter v. Arrowhead Reservoir Co., 100 Cal. 500, 35 P. 146; San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton Land & Improvement Co., 119 Cal. 272, 51 P. 335; Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., 60 Cal. App. 516, 213 P. 529; Big Boy Drilling Corp., Ltd. v. Etheridge, 44 Cal.App.2d 114, 119, 111 P.2d 953.

[5] Defendants do not question this rule of law but argue that it is inapplicable to this case: (1) Because under the written contract extra work (of which there was admittedly considerable) could only be charged for where contracted for in writing signed by DuPuy; (2) because under the written contract DuPuy was entitled to retain an amount sufficient to meet any claims against the work by subcontractors, laborers or materialmen; and (3) because under the written contract Burr was not entitled to cease work until 10 days after default in any payment and then only after giving 5 days' written notice. These points all assume and depend on the existence of the written contract. The finding of the trial court that the proposed written contract was never entered into destroys their major premise. Burr was not bound by any of these provisions of the proposed but legally unexecuted contract and the arguments predicated thereon are left without factual foundation.

The second point relied upon by defendants depends upon the following facts: F. A. Dailey was Burr's foreman on the job. On the witness stand he testified that he had a written contract with Burr. Upon defendants' demand this writing was produced but was not introduced into evidence on the trial of action. At a later stage of the trial it was stipulated that Dailey should be added as a party plaintiff and Alta Electric and Mechanical Company, Inc., should be added as a party defendant, without any amendment to the pleadings. This was done by formal written order of the court. The judgment as entered, however, runs only in favor of Burr, and defendants point to no evidence in the reporter's transcript which would support a judgment in favor of Dailey.

[6, 7] After judgment had been ordered by the court defendants for the first time raised the point that Dailey was a party to the contract between Burr and DuPuy and that Dailey had no contractor's license and Dailey and Burr had no joint license. This point was apparently made by motion to dismiss the action on that ground and also by motion for leave to reopen the case so as to set up that defense by amendment to the answer and to produce evidence in support thereof. These matters appear in the clerk's transcript only and in the following fashion: There are set out therein a "notice of motion to dismiss proceedings" and a "notice of motion to reopen case" and what purports to be affidavits and counter-affidavits. Attached to a purported affidavit of Courtney L. Moore is a purported copy of the agreement between Dailey and Burr which is alleged to be the agreement under which Dailey was acting on the job in question.

On the record so presented we cannot consider the matters attempted to be presented on this appeal. The record in the first place nowhere shows that either motion was ever made or presented to the court. But assuming that they were made and that a general order which appears in the reporter's transcript under date of March 22, 1941, reading: "The court further orders that all motions be and the same are hereby denied" was a denial of these motions, there is still no record before us from which we can tell what evidence was or may have been presented to the trial court in support of or in opposition to the granting of either motion. No rule is better settled than the one that only the trial judge can certify on appeal the evidence which was presented to him upon either a trial or the hearing of a motion. Purported affidavits appearing in the clerk's transcript and certified only by the clerk cannot be considered by an appellate court. Strumberger v. Hall, 5 Cal.2d 22, 52 P.2d 917; Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054; Egan v. Bishop, 8 Cal.App.2d 119, 47 P.2d 500; 2 Cal.Jur. 526.

[8] In the absence of a proper record affirmatively showing otherwise we must assume any state of facts which will support the action of the trial court. Ward v. Ward, 15 Cal.2d 234, 237, 100 P.2d 773. Thus we are entitled to assume on the record before us either that the motions were never presented to the trial court, or that if presented the evidence then produced before the trial court justified their denial.

[9] The same matter was again presented on motion for new trial as appears from the reporter's transcript certified by the judge who tried the case. The motion for new trial was supported by an affidavit reciting among other matters that the fact that Dailey did not have a contractor's license was first discovered on February 26, 1941. The record shows that the findings and judgment were not signed and filed until March 22, 1941. Since we are entitled to assume on the record here presented either that no motion to reopen the case was presented to the court, or that if presented the evidence then before the court was sufficient to justify its denial, the presentation of this affidavit in support of their motion for new trial cannot benefit defendants on this appeal. If no motion to reopen was made during the period between February 26 and March 22, 1941, defendants could not rely upon the ground of newly discovered evidence in support of their motion for new trial. Rockwell v. Italian-Swiss Colony, 10 Cal.App. 633, 637, 103 P. 162. If the motion was made and denied, the assumption that its denial was based on sufficient evidence would preclude the defendants from questioning the action of the trial court in denying their motion for new trial on this ground.

[10] The plaintiff's appeal presents the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify two deductions by way of offsets from the amount of his judgment.

The first is an item of $481.38. Sheerin, a witness for defendants, testified that DuPuy was required by the District Engineer to pay this amount for damage to certain conduit pipes and cable which were damaged by a tractor running over them. He further testified that Farish, a subcontractor under plaintiff, had tractors on the job at the time. Dailey while denying knowledge of the cause of this damage testified that a tractor would have to run over this conduit to get in and out of the tunnel. It is claimed that this item is excessive on its face, that there was no proof that it was for the reasonable value of the repairs, no proof that the damage was caused by plaintiff's negligence and that the owner of the material damaged was guilty of contributory negligence.

In the trial of the case, extending over a period of many days and involving testimony concerning many dozens of items, the evidence at times, as in this instance, was undoubtedly sketchy. On the cross-examination of defendants' witness no inquiry was made as to the reasonableness of this particular item; the witness testified that DuPuy paid the amount and its reasonableness was apparently not questioned at the time. We think that the trial judge was justified in drawing an inference from the testimony that the conduit was damaged by the negligent operation of one of the tractors operated by Burr's subcontractor (there was no evidence of any other tractors operating on the job at that particular time) and that contributory negligence of the owner of the conduit was not proved.

[11] The $2,140 item represents an amount paid to Farish, Burr's subcontractor, for hauling dirt. Sheerin, defendants' witness, testified that this represented 2,140 yards of dirt at $1.00 per yard hauled from the trenches in the tunnel. Dailey testified for plaintiff that none of this dirt was hauled out of the tunnel. This conflict was resolved by the trial court in favor of defendants. Plaintiff makes the further claim that in any event the full amount paid Farish by DuPuy, including this $2,140, was already once deducted from plaintiff's claim in arriving at the judgment and that in deducting it a second time the court was duplicating the off-set. The unit prices under which Burr was working provided $1 per foot for digging this trench, which would include hauling the material away if necessary. The full charge was made by plaintiff for this work and included in the judgment. It is thus clear that the $2,140 was a partial payment on account of this $1 per foot of excavation and hence properly deducted.

[12] Plaintiff quotes section 2 of the Public Works Act: (Deering's Gen.Laws, Act 6423) "Upon the trial of any such action, the court shall award to the prevailing party a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed as costs, and to be included in the judgment therein rendered."

An attorney's fee was included in the judgment. Plaintiff asks for an additional attorney's fee on appeal. The language of the section, "upon the trial," clearly limits the attorney's fee to the trial, and we find no warrant therein for the allowance of a further fee on appeal. No California case in point has been cited or found by us but the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in National Credit Co. v. Franklin, 177 Okl. 417, 60 P.2d 744, reached a similar conclusion on a statute apparently not so clearly limiting the fee to the trial of the action as ours.

The judgment is affirmed on both appeals.

STERLING v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO.

Civ. 13339.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 31, 1942.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑151(3)

Where executor of maker of note admitted that note was given and that none of the principal, and only part of the interest, had been paid, letters written by maker to payee, prior to expiration of the four-year limitation period, assuring payee of maker's appreciation of payee's forbearance and that note would be paid, when considered together, constituted an "acknowledgment" and the proper basis for an implied unconditional promise to pay within statute providing that a written acknowledgment takes the case out of the limitation statute, and lifted the bar of the four year limitation statute, starting it to run anew after the date of the first letter. Code Civ.Proc. § 360; § 337, subd. 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Acknowledgment".

2. Limitation of actions 🔑199(3)

The sufficiency of an acknowledgment as evidence of a continuing contract so as to lift the bar of a limitation statute and start it running anew is a matter of judicial interpretation as a "question of law". Code Civ.Proc. § 312 et seq., and § 360.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Question of Law".

3. Limitation of actions 🔑151(1)

A distinct and unqualified written admission of an existing debt, signed by the party to be charged, without intimation of intent to refuse payment, establishes the debt as a "continuing contract", so as to interrupt the running of a limitation statute, and the law implies a promise to pay from the acknowledgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 312 et seq., and § 360.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Continuing Contract".

4. Appeal and error 🔑176

In action against estate of maker of note, appellate court was required to treat allegation of complaint that claim had been presented on the note, which was admitted by the answer, as a fact.

5. Appeal and error 🔑931(8)

In action against estate of maker of note, finding that cause of action was barred by four-year limitation statute was required to be construed as a finding that there was neither an acknowledgment of the debt nor a new promise, so as to authorize review of executor's contention that payee had failed to allege and prove facts showing liability under a new conditional promise. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; § 360.

6. Limitation of actions 🔑151(3)

The distinction between a "new contract" and a "continuing contract", both operating to take a case out of the limitation statutes, is that a continuing contract is established by acknowledgment or promise while the contract is a subsisting liability, and a new contract is established when the acknowledgment or promise is made after the statutory bar has attached. Code Civ. Proc. § 312 et seq., and § 360.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "New Contract".

7. Limitation of actions ⚷148(2)

A promise sufficient to supplant the original one and take the case out of a limitation statute cannot be inferred because the debtor in making the acknowledgment also expresses hope either as to time or manner of payment, and an express promise necessarily excludes a promise by implication, whereas the mere acknowledgment carries with it a promise furnished by law. Code Civ.Proc. § 312 et seq., and § 360.

8. Executors and administrators ⚷226

Where distribution decree had not been rendered and payee of note was a nonresident and had no notice of the time within which claims were required to be filed, payee's claim was not barred by failure to present it to the executor within the time limited by the notice to creditors, notwithstanding that payee was informed of maker's death shortly after it occurred, since payee had no duty to pursue inquiry but was entitled to present her claim any time before distribution decree was rendered. Civ.Code, § 19; Probate Code, §§ 700, 702, 707.

9. Executors and administrators ⚷226

The statute providing that every person having actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry has constructive notice of the fact itself where inquiry would have disclosed such fact does not cut off a nonresident creditor's right to present his claim against a decedent's estate anytime before distribution if he is without actual notice of the time for presentation of claims as limited by published notice to creditors. Civ.Code, § 19; Probate Code, §§ 700, 702, 707.

10. Notice ⚷6

Under statute providing that every person having actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry has constructive notice of the fact itself, where, by prosecuting inquiry, he might have learned such fact, before a party may be charged with "implied notice" he must have a duty to pursue the inquiry. Civ.Code, § 19.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Implied Notice".

11. Notice ⚷6

If a party has information of extraneous facts, not amounting to or showing actual notice but sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry respecting a conflicting interest, and the circumstances are such that the inquiry if made and followed up would lead to a discovery of the truth, to a knowledge of the interest really existing, the party is charged with "constructive notice" of such interest.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Notice".

12. Notice ⚷6

If no duty is imposed by law upon a person to make inquiry and where a prudent man would not be put upon inquiry, that means of knowledge are open to a party and he has not availed himself of them does not debar him from relief when thereafter he makes actual discovery. Civ.Code, § 19.

13. Notice ⚷6

The doctrine of "implied notice" applies only to situations where failure to make inquiry would amount to dereliction of duty or failure to take ordinary care of one's own concerns. Civ.Code, § 19.

14. Executors and administrators ⚷449

In action against estate of maker of note, executor's answer, admitting execution of note and nonpayment of principal or more than a designated amount of interest, raised no issue of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Norman A. Bailie, Judge.

Action by Emma A. Sterling against Title Insurance & Trust Company, as executor of the estate of Alice Bolan Emery, also known as Alice Bolan Sterling, deceased, on a note. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff.

Geo. W. Rochester and Harry P. Bowman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. Sidney Laughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

Appeal by plaintiff from an adverse judgment in an action against defendant executor upon a rejected claim. Judgment went for defendant upon the ground that the promissory note which was the subject of the action was barred by the provisions of section 337, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure and sections 700, 702, and 707 of the Probate Code. The first section relates to the time for commencement of actions, the latter sections to the time for presentation of claims.

Plaintiff holds a note executed by decedent April 6, 1932, for $10,000; it was due March 16, 1933, and would have been barred March 16, 1937. The maker, Alice B. Sterling, later Alice Bolan Emery, lived in Beverly Hills, California, and plaintiff, payee of the note, at all times material to the case, lived in Pennsylvania. Alice Bolan Emery died in Los Angeles County March 11, 1939; defendant executor was appointed and qualified April 4, 1939, and on that date notice to creditors was first published, fixing October 8, 1939, as the last day for the presentation of claims against the estate. On the 24th day of April, 1940, plaintiff presented to the executor her claim, showing unpaid principal in the sum of $10,000 and unpaid interest in the additional sum of $2,880. The claim was rejected and this action was brought.

From the foregoing dates it will be observed that the note matured almost six years before the death of the maker and that action thereon would then normally have been barred for almost two years. It will be noted further that the claim was presented to the executor more than six months after the time limited for presentation of claims as stated in the notice to creditors. If, therefore, the operation of the statute of limitations was not interrupted, the claim was properly rejected by the executor upon the ground that the statute had run, and with reference to the presentation of the claim, if plaintiff's delay was not legally excusable it was properly rejected because it was presented too late.

Upon the first point plaintiff relies upon four letters written to her by the debtor, portions of which were pleaded in the complaint and proved at the trial and which were dated and read as follows:

"October 20, 1936. I am so sorry I cannot send you more money. I worry about it all the time, but if things come back like people think, I hope I will be able to sell that house and get you your money. You have been so nice about it. I can't tell you how much I appreciate it, but I assure you you will get it all just as soon as I can manage it."

"December 15, 1936. Am enclosing a check for $25.00 and I am always ashamed to send it. You have been so patient, that I am doing the best I can until I can sell some property which I hope will not be long now."

"March 2, 1937. Mama Tade I feel terribly that I haven't been able to send you some money, but I have had the most awful time with that house, the people haven't paid any rent since November, and I had to go to court to have them put out and each time the day would come, they got a doctor's certificate that one of the children were ill and according to the law you can't evict them when there is sickness. * * * but I will do the best I can to sell it as soon as possible so I can get you some money I know you need it."

"August 10, 1938. I am sorry I haven't been able to send you any money, but I just haven't got it. I have had to put a mortgage on the Walden house to pay my taxes, etc., that this fall I am going to put that Wilshire lot on the market and taking anything I can get for it and if I can sell it I will pay off part of that note."

It will be observed that three of the letters were written prior to the expiration of the four-year period and one was written afterward. We shall consider the first three as a group. The conclusion we have reached as to the effect which should be given to them as acknowledgments of the debt renders it unnecessary for us to consider the fourth letter in that connection.

Upon this point three principal questions are discussed in the briefs: (1) Do these letters constitute an acknowledgment of the debt so as to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations? (2) Do the expressions in the letters constitute a promise of payment which should be recognized as a substitute for the original obligation? And (3) if the letters do express a new promise, was it a conditional one?

The first question is presented on the record as a clean-cut question of law. The second and third questions, while they are argued in the briefs, involve questions of law which were not raised at the trial and questions of fact which were only impliedly put at rest by the findings of fact.

[1, 2] The three letters, considered together, as they should be (Searles v. Gonzalez, 1923, 191 Cal. 426, 432, 433, 216 P. 1003, 28 A.L.R. 78), amounted to an acknowledgment which lifted the bar of the statute of limitations and started it running anew, as of the date of the first letter, October 20, 1936, which was less than four years prior to the institution of this action. Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby." This section, which is the only one on the subject, has always been given affirmative effect as if it provided that an acknowledgment or promise in writing signed by the party to be charged thereby does take the case out of the operation of title II, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the time of commencing civil actions. The sufficiency of an acknowledgment or promise as evidence of a continuing or new contract is a matter of judicial interpretation. The question is one of law. Concannon v. Smith, 1901, 134 Cal. 14, 20, 66 P. 40.

[3] The essentials of a sufficient acknowledgment have been frequently stated and were well expressed in Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, 1898, 122 Cal. 413, at page 415, 52 P. 836, 837, 55 P. 145, as follows: "The distinct and unqualified admission of an existing debt, contained in a writing signed by the party to be charged, and without intimation of an intent to refuse payment thereof, suffices to establish the debt to which the contract relates as a continuing contract, and to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations against the same. From such an acknowledgment the law implies a promise to pay." There was before the court in that case a letter reading as follows: "Dear Sir: Referring to that traction engine at Auburn, owned by me, and mortgaged to S. P. Co., I have not been able to sell it. * * * Now, sir, can't you give me a chance to pay you in work? The Co. employs many men, and, if you choose, you can procure some employment for me. I have a sick family, and am hard up personally, and need work, and want to pay you, besides. * * * W. S. Prosser." Of that letter the court said at page 415 of 122 Cal., at page 837 of 52 P.: "The defendant contends that his said letter was nothing but an inquiry whether plaintiff would accept payment in work. We think it was more significant than this. As we read the document, it was an unqualified admission of an existing debt which defendant desired to pay, and also a request for leave to pay in a manner more convenient to the writer than that provided in the original contract. * * * We have no doubt that the latter [(letter) see 122 Cal. page 419, 52 P. 836, 55 P. 145] interrupted the running of the statute, as to the debt sued on."

The inquiry as to whether the three letters before us amounted to a "distinct and unqualified admission of an existing debt" must take into account the fact that it was admitted by defendant's answer that the note was given, that no part of the principal had been paid, and that only the sum of $1,070 had been paid as interest. In other words, the letters must be construed as having been written by a debtor to a creditor holding a $10,000 note bearing interest quarterly and upon which the debtor was making periodic interest payments. A connection between the letter of December 15, 1936, and the note may be drawn from the fact that a $25 check was apparently enclosed with the letter and that the same amount was credited on the note December 21, 1936, as shown by schedule of interest payments alleged in the complaint and admitted by the answer. That the letters referred to a debt is clear from their general tenor, which is consistently one expressing an obligation of the writer to send money to the addressee which was due to the latter. The letter of October 20, 1936, speaks of sending "your" (plaintiff's) money and each letter makes mention of plaintiff's forbearance. The expression of this letter, "I can't tell you how much I appreciate it but I assure you you will get it all just as soon as I can manage it," was a distinct and unqualified acknowledgment of the debt and the letters throughout clearly negative any intent of the writer to refuse payment. That they referred to the debt evidenced by the note is sufficiently established. The letters mention periodic payments, at least one of which was identified circumstantially as a payment of interest on the note, and since it is not contended that there was any other debt owing by the writer to the addressee and there is no basis for assuming that there was one, it is to be inferred that all of the references were to the particular debt in question. Taken as a whole they were at least as definite and expressive as the acknowledgment held to be sufficient in Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, supra. Writings of similar import were held sufficient as acknowledgments and effective to start anew the running of the statute of limitations in Bank of America, etc., Ass'n v. Hunter, 1937, 8 Cal.2d 592, 67 P.2d 99; Searles v. Gonzalez, supra, 1923, 191 Cal. 426, 216 P. 1003, 28 A.L.R. 78; Concannon v. Smith, 1901, 134 Cal. 14, 66 P. 40; Weatherwax v. Hills, 1931, 113 Cal.App. 557, 298 P. 853, and First Nat. Bk. of Park Rapids v. Pray, 1927, 86 Cal.App. 484, 260 P. 933.

Respondent, in arguing the second and third questions above stated, singles out the fourth letter, written after the statute had run, and contends that it contained a promise conditioned upon the debtor's ability to sell certain real property which she owned. Upon this construction of the letter respondent invokes the rule stated in Curtis v. City of Sacramento, 1886, 70 Cal. 412, 11 P. 748; Rodgers v. Byers, 1900, 127 Cal. 528, 60 P. 42, and cases therein cited, to the effect that where a new promise is made, the action must be upon that promise and not upon the original one, and that if the new promise is conditional, facts must be alleged and proved showing that the conditional liability has become absolute. Respondent then says: "It would follow from the above that no matter how the four letters, or any of them, are construed appellant's action must fail because not founded on the assumed new contract."

[4] We are in some doubt as to how these questions are presented by the record before us. When the letters were offered at the trial they were not objected to upon the ground that they constituted a new contract and that they were inadmissible because the claim had been presented on the original obligation, the note, and not upon the new contract; nor were they objected to upon the ground that the action was brought on the note and not on a substituted contract. There is no copy of the claim in the record but counsel would seem to be in agreement that the claim was presented on the note. That is the allegation of the complaint, which was admitted by the answer, and we must treat it to be the fact.

[5] The finding that the cause of action was barred by section 337, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure must be construed as a finding that there was neither an acknowledgment of the debt nor a new promise, for if there had been either, the action would not have been barred, and the finding therefore must be construed as negating either a conditional acknowledgment or promise. If the trial judge had been of the opinion that there was either an acknowledgment or a promise that was conditional, the findings would have disclosed that fact and the question of variance would have arisen. But as that question was not raised at the trial it would seem that the defendant stood on the denials of its answer that there had been any acknowledgment or promise, conditional or otherwise. However, even though the point was not raised at the trial, it appears necessary for us to examine it in order to make a complete disposition of the case upon this appeal.

[7] As we read the first three letters there was no new promise, only an acknowledgment of an existing one. The strongest expressions used in any of them were no more than assurances that the money would be paid eventually and in part at least when the debtor should sell some property. The acknowledgment was unconditional and absolute. A promise sufficient to supplant the original one cannot be inferred from the fact that the debtor in making the acknowledgment also expresses hopes either as to time or manner of payment. The letters suggest no alteration of the original obligation nor any reluctance to pay as soon as possible. The references to the expected sale of real property were but a disclosure of the debtor's plans such as would commonly be found in such correspondence. Having in mind the distinction which the code recognizes between an acknowledgment and a promise, we should be careful not to place a construction upon the writings which would attribute to the debtor intentions not expressed therein. It is true that an express promise necessarily excludes a promise by implication (McCormick v. Brown, 1868, 36 Cal. 180, 185, 95 Am.Dec. 170), whereas a mere acknowledgment carries with it a promise furnished by the law. But as we have stated, we construe the letters as mere acknowledgments of the debt and the proper basis for an implied unconditional promise to pay the same.

[8] Plaintiff, as an excuse for her failure to present her claim to the executor within the time limited by the notice to creditors or until about six months after that time had expired, relies upon the fact that she was a nonresident and had no notice of the giving of notice to creditors or of the time within which claims were required to be filed. This appears to be a tenable position. Her nonresidence and the fact that she had no actual notice are admitted. (We shall refer to creditors who are out of the state as nonresident creditors solely for convenience and because plaintiff was not at any time within the state.) Alice Bolan Emery was her daughter-in-law, the widow of a son, and plaintiff learned of Mrs. Emery's death a few days after it occurred on March 11, 1939. She testified by deposition that she did not know prior to November, 1939, of the administration of said estate nor that an administrator had been appointed or notice to creditors given or that claims were required to be filed on or before October 8, 1939, and that she first became aware of the administration of the estate during the first part of 1940. She testified to a visit made to her by her granddaughter, Paula Sterling, a daughter of Mrs. Emery, in the latter part of August, 1939, and of having discussed with her the death of Mrs. Emery and she stated that she might have discussed the estate. Paula Sterling testified to the same visit and of discussing the money that Mrs. Emery owed plaintiff, but she testified to having told plaintiff and plaintiff's son that she knew nothing about the estate, which was being handled by her guardian in California.

Plaintiff also testified that her business was managed by her son, Harry E. Sterling, and the latter testified substantially the same as plaintiff and Paula Sterling as to conversations concerning Mrs. Emery and the debt in August of 1939. Defendant introduced two letters from Harry E. Sterling to defendant's attorney, dated respectively, January 22, 1940, and February 18, 1940, in the first of which he stated that he had just received word from the court in Los Angeles that the addressee was the executor of the estate; that he had given Paula Sterling a statement of the note to give to the executor but had heard nothing from them; that he had written to "both of the children asking for your address" but had received no reply; that plaintiff held a mortgage of $10,000 against the estate with interest. In the letter of February 18, 1940, he stated, in reply to a letter of the attorney dated February 2, that the money had been loaned to his brother James, deceased husband of Mrs. Emery, on a mortgage; that the property had been sold, the mortgage was to have been placed on another property, which plaintiff had always thought had been done, and that they were surprised to learn upon receiving a letter from the attorney that he knew nothing about this.

Under section 707 of the Probate Code, except in cases not material here, the failure to file a claim arising upon contract within the time limited in the notice bars the claim "unless it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant to the satisfaction of the court or a judge thereof that the claimant had not received notice, by reason of being out of the state, in which event it may be filed or presented at any time before a decree of distribution is rendered." It appears that an affidavit was made as required and that the claim was presented to the executor before a decree of distribution had been rendered.

It is defendant's position that a nonresident creditor, although without actual notice or knowledge of the publication of notice to creditors or of the time within which claims must be filed as limited by the notice, is nevertheless bound by the limitation and will be deemed to have had notice if he has received "any timely knowledge or information which, if inquiry were pursued by such creditor, would lead to a full disclosure of the fact." Assuming that this rule applies, defendant asserts that as plaintiff was informed of the death of Mrs. Emery shortly after it occurred, she was put on notice that there would be probate proceedings; that a notice to creditors would be given; that the time for the presentation of claims would be limited; and that if she had made proper inquiry she would have learned that the time for presentation of claims would expire October 8, 1939, and that therefore she must be deemed to have had notice as effectually as if she had at all times been a resident of California.

[9] Section 19 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "Every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact." This is but a statement of a principle long recognized by the courts and text writers. But we think it cannot be so applied to the case of a nonresident creditor as to cut off his right to present his claim at any time before distribution if he is without actual knowledge as to the time for presentation of claims as limited by published notice to creditors. In Cullerton v. Mead, 1863, 22 Cal. 95, the plaintiff creditor was absent from the state during all of the time when notice to creditors was being published and for about seven months after the date of the first publication. He then returned to California and learned of the death of his debtor but was ignorant of the appointment of an administrator and of the publication of notice to creditors, which he had never seen. As the law then stood, some three months remained after he learned of the death of the debtor within which he might have presented his claim. He was informed of the limited time shortly after it had expired and then presented his claim, which was rejected because it was filed too late. The law at that time required the giving of notice to creditors and the rights of claimants who had received no notice by reason of being out of the state did not differ in substance from their rights as specified in section 707 of the Probate Code which we have quoted. In reversing a judgment for the defendant on demurrer, the court held that since plaintiff had been absent from the state during the entire five weeks in which weekly publication had been made and had no actual notice of the time stated in the notice for filing claims, he came clearly within the exception of the statute and had the whole time up to the decree of distribution in which to present his claim for allowance. The court said at page 99 of 22 Cal.: "The fact that he returned to the State before the ten months expired can make no difference, for the law had extended the time for presenting his claim, he being absent from the State during the time of publication. The law will not presume that immediately upon his return he had notice of a publication in a newspaper months before, and if he had had actual notice of the fact of publication, he had only to look at the law, when he would find that the time was extended in his case." And of the statute the court said at page 98 of 22 Cal.: "This is a remedial statute, and it must therefore be construed liberally, and when the meaning is doubtful, it must be so construed as to extend the remedy."

In MacGowan v. Jones, 1904, 142 Cal. 593, 76 P. 503, a claim was held to be barred where the claimant was within the state at the time of the first two publications of notice to creditors, then left the state and later returned and more than one month before the time for presenting his claim had expired received actual notice that the administrator had published notice to creditors. The court said at page 595 of 142 Cal., at page 504 of 76 P.: "The facts in Cullerton v. Mead, 22 Cal. 95, 96, upon which plaintiff relies, were widely at variance from those here presented. * * * In the Cullerton case, therefore, the plaintiff was not only absent from the state during the time of publication, but received no actual notice or knowledge of the fact that publication had been made until after the time for the presentation of the claims had expired—a very different case from that where plaintiff, being the attendant physician, knew of the death of deceased, was present in the state during the first two publications, returned to the state, and had actual notice of the publication for more than one month prior to the expiration of the time for filing his claim, and still neglected to do so until long after that date." The MacGowan case is the only one we have found which refers to Cullerton v. Mead, supra. It is a significant fact that the doctrine of the Cullerton case has been accepted for 80 years as the law in the application of statutory provisions which have stood for that period without substantial change, during which time the entire wealth of the state subject to administration has passed through the probate courts at least once and the greater share of it several times. It is true that in the Cullerton case the court did not discuss the rule of constructive notice as declared by section 19 of the Civil Code, although as appears from the facts in that case, the claimant had actual knowledge of the death of his creditor some three months before the last day for presentation of his claim.

Defendant has cited to us the case of State Bank of Seneca, Missouri, v. Miller, 1935, by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, reported in 171 Okl. 253, 42 P.2d 834. There judgment was rendered on a verdict in favor of defendant in a suit by a nonresident creditor on a claim which had been rejected because presented too late. The evidence was held sufficient to prove that the nonresident creditor had actual notice of the giving of notice to creditors and this was held to be a proper basis for the verdict. In the opinion, which is shown to have been prepared by a committee of the State Bar, appointed by the Judicial Council and approved by the Supreme Court, and which opinion was adopted by the Supreme Court, there is dictum to the effect that the rule of constructive notice applied to the case of a nonresident creditor of a decedent under a statute which probably resembled in some respects our own. We are not inclined to follow this doctrine, especially in view of the fact that the careful research that appears to have been made in the preparation of the opinion seems to have disclosed no authority for the proposition.

[10, 11] The cases within our own state where the Civil Code section has been applied are legion. In attempting to apply the rule to the facts of the instant case defendant overlooks one important feature, namely, that before a party having notice of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry will be charged with implied notice of the material facts which a diligent inquiry would have disclosed, the situation must be one which imposes upon him a duty to pursue the inquiry. The situations where inquiry is called for are too many to enumerate but a few of them may be noted by way of example. There is a special duty on the part of officers and directors of corporations to keep themselves advised as to the manner in which the corporate affairs are conducted and upon stockholders to inform themselves of actions taken at stockholders' meetings; there is a duty on the part of one dealing with an agent known to have limited authority, to inquire as to the extent of his authority. A common situation is one where conflicting property rights are involved, and of these Mr. Pomeroy says (Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, Vol. 2, fourth edition, p. 1154, sec. 608): "Whenever a party has information or knowledge of certain extraneous facts, which of themselves do not amount to, nor tend to show, an actual notice, but which are sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon an inquiry respecting a conflicting interest, claim, or right, and the circumstances are such that the inquiry, if made and followed up with reasonable care and diligence, would lead to a discovery of the truth, to a knowledge of the interest, claim, or right which really exists, then the party is absolutely charged with a constructive notice of such interest, claim, or right." Another familiar situation is where one who claims to have been defrauded becomes aware of facts sufficient to reasonably arouse a suspicion that a fraud has been committed and is thereby placed under a duty to institute an inquiry for the truth. Still another case is one in which stockholders of corporations are charged with a duty to make inquiry as to alleged breaches of duty on the part of the management when their attention is called to circumstances reasonably suggesting acts of malfeasance.

[13] The foregoing illustrations are sufficient to show the reason which underlies the rule of implied notice. It will be found invariably that where the doctrine of implied notice is applied, the party chargeable with notice has had a specific duty to perform which required him to inform himself of pertinent facts or has had a right involved, the protection of which has required that he proceed with diligence and as a person of reasonable prudence would proceed to ascertain the facts affecting his right. It may be said generally that the doctrine applies only to situations in which failure to make inquiry would amount to dereliction of duty or a failure to take ordinary care of one's own concerns. It cannot be applied to the conduct of nonresident creditors of decedents so as to require them to inform themselves as to steps that have been taken to give notice to creditors. They are presumed to know the laws of California. They have an absolute right to present their claims at any time before a decree of distribution is rendered, except in the single event that they have received actual notice of the terms of the statutory notice required to be given to creditors. Having an absolute right to present their claims within the longer period of time, they are under no duty to make inquiry as to facts which, when brought to their knowledge, would limit the time within which they must act. They have a right to rely upon their lack of knowledge. A nonresident creditor who learns of the death within this state of his debtor may stand upon his right to present his claim at any time before distribution, unless he has actual notice of the fact of which creditors in the state have constructive notice by the publication and is not obliged to inquire whether notice to creditors has been given or as to a limitation of time prescribed thereby, and if he is under no duty to make such inquiry the law charges him with no notice of facts which would have come to him through an inquiry. Unmeasured uncertainty in the duties of personal representatives and the court in probate in the allowance and approval of claims would result should section 707 of the Probate Code be so construed as to place nonresident creditors who receive knowledge of the death of their debtors under the same limitations as are prescribed for the presentation of claims by resident creditors, who are conclusively presumed to have knowledge of the facts stated in the notice to creditors. We conclude therefore that plaintiff's claim was presented in time.

[14] Defendant's answer admitted all of the material allegations of the complaint, although it contained denials of allegations that there are "now due, owing and unpaid from said decedent and estate of said decedent to the plaintiff herein" the alleged sums of principal and interest. In view of the admission of the execution of the note and nonpayment of the principal or of any more than $1,070 interest, no issue of fact was raised by the denials. The special defenses presented the only issues to be tried, and since they have been held to be untenable, nothing remains to be done in the trial court but to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the principal of the note and the unpaid interest.

The judgment is reversed with directions that judgment be entered for plaintiff for the sum of $10,000, with interest as provided in the note, giving credit for sums paid as interest as alleged in the complaint, the same to be payable in due course of administration.

PEOPLE v. ABRAHAM.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
July 24, 1942.

Gaming 🔑98(1)

Evidence sustained conviction for receiving money to be wagered on a horse race. Pen.Code, § 337a, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

Mike Abraham was convicted of the offense of receiving money to be wagered on a horse race in violation of Penal Code, § 337a, subd. 3, and from the judgment of conviction and order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

George Stahlman, of Los Angles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment of guilty of violating section 337a, subdivision 3 of the Penal Code after trial before the court without a jury, defendant appeals. There is also an appeal from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The evidence being viewed in the light most favorable to the People (respondent), the essential facts are:

Officer Stewart Jones stated that he saw defendant on or about September 22, 1941, on the sidewalk between Broadway and Hill on Fifth Street in the city of Los Angeles; that he, Officer Jones, in company with Officer Allen had driven around the block several times and saw defendant contacting a man and woman who were looking at a newspaper and he saw the man and woman hand defendant some money; that the officers drove around the block a second time and saw a young man motion to defendant and that defendant approached him; that Officer Jones stepped out of the car and stood behind a pillar and watched the two men talking and saw them looking at a scratch sheet defendant had in his hand; that he saw the young man hand defendant some United States currency; that defendant then walked west on Fifth Street and as he did so he, Officer Jones, followed him and saw him making a notation on a scratch sheet with a pencil opposite the "sixth race at Hawthorne"; that defendant then walked to a cigar stand at the corner of Fifth and Hill, went to a telephone, inserted a nickel, dialed a number, and hung the telephone receiver up; that he, Officer Jones, waited outside while the defendant inserted another nickel and dialed the telephone; that a moment or two later defendant moved from the telephone to the cigar counter, where, with a scratch sheet in his hand, he was placed under arrest. The witness then stated that he went to the telephone where defendant had been and on the bell box underneath the telephone he found several other scratch sheets for previous dates. Defendant had $151.50 in his possession when arrested. The witness stated further when shown a scratch sheet that it was the one upon which defendant had made a notation and that after the sixth race was the name "Prairie Dog" and the initials "J.J."

After establishing himself as an expert upon the subject, the witness testified that the initials "J. J." upon the scratch sheet indicated a person or player's initials and that the person making the bet places those initials on the scratch sheet in a position so that it will indicate to him whether the bet was to win or otherwise; that if it was a win bet the initials would be placed in front of the horse's name, if a place bet behind the horse's name, if the amount bet is $1 there is just one initial, if it is a $2 bet the initial is written and above the initial a small "2" or other amount bet is placed.

Defendant relies for reversal of the judgment on the ground that there is no substantial evidence to sustain the conviction.

This proposition is untenable, in view of the decision of our Supreme Court in People v. Newland, 15 Cal.2d 678, 104 P.2d 778, and the decision in People v. Kahn, 27 Cal.App.2d 645, 81 P.2d 632. In the two cases cited the evidence was no stronger than in the instant case, nevertheless the convictions were sustained, in one case by the Supreme Court and in the other by this court.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are and each is affirmed.

MOORE, P. J., concurred.

BOYD v. LANCASTER.

Civ. 3037.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 20, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑14(2)

Where issues raised by appeal taken by present respondent from judgment entered by direction of appellate court had not been presented or considered on two prior appeals, and appeal offered appellant his first chance to attack essential findings upon which a judgment for respondent must be based, appellant was entitled to appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1202

Where judgment rendered against defendant by direction of appellate court after two appeals by plaintiff was the first judgment adverse to defendant, he was entitled to move for a new trial before appealing.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1202

The right of appeal carries with it the right to have considered such matters as were formerly considered on an appeal from an order denying new trial and movant's contention that judgment as entered did not comply with the appellate court's direction may be passed upon, on motion for new trial before resorting to appeal.

4. Appeal and error 🔑345(1)

Where appeal from judgment entered by direction of appellate court after two previous appeals by respondent was taken within the statutory time after appellant's motion for new trial was denied, the appeal was timely.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by C. M. Grove, guardian ad litem of Henry O. Boyd, against J. M. Lancaster, to set aside a deed, wherein defendant filed a cross complaint to quiet title. Henry O. Boyd died, and Joseph L. Boyd, as administrator, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss.

Motion denied.

J. O. Reavis, of Bakersfield, and John S. Chapman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edgar T. Fee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to set aside a deed from Henry O. Boyd to J. M. Lancaster. On June 29, 1937, the court found that the deed was voidable because of the mental condition of Boyd and the inadequacy of the consideration, but that $5,300 was due to Lancaster on account of advancements made to Boyd. It was concluded that the property should be reconveyed to Boyd on the payment of $5,300 to Lancaster within sixty days and if the amount was not paid title was to be quieted in Lancaster. In September, 1937, and after the death of Boyd, it was found that the money had not been paid within the time allowed and judgment was entered quieting title in the defendant. On appeal, that judgment was reversed because no substitution of parties had been made after the death of Boyd. Boyd v. Lancaster, 32 Cal.App.2d 574, 90 P.2d 317.

On August 17, 1939, another judgment was entered decreeing that the $5,300 had not been paid within the time allowed, that no extension of time therefor had been given, and quieting title to the property in the defendant. The plaintiff again appealed from that judgment and the same was reversed on the ground that the time for the payment of the money had been extended and that there had been a substantial and actual compliance on the part of the plaintiff with the terms of the interlocutory order. Boyd v. Lancaster, 43 Cal.App.2d 161, 110 P.2d 532, 535. The order of reversal was as follows: "The judgment is reversed with directions to enter judgment in favor of the appellant, with an appropriate order turning over the money deposited to the respondent."

In compliance with said order the trial court on July 9, 1941, entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied on September 8, 1941. The defendant then gave notice of appeal from this judgment on September 16, 1941, and the appeal is presented upon a transcript of the evidence.

The appellant filed his opening brief and thereafter the respondent moved to dismiss this appeal on the grounds that all matters in controversy have been finally determined on the previous appeals, that these decisions have become the law of the case, and that notice of appeal, being filed more than sixty days after the entry of the judgment, was too late since the appellant had no right to move for a new trial and the purported motion therefor could not have extended the time for taking an appeal.

The respondent particularly relies on Kramer v. Superior Court, 35 Cal.App.2d 239, 95 P.2d 158; Snoffer v. City of Los Angeles, 14 Cal.App.2d 650, 58 P.2d 961; and Lial v. Superior Court, 133 Cal.App. 31, 23 P.2d 795. These cases are not controlling under the circumstances which here appear. The Kramer case held, in effect, that when a judgment has been entered as rendered by an appellate court the trial court has no jurisdiction to entertain a motion for a new trial or to otherwise modify the judgment insofar as the issues have been settled on the previous appeal. In the Snoffer case a judgment and order granting a new trial had been reversed on a previous appeal on the ground that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred, with directions for the entry of judgment in favor of the defendant. Such a judgment was entered, followed by an order granting a new trial. On appeal, this order was reversed on the grounds that the previous appeal had finally determined that the plaintiff could not maintain his action and that the complaint could not be so amended as to set up a good cause of action. On a previous appeal in the case of Lial v. Superior Court, supra, it had been held that the contract on which the plaintiff relied was void and the judgment was reversed with directions to enter judgment against the plaintiff. This was done but a motion for a new trial was then granted. This order was reversed on the ground that the cause had been determined on its merits and that new issues could not, therefore, be set up by amendment in order to secure a trial de novo.

In Phillips v. Patterson, 34 Cal.App.2d 481, 93 P.2d 807, 811, the question was presented whether a plaintiff was entitled to execution after final judgment entered as directed by the appellate court. A prior appeal had been taken under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure but which, by stipulation, had presented the sole question as to whether the negligent person was an independent contractor or the agent of the company sought to be charged, and waiving all other issues. It had been held on that appeal that the negligent person was an agent of the company and not an independent contractor and judgment had been ordered entered against the company. This had been done and no appeal was taken from the directed judgment and no motion for a new trial was made. It was held that the original appeal taken under section 953a had raised every issue involved in the action, that all issues had been specifically waived except the issue of agency, and that the directed judgment was, therefore, final and conclusive. It was pointed out in that case, however, that "There is no specific statutory authorization to move for a new trial, or to appeal from a directed judgment, but the language of some of the last-cited cases seems to indicate a recognition of a right to appeal from a failure or refusal of a trial court to enter judgment in the manner directed by a reviewing court, or from a directed judgment against a party to litigation in whose favor the original judgment was rendered, when errors occur at the trial 'that were not presented in the record upon the former appeal.'" After reviewing several such cases, the court said:

"In reconciling the cases relied upon by the respondents with those cited by the petitioners, in the light of the Constitution, article VI, section 4¾, and sections 53 and 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, we assume that an appeal may lie from a judgment directed by a reviewing court which for the first time fixes a liability upon a party to the litigation, when the method of the original appeal gave him no opportunity to review errors alleged to have occurred at the trial. There is no doubt that, in justice, such a privilege should exist."

In Klauber v. San Diego St. Car Co., 98 Cal. 105, 32 P. 876, 877, a judgment for the defendant had been reversed on a former appeal on the judgment roll alone with directions to enter a judgment for the plaintiff, which was done. The defendant then appealed from that judgment and prepared and presented a bill of exceptions. The plaintiff moved to dismiss that appeal on the ground that the directed judgment was final. After pointing out that the defendant had had no opportunity on the former appeal to present for review errors which had been committed against him at the trial, the court said: "As it is only when, upon the second appeal, the record presents the same matters, either of fact or of law, upon which the determination of this court was rendered at the former appeal, that that determination is held to be final, it follows that if there is presented upon the second appeal a different state of facts, or any errors that were committed by the trial court which were not presented in the former record, this court is at liberty to consider them as fully as though presented upon a first appeal." And further, after discussing Heinlen v. Beans, 73 Cal. 240, 14 P. 855: "The present case differs materially from that, however, in that it presents a bill of exceptions containing matters directly affecting the findings of fact upon which the judgment rests; and as those matters were not before the court upon the former appeal the 'law of the case' has no application." In Gore v. Bingaman, 20 Cal.2d 118, 124 P.2d 17, 18, it is said: "A final judgment entered by a superior court under the direction of an appellate court is appealable. [Citing cases.] * * * The second appeal must be limited to questions arising from the action of the trial court which were not involved in the prior appeal."

Beyond question, issues are raised on this appeal which were not presented or considered on the two prior appeals, each of which was presented upon a bill of exceptions and each of which was taken by this respondent. On the first appeal the only matter considered was the failure to make a proper substitution of parties before entry of the judgment. On the second appeal, the only issue decided was as to whether there had been a failure to comply with the terms of the preliminary order requiring the payment of money to the other party. The judgment now appealed from was the first one entered against this appellant and this appeal offers him his first chance to attack the essential findings upon which a judgment in favor of the respondent must be based. A number of questions are here presented which were not presented or considered on the former appeals, including the sufficiency of the evidence to support the court's findings as to the mental condition of Henry O. Boyd, the failure to give a proper notice of rescission, the absence of a necessary party and other questions.

[1-4] There can be no question that this appellant had the right to appeal from this judgment and we think it should also be held that he had a right to move for a new trial, this being the first judgment entered which was in any way adverse to him. While there is no statute specifically giving such a right after the entry of a directed judgment no reason appears, under these circumstances, why this judgment should not be treated like any other judgment for this purpose or why the usual rules relating to motions for a new trial should not apply. The right of appeal carries with it the right to have considered such matters as were formerly considered on an appeal from an order denying a new trial. The moving party might, in many cases, contend that the judgment as entered did not comply with the directions of the appellate court and there is good reason for allowing such questions to be passed upon on motion for a new trial before resorting to an appeal. In the absence of authority to the contrary, we therefore hold that the appellant had a right to move for a new trial and his appeal having been taken within the statutory time after that motion was denied, it follows that the appeal was taken in time.

For the reasons given the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

AVILA v. LEONARDO et al.

Civ. 6711.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 27, 1942.

1. Divorce 🔑289

The authority of court in divorce action to make necessary orders for maintenance and support of minor children is conferred by statute, and its exercise cannot be limited or abridged by the parties.

2. Divorce 🔑310

The statutory provision that remarriage of former wife does not affect father's duty to provide for maintenance of his children is read into every divorce decree which purports to deal with care, custody and support of minor children. Civ.Code, § 139.

3. Divorce ⚷297

Under divorce decree purporting to approve property settlement previously executed, but requiring husband to make certain payments monthly for support of children without referring to mother's remarriage, notwithstanding that settlement provided that mother should hold father harmless from obligation to support children on her remarriage, mother's obligation to hold father harmless could not be set off, after mother's remarriage, against father's obligation under decree. Civ.Code, § 139.

4. Divorce ⚷297

A decree in divorce action requiring husband to make certain payments monthly for support of children without referring to mother's remarriage, notwithstanding that property settlement provided that mother should hold father harmless from obligation to support children on her remarriage, could not be modified so as to permit mother's obligation to hold father harmless to be set off against father's obligation to pay accrued installments under decree, especially where father had unsuccessfully attempted to obtain termination of obligation to support children. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge Assigned.

Action by Manuel J. Avila against Rose Gertrude Leonardo and another to enjoin the payment over of certain moneys levied on under execution. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hawkins, Hawkins & Cardoza, of Modesto, for appellant.

Nathan B. McVay and Theodore W. Martz, both of Modesto, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment for respondents in an action wherein plaintiff sought to enjoin respondent Hogin, Sheriff of Stanislaus County, from paying over to respondent Leonardo certain moneys levied upon under execution issued upon a judgment in favor of said respondent Leonardo, plaintiff claiming an equitable set-off against said judgment.

In November, 1931, plaintiff and respondent Leonardo, who were then husband and wife, entered into a separation agreement wherein they settled their property rights, and also provided that the husband should have the custody of two of their four children and the wife the custody of the other two, plaintiff Avila to pay to his wife for the support of the two children in her custody, the sum of $20 per month and necessary doctor and hospital bills. The agreement further provided: "But, if the party of the second part shall hereafter marry, then, in that case, she shall care, support and maintain said Anthony Avila and Edward Avila at her own cost and expense and save and hold harmless the party of the second part from his obligation to maintain and care for said children, and his obligation to pay $20.00 per month for their care, support and maintenance shall cease."

It also recited: "Both parties to this agreement have had the benefit of disinterested advice of legal counsel and understand the provisions of this agreement relating to the care, custody and control of the minor children of the parties hereto are only binding upon the parties hereto as between themselves, and the State has the right to demand of the parties hereto or either of them support and maintenance different and other than that herein provided for, and the Court has the right to provide for other custody than that herein provided for."

Thereafter Avila began a divorce action against his wife. In the prayer thereof he asked the court to make an order requiring him to pay $20 per month to defendant for the care of the two minor children, and in addition thereto necessary expenses of illness. There was no request that such order should provide for the termination of such payments on the remarriage of defendant. After trial the court granted a divorce to plaintiff. Findings of fact were made which recited that "plaintiff and defendant have settled their property rights by a written instrument in the preparation and execution of which the defendant had the aid of independent legal counsel." Said findings then set out the property belonging to the parties as stated in their property settlement, and further recited that plaintiff had agreed to pay to defendant the sum of $20 per month for the care, support and maintenance of the two children Anthony and Eddie, and all sums of money that might be necessary for doctors' bills and any other bills connected with their sickness. Nothing was said as to a termination of these payments on the remarriage of defendant. As conclusions of law the court said that plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from defendant on the ground of extreme cruelty; that "said contract is fair, just and should be ratified and approved"; that the property of the parties should be awarded in accordance with the terms of said contract; that the custody of two of the children should be granted to plaintiff, and of the other two to defendant; and that plaintiff should pay to defendant for the support of the children awarded to her the sum of $20 per month, and expenses of any sickness.

The interlocutory decree thereafter entered adjudged "that the property settlement executed between the parties to this action should be and the same is hereby approved and confirmed." It was not made a part of the decree. The property of the parties was divided in accordance with the agreement; the custody of the children Anthony and Eddie was awarded to defendant, and plaintiff was ordered to pay to defendant $20 per month for their support and maintenance on the first of each and every month. It is significant that the court did not limit that payment by any reference to the remarriage of defendant. The final decree of divorce thereafter entered followed the language of the interlocutory decree.

Thereafter defendant married one Leonardo, and plaintiff ceased to make payments to her. Subsequently plaintiff, in a proceeding on order to show cause, sought a modification of the decree of divorce so that he would not be compelled to pay any sum whatsoever to defendant, setting up and relying upon the provisions of the separation agreement releasing him from liability in the event of defendant's remarriage. In a counter affidavit Mrs. Leonardo sought the custody of all of the children of the marriage and an increased amount for their support. The court denied the applications of both parties. No appeal was taken from that order. A subsequent application of Mrs. Leonardo for modification of the decree was also denied by the court "without prejudice."

In 1939, plaintiff being then in arrears to defendant in the sum of some $1,400, Mrs. Leonardo secured the issuance of an execution under which the sheriff levied upon a debtor of plaintiff, and took into his possession some $400. Avila then began the present action seeking to enjoin the defendant sheriff, and praying for an order that plaintiff owed the defendant Leonardo nothing. In his complaint plaintiff recited the provisions of the divorce decree that he should pay the sum of $20 per month for the support of the children to his wife, but contended that the obligation in said judgment had been and was compensated by the obligation of defendant Leonardo to save and hold him harmless from such payment in the event of her remarriage, as set forth in the separation agreement. The insolvency of Mrs. Leonardo was also alleged as ground for the interposition of a court of equity.

Defendants answered, specifically denying that plaintiff's obligation to pay the $20 per month to defendant Leonardo was compensation by an obligation on her part to hold plaintiff harmless upon her remarriage. After trial of the issues the court made findings of fact in which it was recounted that in the divorce action plaintiff's complaint made no mention of the termination of payments to defendant on her remarriage, but, on the contrary, his prayer was that he pay her the said sum of $20 per month; also that in the divorce decree no mention was made of the termination of such payments on the remarriage of defendant. The refusal of the court to relieve plaintiff of further payments when he applied for such relief after the remarriage of defendant was also recited. As conclusions of law it was held that the said property settlement agreement did not deprive the divorce court of jurisdiction to make provision for the support of the minor children, that in executing it the wife did not forfeit the claim of the minor children for support, that her remarriage did not terminate the payments ordered to be made under the interlocutory and final decrees, and that the provision of the property settlement wherein defendant Leonardo agreed to save and hold plaintiff harmless from such payments upon her remarriage is not an offset against the amount due her by virtue of the divorce decree. Judgment for defendants was entered accordingly.

The contention of appellant herein is that as defendant Leonardo remarried and thereafter performed her agreement and supported the children for several years and then became insolvent, a court of equity should declare as an equitable set-off against the judgment her liability for breach of contract of indemnity to save him free from liability for support of the children after her remarriage. He argues that the case does not involve the question of the rights of the parents to limit or abridge the authority of the court to make provision for the minor children of the parties; that should the defendant thereafter be financially unable to care for or support said minor children she may obtain and enforce an order requiring plaintiff to care for them, but that in such case plaintiff would be entitled to be reimbursed by her if and when she became financially able to respond to her obligation to save and hold plaintiff harmless; that if plaintiff is forced to pay this judgment he will then have a claim against defendant for breach of her warranty of indemnity to hold him free from liability, and that the amount of the "damages" for breach of that contract will be exactly the amount plaintiff would be compelled to pay on execution of the judgment; that defendant Leonardo is insolvent and plaintiff would be unable to collect any judgment against her, and if an injunction will not lie defendant will have been permitted by a court of equity to take advantage of her own wrong to plaintiff's damage. He admits that if the separation agreement does abrogate the power of the court to make provision for the support of minor children it is unlawful and to that extent void. He cites cases dealing with equitable set-off, summarizing the holdings therein to be that the right of set-off exists when parties hold cross-demands under such circumstances that in equity they should be applied one against the other to the extinguishment of both, and asserts that the facts of this case bring it strictly within the rule of equitable set-off, defendant being admittedly insolvent.

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the court in rendering its decrees in the divorce action undoubtedly intended to provide for the support of the children in terms at variance with those of the separation agreement; that insofar as the agreement is at variance with the express order of the court it is void; and that to uphold appellant's contention would mean that the broad powers of the courts with respect to the support of minor children could be thwarted by the subterfuge of an indemnity provision in a separation agreement of the parents and a setting off of the obligation of the father under the order of the court against the asserted obligation of the mother under such an agreement.

It is to be noted that plaintiff herein, when he claims a right to set-off cross-demands, admits his liability to pay the amount awarded to defendant under the divorce decree; likewise he admits an arrearage in the sum of some $1,400; but while admitting his own dereliction he asks the interposition of a court of equity to set off against his admitted debt to defendant Leonardo her assumed liability to hold him harmless, and all this while admitting, as stated in the agreement itself, that the state has the right to demand of the parties or either of them support and maintenance different and other than that provided for in the agreement and for custody other than that provided for therein.

[1] We are of the opinion that the holding of the trial court was right. The authority of the court in a divorce action to make necessary orders for the maintenance and support of the minor children of the marriage is conferred by statute, and its exercise cannot be limited or abridged by the parties. 9 Cal.Jur. 803, § 144; Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 341, 163 P. 42; Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399; Karlslyst v. Frazier, 213 Cal. 377, 2 P.2d 362; Adams v. Adams, 2 Cal.App.2d 173, 37 P.2d 729; Merritt v. Merritt, 106 Cal. App. 234, 289 P. 240; Evans v. Evans, 154 Cal. 644, 645, 98 P. 1044.

In Fernandez v. Aburrea, 42 Cal.App. 131, 183 P. 366, an agreement had been entered into between the parties in which Mary Fernandez discharged Aburrea of all obligations he might have toward her and their unborn child. Subsequently plaintiff began this action to compel defendant, as the father of her illegitimate child, to support it. Defendant relied upon the release, but the court held that, assuming that the agreement included an undertaking by plaintiff to relieve defendant of his obligation to support his child, it would have no binding force or effect, for it is settled law in this state that a minor's right to support by its father may not be limited or contracted away by its parents; and that so much of the agreement as purported to release the father was void.

In D'Arcy v. D'Arcy, 89 Cal.App. 86, 91, 264 P. 497, it was said, also, that the authority of the court in a divorce action to make necessary orders for the support of the minor children of the marriage is conferred by statute and its exercise cannot be limited or abridged by the parents; and that an agreement of the parties insofar as the minor children were concerned was void.

Appellant recognizes that lack of power of the parties to abridge the power of the court, as held in the foregoing cases, but refuses to admit that the provisions of their separation agreement attempting so to do are void. He argues that the cases above cited are distinguishable from the instant case because here the wife agreed to hold the husband harmless from his obligation imposed by the order of the court, and that they could make such an agreement as between themselves without abridging the power of the court to provide for the support of the children; and that at least as to unpaid installments her assumed liability should be set off against the amount accrued, as this would not affect the rights of the children for support, they having already been supported by the mother.

This agreement is specious but unsound. If plaintiff can set off the assumed liability of the wife against the installments now accrued he can defeat the collection of all future installments by the simple expedient of refusing payment as they became due, and, offsetting the assumed liability of the wife thereafter as he seeks to do here. Such an evasion of the law and the orders of the court cannot be countenanced. Nor can a court of equity assist a husband who comes into it admitting that he has failed to obey the valid orders of that court. The very nature of plaintiff's action assume cross-demands of the parties, and a valid demand on the part of the wife. 23 Cal.Jur. 220.

[2, 3] Appellant relies upon section 159 of the Civil Code, but it has no application here. Section 139 of the Civil Code provides that the remarriage of a former wife does not affect the duty of a father to provide for the maintenance of the children of his marriage. This language is read into every decree of divorce which purports to deal with the care, custody and support of minor children. Moore v. Superior Court, 203 Cal. 238, 263 P. 1009; Rosher v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.2d 556, 560, 71 P.2d 918. It entered into the decree in the instant case and the trial court recognized it when it declined to provide therein that the obligation of Avila to support his minor sons should terminate upon the remarriage of their mother. It was recognized by the parties to the separation agreement when they provided therein that both parties thereto undertood that the state has the right to demand of either of them support and maintenance different and other than that provided in such agreement. After the decree was entered the rights of the parties rested upon it and not upon the agreement, and it cannot be argued successfully that the contract herein was made a part of the decree in toto. While, as hereinbefore stated, the court did state in its conclusions of law that the contract was fair and just and should be ratified and approved, and that the property of the parties should be awarded in accordance with its terms, it did not make it a part of its decrees; on the contrary it made specific provision therein contrary to the agreement insofar as the payment for support of the minor sons was concerned. It has so construed its own decree in declining to modify it at the request of plaintiff to relieve him of his obligation after the remarriage of defendant.

[4] There is a further reason why plaintiff may not resort to the set-off claimed and that is that the decree of the court could not be modified as to accrued installments. In Keck v. Keck, 219 Cal. 316, 26 P.2d 300, where, on an order to show cause, the trial court set off against accrued installments of alimony, an alleged debt of the wife to the husband, the court held that the marital duty of the husband to support the wife was not suspended because the wife was indebted to him and that the obligation to pay alimony is founded on this duty and is not an ordinary debt; also that a decree for alimony may not be modified as to accrued installments and that the set-off had that effect, the divorce decree having been silent as to any indebtedness of the wife to the husband. In the case before us plaintiff attempted, on an order to show cause to have the order for payment to defendant for the support of the minor sons terminated because of the provision of the separation agreement relied upon here. This request was denied. Plaintiff cannot be granted in this collateral attack upon the divorce decree, the relief heretofore denied him upon the same grounds. Snyder v. Snyder, 219 Cal. 80, 25 P.2d 403.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law 🔑573

The constitutional provision that the party accused shall have right to a speedy and public trial merely guarantees the accused a speedy and public trial and does not fix a period of time within which a person charged with a crime must be tried. Const. art. 1, § 13.

2. Criminal law 🔑576(1)

The statutory provision that the court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order prosecution to be dismissed if defendant is not brought to trial within 60 days after finding of indictment, merely designates 60 days as a maximum time after the finding of indictment within which cause shall be tried in the absence of a showing of good cause for extending that time. Pen. Code, § 1382.

3. Criminal law 🔑576(2)

Where prosecution established that it would be in interest of justice that nine defendants jointly indicted for violation of statute intended to prevent subversive conduct tending to overthrow government should be jointly tried, but two of the defendants were in actual trial in federal court on conspiracy charge by reason of which it was impossible to secure their presence and the presence of certain necessary witnesses, continuance of trial to twenty-second day beyond the 60-day period after finding of indictment was for "good cause" and did not entitle defendants to dismissal of indictment on ground that they were not given a "speedy trial". Mandamus proceeding by F. K. Ferenz and others against the Superior Court of Sacramento County to require the respondent to dismiss an indictment and to discharge petitioner from custody.

Petition for writ of mandamus denied.

J. M. Inman, Fred J. Harris, and Lawrence J. Skirving, all of Sacramento, and Roy Daily, of North Sacramento, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., Sherrill Halbert and Lewis Drucker, Deputy Attys. Gen., and Otis D. Babcock, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to require the respondent to dismiss the indictment against the petitioners and to discharge them from custody on the ground that the cause was not brought to trial within sixty days of the filing of the indictment, as required by section 1382 of the Penal Code. To this petition the respondent has filed a demurrer on the ground that the pleading fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or to authorize the issuance of the writ of mandate.

The pleadings show that these seven petitioners were jointly indicted by the grand jury of Sacramento County, with two other defendants named Robert Noble and Ellis O. Jones, on May 5, 1942, of the crime of failing to register with the Secretary of State as officers or members of the board of directors of the "Friends of Progress," a subversive organization advocating the overthrow of the United States Government by means of force and violence, contrary to the provisions of the Statutes of 1941, page 1236, chapter 183; that the petitioners were subsequently duly arraigned, and a plea of not guilty was entered as to each; that the trial of these petitioners was first set by consent for July 20th; that on motion the trial of said cause was subsequently re-set by consent of all parties for July 6th; that on the last-mentioned date the prosecution moved to continue the trial to July 21st, which was opposed by the petitioners on the ground that they were entitled to a speedy trial.

This motion was presented on affidavits of the respective parties. The affidavits in behalf of the prosecution show that the defendants Noble and Jones had been previously indicted by the federal grand jury and were then on trial at Los Angeles in the United States district court on a charge of conspiracy to violate the sedition laws of the United States; that Noble and Jones were then in the exclusive custody of the United States officers and that it was impossible to secure their presence, and the presence of certain necessary witnesses until after the completion of that trial; that it is desirable and necessary, to prevent a miscarriage of justice, that the nine defendants who are charged in this indictment be tried jointly, for the reason that the trial will require the presence of some fifty witnesses, including several who reside at Washington, D. C., and a large number at the city of Los Angeles, and that the trial of this cause will consume eight to ten weeks of time. Upon that showing, over the objection of the petitioners, the court ordered that the trial of this cause be set for July 21st; that on the last-mentioned date the prosecution moved for a continuance of the trial to July 28th. This motion was heard on affidavits of the respective parties upon the grounds heretofore mentioned and upon the further ground that the trial of the defendants Noble and Jones had not then been completed and that it was impossible to procure their attendance at the trial of this cause on July 21st. It appeared that if the cause was continued to July 28th, for trial, the prosecution would then be enabled to secure the presence of Noble and Jones and the numerous witnesses whose presence would be required. This motion was opposed by the petitioners on the same ground previously mentioned. The court determined from the evidence adduced on that motion that there was good cause for continuing the trial to July 28th and so ordered.

The petitioners subsequently moved to dismiss the indictment as to themselves for failure to bring the cause to trial as required by section 1382 of the Penal Code and to discharge them from custody. This motion was denied.

A previous petition for a writ of mandamus which was filed in this court by the same petitioners upon the same grounds was denied without prejudice. This petition was then filed in this court on July 22nd, to which a demurrer was filed, and the affidavits and proceedings of the trial court were also filed for consideration on this hearing.

The petitioners contend that they are entitled to a dismissal of the indictment and to a discharge from custody on the ground that their cause was not brought to trial speedily or within sixty days after the filing of the indictment as required by article I, section 13, of the Constitution, and section 1382 of the Penal Code.

We are of the opinion that the facts disclosed by the record in this case show good cause for the continuance of the trial of the petitioners in this case beyond the sixty-day period prescribed by section 1382 of the Penal Code, which reads in part:

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * 2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

Article I, section 13, of the Constitution merely provides in that regard: "The party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial."

[1-3] The Constitution does not purport to fix a period of time within which a person charged with a crime shall be tried. It merely guarantees the accused a "speedy and public trial." While it is true that section 1382 of the Penal Code has been held to be mandatory, that section merely designates sixty days as the maximum time after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information within which the cause shall be tried "in the absence of a showing of good cause for extending that time." It does not necessarily follow that a defendant who has not been brought to trial within sixty days from the finding of the indictment or the filing of the information shall be entitled to a dismissal of the charge for lack of diligence in the prosecution of the cause. In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 P. 828, 56 L.R.A. 513, 85 Am.St.Rep. 178; People v. Romero, 13 Cal.App.2d 667, 57 P.2d 557;

8 Cal.Jur. 202, § 276. In the present case we are convinced the prosecution has adequately shown good cause why the trial of this case against the petitioners should reasonably be continued to the 28th day of July, which is only twenty-two days beyond the period designated by section 1382 of the Penal Code.

It satisfactorily appears that it would be desirable and in the interest of justice that the nine defendants mentioned in the indictment should be jointly tried for the reason that they are all involved in the same violation of the statute intended to prevent subversive conduct tending to overthrow the government of the United States by force and violence and to impede organized efforts of government agencies in conducting the world-wide war in which this country is now engaged. It appears that during all of the time subsequent to the finding of the indictment in this case the two defendants Noble and Jones were in the actual custody of Federal officers and in actual trial in the United States district court at Los Angeles on a charge of conspiracy to violate the sedition laws of the United States, of which charge they were recently convicted. It also appears that the district attorney of Sacramento County has been unable to procure the attendance of said defendants Noble and Jones, or of the numerous witnesses hereinbefore referred to, at the trial of the cause prior to said 28th day of July; that a number of said witnesses reside in the city of Washington, D. C., and are not subject to process of the courts of California to procure their attendance at the trial; that said witnesses, who are connected with the Federal Government, have assured said district attorney they could and would voluntarily attend the trial as witnesses but would be unable to do so on more than one occasion; that the trial of the cause would consume eight to ten weeks of time and the attendance of approximately fifty witnesses, many of whom reside at Los Angeles, and that the necessity of severing the trials of these petitioners from that of the defendants Noble and Jones would be likely to result in great inconvenience and expense, with the likelihood of a miscarriage of justice.

For the foregoing reasons we assume good cause has been shown justifying the continuance of the trial of said cause to July 28th. This proceeding involves facts and conditions of unusual present interest to this State and Nation.

[4-6] A petitioner is not entitled to the extraordinary remedy of mandamus as a mere matter of right. The court has a sound discretion in issuing or denying a writ of mandamus, dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case. Wiedwald v. Dodson, 95 Cal. 450, 30 P. 580; 16 Cal.Jur. 768, § 7. We assume that where the granting of a writ of mandamus is likely to result in great public detriment the court is warranted in denying it. 34 Am.Jur. 830, §§ 35, 36.

The petition for a writ of mandamus is therefore denied.

1. Trusts 🔑44(1), 110

In action to recover for legal services rendered to defendants by plaintiff's assignor, an attorney at law, under alleged agreement whereby defendants were to hold note payable to one of the defendants in trust for plaintiff's assignor who was to receive one half of the proceeds, evidence warranted finding that defendants became voluntary as well as involuntary trustees for plaintiff's assignor, and in such capacity were required to hold the note in trust for plaintiff's assignor. 2. Trusts 🔑110

Where court, on competent evidence, found that after defendants obtained note, half of the proceeds of which were to be paid to the plaintiff's assignor for legal services, defendants denied that plaintiff's assignor had any interest in the note, and wrongfully retained the note and the proceeds received therefrom, a finding that an "involuntary trust" or "constructive trust" was created in favor of plaintiff's assignor was justified. 5. Limitation of actions ⚷50(3)

Where original agreement between defendants and plaintiff's assignor, an attorney, for payment of 50 per cent. of recovery on litigation to assignor for legal services was made in 1931, but was by defendants confirmed from time to time, and plaintiff's assignor continued to work on the matter of collecting the account up to and beyond time that note, half of the proceeds of which were allegedly to be held by defendants in trust for plaintiff's assignor, was made in 1939, shortly before action was brought to recover for legal services rendered, the action was not barred by limitations. 10. Appeal and error ⚷1071(1)

Defendants were not prejudiced by trial court's finding on quantum meruit count of plaintiff's complaint, where there was ample evidence to support findings as to the reasonableness of recovery, both on quantum meruit basis and on express agreement, and court found that plaintiff was entitled to the same amount on quantum meruit basis and on express agreement.

11. Attorney and client ⚷153

Where agreement between defendants and defendants' judgment debtors by which defendants were to reconvey under certain conditions certain realty on payment by judgment debtors to defendants of expenses and taxes incurred by defendants, was separate from deficiency judgment transaction which resulted in the execution of a note by defendants' judgment debtors to defendants under alleged agreement that one half of the proceeds were to go to plaintiff's assignor for services as attorney, plaintiff's assignor was entitled to one half of the recovery on the note without any deduction because of the agreement between defendants and the judgment debtors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Parker Wood, Judge.

Action by T. E. Niles against Louis H. Rapoport & Sons, Inc., and others to recover for legal services rendered to defendants by the plaintiff's assignor. From an adverse judgment, the defendants appeal.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Isaac Pacht, Clore Warne, and Pacht, Pelton, Warne, Ross & Bernhard, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles A. Bank and Harold D. Geffen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This litigation arises out of an action commenced by plaintiff to recover for legal services rendered to defendants by plaintiff's assignor, Harold D. Geffen, an attorney at law. Originally, the complaint contained three causes of action, the first of which charged that within two years prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff's assignor and the defendants "entered into an oral agreement, wherein, for legal services rendered by plaintiff's assignor, defendants agreed to hold a certain promissory note made by one Abe Stern, as payor, to Louis H. Rapoport & Sons, Inc., designated therein as payee, for the benefit of plaintiff's assignor and defendants, and each of them, share and share alike," and further, that it was also then and there agreed that Geffen "should own a one-half interest in said note and the proceeds thereof, and that defendants, and each of them, would hold said note in the name of Louis H. Rapoport & Sons, Inc., in trust for plaintiff's assignor, and that the same is now so held." It was also alleged that the note was executed September 21, 1939, in the sum of $3,050, and that defendants claimed the whole thereof and had collected upon it and refused to account to Attorney Geffen.

The second cause of action was presented upon the theory of an account stated, but as to such claim the trial court held against plaintiff, and we need not concern ourselves therewith on this appeal. The third cause of action was based upon services allegedly rendered by plaintiff's assignor to defendants "within two years last past" of the claimed reasonable value of $5,000.

By their answers the individual defendants denied any liability whatsoever. Defendant corporation by its answer denied all allegations of the first and second causes of action and admitted liability in the amount of $250 on the third or quantum meruit cause of action. Defendant copartnership likewise denied the allegations contained in the first and second causes of action, but admitted liability in the sum of $100 by reason of the allegations contained in the third cause of action. Each defendant, by supplemental answer, set up the bar of the statute of limitations (Code Civ.Proc. § 339) as to the first cause of action.

During the trial the court granted plaintiff, over defendants' objections, leave to file a fourth cause of action by way of amendment to the complaint. In general, the allegations contained therein were that about September, 1931, plaintiff's assignor entered into an oral agreement with defendant corporation under the terms of which he was employed to collect a certain indebtedness allegedly due from Abe Stern and Mollie Stern, and as compensation therefor he was to be paid fifty per cent of all sums collected upon such obligation; that on September 21, 1939, defendant corporation took possession of a promissory note in the sum of $3,050, executed by Abe and Mollie Stern and payable to such corporation, in liquidation of the aforesaid indebtedness; that said note provided for installment payments, on account of which $1,100 had been paid. It was further alleged that on September 21, 1939, "defendants became involuntary trustees of said above mentioned promissory note, and one-half the proceeds collected and to be collected in the future thereon" for the benefit of plaintiff's assignor. Then followed the allegation that defendants claimed the whole of said note and had converted the proceeds thereof to their own use.

Following trial the court found that the defendants had collected $1,100 on account of what we shall designate as the "Abe Stern note transaction"; that the defendants within two years prior to the commencement of the action agreed to hold such note for the benefit of plaintiff's assignor and defendants, share and share alike; that plaintiff was entitled to one-half the proceeds collected and to be collected thereon and was the beneficial owner of one-half of said note as well as the proceeds received and to be received therefrom; that the defendants were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,200 (this apparently including the $1,100 theretofore found to have been collected on account of the Stern note), and further, that plaintiff was entitled to "one-half of such sum as has been paid to defendants or any of them on the Stern note since the date of trial"; that the reasonable value of the services rendered by plaintiff's assignor to defendants was $2,200, together with one-half of such sum as had been paid on the note by the Sterns since the date of trial and one-half of such sums as might be received or paid on said note in the future.

Upon these findings the court entered judgment against all the defendants and in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,200 "and one-half of such further sums as have been paid since the date of trial by Abe Stern and sons to defendants or any of them." The judgment further recited that plaintiff was entitled to receive one-half of all sums that might be paid on said note thereafter and "that defendants and each of them convey to plaintiff by good and sufficient assignment, one-half interest in said note and the proceeds that may be received therefrom," and "that said note be delivered up to the clerk of the court to be impounded by him, and one-half the proceeds paid over to plaintiff when the same are received."

Upon this appeal defendants are urging a reversal only in so far as the Abe Stern promissory note trust transaction is concerned. As to the items found by the court to be due under plaintiff's third cause of action, which had reference to services rendered by plaintiff's assignor for defendants in connection with transactions other than the Stern promissory note, no question is here raised. Appellants concede that as to the amount due on these items the evidence is in conflict and the trial court's determination of the matter must be final.

Appellants first contend that there is no evidence to sustain and support any findings of a trust relationship, either voluntary or involuntary, between plaintiff's assignor, Attorney Geffen, and his clients, the defendants herein, as to the Abe Stern promissory note transaction. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the findings and the judgment predicated thereon, the record reveals that in 1931 plaintiff's assignor was retained by defendant Harry Rapoport to bring an action against Abe and Mollie Stern to recover a deficiency judgment after foreclosure of a mortgage or trust deed. The original note was for $2,777.65, and the property, consisting of several lots, was sold to the Rapoports at a foreclosure sale for $1,000, leaving a deficiency of $1,778.41. Attorney Geffen filed the action August 12, 1931, and judgment was entered September 4, 1931, for $1,911.92, which amount included attorney's fees of $100. Execution was issued, and was returned wholly unsatisfied on January 12, 1932. Attorney Geffen testified that so far as his fee was concerned, it was agreed that the same would be "fifty per cent of anything recovered" and that this fee arrangement was confirmed by defendants "from time to time." Attorney Geffen testified that defendant Harry Rapoport continually urged him to attempt to collect the judgment; that he advised Rapoport not to be too insistent, because there was some question as to the validity of the judgment by reason of the fact that Mr. Stern had been discharged in bankruptcy after his debt to the Rapoports had been incurred, and that the latter's claim was listed in the schedule in bankruptcy. In his testimony Attorney Geffen then detailed the plans he unfolded to defendant Harry Rapoport looking toward the collection of the judgment. Finally, according to the witness, appellants secured a financial statement of the Sterns' business, which disclosed possession by them of certain assets. This occurred in July or August, 1939, and thereupon Attorney Geffen caused execution to be issued and levy made upon the Sterns' business. This action resulted in a meeting at which, according to Mr. Geffen's testimony, through his efforts a settlement was reached. The terms of the settlement called for the execution of a note by Abe Stern, Mollie Stern and their sons, to defendants herein, in the sum of $3,050, representing the amount of principal on the judgment plus accumulated interest since 1931. According to Attorney Geffen's testimony, he and defendant Harry Rapoport agreed that it would be sufficient to designate Louis H. Rapoport & Sons, Inc., as payee on the last-mentioned note and that Mr. Geffen was to be paid one-half of the monthly amortized payments provided for in the note.

[1] With reference to the existence of a trust agreement as to the Abe Stern note, plaintiff's assignor testified: "I told Harry to take the note in the name of his company as payee, and that he did not have to name me as one of the payees, but that he could send me one-half monthly as collected. He said that was all right. I then said that inasmuch as there was nothing more to do but sign a form of bank note I would leave. He said that he would show me the note when it was executed. Louis Rapoport left with me in my car. As we were going to the office he asked me if $25 would be all right for my services in making the settlement. I told him that Harry and I had an agreement that I was to receive fifty per cent of whatever we received. He said that I would then have to take the matter up with Harry."

Much of the foregoing testimony was denied or contradicted by the appellants, but it was for the trial court to determine the value and effect of all the evidence introduced, as well as the credibility of the respective witnesses. We are persuaded that the foregoing evidence is of sufficient substantiality to warrant the finding and conclusion by the trial court that defendants became voluntary, and as well, involuntary trustees for plaintiff's assignor, and in such capacity were required to hold in trust for plaintiff's assignor the Stern promissory note in the sum of $3,050 dated December 21, 1939. Once a fact is proved, an inference may be drawn therefrom when, among other things, a consideration of the course of business warrants such deduction. Code Civ.Proc. § 1960. Viewing the foregoing evidence in the light of business practice and the usual propensities of people, we are impressed that the court was justified in concluding that plaintiff's assignor owned a one-half interest in the note in question as well as the payments made thereunder, and that defendants voluntarily accepted a confidence reposed in them by plaintiff's assignor to hold the note in trust to secure to him the payment of his one-half interest therein. Civil Code, sec. 2216.

[2] Section 2223 of the Civil Code reads, "One who wrongfully detains a thing is an involuntary trustee thereof, for the benefit of the owner," while section 2224 of the same code provides in part that one who gains a thing through the violation of a trust or other wrongful act, unless he has some other or better right thereto, is an involuntary trustee of the thing gained for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have it. When, therefore, the court upon competent evidence found that after obtaining the note and certain payments made thereon, appellants denied that respondent's assignor had any interest therein and wrongfully detained the note and proceeds received therefrom, a finding that an involuntary or constructive trust was created in favor of respondent's assignor was justified, because there were present in the transaction between the parties those conditions stated in the last-mentioned code section, and that is all that is necessary to warrant the establishment of an involuntary trust. Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 P. 430.

[3] We are not unmindful of the rule that in construing oral contracts between attorney and client concerning compensation, there may be circumstances where the contract is to be construed most favorably to the interests of the client by reason of the confidential relationship which exists, but these circumstances are present only when there is some ambiguity as to the intent of the parties. 3 Cal.Jur. 686. In the instant case we cannot say that the arrangement between the parties herein was tainted with ambiguity or uncertainty.

[4-6] Appellants' contention that the court failed to make any findings on the issue of the statute of limitations cannot be sustained. There is abundant evidence in the record to indicate that the original agreement for the payment of fifty per cent of the recovery on the Stern litigation was made by defendants in 1931 and by them confirmed "from time to time." There is also evidence that plaintiff's assignor continued to work on the matter of collecting this account up to and beyond the time that the note was made on September 21, 1939. The statute of limitations does not begin to run from the time of making a contract, but commences from the time the cause of action accrues. Code Civ.Proc. § 312; Wheatley v. San Pedro, etc., R. Co., 169 Cal. 505, 147 P. 135. The statute commences as of the date of breach of the obligation. Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 173. In the instant case, the breach occurred at the time appellants took possession of the note and proceeds and failed or refused to pay Attorney Geffen his one-half interest therein. Where, as here, the court found that plaintiff's assignor was entitled to a portion of the note and proceeds, it thereby necessarily found that respondent's claim was not barred by the statute of limitations. From what we have herein said it is at once apparent that if more complete findings had been made on the issue of the bar of the statute of limitations, they would have been adverse to the contentions of appellants. That being so, the failure of the court to find further than it did is not a ground for setting aside the judgment. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 572, 217 P. 750; Los Angeles County v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 13 Cal.App.2d 69, 78, 56 P.2d 577.

[7, 8] Appellants next contend that the judgment is uncertain, and by reason of such uncertainty, invalid. As we read the judgment, it clearly and without ambiguity orders that plaintiff recover of and from the defendants the sum of $2,200 and one-half the sums received by defendants on the Stern note since the trial date. This latter portion of the judgment was warranted because a period of some ninety days elapsed from the date of trial to the date of judgment, during which time amortized payments became due on the note, and under the judgment plaintiff owned one-half of such payments. The judgment then determines that plaintiff is entitled to receive one-half of such sums as may be paid in the future upon the Stern note, and then directs defendants to convey to plaintiff, by good and sufficient assignment, a one-half interest in the note and the proceeds that may be received therefrom. We are in accord with appellants' claim that the portion of the judgment requiring that the note be delivered to the clerk of the court, to be impounded by him and one-half the proceeds paid over to plaintiff as the same are received, should be stricken therefrom. This for the reason that there is no authority in law for the clerk of the court, on behalf of private parties, to receive payments due under the note and transmit the same in proper proportions to such parties, and in the event payments were not made there is no authority vested in the clerk by and through which he could enforce collection of the installments due from time to time.

[9, 10] We cannot see where appellants were prejudiced by the court's finding as to the Stern note transaction on the quantum meruit count of the complaint. There was ample evidence to support the court's finding as to the reasonableness of the recovery, both on a quantum meruit basis and upon the express agreement made by the parties. Appellants assert that the effect of this is to permit plaintiff to recover on asserted inconsistent theories of express and implied contract. Where, as here, there is in the record evidence to support a recovery on either theory, the findings on the inconsistent theory may be disregarded as surplusage. Baird v. Ocequeda, 8 Cal.2d 700, 67 P.2d 1055. In the instant case the amount of the judgment, based upon either theory, was the same; that is to say, the court found that plaintiff was entitled to a specific sum, the amount of which was determined to be the same upon both a quantum meruit basis and an express agreement basis. Therefore appellants suffered no injury.

[11] Appellants finally urge that even though respondent is entitled to fifty per cent of the recovery made on the Stern indebtedness, this should be what they denominate a "net recovery." In this connection it appears that prior to 1939 Abe Stern and Mollie Stern owned certain lots which they hypothecated to secure the indebtedness to appellants represented by a promissory note. When the Sterns defaulted in the payment of their obligation under this note, appellants foreclosed on the security and caused the same to be sold at a trustee's sale. There being no bidders, appellants bought the lots in themselves, and as heretofore pointed out later retained plaintiff's assignor to file suit for recovery of a deficiency judgment. It is this deficiency judgment that was settled by execution of the promissory note hereinbefore discussed in the sum of $3,050. Appellants contend that when they acquired title to the lots they were required to pay various taxes, assessments and other expenses from 1931 to the date of trial, and that at the time the agreement to execute the Stern note of $3,050 was made it was agreed that appellants would reconvey the aforesaid real property to the Sterns upon payment by the latter to appellants of certain taxes and other expenses incurred in connection with the real property after appellants had bid it in at the trustee's sale. It is appellants' claim that the real property should be considered in connection with appellants' responsibility to plaintiff's assignor for fees in making the Stern settlement. We are not in accord with this claim, because it clearly appears that the understanding with regard to the transfer of the lots from appellants back to the Sterns was no part of the settlement of the deficiency judgment out of which this litigation grows. Plaintiff's assignor was therefore not concerned therewith, because the obligation of appellants to the Sterns did not in any way affect the appellants' obligation under the $3,050 note out of which the court found the fee of plaintiff's assignor was to be paid. The agreement between appellants and Abe Stern and sons by which the former were to reconvey under certain terms and conditions the lots in question was separate and apart from and had nothing whatever to do with the deficiency judgment transaction that resulted in the execution of the $3,050 note.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is modified by striking therefrom that portion which directs "that said note be delivered up to the clerk of the court to be impounded by him, and one-half the proceeds paid over to plaintiff when the saime are received." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover costs on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt, Judge.

Action to recover on a contract by Williams Bros. & Haas, Inc., against the City and County of San Francisco. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Walter Shelton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., Dion R. Holm, Asst. City Atty., and Nora A. Blichfeldt, Deputy City Atty., all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff had a contract with the defendant for the construction of a pipe line over property which was in process of condemnation in a proceeding pending in the superior court. During operations under the contract heavy rains caused a slide which damaged a portion of the property which was condemned. A dispute arose between this contractor, the city, and the property owner as to who was responsible for this damage. The contractor and the city executed a contract agreeing that the contractor should repair the damage and that the city should pay one-half of the cost of repairs, but not to exceed $7,000. This agreement was not approved by the city controller. The contractor completed the repairs at a cost in excess of $15,000, and presented his claim to the city for $7,000. This claim was not presented within the sixty-day period prescribed by the city charter. Upon the termination of the city's suit for condemnation of the right of way it was determined that the slide was the result of natural causes, and that the city was not chargeable with damages to the property owner on that account.

In the trial of the instant case the defendant had judgment upon the pleadings and a stipulation of facts and plaintiff's appeal from this judgment presents the single question whether the charter provisions relating to the execution of contracts and the presentation of claims thereunder are controlling.

Section 86 of the charter provides that "no obligation involving the expenditure of money shall be incurred or authorized * * * unless the controller first certify that there is a valid appropriation from which the expenditure may be made. * * * All obligations incurred, * * * contrary to the provisions of this section, shall be void. * * *"

[1] It is conceded that there was a failure to comply with these provisions, and for this reason no enforceable liability arose against the city under the contract to pay for the repairs to the property. Zottman v. City and County of San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am.Dec. 96; Gamewell F. A. T. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 45 Cal.App. 149, 154, 187 P. 163.

It is equally well settled that appellant cannot recover in quantum meruit where the claim is based upon a contract made void by such charter restrictions. Shaw v. City and County of San Francisco, 13 Cal.App. 547, 549, 110 P. 149, where numerous cases are cited.

[2] For these reasons it is immaterial whether the suit is based upon the written contract, on an implied contract for the reasonable value of the services performed, or is one in damages. No recovery can be had on a contract express or implied made void by the charter, and no recovery can be had in damages, because appellant failed to file a claim therefor as required by section 87 of the charter. Cathey v. City and County of San Francisco, 37 Cal.App.2d 575, 576, 99 P.2d 1109, where cases are cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Personal injury action by Josephine Nosbonne against George E. Brill. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

H. L. Hagan, of Oakland, and Charles Reagh, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Myron Harris, William H. Older, and John Jewett Earle, all of Oakland, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendant entered after an adverse jury verdict in an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. Appellant concedes that the evidence is conflicting, but urges that the trial court committed error in instructions given and refused, and in admitting into evidence an ordinance of the city of Oakland, which, it is urged, is invalid because in conflict with the provisions of the Vehicle Code. The submission of this appeal was held up to await the decision of the Supreme Court in Pipoly v. Benson, 20 Cal.2d 366, 125 P.2d 482, which involved the identical point last above mentioned. The decision in that case has now become final, and for reasons stated therein, the judgment here appealed from must be reversed.

The accident occurred between 9:30 and 10:00 p. m. on July 7, 1939, while appellant was crossing on foot from the east to the west side of College Avenue in the city of Oakland, near the intersection of College Avenue with Manila Avenue and Hudson Street. Hudson Street stops on the west side of College Avenue, while Manila Avenue continues both east and west of College Avenue. On the west side of College Avenue both Manila Avenue and Hudson Street intersect College Avenue at other than right angles. The result is, that at the intersection there are five corners. There is a pedestrian crosswalk delineated on the street extending from the northeast corner of College and Manila Avenues across College Avenue to its west side. Appellant testified that she was crossing in this pedestrian lane when she was struck. Respondent, and several other witnesses, testified that appellant was outside the pedestrian lane when hit.

The trial court admitted into evidence over appellant's objection, an ordinance of the city of Oakland which provides: "No pedestrian shall cross a roadway except at a crosswalk or regularly established pedestrian lane." An instruction was given based on this ordinance, as well as one predicated on section 562 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 188, which provides:

"(a) Every pedestrian crossing a roadway at any point other than within a marked crosswalk or within an unmarked crosswalk at an intersection shall yield the right of way to all vehicles upon the roadway.

"(b) The provisions of this section shall not relieve the driver of a vehicle from the duty to exercise due care for the safety of any pedestrian upon a roadway." The court also instructed that any violation of the Vehicle Code or of the city ordinance "is presumptively an act of negligence and conclusively so until rebutted by evidence. * * *"

It is obvious that these instructions are directly conflicting. The instruction predicated on the ordinance told the jury that a pedestrian was absolutely prohibited from crossing a roadway outside a crosswalk, while the instruction predicated on the state statute told the jury that a pedestrian is simply required to yield the right of way when crossing outside the crosswalk.

[1] In Pipoly v. Benson, supra, there was involved a Los Angeles ordinance substantially similar in language and identical in legal effect, to the Oakland ordinance above quoted. The Supreme Court held that the city ordinance, at least insofar as it attempts to regulate the rights of pedestrian traffic in relation to vehicular traffic, was invalid as beyond the power of the municipality, that field of regulation having been fully and exclusively occupied by the state. It, therefore, held that the judgment for the defendant must be reversed.

[2] The same conclusion follows in this case. Counsel for respondent at the oral argument pointed out that it does not appear from the record by whom the challenged instruction relating to the city ordinance was submitted, and relies on the rule that in such cases it will be presumed on appeal that the challenged instruction was offered by appellant, who, therefore, cannot complain. Buckley v. Shell Chemical Co., 32 Cal.App.2d 209, 89 P.2d 453; see cases collected 24 Cal.Jur., p. 870, § 118; 2 Cal.Jur., p. 869, § 509. That rule is predicated on the basic rule of estoppel that the person offering an incorrect instruction cannot complain if it is given, and upon the rule that it is incumbent on the appellant to show error. The rule is usually applied to situations where an instruction on the subject matter was proper but the particular instruction was improper in form. If the presumption be indulged in in the instant case, it would mean that the court would presume that appellant offered what was in effect an instruction for a directed verdict for respondent. To apply the rule to such a situation would be to indulge in a presumption that common sense tells us is contrary to the facts. The Supreme Court, in at least one case, has refused to apply the rule. Fawkes v. Reynolds, 190 Cal. 204, 211 P. 449. That case was followed in Hayes v. Emerson, 110 Cal.App. 470, 294 P. 765. In both cases the courts emphasized that under section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure each party is allowed, as a matter of law, an exception to every instruction. This last factor was also emphasized in Pipoly v. Benson, supra.

[3] In the instant case, however, we are not required to base our conclusion that the judgment should be reversed solely on the ground that the instructions were conflicting. Counsel for respondent referred to the city ordinance during his opening statement, and indicated that his defense of contributory negligence was predicated, partly at least, on a claimed violation of that ordinance. During the trial respondent offered the ordinance in evidence and it was admitted over vigorous objections of appellant. Counsel for respondent then read the ordinance to the jury. The admission into evidence of the ordinance, over objection, and the reading of it to the jury, when such ordinance was unconstitutional and contained a totally incorrect statement of the standard of care required of pedestrians, was clearly error of a most serious and prejudicial nature. None of the other arguments offered by respondent requires discussion.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Code Civ.Proc. § 1981.

4. Theaters and shows 🔑6

Patron leaving theater and seeing that it was raining heavily and that sidewalks were wet was required in exercise of ordinary care to take notice of probability that there might be water on the floor of theater lobby near the sidewalk and protect herself against dangerous condition resulting therefrom, and hence theater owners would not be liable for patron's injury sustained in a fall due to such apparent danger.

5. Negligence 🔑52

If dangerous condition of premises is so apparent that invitee can reasonably be expected to notice it and protect against it, the condition itself constitutes adequate warning so that owner of premises will not be liable for injury to invitee resulting therefrom.

6. Negligence 🔑32(1)

The true grounds of liability of property owner for injuries sustained by invitee on the premises rests on the owner's superior knowledge of the perilous instrumentality and the danger therefrom to invitees.

7. Negligence 🔑32(1), 52

Property owner must use reasonable care to keep his premises in a reasonably safe condition for invitees and give warning of latent or concealed perils, but he is not an "insurer" of safety and is not liable for injury to an invitee resulting from a danger which was obvious or should have been observed in exercise of reasonable care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. S. Baird, Judge.

Action by Anna Matherne and another against the Los Feliz Theatre and others for injuries sustained by named plaintiff as a result of fall allegedly caused by water on the floor of the entrance to defendants' theater. From judgment for defendants, notwithstanding verdict in favor of plaintiffs, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Marcus, Rabwin & Nash, Monroe R. Rubin, and A. Feldman, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Sidney A. Moss, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

The verdict of the jury was for plaintiffs, husband and wife, for damages for personal injuries to the wife as a result of slipping and falling, allegedly caused by water on the floor of the entrance to defendants' theater. The trial court granted defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and judgment was entered for defendants.

Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and assert that they established a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendants which was a proximate cause of the injury and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Plaintiff, Anna Matherne, referred to hereinafter as plaintiff, testified that she was taken to the Los Feliz Theatre by her husband on March 31, 1940, about 6 p.m. and at that time the condition of the weather was "drizzling," the sidewalk was wet; she bought a ticket, entered the theater and stayed about three hours; when she came out she saw it was raining; she looked to see if her husband and the car were there; that she slipped and fell when she had gone out about 8 or 10 steps into the lobby from the theater door, about "by that box office," about one foot in the lobby from the front of the building, and about the center between the box office and the wall; she "picked herself up" and noticed a considerable amount of water on each side of the place where she fell; water was dripping on her, she glanced up and saw it was water dripping from the ceiling of the marquee "as if it were raining," and she noticed the ceiling was wet; the ceiling of the marquee ended about one foot inside the lobby and that was where the water was coming down; the only place where she saw water on the floor was where she fell; it was wet from the wall to the box office and from the edge of the sidewalk into the lobby about one foot, except it was dry where her clothes wiped up the water when she fell; the floor slanted up toward the theater door, the water was seeping toward the sidewalk; from the time she left the door to the time she fell she was looking down where she was walking and out to see if her car was there; before she fell she did not see any water on the floor and did not notice that the floor was slippery; as she went out of the door, before she fell, she saw that the sidewalk was wet; it was raining "very heavy"; when she went into the theater the ticket taker was standing at the door, but she did not remember whether he was there when she came out.

It was stipulated that the lobby floor was of a material known as terrazzo. Three photographs (included in the bill of exceptions) showing the entrance of the theater were offered in evidence by plaintiffs and received.

Defendant Lewis, one of the owners of the theater, testified that the marquee did not extend farther (presumably meaning not farther toward the lobby) than the front of the box office (the photographs show that the front of that office is at the inside line of the sidewalk); he came out through the lobby when he took plaintiff to a doctor and at that time he saw no water dripping from the ceiling; the sidewalk was wet; there might have been a little damp coming in about a foot in from the sidewalk; it was raining pretty hard; plaster on the marquee was very much discolored; he had a bad job on the plaster on the marquee.

Another witness for defendants testified that plaintiff fell on the sidewalk about a foot and a half west of the front of the box office; the front part of the lobby was damp about a foot and a half, caused by people tracking it in; the plaster of the marquee was discolored.

An architect called by defendants testified that the roof of the marquee sloped toward the building into a rain trough; the ceiling of the marquee extended ten inches into the lobby, was cracked in several places and showed discoloration; he did not examine the marquee roof for leaks; the slope of the floor where plaintiff fell was about one-fourth of an inch to the foot and the Building Code allows a slope of one-half inch to the foot.

Another witness for defendants testified that he saw plaintiff come around the corner (referring to a corner outside on the sidewalk), and fall on the sidewalk, get up, and as she started to turn into the ticket office he saw her fall again.

Plaintiff testified she had never seen the last mentioned witness.

[1] The rule as to the power of a trial court to enter a judgment contrary to a verdict is stated in Neel v. Mannings, Inc., 1942, 19 Cal.2d 647, 122 P.2d 576, 577, as follows: "* * * a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto may properly be granted 'when, and only when, disregarding conflicting evidence, and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.'"

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, without regard to any asserted contradiction in the proof, as the rule requires the court to do in determining the propriety of a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, it appears there was sufficient basis for concluding: that the water was dripping from the ceiling at a point inside the lobby about one foot from the sidewalk; that plaintiff fell as a result of slipping caused by such dripping of water in the lobby; that she was injured; that defendants "had a bad job on the plaster"; that the plaster on the ceiling of the marquee inside the lobby was cracked in several places and very much discolored; that water was on the floor from the wall to the box office for a distance of approximately one foot in the lobby from the inside line of the sidewalk.

It does not appear, however, in viewing the evidence in such manner, that defendants knew at the time of this incident or prior thereto or at all that water dripped from the ceiling onto the floor inside the lobby, or dripped from the ceiling at all. It further does not appear that water dripped from said ceiling onto the floor of the lobby for such a length of time that defendants or any of them should have known in the exercise of ordinary care of such condition; or, if they were chargeable with such constructive knowledge of such dripping of water, that they had had a reasonable time before plaintiff fell within which to repair such condition or otherwise protect or give adequate warning to persons using the entrance.

As stated by appellants, it was a reasonable inference that the discoloration of the plaster was caused by water. It was not a reasonable inference, however, that because there was discoloration that the water which came in contact with the plaster at that point reached the floor on this or any previous occasion. The condition of the plaster was unimportant except as it may or may not have been an indication that defendants should be charged with constructive notice of a defect in the roof which, in the exercise of ordinary care to protect their patrons, defendants should have repaired.

[2] The record does not show what was meant by the statement defendants "had a bad job on the plaster," or to what extent the plaster was cracked or discolored. The testimony, in such general and comparative language as shown by the record, that defendants "had a bad job on the plaster," and that the plaster was cracked in several places and very much discolored, without further explanation or description, did not justify an inference that defendants should have known that water would leak through it and fall upon the floor.

There are many different conditions which would warrant the classification of plaster construction work as bad, such as wrong proportions of materials, improper mixture, too rough, too thick or thin in application, or unattractive in appearance, which would not be a warning that the roof should be repaired to prevent water from leaking through such plaster and falling upon the floor.

Likewise plaster may be cracked in several places and the condition of the cracks, such as width, length, whether old or new, and number, be such that the cracks would not be notice that the roof should be repaired to prevent water from falling upon the floor.

Discoloration of plaster, even if caused by water, may be of various shades depending upon numerous factors, such as time the discoloration has existed, materials of which the plaster was made, and original color of the plaster, and not be notice of such a defect in the roof that it should be repaired to keep water from the floor.

The fact that plaster on a ceiling was discolored by water leaking through a roof does not signify, because such plaster was not repaired thereafter, that the leak in the roof was not repaired. If there was a leak in the roof it may have been repaired and the plaster not repaired, and the roof may have failed again at or near the old leak. In such an event the discoloration which remained after the prior leak in the roof should not be regarded as a continuing signal of an imperfection in the roof.

[3] The burden was upon plaintiffs to show that defendants had actual or constructive knowledge of a dangerous condition of the premises which proximately caused the accident (Code Civ.Proc. § 1981; Gabriel v. Bank of Italy, 1928, 204 Cal. 244, 246, 267 P. 544, 58 A.L.R. 1039) and that such knowledge existed for a sufficient length of time that defendants had a reasonable opportunity to correct the condition or warn its patrons. Gold v. Arizona Realty, etc., Co., 1936, 12 Cal.App. 2d 676, 55 P.2d 1254.

Although plaintiffs tried the case upon the theory, heretofore discussed, that the water on the floor which caused the accident had dripped from the ceiling, another theory, that the water was in fact on the floor whether it dripped from the ceiling or not, should be considered on this appeal inasmuch as the testimony must be viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs. The testimony was that water was upon the floor of the lobby from the wall to the box office, about one foot into the lobby from the inside line of the sidewalk. There was no evidence that defendants knew water was there or at all on the floor, except that defendant Lewis said, in referring to a time after the accident when he went through the lobby to take plaintiff to a doctor, "there might have been a little damp coming in about a foot in from the sidewalk. It was raining pretty hard." No showing was made as to the length of time the water was on the floor, or any circumstances to indicate that defendants should have known of its presence or that they had a reasonable time in which to remove the water or warn the patrons. It was not shown how long it had been raining, or raining "very heavy" as plaintiff said, or "pretty hard" as defendant Lewis said. It was established that it was "drizzling" when plaintiff entered the theater about three hours before the accident. There are many different circumstances which might have caused the water to be so recently introduced upon the floor through the lobby entrance that there was not sufficient opportunity to remove or guard against it. It may have been an unprecedented rain, a rain accompanied by unusually strong wind, or several persons entering from the wet sidewalk. The burden was upon plaintiffs to prove that defendants had had a reasonable opportunity to correct the condition or warn the patrons and plaintiffs failed to meet such burden of proof.

[4] In any event the water was inside the lobby to the extent of approximately one foot from the inside line of the sidewalk. Plaintiff said the sidewalk was wet when she went into the theater, that she saw the sidewalk was wet when she came out and it was raining "very heavy." She was required to use ordinary care for her own safety. Plaintiff was required in the exercise of ordinary care, having such knowledge of the heavy rain and wet condition of the sidewalk, in approaching the sidewalk to have in mind the probability that in the ordinary course of events under such weather conditions there might be some water in the immediate proximity of the sidewalk line on the lobby side.

[5, 6] If a danger is so apparent that the invitee can reasonably be expected to notice it and protect against it, the condition itself constitutes adequate warning. Shanley v. American Olive Co., 1921, 185 Cal. 552, 555, 197 P. 793; Dingman v. A. F. Mattock, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 622, 624, 104 P.2d 26. It was stated in Crawford v. Pacific States S. & L. Co., 1937, 22 Cal. App.2d 448, at page 449, 71 P.2d 333, in quoting another case, Touhy v. Owl Drug Co., 6 Cal.App.2d 64, 44 P.2d 405, "'The true ground of liability rests on the proprietor's superior knowledge of the perilous instrumentality and the danger therefrom to invitees, over that of the invitee.'"

[7] In the case of Blodgett v. B. H. Dyas Co., 1935, 4 Cal.2d 511, at page 512, 50 P.2d 801, at page 802, the court said: "The owner of property, in so far as an invitee is concerned, is not an insurer of safety, but must use reasonable care to keep his premises in a reasonably safe condition and give warning of latent or concealed perils. He is not liable for injury to an invitee resulting from a danger which was obvious or should have been observed in the exercise of reasonable care." The duty of the owner of the theater was to use ordinary care to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition. Brown v. Holzwasser, Inc., 1930, 108 Cal.App. 483, 291 P. 661; Corbett v. Spanos, 1918, 37 Cal.App. 200, 173 P. 769.

It does not appear that defendants failed in any duty owed to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Action 🔑6

Where writ of execution had been returned unsatisfied because of service on sheriff of copy of declaration of homestead on property levied upon, judgment creditor could maintain action for declaration as to validity of homestead claim, notwithstanding availability of other remedies. Civ.Code, § 1245; Code Civ.Proc. § 1060.

2. Action 🔑6

In judgment creditor's action for declaration as to validity of homestead claim which had caused writ of execution to be returned unsatisfied, wherein, following necessary formal proof, judgment creditor called judgment debtor and proved character of property in question, which, according to creditor's contention, could not be impressed with a homestead, granting of nonsuit was erroneous. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action for declaratory judgment by Mary E. Bryan Phelps against C. V. Loop and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

Irving E. Read, of Los Angeles, and Monroe & McInnis, of San Diego, for appellant.

Chandler & Wright, Morgan W. Lowery, and Oliver S. Northcote, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

In the within action the complaint alleged in substance that plaintiff and appellant had obtained a judgment in the sum of $9,243.30 against defendants and respondents, which had become final; that a writ of execution duly issued was levied upon the property of defendants, who, within a few days, served the sheriff with a certified copy of a declaration of homestead on said property which had been recorded for some months, wherefore the writ was returned unsatisfied. Further appropriate allegations established the sufficiency of the complaint, the prayer of which was as follows: "Wherefore, plaintiff prays that defendants may be required to answer this amended complaint; that this cause shall be set for trial at the earliest possible date, as provided by section 1062a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that upon a trial thereof the court determine the validity of said declaration of homestead and declare and adjudicate the rights of the respective parties in and to said property. Plaintiff prays that upon said trial the court find and determine that said declaration of homestead is a nullity and void, and that said real estate owned as aforesaid by the defendants is subject to the levy of execution in said cause No. 70254, and that plaintiff now holds a valid lien and judgment on said property to the extent of her judgment, interest and costs as herein alleged." (Italics added.)

At the trial of the action, following the necessary formal proof, plaintiff called defendant under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure and proved the character of the property in question, which by reason thereof, according to plaintiff's contention, could not, under the law, be impressed with a homestead. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was granted. The appeal is from the judgment that followed.

Appellant submits the question on appeal as follows: "1. Where a property is constructed as an apartment house and is especially adapted to that purpose and is used for the primary purpose of carrying on the business of renting accommodations to the public, can it be declared the homestead of the owner? 2. Is an action for declaratory relief the proper remedy to determine the validity of the declaration of homestead and to determine if the property is subject to execution? 3. In such action is it proper to grant a non-suit?"

Respondents, on the other hand, offer the following: "Question Presented. The respondents do not agree with appellant's statement of the questions presented, and submit that the proper and only question presented by this appeal is the following: A husband and wife filed a declaration of homestead on a 125x50 ft. lot on which was a thirty-five year old, three story frame building. The building contained six double apartments, three single apartments, and nine light housekeeping rooms. The husband and wife, for approximately two and a half years prior to filing the declaration and since that date resided in the building as their bona fide home and residence, occupying one of the double apartments and one of the light housekeeping rooms. During this time the wife in order to assist her husband in maintaining the home leased out the other apartments. Is such a building and lot the subject of homestead?"

In disputing the remedy sought by appellant under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, respondents contend that appellant should have pursued any one of several different remedies. For example, it is argued that appellant could have proceeded under section 1245 of the Civil Code; or brought an action to set aside the homestead; or bought the property in question at a sheriff's sale and then commenced an action to quiet title, etc. Such suggestions have no bearing on the validity of the action relied on by appellant. That such action is proper there can be no question. The pertinent language of section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "Any person interested * * * who desires a declaration of his rights * * * in respect to * * * property * * * may, in cases of actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties, bring an action in the superior court for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises, * * *."

[1, 2] Regardless of what other remedies may have been available it was plaintiff's right to make the selection. From the standpoint of plaintiff the other remedies may have presented serious objections. The action was proper under the law; the complaint was sufficient in form and substance and it was the trial court's plain duty to find the facts and determine the law as to the issues joined by the pleadings. It clearly was an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse so to do. Except in certain cases judgment must be on the merits. § 582, Code Civ. Proc. Plaintiff proved a "sufficient case", as contemplated by subdivision 5 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence was entitled to findings, unless waived, and a judgment "on the merits".

As hereinbefore noted in substance and effect, not only were valid issues left undetermined, but a legitimate request for such a determination as recited in the prayer of the complaint was refused. In City and County of San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 P. 281, the Supreme Court declared as follows: "The judgment, as rendered, was one of nonsuit only, the effect of which was simply to declare that the plaintiff had failed to make proof of material allegations necessary to sustain his cause of action. It decided nothing on the merits of the controversy, and necessarily could not, as its effect was to virtually put the plaintiff out of court. It operated simply as a dismissal of the case. * * * And a nonsuit suffered for any cause is not a bar to a suit subsequently brought on the same cause of action." Page 647 of 153 Cal., page 282 of 96 P.2d.

The foregoing disposes of the only issues revealed by the record to be duly raised by the action of the court below and relevant to the appeal herein. Respondents' contention that appellant seeks to "have the declaration of homestead set aside" is not supported by the record. Nor is it correct, as contended by respondents, that, "The ruling of the trial court in granting a nonsuit is a ruling that the homestead is valid" and that "the judgment of nonsuit is a final declaration under the facts as presented, that the homestead is valid".

Much of the brief is devoted to the question of whether the property involved is a proper subject of homestead. That question remains to be determined at the trial, and for reasons hereinbefore stated, is not now a proper subject for review. Moreover, the state of the law is such that helpful suggestions would be presumptuous. For example, no attempt has been made in any of the decisions to construe the term "dwelling-house" by the application of fundamental rules of construction. The statute in question reads as follows: "The homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in this title provided." § 1237, Civ.Code, Stats.1872, as amended.

In that connection the Supreme Court has declared that: "'It is the principal use to which the property is put, and not quantity, which furnishes the test in determining the question whether or not property is subject to dedication as a homestead.'" In re Albert Allen, 78 Cal. 293, 20 P. 679, 680, quoting Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 422, 17 P. 539, 7 Am.St.Rep. 180. And in Re Estate of Levy, 141 Cal. 646, at page 649, 75 P. 301, at page 302, 99 Am.St.Rep. 92, may be found the following: "When the statute speaks of the 'dwelling house' it means the 'building' which is occupied as a dwelling house by the family, and not such portion of the building as may be actually used by the family for residence purposes. It is well settled, as was said by this court in Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 P. 404, that 'using a building partly, or even chiefly, for business purposes, or renting part of it, is not inconsistent with the right of homestead, provided it is, and continues to be, the bona fide residence of the family.'" Thus "bona fide residence" becomes the test in the determination of the question and by judicial legislation the term "building" is substituted for the term "dwelling-house". Just why the Legislature intended building instead of dwelling house is not explained by reference to any rules of construction nor are any reasons given for such assumption. That the term building is general, less certain and more comprehensive than the term "house", there can be no question and hence the effect and extent of section 1237 is broadened from the particular to the general almost without limitation. It is noteworthy in that regard that the same Legislature that adopted section 1237 (1872–1873), adopted sections 459 and 460 of the Penal Code defining burglary and the degrees thereof, which sections appear to recognize a definite distinction among the terms "house", "dwelling-house" and "building".

Later decisions return to the rule that it is the "principal use" to which the property is put, in addition to residence, that constitutes the test referred to.

On the asserted grounds of liberal construction, there is a definite tendency in the decisions to indulge the homestead to such an extent that a wide variety of business ventures appear to be well protected by the same shelter.

The foregoing brief reference to the law is included to emphasize the importance of the issue involved and the necessity for a trial on the merits.

For the reasons stated the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for trial on the issues joined by the pleadings.

YORK, P. J., and WHITE, J., concurred.

ROSE v. AMES et al.

Civ. 13541.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 25, 1942.

1. Contracts 🔑332(2)

In action for breach of contract to pay plaintiff one-third of all moneys recovered either by sale or compromise in the enforcement of a judgment, complaint which lacked any allegations that defendants had recovered any money by sale or compromise failed to state a cause of action.

2. Specific performance 🔑114(1)

In action based upon an alleged contract under which plaintiff was to receive one-third of all moneys recovered either by sale or compromise in the enforcement of a judgment, but which contained no agreement that defendants would levy an execution upon judgment debtor's property and cause it to be sold, count stating that plaintiff had no speedy and adequate remedy at law and would be irreparably damaged unless defendants were compelled to sell judgment debtor's property, did not state a cause of action for specific performance.

3. Conspiracy 🔑18

In action based upon an alleged contract under which plaintiff was to receive one-third of all moneys recovered by defendant either by sale or compromise in the enforcement of a judgment, count alleging that defendants in order to defraud plaintiff had fraudulently and unlawfully conspired with judgment debtor to delay enforcement until the levy under writ of execution lapsed did not state a cause of action predicated upon theory of conspiracy, since there was no allegation of an unlawful act or injurious act by unlawful means.

4. Conspiracy 🔑1, 4

A conspiracy is not actionable unless the alleged combination results in perpetration of the unlawful act or some injurious act by unlawful means.

5. Money received 🔑17(1)

Where plaintiff relied for recovery under common count for money had and received on facts specifically pleaded in other counts which failed to state a cause of action, general demurrer was properly sustained to count for money had and received.

6. Money received 🔑17(1)

Where plaintiff is not entitled to recover under count in complaint in which all facts upon which his demand is based are specifically pleaded, common count seeking recovery on the same set of facts is demurrable.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1041(2)

Where proposed amended complaint was vulnerable to general demurrer on same ground upon which demurrer to original complaint had been sustained, denial of permission to file amended complaint did not constitute prejudicial error.

8. Appeal and error 🔑959(1)

An appellate court will sustain trial court's denial of application for leave to file an amended pleading unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Maurice Rose against E. Neal Ames and another to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract. From a judgment in favor of the defendants after the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for permission to file an amended complaint, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

A. J. Weiss and William E. Balter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. Neal Ames, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. for respondents.

McCOMB, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from (1) a judgment in favor of defendants after the trial court sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend in an action to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract, and (2) an order denying plaintiff's motion for permission to file an amended complaint. The complaint contained the following allegations in substance:

Count I

Count I is a common count for money had and received.

Count II

I

Prior to the institution of the present action Maurice Rose filed a certificate with the county clerk of Los Angeles County, showing that he was doing business under the fictitious name of Golden State Finance Company.

II

Waunetta G. Silverstein obtained a judgment against John A. Woodward for the sum of $18,992.66, which judgment was partially satisfied in the sum of $1,431.90, and there is still due and owing on said judgment the sum of $17,560.76.

III

Each of the defendants claim an interest in the aforementioned judgment.

IV

On December 19, 1938, defendants entered into a written agreement with plaintiff reading as follows:

"Golden State Finance Company
"Los Angeles, California
"Attention: Mr. H. L. Rose

"Dear Sir:

"In accordance with our conversation, you have informed me of the fact that you are in a position to give me information whereby I may levy upon property belonging to John A. Woodward, Jr., under an execution issued in the judgment secured by Mrs. Waunetta G. Silverstein against Mr. Woodward in Superior Court Case No. 409108.

"It is understood the information which you are to give me is of sufficient definite nature that it will enable me on Mrs. Silverstein's behalf to levy upon the property designated by you, said information being sufficiently definite both as to the nature of the property to be levied upon and its location.

"It is understood and agreed that there will be no expenses incurred or necessary in order to recover under an execution upon said property, other than the usual costs of levy and sale.

"It is further understood and agreed that for and in consideration of the giving of the information to E. Neal Ames on behalf of Mrs. Silverstein, you are to receive one-third (⅓) of all moneys recovered either by sale or compromise, after deducting all costs incurred by Mrs. Silverstein in connection with the levy upon the property from the information furnished by you.

"It is further understood and agreed that the property above referred to is not any interest which the said Woodward has under the terms of the trust created by his father's will or any real estate involved therein, nor shall it cover any property upon which you have already levied an execution.

"It is further understood that Mr. Ames is authorized and hereby instructed to pay the same to you out of the proceeds of any recovery made as hereinbefore set out.

"Very sincerely yours,
"E. Neal Ames.

"I hereby approve the same.

....

"Mrs. Waunetta G. Silverstein."

V

At all times mentioned in the complaint defendant E. Neal Ames was the attorney of record for defendant Waunetta G. Silverstein.

VI

On or about December 19, 1939, plaintiff furnished defendants information concerning said properties of John A. Woodward, and thereafter defendants caused writs of execution to be levied upon said properties and instructed the sheriff of Los Angeles County to sell the same, but prior to the date of sale defendants instructed the sheriff to discontinue any further action upon the writs of execution, and defendants have never continued with the sale, although requested to do so by plaintiff.

VII

Plaintiff has no knowledge or belief as to whether defendants have in truth and in fact received payment pursuant to or as a result of the aforementioned levy of execution.

VIII

Plaintiff has demanded from defendants the sum of $7,716.82, it being one-third of the amount due on the judgment obtained by defendant Silverstein against John A. Woodward, which sum defendants have refused to pay plaintiff.

Count III

I

Count III incorporates by reference most of the material allegations of Count II.

II

Plaintiff has performed all the conditions and covenants of the agreement set forth in Count II.

III

Plaintiff has no speedy and adequate remedy at law, and, unless defendants are compelled to sell the property of John A. Woodward, plaintiff will be irreparably damaged.

Count IV

I

Count IV incorporates by reference most of the material allegations of Count II.

II

"Plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges the fact to be true, that defendants and each of them in order to defraud plaintiff of his one-third share in and to any sale or compromise on account of" the aforementioned execution "on the property of" John Woodward, "in accordance with the terms of said agreement aforementioned, have fraudulently and unlawfully conspired together with said Woodward to delay or withhold enforcement until such time as said levy under the writ of execution above set forth lapses and said writ becomes of no force and effect.

"* * * in pursuance to said conspiracy to defraud plaintiff * * * defendants and each of them have delayed and refused to enforce said levy pursuant to the writ of execution aforementioned, despite plaintiff's insistent demands therefor."

Plaintiff asked judgment against defendants (1) for the sum of $7,716.82, (2) that defendants be compelled to satisfy the judgment obtained by defendant Silverstein against John Woodward out of the property upon which execution had been levied, (3) for costs of the suit, and (4) for general relief.

[1] There are two questions presented for our determination, which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim.

First: Was the general demurrer of defendants to the complaint properly sustained on the ground that the pleading failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. Assuming that the letter of December 19, 1938, signed by defendant Ames, which is alleged in the complaint, constituted a contract between plaintiff and defendants, an essential allegation for plaintiff to recover upon such alleged agreement would be that defendants had "recovered either by sale or compromise" money due on the judgment obtained against Mr. Woodward by defendant Silverstein.

The pertinent paragraph of the alleged agreement reads thus:

"It is further understood and agreed that for and in consideration of the giving of the information to E. Neal Ames on behalf of Mrs. Silverstein, you are to receive one-third (1/3) of all moneys recovered either by sale or compromise, after deducting all costs incurred by Mrs. Silverstein in connection with the levy upon the property from the information furnished by you."

There is a total absence of any allegation in the complaint that defendants or either of them recovered any money either by sale or compromise on the judgment which defendant Silverstein had obtained against Mr. Woodward. Hence, the general demurrer was properly sustained as to the second count in the complaint.

[2] In the purported contract there is no agreement upon the part of defendants to levy an execution upon the property of Mr. Woodward and thereafter to cause the same to be sold. Therefore, Count III did not state a cause of action for specific performance and the demurrer was properly sustained as to this count.

[3, 4] The fourth count did not state a cause of action predicated upon the theory of conspiracy, for the reason that the law is established in California that a conspiracy is not actionable, unless the alleged combination results in the perpetration of an unlawful act or some injurious act by unlawful means. (Harris v. Hirschfeld, 13 Cal.App.2d 204, 206, 56 P.2d 1252.) In the complaint before us there is a total absence of any allegation of either an unlawful act or an injurious act by unlawful means. Hence, the demurrer was properly sustained to the fourth count.

[5, 6] As to the first count, which was a common count for money had and received, the general demurrer was likewise properly sustained. It is the established law of California that, if plaintiff is not entitled to recover under one count in a complaint, where all the facts upon which his demand is based are specifically pleaded, it is proper to sustain a demurrer to a common count set forth in the complaint, the recovery under which is obviously based on the set of facts specifically pleaded in the other count. (Hays v. Temple, 23 Cal.App.2d 690, 695, 73 P.2d 1248.)

It is obvious from reading the complaint in the instant case that plaintiff relies for recovery under the first count, that is, the common count on the facts specifically pleaded in counts II, III, and IV. For the foregoing reasons the general demurrer was properly sustained as to all counts in the complaint.

Second: Did the trial court commit prejudicial error in denying plaintiff's application for permission to file an amended complaint?

[7, 8] This question must be answered in the negative. The law is established in California that an appellate court will sustain the action of the trial court in denying an application for leave to file an amended pleading, unless it be made to appear that there has been an abuse of discretion. In the instant case there is no showing that the trial court abused its discretion. The proposed amended complaint proffered by plaintiff did not supply the material allegations which were omitted from the original complaint, and such proposed amended complaint was vulnerable to a general demurrer on each of the grounds upon which the demurrer to the original complaint was sustained.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are and each is affirmed.

HICKS et ux. v. REIS et al.

Civ. 13134.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 29, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⇨242(6)

An inference that driver of automobile involved in collision was using automobile with owner's implied consent may be overcome by evidence so clear, positive, and uncontradicted that it cannot rationally be disbelieved.

2. Automobiles ⇨242(6)

Evidence that dealer's used automobiles were not insured, that his salesmen were required to obtain consent before using automobiles, that employee had been previously discharged for using automobile without permission, and that he was not given express permission to take dealer's automobile, which he allegedly kept overnight to demonstrate to himself as a prospective purchaser, and which was being driven by his brother when involved in collision on pleasure trip, was sufficient to overcome any inference that his brother was using automobile at time of collision with dealer's consent.

3. Automobiles ⇨243(12)

In action for damages arising out of collision with automobile dealer's automobile which was being driven by brother of dealer's employee, testimony of employee that before taking automobile he told dealer's auditor that he was going to take it was inadmissible to show dealer's knowledge of employee's taking of automobile, where auditor had no connection with business other than as bookkeeper.

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(6)

Where sole question involved in case was whether automobile dealer's employee had authority to take dealer's automobile which was involved in collision, reviewing court was required to presume that trial court gave some weight to incompetent testimony that employee before taking automobile informed dealer's auditor that he was going to do so.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)

In action for damages arising out of collision with automobile dealer's automobile which was being driven by brother of dealer's employee, where sole question involved authority of employee to take the automobile, error in admission of employee's testimony that before taking automobile he told dealer's auditor that he was going to do so was prejudicial.

Where automobile dealer's employee sought to justify his taking of dealer's automobile, which was later involved in collision while being driven by employee's brother, on ground that he wished to demonstrate automobile to himself as a prospective purchaser, brother's driving of automobile while he and employee were on pleasure trip was without dealer's consent, in absence of any claim that trip was a part of demonstration or that brother was a prospective purchaser.

7. Automobiles ⇨193(11)

Implied consent that one person may use automobile for a particular purpose is no consent at all that he may turn it over to whomsoever he pleases to be driven for any other purpose.

8. Automobiles ⇨242(6)

Where automobile dealer's employee kept dealer's automobile overnight without specific permission as required by dealer, and automobile was involved in collision on following evening while being driven by employee's brother on pleasure trip, the statutory presumption that a person is innocent of crime and the provision making it unlawful for anyone to drive a vehicle without owner's consent, considered together, did not give rise to presumption, on which dealer's liability could be based, that automobile was being driven with dealer's consent. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subd. 1; Vehicle Code, § 503, St.1939, p. 1481.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Louis C. Drapeau, Judge.

Suit by Dorrance P. Hicks and wife against John Reis, Fred W. Gray, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Fred W. Gray Company, and others, to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiffs' persons and property sustained in a collision of their automobile with an automobile owned by the defendant Gray. Judgment for the plaintiffs and the defendant Gray appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James C. Hollingsworth, of Ventura, and Henderson & Churchill, of Santa Paula, for respondents.

SHINN, Judge.

Plaintiffs, husband and wife, recovered judgment against Stanley Reis, John Reis and Fred W. Gray as damages for injuries to their persons and property sustained in a collision of their automobile with another car owned by defendant Gray and driven by Stanley Reis at the request of John Reis, who was riding in the car at the time. Defendant Gray appeals.

The judgment against Gray can be sustained only in case the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the car was being driven at the time of the accident with the permission of Gray, in which case the latter would be responsible for the negligence of the driver. As we have concluded that the judgment must be reversed, our discussion will cover all phases of the case as they are presented in the briefs.

Defendant Gray was a dealer in second-hand cars, Frank P. Hume was his sales manager, and John Reis was employed as one of his salesmen working on a lot from which cars were sold. At about 9 p.m. June 13, 1940, John Reis, being the only person on the lot, left his own car there and took an Oldsmobile from the lot to his home, kept it there the rest of the night, did not go to work the following day (his birthday), but during the day drove the car some 37 miles. In the evening John and his brother Stanley and two young women took a ride in the car; Stanley, at John's suggestion, drove the car from Los Angeles on the coast highway to the outskirts of Oxnard, some 63 miles, where they turned around and came back to the point where the accident occurred. John rode in the rumble seat, part of the time with one of the girls and the rest of the time alone. The accident occurred some 23 hours after John had taken the car from the lot of defendant Gray. During this time John was not engaged at all in the business of his employer.

[1, 2] For the purpose of a discussion of the matter of implied consent from a viewpoint most favorable to respondent, we shall assume as a premise, without conceding its verity, that as Gray owned the car, John was his employee and Stanley drove the car at the suggestion of John, an inference could be drawn that Stanley was driving and using the car with the implied consent of Gray. Such inference would be sufficient to support an affirmative finding on that issue, unless the evidence contrary thereto was so clear, positive, uncontradicted and of such a nature that it could not rationally have been disbelieved. If there was such complete evidence opposed to the inference, the fact of implied consent was disproved as a matter of law. Blank v. Coffin, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868. We think there was such evidence and that upon the undisputed facts of the case the inference of permissive use alone does not support the finding. Because of this conclusion it will be necessary to make a somewhat comprehensive statement of the evidence.

First we shall notice the testimony of John Reis, for if there is not to be found therein contradiction of the defendant Gray and certain of his witnesses whose testimony we shall mention later, the evidence that John Reis had no express or implied permission to take the car from the lot for personal use on a pleasure trip stands without contradiction. As we shall point out, there was no such contradiction. Before giving specific attention to the facts testified to by John, we might say that it was shown that he had been employed by Gray as a salesman upon a former occasion and had been discharged for taking a car off the sales lot without permission and retaining it overnight. A year and a half after this incident he was reemployed and had been working for two or three weeks before he took the Oldsmobile that was involved in the accident.

John testified that upon several occasions he had taken cars off the lot to demonstrate them to prospects; that on these occasions neither Gray nor his manager Hume was on the lot; that he had occasionally driven a car from the lot during the noon hour to a lunch room a few blocks away and that Mr. Hume had had knowledge of his making such use of cars. He testified that before he took the Oldsmobile on the night of June 13 he had not asked Gray or his manager for permission to use it, had not received such permission and that he took it without their knowledge. The only explanation he offered for his actions was that he had some thought of buying the Oldsmobile and wished to try it out. He testified that he had mentioned the matter to Gray, but the latter denied this. He had been selling cars for about five years, was familiar with motors, had run the motor of the Oldsmobile while it was standing on the lot and had listened to it; that on the night of June 13 he drove it six or seven miles to his home, was not entirely satisfied then with the extent of the demonstration but by the time he had driven it the next day for a total distance of some 37 miles he was more than satisfied with its condition. This was before the start of the trip to Oxnard. The price of the Oldsmobile was $295. The down payment would have been $100. John's own car was worth not more than $50 and in the time he had worked for Gray he had earned only $41 and he had no money but in fact had endeavored unsuccessfully to borrow $25 from Gray at the time he went to work and later had obtained a $10 advance on his commissions before they were due. The sum of this testimony is that John had demonstrated cars to customers a few times without the prior knowledge or consent of Gray or Hume; that he had used a car to go to lunch a few times, on which occasions he told Hume where he was going; that he took the Oldsmobile and kept it because he had in mind buying it and wished to see how it ran; that he was entirely satisfied with its condition before he started the ride to Oxnard.

There is one other fact testified to by John, namely, that he told a Mr. Daly, Gray's bookkeeper, that he intended to take the Oldsmobile from the lot. This testimony, received over defendant's objection, will be discussed later.

Defendant Gray testified to the previous employment of John and his discharge for taking a car without permission; of having told John that he was being discharged because of his violation of that rule; that he informed him at the time of his reemployment, which he had under consideration for two days before deciding on it, that their rule was very strict as to the removal of cars from the lot; that no car was to be taken without the permission of himself or Hume; that John had never mentioned to him a possible purchase of the Oldsmobile; that there had never been a time to his knowledge when John had taken a car off the lot at lunch time or on any occasion without obtaining permission; that he did not know that the Oldsmobile had been taken from the lot until the day after the accident; that Hume was in charge of the lot when Gray was away; that Daly had nothing to do with the sale of cars or the used-car end of the business; that the cars carried no collision insurance and when a demonstration was allowed it was confined to a drive of four or five blocks, and that no salesman ever took a car off the lot prior to the occasion in question without the consent of Gray or Hume.

The witness Hume testified that he was sales manager for Gray in charge of the cars and employees on the used-car lot; that he had never known of any occasion when John took a car off the lot prior to the occasion in question except for a demonstration around four or five blocks; that on the day John came to work Hume instructed him that no car was to be taken off the lot for a demonstration without notification to Gray or Hume; that John had never discussed a possible purchase of the Oldsmobile with him; that he did not discover the disappearance of the Oldsmobile for 48 hours after it had been taken; that he had given no one permission to take the car, and that he knew of no occasion when John had used a car for the purpose of going to lunch or that he had ever taken a car off the lot without express permission.

John Reis did not deny having been instructed that cars could be taken off the lot only for demonstration purposes and then only with the consent of Gray or Hume.

Stanley Reis testified that he had no intention of buying the car and did not drive it for the purpose of demonstrating it to himself.

Whatever evidence there was in support of or opposed to the inference that the car was being driven with the consent of Gray at the time of the accident must be found in the foregoing facts and the testimony of the witnesses.

It may be conceded that if full credence was given to the testimony of John Reis the conclusion was properly drawn that he had implied permission to demonstrate the car to himself in a usual manner. The use of the car for an extended pleasure trip was quite another matter.

We therefore do not question the sufficiency of the evidence to show that John had implied permission to take the car in order to try it out as a prospective purchaser. When we speak of the inference of consent, we refer to consent to the use of the car by Stanley as distinguished from its use for limited purposes by John.

Each case where the question of an owner's consent is involved necessarily rests upon its own peculiar facts. A case such as the one before us, where all of the direct evidence and strong circumstantial evidence was opposed to the inference that the use of the car at the time of the accident was permissive and in which the finding of the trial court was in accordance with the inference, calls for an examination of the entire record to ascertain whether there was reason to reject the direct and circumstantial evidence and follow the inference, or whether the evidence opposed to the court's finding was reasonable, uncontradicted, unimpeached, and in all respects so satisfactory as to compel its acceptance. Circumstantial evidence is frequently of great importance, for it may tend strongly to show that the claim that the driver was using the car with the owner's permission is highly unreasonable, which we think is true in the present case, or not unreasonable at all under facts such as those involved in Blank v. Coffin, supra, 1942, where it was held error to direct a verdict for the defendant. In that case an employee had been given the exclusive use and possession of his company's car and he used it continually in his business, even in the evenings, but also frequently on his own pleasure jaunts and under circumstances which would readily have brought to the employer's attention his personal use of the car. The case was held to be one in which the jury could have believed that the employee's superiors probably knew of such personal use and winked at it and for that reason it was held that the inference that the employer did consent might reasonably have been followed by the jury in preference to the testimony of witnesses that there was no such consent. A comparison of the facts of that case with those of the case before us is appropriate because the one case involved a not unusual situation where the inference of implied consent could properly be drawn from the entire evidence, whereas our own case presents a situation, also not unusual, where evidence of a positive and satisfactory character, both direct and circumstantial, reasonably and logically dissolves the supposed inference.

Gray's secondhand cars were not insured against collision damage; his sales lot was kept open until 10 p. m. for the accommodation of customers; he permitted short demonstrations to be made by his salesmen with the consent of himself or his manager; he had discharged John Reis from a former employment for using a car without his permission, and when he reemployed him he gave him strict instructions not to repeat his escapade. It would have been an unbusinesslike and foolish policy to allow his salesmen to use his uninsured automobiles for their own business or pleasure, to say nothing of allowing their retention overnight. These circumstances of the case and the reasonableness of Gray's rules for his employees would have been sufficient to warrant the trial court in making a finding contrary to the inference of permissive use. And if we turn to the testimony of John Reis and accord it the greatest possible weight we find that under a pretext that he wished to buy the car he took it home, kept it all night and the following day for the alleged purpose of demonstration, and after he was entirely satisfied with it, took his brother and a couple of girls on a 125-mile pleasure trip. If an inference of permission to keep the car for 23 hours is consistent with the undisputed facts of the case, when would the permission have run out? And would it have lasted until the owner discovered the loss of the car and demanded its return? These questions bring us back to the realities of the situation. When we look not only to the facts of Gray's ownership and John's status as an employee, but also to the entire, firmly established and indisputable facts of the case, which must be considered as a whole, we have to say that an inference that the driver of the car was using it at the time of the accident with the owner's consent cannot be drawn, or, stating it in another way, that the inference which might be drawn from certain of the facts is dispelled, if it is recognized at all, by the overwhelming weight of the evidence, which satisfies our minds that the inference can no longer reasonably survive. Whichever way the proposition is stated, the result is that whenever it becomes necessary to determine whether the evidence opposed to the inference is so strong and satisfactory that the inference ceases to furnish substantial conflict in the evidence upon the point, the question on appeal becomes purely one of law.

The instant case is governed by the principles stated in Engstrom v. Auburn Auto. Sales Corp., 1938, 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059; Crouch v. Gilmore Oil Co., Ltd., 1936, 5 Cal.2d 330, 54 P.2d 709; and Maupin v. Solomon, 1919, 41 Cal.App. 323, 183 P. 198. In the Engstrom case the inference of permissive use was held to be overcome by uncontradicted testimony that the driver, who had borrowed the car, had promised to return it a day prior to the accident and had retained it longer without the owner's consent. And so in our case, if John Reis had implied authority to demonstrate the car to himself, his right to use it was only a right to demonstrate it and the retention of the car thereafter and Stanley's driving it on a pleasure trip were wholly unauthorized in any view of the facts. Under the circumstances there was the same duty to return the car promptly that there would have been had Gray given his express consent that the car be tried out and John Reis had expressly promised to return it when the demonstration was over. The finding that the automobile was being driven at the time of the accident with the implied consent of the defendant Gray is unsupported by the evidence.

[3] We think the trial court was probably influenced to make the finding as to permissive use by certain testimony that was admitted upon the promise of counsel for plaintiffs to lay a foundation for it, which they failed to do. The court permitted John Reis to testify that either on the night that he took the car or the night before, he told a Mr. Daly he was going to take it and try it out. It appears without dispute that Daly was an auditor and clerk in the employ of appellant, that he took care of the books and had no other connection with the business. No authority was shown on the part of Daly to permit cars to be taken from the lot. Appellant objected to the introduction of this evidence and it was admitted only upon the promise that it would be connected up by a showing of authority on the part of Daly. No such showing was made. Appellant moved to strike out the testimony on the ground that it related to matters entirely outside the scope of Daly's employment and was incompetent to show knowledge on the part of appellant that Reis intended to take or had taken the car. This motion was denied. The evidence was clearly inadmissible upon that issue. "An agent's knowledge of matter which is outside the scope of the agency or not related to its purpose is not imputed to the principal." 3 C.J.S., Agency, § 264, p. 197; Foorman v. Myers, 1934, 1 Cal.App.2d 719, 722, 37 P.2d 469.

[4, 5] It is urged by respondents in justification of the ruling that the conduct of Reis was material to show that he acted "in accordance with customary routine" and not surreptitiously and that he believed he had permission to use the car. No such contention was made in the court below. We have carefully read the record pertaining to the rulings upon the objection and the motion to strike out this testimony, and it appears therefrom that the sole question upon which the court ruled was one relating to the authority of Reis to take the car and to the related question of the knowledge, if any, that was possessed by appellant or his employees of Reis' intention to take it. The state of the record is such that we must presume that the court gave some weight to this incompetent testimony, and for that reason we believe that the error was prejudicial.

[6, 7] Furthermore, despite the inference which we assumed in the beginning for the purposes of discussion of the first point considered, we believe that under the undisputed facts Stanley Reis could not on any theory be deemed to have been using the car with Gray's implied consent. His driving it was no part of the demonstration of the car either for his benefit or for John's. Implied consent that one person may use a car for a particular purpose is no consent at all that he may turn it over to whomsoever he pleases to be driven for any other purpose. This rule is stated in Howland v. Doyle, 1935, 6 Cal. App.2d 311, 314, 315, 44 P.2d 453, and has been followed in Sommers v. Van Der Linden, 1938, 24 Cal.App.2d 375, 381, 75 P.2d 83; Garrison v. Booth, 1935, 10 Cal.App. 2d 738, 742, 52 P.2d 535; and Engstrom v. Auburn Auto. Sales Corp. supra, 1938, 11 Cal.2d 64, 68, 77 P.2d 1059. The rule of these cases is to be distinguished from the one followed in Haggard v. Frick, 1935, 6

Cal.App.2d 392, 44 P.2d 447, and cases therein cited, holding that an owner invests the borrower of his car with authority to select an operator for it where he loans it without definite direction or reservation as to its use.

[8] Finally, it is contended by respondent that it is to be presumed under section 1963, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure that a person is innocent of crime or wrong; that under section 503 of the Vehicle Code, St.1939, p. 1481, it is unlawful for any person to drive or take a vehicle not his own without the consent of the owner thereof and in the absence of the owner and with intent to either permanently or temporarily deprive the owner thereof of his title to or possession of such vehicle, whether with or without intent to steal the same, and that when effect is given to said section 1963 there arises a presumption that the car was being driven with the consent of the owner.

We may assume, without so deciding, that the presumption of innocence sought to be invoked should be given effect to the full extent which the proven facts will allow, as to the conduct of both Stanley and John, but when this is done the conclusions we have heretofore stated are not affected in any degree. So far as Stanley's conduct is concerned there was no evidence whatever that he was implicated with John in the taking of the car or had reason to believe that John's permission to use it was limited to a demonstration of it. He was driving the car at John's suggestion, he was under no active duty to return it to Gray and committed no wrong in failing to do so. His innocence of crime or wrong did not depend upon his having Gray's permission to use the car but upon his good faith in acting upon John's permission to drive it, and the presumption on this point is in his favor. 31 C.J.S., Evidence, § 126, p. 745; Hedden v. Waldeck, 1937, 9 Cal.2d 631, 636, 72 P.2d 114; Arakelian v. Sears, 1921, 53 Cal.App. 646, 653, 200 P. 757. Not only would it be wholly unreasonable to believe from the evidence that Stanley, himself, had Gray's permission to use the car, but such consent would be irrelevant, upon any factual basis derivable from the record, to the question of his innocence, and for both of these reasons the presumption as related to his conduct, can have no application. No more can the presumption of innocence be applied to the conduct of John in the decision of any material issue. In the first place it is not John's negligence that is sought to be imputed to Gray—only Stanley's. Granted that the presumption of innocence if extended in John's favor would be evidence that he had Gray's consent to use the car even up to and at the time of the accident, that fact would still be irrelevant to the question of Gray's responsibility, since John's limited authority to use the car would have given him no right to turn it over to Stanley to use and his act in so doing would have imposed no liability upon Gray for Stanley's negligence. In addition to this, the undisputed testimony that John at most had a limited authority to use the car and that he exceeded that authority, and the absence of all evidence, direct or circumstantial, that he had a right to possession of the car at the time of the accident, establish the fact of nonconsent so firmly and satisfactorily as to completely overcome any presumption of consent derivable from the presumption of John's innocence. If the inference of permissive use is overcome by the weight of the undisputed evidence, it cannot be restored by resort to the disputable presumption of innocence. The presumption as well as the inference is overcome as a matter of law where it ceases to furnish a substantial conflict with the evidence opposed to it. A conclusion of fact, whether resulting from a process of inference or from a declared disputable presumption, can have probative force only so long as it is sustainable in reason. But as we have said, presumptive evidence that John had the right to the use of the car at the time of the accident is wholly irrelevant to the question of Gray's liability, which is nonexistent unless Stanley's negligence can be imputed to him, and we have shown that this cannot be done.

I concur: SCHAUER, P. J.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

I concur except in the discussion of the presumption of innocence. As to that matter I express no opinion. Even if the presumption is applicable here, the evidence opposing it is so strong that the error in admitting evidence of the conversations with Daly must be regarded as prejudicial.

FIRST FEDERAL SAVINGS & LOAN ASS'N OF HOLLYWOOD v. STATE BOARD OF CONTROL et al.

Civ. 13487.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 14, 1942.

1. Taxation 🔑535

While word "approve", used in statute prohibiting allowance of corporation franchise tax refund until approved by State Board of Control, does not ex vi termini necessarily import exercise of discretion, legislature is presumed to have intended that officer, whose approval is required by statute to validate or consummate another's act, is invested with option to sanction officially or disapprove such act, but such presumption is not conclusive, and if it clearly appears that word is used in more limited sense and imposes mere ministerial or clerical duty, courts will so hold. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Approve".

2. Taxation 🔑535

The provision of Corporation Franchise Tax Act that determination of State Board of Equalization on appeal from franchise tax commissioner's disallowance of claim for refund of tax overpayment shall be final after specified times is merely time limitation on such board's power to act and hence not in conflict with provision that no refund shall be allowed until approved by State Board of Control, in view of taxpayer's statutory right to bring action after such determination to recover amount claimed, so that Board of Control has power to determine questions of law and fact for itself. Gen. Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, §§ 27, 30.

3. Taxation 🔑535

The failure of State Board of Control to give notice of hearing on review of State Board of Equalization's decision allowing claim for refund of corporation franchise tax overpayment should not be considered in determining whether statute requiring approval of claim by Board of Control authorizes such board to pass on merits of claim and consider questions of law and fact for himself, especially in absence of statutory provisions precluding or denying such hearing, if requested, and petition by taxpayer for reconsideration of board's action, accompanied by request for hearing. Gen. Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

4. Mandamus 🔑187(9)

On appeal from judgment granting writ of mandate, requiring State Board of Control to approve petitioner's claim for refund of franchise tax overpayment, after overruling demurrer to petition without leave to answer, question whether petitioner is without other remedy because statute makes no provision for bringing of action for refund after such board's ruling is not relevant to issue whether petition stated sufficient facts to warrant issuance of writ and hence will not be considered. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

5. Statutes 🔑220

Failure of Corporation Franchise Tax Act to provide for action for refund of tax overpayment after decision of State Board of Control disapproving claim for refund does not show intent to limit such board's power to ministerial act of auditing claim. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

6. Taxation 🔑535

The provision of Corporation Franchise Tax Act that no refund of tax overpayment shall be allowed until approved by State Board of Control presumptively invests such board with discretionary power and option to sanction or disapprove State Board of Equalization's allowance of claim for refund. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

7. Taxation 🔑535

The word "approve", used in act prohibiting allowance of corporation franchise tax refund until approved by State Board of Control, has no technical meaning, and court is without power to extend its meaning beyond that contemplated by approved usage of language, unless contrary or more limited construction according to context is obviously intended. Civ.Code, § 13; Gen. Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

8. Mandamus 🔑154(4)

A petition for writ of mandate, requiring State Board of Control to approve claim for refund of franchise tax overpayment on theory that Board of Control was without discretion in matter, was insufficient on demurrer, in absence of allegations of facts tending to show abuse of discretion by board. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Proceeding by the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Hollywood, a corporation, for a writ of mandate requiring the State Board of Control to approve and the State Comptroller to pay a refund of excessive franchise taxes paid by petitioner. Judgment for petitioner, and respondents appeal.

Reversed with directions.

Hearing denied; CARTER and TRAYNOR, JJ., dissenting.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., H. H. Linney, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Robert Clifton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Richard FitzPatrick and J. Rex Dibble, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

Respondent, a corporation doing business in the State of California and subject to payment of franchise taxes pursuant to the provisions of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act (Stats.1929, page 19, as amended; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 8488), made returns for said taxes for the years 1934 to 1937 inclusive, and paid taxes in accordance with said returns. Later, on or about April 13, 1938, having discovered an alleged error in computation of the taxes, respondent filed its claim for refund of the amounts which it asserted had been overpaid by reason of such error. The Franchise Tax Commissioner disallowed the claim for refund and respondent appealed to the State Board of Equalization. The latter board determined that the Franchise Tax Commissioner was in error in disallowing the claim for refund and allowed a refund. The board notified the commissioner of its decision and the commissioner notified the State Board of Control. The State Board of Control, at a meeting held by it, of which respondent had no notice, disapproved the refund and advised respondent of its action. In the meantime any right respondent may have had under the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act to bring suit against the state for the refund had expired. Respondent then filed its petition for writ of mandate in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County against the State Board of Control and the controller praying that the court order that board to approve the claim and the controller to pay it. The attorney general, on behalf of the board and the controller, filed a demurrer to the petition for writ of mandate and after hearing thereon the court overruled the demurrer without leave to answer and ordered judgment for petitioner as prayed. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

The instant case involves the interpretation of section 27 of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, supra, which, so far as here material, at the time this claim for refund was allowed by the State Board of Equalization and disallowed by the State Board of Control, read as follows:

"If, in the opinion of the commissioner, or the State Board of Equalization, as the case may be, there has been an overpayment of tax, penalty or interest by a taxpayer for any year for any reason, the amount of such overpayment shall be credited against any taxes then due from the taxpayer under this act, and the balance shall be refunded to the taxpayer or its successor through reorganization, merger, or consolidation, or to stockholders upon dissolution. No such credit or refund shall be allowed or made until approved by the State Board of Control. No such credit or refund shall be allowed or made after four years from the last day prescribed for filing the return or after one year from the date of the overpayment, whichever period expires the later, unless before the expiration of such period a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer. A refund claim upon which action has become final shall not thereafter be considered a refund claim within the meaning of the foregoing provision except to the extent allowed. Every claim for refund must be in writing under oath and must state the specific grounds upon which the claim is founded.

"If the commissioner disallows any claim for refund, he shall notify the taxpayer accordingly. At the expiration of ninety days from the mailing of such notice, the commissioner's action upon the claim shall be final unless within such ninety-day period, the taxpayer appeals in writing from the action of the commissioner to the State Board of Equalization. If the commissioner fails to mail notice of action on any refund claim within six months after the claim was filed, the taxpayer may, prior to mailing of notice of action on the refund claim, consider the claim disallowed and appeal to said board. Appeals must be addressed and mailed to the State Board of Equalization at Sacramento, and a copy of the appeal addressed and mailed at the same time to the commissioner at Sacramento. Said board shall hear and determine the same and thereafter shall forthwith notify the taxpayer and the commissioner of its determination. Such determination shall be final upon the expiration of sixty days from the time of such determination unless within such sixty-day period the determination is modified, in which event it shall become final upon the expiration of sixty days from the time it is modified. * * *

"Any refund or any portion thereof which is erroneously made, and any credit or any portion thereof which is erroneously allowed, may be recovered * * * in an action brought by the commissioner in a court of competent jurisdiction in the county of Sacramento in the name of the people of the State of California, and such actions shall be tried in the county of Sacramento, unless the court, with the consent of the Attorney General or the counsel for the commissioner, orders a change of place of trial. The Attorney General or the counsel for the commissioner must prosecute such action, and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to service of summons, pleadings, proofs, trials, and appeals are applicable to the proceedings herein provided for." Stats.1939, ch. 1050, p. 2965, § 16, Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 27. (Italics added.)

The petition for writ of mandate herein set forth the facts regarding petitioner's claim for refund, the decision of the State Board of Equalization with regard thereto and the disapproval of the State Board of Control, and alleged that after petitioner had been advised by the latter board that it had disapproved the refund "petitioner reminded said State Board of Control that its claim for refund had been approved by the State Board of Equalization and demanded that said State Board of Control approve said refund"; that: "Notwithstanding said demand by petitioner, the State Board of Control has refused, and continues to refuse, to approve said refund." The petition did not state any facts from which it might be concluded that the action of the board, in the circumstances, amounted to an abuse of discretion. As appears from the contentions of respondent upon this appeal, as well as from the petition itself in the court below, the petition for the writ of mandate was predicated upon the theory that since the claim for refund had been allowed by the State Board of Equalization, it was mandatory upon the State Board of Control to approve it. It is true that in the petition it was alleged that petitioner was not given any notice of the meeting of the Board of Control at which said refund was disapproved, and that petitioner was not given any opportunity to be heard by said board prior to said disapproval; that petitioner has not since been given any opportunity to be heard regarding the validity of the action of the board in disapproving said refund. But it is not urged by respondent that such allegations were sufficient to show an abuse of discretion on the part of the Board of Control. Respondent apparently relies solely upon its contention that the Board of Control was without power of discretion under the statute. As appears more particularly hereinafter, the procedure adopted by the board does not necessarily bear a relation to the power of the board to act, or of itself reveal an abuse of discretion under the provisions of the statute in question.

From the written opinion given upon the ruling on appellants' demurrer, the court below appears to have taken the position that the approval required of the State Board of Control by the provisions of the statute above quoted was merely a ministerial act, not permitting the exercise of any judgment on the part of said board regarding the merits of the claim; that the action of the State Board of Control under the statute was limited to "auditing," in the sense of checking and correcting computations and similar ministerial acts. Appellants contend that section 27 of the act in question does not limit the power of the Board of Control to mere audit of claims; that in actions in mandate involving payment of public funds in refund of tax claims the merits of the claim must be judicially established as a condition precedent to issuance of the writ. Stated in its simplest terms, the question here to be answered is whether in passing upon claims for refund of taxes, under the provisions of section 27 of the act above quoted, the Board of Control exercises discretionary powers or acts only in a ministerial capacity. Under the long settled rules governing actions in mandate, if the approval of the board, required by the foregoing provisions, called for the exercise of discretionary powers, then a petition for a writ of mandate, which merely recited that the Board of Control had refused to approve a refund after the same had been approved by the State Board of Equalization, would not state sufficient grounds for the issuance of a writ. Further allegations to show an abuse of discretion on the part of the board would be required.

[1] As pointed out by appellant, the word "audit" is not used in section 27, supra, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the particular meaning which should be ascribed to that word. As to the meaning of the word "approve," it was said in Cosner v. Board of Supervisors of Colusa County, 58 Cal. 274, at page 277, "The word 'approve' is to be considered in connection with the action to which it relates. It does not ex vi termini necessarily import the exercise of discretion. Presumptively, however, when the 'approval' of a distinct officer is made necessary to validate or consummate the act of another, it is the intention of the Legislature that he should be invested with the option to sanction officially or to disapprove the act submitted to him. It involves the idea of discretion and adjudication. Yet such presumed intention is not conclusive, and if it clearly appears from the nature of the act, or the express language of the context, that the word 'approved' is used in a more limited sense, and imposes a mere ministerial or clerical duty, the Courts will so hold."

[2] The trial court, in passing upon the question here presented, held that if it be construed that the Board of Control has jurisdiction to determine for itself questions of law or of fact, or to do more than to audit a claim, then the provision of section 27 of the act, above quoted, that the determination of the Board of Equalization shall be final, is in conflict with that providing that no refund shall be allowed until approved by the Board of Control, because, if the decision of the Board of Equalization approving a refund is final the Board of Control is without power to refuse approval of the claim. In arriving at such a conclusion the trial court apparently overlooked the provisions of section 30 of the same act, which read, so far as here material: "Within ninety days after the mailing of the notice of the commissioner's action upon any refund claim, or in case of an appeal to the State Board of Equalization from the disallowance of any refund claim, within ninety days after the mailing of the notice of the board's determination of the appeal, the taxpayer may bring an action against the commissioner on the grounds set forth in such claim for the recovery of the whole or any part of the amount claimed as an overpayment." Stats.1939, ch. 1050, p. 2968, § 18, Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8488, § 30.

It appears from the portion of section 30 above quoted that the decision of the State Board of Equalization upon a claim for refund is not final as against the taxpayer, since the taxpayer may thereafter bring an action for recovery of the amount claimed as overpayment. Reading the provisions of section 27, supra, in the light of those just quoted from section 30 of the same act, it becomes reasonably plain that when it is therein provided that the determination of the Board of Equalization shall be final upon the expiration of sixty days from the time of such determination, or upon the expiration of sixty days from the modification of such determination, such provision was merely enacted as a limitation of time upon the power of the Board of Equalization to act in the matter. In other words, sixty days after the determination of the board, or a modification of such determination, no further modification of the decision may be made and the board's determination shall then become final, as far as the Board of Equalization is concerned. This construction of the act becomes even plainer when it is considered that section 27 thereof clearly allows the Board of Equalization to modify its decisions upon tax refunds. Obviously, a limitation of time must be placed upon any such power of modification. It may be seen therefore that even if the Board of Control is held to have the power to determine for itself questions of law or of fact, the provision for "approval" of the claim by that board is not in conflict with that governing the time within which decisions of the State Board of Equalization become "final."

[3] The trial court also stated that there is no provision in the statute for an appeal to the Board of Control; that if the Legislature had intended said board to have appellate jurisdiction over the decisions of the Board of Equalization appropriate procedure would have been specified; that no hearing was given and none is provided for by law; that if the Board of Control is authorized to pass on the merits of claims for refunds and to consider questions of law or of fact the claimant would be entitled to a hearing before said board in order to satisfy the requirement of due process. It must be pointed out that the method of procedure adopted by the Board of Control bears no relation to the rules of statutory construction here being applied to section 27, supra, and is not decisive of the question here presented. The failure of said board to give notice of a hearing should not be considered in determining the legal effect of the language used in the statute. Moreover, there is nothing in the statute which precludes or denies such a hearing if requested. Apparently there was no petition for a reconsideration of the action by the Board of Control, accompanied by a request to be heard on the matter. The only action by respondent appears to have been the demand for approval of the refund, referred to in respondent's petition herein. Such a demand is not necessarily the equivalent of a petition for a reconsideration. A fact of significance, and one apparently overlooked by the trial court, is that provision for the power of the Board of Control here in question was added to section 27 by a later amendment. Stats.1939, ch. 1050, p. 2934, at p. 2965.

[4, 5] The trial court also pointed out that the statute makes no provision for the bringing of an action after the ruling by the Board of Control, and petitioner is without any remedy whatsoever unless a writ of mandate is granted in this proceeding. This is not relevant to the issue here presented, which is, in the final analysis, whether the petition stated sufficient facts to warrant the issuance of a writ of mandate. Moreover, the trial court's conclusion, that the failure to make provision for such an action after a decision by the board was no doubt due to the fact that it was intended that the powers of said board should be limited to the ministerial act of auditing the claim, is an assumption unwarranted by the circumstances and constitutes a non sequitur.

[6-8] The provisions of section 27 of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, as above quoted, clearly indicate that the approval of the Board of Control is made necessary to validate the act of the State Board of Equalization in allowing a claim for tax refund. Presumptively, therefore, it was the legislative intent to invest the Board of Control with a power of discretion in the matter; nor does it clearly appear either from the nature of the act or the express language of the context that the word "approve" is used in a more limited sense. Therefore, in accordance with the rule enunciated in Cosner v. Board of Supervisors of Colusa County, supra, the presumption must stand that it was the intent of the Legislature to invest the Board of Control with the option to sanction or to disapprove the act submitted to it. The word "approve" has no technical meaning and the court is without power to extend its meaning beyond that which the "approved usage of the language" contemplates, unless a contrary or more limited construction "according to the context" obviously is intended. Civ.Code, § 13. It follows that unless respondent's petition set forth facts which tended to show an abuse of discretion on the part of the board, the petition failed to state sufficient facts to justify the issuance of a writ of mandate; and appellant's demurrer thereto was properly taken and should have been sustained. Predicated as it was, upon a theory that the Board of Control was without discretion in the matter, respondent's petition for a writ of mandate was insufficient.

The judgment is accordingly reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain appellants' demurrer to respondent's petition, with leave to respondent to amend its petition if it is so advised.

YORK, P. J., and WHITE, J., concurred.

BICKFORD v. MAUSER et al.

Civ. 11830.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 30, 1942.

As Corrected Aug. 28, 1942.

1. Witnesses 🔑395

Where plaintiff attempted to show that defense witness had told police immediately after automobile accident that he had been resting and had not seen accident and that because of friendship with defendant he had fabricated his testimony concerning the collision, defendant was entitled to rehabilitate such testimony, and admission for such purpose over plaintiff's objection of a written statement made by witness the day after the accident to an investigator was not error.

2. Witnesses ⚷395

Evidence of prior statements consistent with testimony at former hearing is not rendered competent to rehabilitate witness' testimony at trial merely because effort has been made to impeach witness' general reputation or because of evidence of former statements inconsistent with present testimony.

3. Witnesses ⚷395

Where there is an effort to show that witness changed his testimony from ulterior motives or that his testimony is fabrication of recent date, his previous statements, corresponding to testimony at trial, are competent to rehabilitate his evidence and refute inference of recent fabrication or improper influence, particularly if such statements were made prior to impeaching statements, and a direct charge of fabrication or improper influence is not necessary to render such evidence competent.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1050(1)

Where the only issue in action for injuries sustained in automobile collision was contributory negligence and written statement made by defense witness the day following collision was rendered competent to rehabilitate witness' testimony by plaintiff's efforts to show that such testimony was fabrication of recent date, admission over plaintiff's objection of portion of statement that defendant was a careful driver and of other portions relating to irrelevant matters was not prejudicial error.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1050(1)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, wherein it was admitted that defendant was operating automobile negligently so that the only issue was that of contributory negligence of plaintiff, admission over plaintiff's objection of testimony of defendant that because of his unfamiliarity with the city where accident occurred and vehicle laws of the state he did not know he was exceeding the speed limit, was not prejudicial.

6. Appeal and error ⚷1064(1)

Where instruction correctly stated the law relative to contributory negligence, mere repetition or similarity of expression used in the several instructions given did not warrant reversal of judgment on the ground that the matter of contributory negligence had been thereby over-emphasized.

7. Trial ⚷130

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision where plaintiff's counsel repeatedly referred to the fact that defendant had been taken into custody because of death of plaintiff's companion until admonished by trial court for persisting in pressing the point, defense counsel's inquiry of defendant whether the criminal charges had been dropped did not constitute "misconduct".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Misconduct".

8. Trial ⚷255(6)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision where plaintiff's objection to defense counsel's inquiry of defendant whether criminal charges against defendant growing out of the death of plaintiff's companion had been dropped was sustained, court's failure in the absence of request to instruct jury to disregard such inquiry was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Harold Fremont Bickford, an incompetent person, etc., against Roy Kent Mauser, a minor, etc., and others for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants based on the verdict of a jury in an action to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision between a Plymouth coupe driven by plaintiff, Harold Fremont Bickford, 23 years old, and a Pontiac sedan driven by the defendant Roy Kent Mauser, 18 years old, whose father was joined as a party defendant pursuant to the provisions of the California Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 93.

The pleadings raised the issues of the negligent operation of both cars, but at the commencement of the trial counsel for defendants, in his opening statement to the jury, admitted that the Mauser car had been negligently operated, and took the position that the collision was brought about by the negligence of both drivers. Thus as to the question of liability the cause was submitted to the jury on the single issue of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff; and after hearing the evidence the jury returned a verdict in favor of defendants. The evidence clearly supports the conclusion reached by the jury; and plaintiff makes no contention to the contrary; but as grounds of appeal plaintiff urges that the trial court committed prejudicial error in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, that it over-emphasized the question of contributory negligence by giving repeated instructions, and that counsel for defendants was guilty of misconduct.

The important facts of the case necessary to be considered in the determination of the foregoing points may be stated as follows: The accident occurred shortly before 2 a. m. September 12, 1940, at the intersection of Sixth and Bryant Streets in San Francisco. Plaintiff was driving south on Sixth Street, and Mauser east on Bryant. The night was clear and dry, and the intersection well lighted by a street light on each of the four corners. Automatic signals were installed at the intersection, but at that hour of the night they were not operating. A service station occupied the northwest corner of the intersection, and other than the pumps and the little glass building itself, there were no obstructions which would obscure the view of a driver travelling south on Sixth Street or a driver travelling east on Bryant Street from each other for a considerable distance. It was demonstrated that a person driving south on Sixth Street, when 123 feet north of the center of the intersection, had a clear and practically uninterrupted view of a car approaching from the right on Bryant Street continuously from the time the car on Bryant Street reached a point 187 feet west of the center of the intersection. Both cars were equipped with good brakes and were otherwise in good condition, except the plaintiff's car had a "shimmy" in the front wheels when driven much over 35 miles an hour. The evidence shows that at the time of the collision the estimated speed of the Mauser car was 35 or 40 miles an hour, and that the speed of plaintiff's car was about the same. After the collision the Pontiac swung around and stopped when the rear end struck and damaged the automatic signal on the southeast corner; the Plymouth, driven by plaintiff, jumped the southeast curb, struck and broke off a fire hydrant, and came to rest against a building on Bryant Street some 80 feet east of Sixth Street.

Mauser was accompanied by three boy companions about his age. All four resided in Seaside, Oregon, and were students at Oregon State College. They arrived in San Francisco two days before to visit the fair, and were staying across the bay in Albany. The car they were using belonged to the father of one of the boys, named Jackson. On the night of the accident the boys went to a dance at the fair, after which they drove their girl companions to their respective homes in San Francisco, and then started to go back to Albany. After they had taken the girls home young Jackson asked Mauser to drive; and Jackson and a boy named Berg took the back seat. In the front seat with Mauser was the other boy, named Hampton. The boys had directions as to how to get back, but missed the street leading to the bay bridge, and drove out the Bayshore Highway a ways, then stopped at a lunch room and inquired of a police officer how to get back. Upon reaching Bryant Street they saw the signs to the bridge, and proceeded easterly on the street for about four blocks when the collision occurred. None of the boys in the Pontiac was seriously injured. Plaintiff had been a student at the University of California up to a short time before the accident, when he was called into active service in the National Guard. At the time of the accident he was accompanied by a young lady who was killed as a result of the collision; and plaintiff suffered severe brain injuries, which have rendered him incompetent, and he has no recollection whatever of the accident or of the circumstances of his being in San Francisco that night. The evidence affirmatively shows that none of the occupants of either car had been drinking. Police officers attached to the Accident Prevention Bureau, arrived at the scene of the accident soon after it happened. One of the first to arrive was Officer Murray, who interrogated the four boys concerning the accident; and admittedly the two boys who were riding in the back seat were half asleep at the time of the collision and had no knowledge as to how it happened. Officer Badagliacco arrived soon after the other officers, and all four boys were taken by him to the Hall of Justice. There a written statement was obtained from Mauser, whereupon he was detained in custody and the other three released.

The testimony relating to the actual happening of the accident was given by Mauser and Hampton, the occupants of the front seat; and their versions were substantially the same. Hampton testified that when they finally reached Bryant Street, after first losing their way, they travelled along the eastbound street car track of Bryant Street (the inner lane) at 35 or 40 miles an hour; that he saw the other car involved in the accident "a split second" before the collision occurred; that it was going at about the same speed as the car in which he was riding, but he did not know exactly how far back of the north property line of Bryant Street it was when he first saw it, but placed it approximately 10 feet north, and the car in which he was riding was then about 10 feet west of the property line of Sixth Street. He also testified that as soon as the police arrived they took Mauser into custody, and afterwards took all four boys to the Accident Prevention Bureau; that there the police questioned Mauser but did not ask him, Hampton, any questions and said nothing to him at all.

[1] As part of defendants' surrebuttal evidence there was received, over the objection of plaintiff, a written statement made by Hampton the day after the accident to an investigator for defendants' counsel. The document was offered in evidence in rehabilitation of Hampton's testimony given at the trial and plaintiff contends that the admission thereof calls for a reversal of the judgment. We cannot agree with this contention. The following were the circumstances leading up to the admission of the document: On cross-examination of Hampton there was an evident attempt made to show that the story then being told by him at the trial as to the circumstances of the accident was a pure fabrication. To this end he was asked if at the scene of the accident he did not tell the police that he "had been resting in the car" and "had not seen the accident," and consequently "could not tell them how it had happened." He positively denied having made such statement, or having stated "anything like that." He denied also having made any such statement later at the police headquarters. In this regard he stated that Mauser was there interrogated about the accident but that he, Hampton, was asked no questions at all. Also in furtherance of the attempt to show that his story was fabricated, it was brought out that he and Mauser were close friends; that they were schoolmates in college; that they had come to San Francisco prior to the trial, visited the scene of the accident with Mauser's counsel, discussed the facts with him, went over a diagram of the place in question, and that Hampton knew that Mauser had been taken into custody by the police as soon as they arrived. Furthermore, in attacking the truth of Hampton's entire story, plaintiff called as rebuttal witnesses the two police officers, Badagliacco and Murray. The former testified that all three of the boys who were riding with Mauser told him "the same thing,"—that they were resting and did not see the accident. And Murray testified that at the scene of the accident and also at police headquarters Hampton stated he was resting and did not see the accident. The trial took place six months after the accident, and both officers admitted that they had made no notes of the conversations with Hampton, that no record was made thereof in the police department, and that they were testifying from mere recollection. They also admitted that since the accident they had investigated many others (estimated by Murray to be 360) and interviewed hundreds of persons concerning them (estimated by Murray to be at least 1,000); but each officer stated that his recollection was quite clear as to this particular conversation with Hampton concerning this particular accident.

On account of the attack thus made by plaintiff upon the truth of Hampton's entire story, defendants, in surrebuttal and for the purpose of rehabilitating his testimony, offered in evidence and the court admitted over plaintiff's objection the written statement made by Hampton the day after the accident to an investigator for defendants' counsel. For the same purpose the court admitted over objection oral conversations had between Hampton and the Mausers, but plaintiff's attack is directed mainly against the written statement. It was written by the investigator and signed by Hampton, and starts out by giving a brief resume of their trip from Oregon to California. He then recited what transpired on the night of the accident prior to the happening thereof; and continuing he goes on to say that he had ridden with Mauser many times and always found him to be a careful driver, that never at any time had he had occasion to warn him about his driving; that on the night of the accident Mauser was not driving at a high rate of speed—not in excess of 40 miles an hour; and as to the circumstances of the happening of the accident the statement reads: "When the front of our car was just about on or near the west curb line of Sixth Street I saw a car travelling south on Sixth Street. This southbound car was about ten feet north of the north intersecting line of Bryant. This southbound car was travelling about forty to forty-five miles per hour, possibly faster. When I saw car No. 2 I yelled, and then the two cars collided near the center of the intersection." He then related what happened to the cars after the collision, as set forth above.

[2, 3] The law governing the admissibility of evidence of this character is well stated in the case of Davis v. Tanner, 88 Cal.App. 67, 262 P. 1106, 1110, wherein the court says: "It is now a well-settled rule in California and in most of the states of this nation that evidence of prior statements consistent with, or corresponding testimony given at a former hearing, are incompetent to rehabilitate the testimony of a witness given at the trial, merely because an effort has been made to impeach her general reputation, or because evidence has been adduced of former statements inconsistent with her present testimony. [Citing cases.] But there is an equally uniform exception to this rule recognized by all the authorities to the effect that, where the witness is charged with changing or coloring his testimony from ulterior motives or that his evidence is a fabrication of recent date, his previous statements corresponding to the testimony given at the trial are competent, particularly if they are made prior to the impeaching statement for the purpose of rehabilitating his evidence and refuting the inference of recent fabrication, or that the testimony was given as a result of improper influence or because of undue interest. [Citing cases.] * * * It is not necessary that the party seeking to impeach the witness shall expressly state that his evidence is offered to prove a fabrication of recent date, nor to charge that the recent evidence was given under improper inducements in order to authorize the admission of corresponding statements made upon a prior occasion. It is sufficient if the evident purpose of the impeaching party, as disclosed by the record, indicates this to have been his purpose. * * * 'In order to come within the above exceptions to the rule, it is not necessary * * * that there be a direct charge of fabrication.'"

It is quite obvious from an examination of the record in the present case that the evident purpose of the above cross-examination of Hampton was to show that immediately after the accident he had made statements to the police officers that he had not seen the other car involved in the accident prior thereto because he had been resting; but that after he talked with defendants' counsel and visited the scene of the accident he changed his story and testified that he was not asleep and that he had seen the other car before the collision. That counsel for plaintiff was in effect seeking to show that the witness was fabricating his testimony is borne out by counsel's later remark that "My position is that his testimony is not true." Plaintiff argues, however, that to warrant the application of the exception there must be a charge of recent fabrication, or the statement must have been made by the witness at a time when he had no motive to fabricate; and that here there was no charge of recent fabrication; that the evidence shows that the witness had an even stronger motive to fabricate at the time he made the statement to the investigaor than he did in giving his testimony at the trial—that at the time he made the statement to the investigator, his friend Mauser was under arrest on criminal charges growing out of the accident, whereas at the time of trial these charges had been dismissed. However, it is apparent that the charge of fabrication was based on the testimony given at the trial, and as held in People v. Kynette, 15 Cal.2d 731, 753, 754, 104 P.2d 794, 806: "When a witness has been charged with improper motives of interest, or improper influences, or with recent fabrication, the law allows hearsay statements to be introduced for the purpose of showing that the same and consistent statements had been made at a time prior to the fabrication or prior to the time the motive of interest existed." (Italics added.) Applying the foregoing rules to the present situation it would seem clear that defendants were entitled to rehabilitate the testimony given by Hampton at the trial.

[4] Appellant argues that in any event the entire statement should not have been admitted. In this regard plaintiff objects to those portions wherein Hampton stated that Mauser was a careful driver; that he was driving carefully and not at a "high rate of speed"; that the impact occurred near the center of the intersection; and that he had yelled when he saw the other car. Plaintiff contends that there was no such testimony given at the trial by Hampton, and therefore those portions of the statement had nothing to do with the rehabilitation of his testimony. If the cause had been submitted to the jury on the contested issue of whether on this occasion Mauser was driving in a negligent manner, there would be much force in plaintiff's objection to those portions of the statement that he was a careful driver. But as pointed out, that issue was eliminated by the concession of counsel for defendants at the opening of the trial that the Mauser car was being negligently operated. The other extraneous portions of the statement to which objection has been made related either to irrelevant matters which could in no way operate to plaintiff's prejudice, or to circumstances concerning which Hampton's testimony was confirmatory. In such situation it would appear that no prejudice resulted from allowing in evidence the entire statement.

[5] Plaintiff complains also of the trial court's ruling allowing Mauser to testify that on account of being a stranger in San Francisco and not knowing where he was, and not being aware of the vehicle laws of this state, he did not know he was driving in town and did not know the speed limit. But in view of the admission by counsel for defendants at the opening of the trial that Mauser was negligent in driving his car, it cannot be said that the jury could have been led to believe, by the admission of the above evidence, that Mauser was not guilty of negligence.

[6] Nor is there any merit in plaintiff's contention that the court erred in giving the instructions. It is not claimed that the form or substance of the instructions which plaintiff claims were "over-emphasized" did not correctly state the law; and that being so, the mere repetition or similarity of expression used in the several instructions does not serve as ground for reversal. Wagy v. Brave, 133 Cal.App. 413, 24 P.2d 209; Barckdall v. Simons Brick Co., 21 Cal. App. 685, 132 P. 846. In Muskin v. Gerun, 46 Cal.App.2d 404, 116 P.2d 105, relied on by plaintiff, the reversal was based upon the refusal to give certain instructions which were proper, rather than the overemphasis of those given.

[7, 8] Plaintiff's final contention is that defendants' counsel was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in asking Mauser if it were not the fact that the criminal charges placed against him were dismissed and he was never brought to trial, and that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury to disregard the statement. It appears, however, that repeatedly throughout the trial counsel for plaintiff referred to the fact that Mauser had been taken into custody because of the death of plaintiff's companion, and that finally the trial court found it necessary to admonish counsel for persisting in pressing the point; therefore on recross-examination defendants' counsel asked Mauser if those charges had been dropped. An objection to the question was sustained; and contrary to plaintiff's assertion, the transcript shows that no request was made that the jury be instructed to disregard the question. In this state of the record no error appears. In Carlston v. Shenson, 47 Cal.App.2d 52, 117 P.2d 408, cited by appellant, the attorney persisted in asking the objectionable question in different forms after a ruling against its admissibility.

The judgment is affirmed.

WARD, J., concurred.

PETERS, Presiding Judge.

I dissent. As pointed out in the majority opinion, the defendants admitted that defendant Roy Kent Mauser was negligent, and that such negligence proximately contributed to the accident. The sole issue was whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. On that issue the plaintiff concedes the evidence was conflicting, and concedes that there is evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that he was guilty of contributory negligence. But the issue was a close one. A contrary finding likewise would have been supported. Moreover, it must be remembered that, as a result of the accident, plaintiff's companion was killed, and plaintiff suffered a severe brain injury and had no memory of the collision. There were no eyewitnesses to the accident capable of testifying except defendant Roy Kent Mauser and his companion and close friend

Hampton. Under such circumstances, any substantial error in the admission of the evidence of either of these witnesses could not help but be prejudicial.

In my opinion, it was error of a most serious and prejudicial nature to have admitted the hearsay, self-serving statement made by Hampton to the investigator of defendants, under the guise of rehabilitation. Hampton, called as a witness for defendants, testified that he saw the accident, and testified to facts which, if believed, showed plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. On cross-examination an attempt was made to impeach him by asking him if, at the scene of the accident and at the police station, he had not told the investigating police officers that he had not seen the accident. He denied making such statements. Officers Badagliacco and Murray were then called, and they testified that Hampton had told them at the scene of the accident and at the police station that at the time of the collision (about 2 a.m.) he was resting and did not see the accident. There was no charge made of recent fabrication, or that Hampton had been induced to change his testimony because of any improper inducement of defendants. All that plaintiff attempted to and did do was to impeach the witness by the usual method of showing prior inconsistent statements. It was simply a situation that develops in every case where a witness has made prior inconsistent statements. The charge that the testimony given by Hampton on the trial was "false" cannot be distorted into a charge of recent fabrication within the meaning of that limited exception to the general rule. That charge is expressly or impliedly made in every case of impeachment.

It must not be forgotten that the usual and general rule is that a witness cannot be rehabilitated by the introduction of prior consistent statements. It is well settled, in this and other states, that, when a witness has been impeached, the opposing party cannot rehabilitate that witness by showing that at other and different times the witness made statements out of court and out of the presence of the other party in harmony with his present testimony. See cases collected 27 Cal.Jur., p. 178, § 153. To that rule there is limited exception. That exception is that where the witness is charged with testifying under the influence of some motive prompting him to make a false statement, or that his evidence is a fabrication of recent date, such rehabilitating evidence is admissible. The exception is well illustrated by the two cases relied upon in the majority opinion. In Davis v. Tanner, 88 Cal.App. 67, 262 P. 1106, a witness was impeached by the introduction of a prior inconsistent statement. Prior consistent statements were allowed to be introduced to rehabilitate her. The theory upon which this was held proper is clearly stated at page 75 of 88 Cal.App., at page 1109 of 262 P. as follows: "It is apparent from the record that appellants offered the former statement of the witness Hogg to impeach her, on the theory that she had fabricated or colored her testimony given at the trial through the urgent inducement of respondent's attorneys, with whom a recent conference was developed by appellants, with the manifest inference that this interview was the cause of whatever conflict exists between her testimony at the trial and her former statement made to appellants." (Italics added.) In People v. Kynette, 15 Cal.2d 731, 104 P.2d 794, rehabilitating evidence was admitted because an attempt had been made to show that the district attorney's office had brought improper influences to bear upon the witness. In the instant case there was no express or implied charge that defendants or their counsel had brought improper pressure to bear on Hampton. They simply charged that he had told the police officers he did not see the accident, and that he was friendly with one of the defendants. Certainly, it cannot be contended, because a witness is impeached by showing friendship with one of the parties, that the door is thrown open to the introduction of hearsay, self-serving prior consistent declarations in violation of the general rule above discussed. If the credibility of a witness can be propped up in this fashion the limited exception to the general rule would soon abolish that rule.

For these reasons I believe the judgment should be reversed.

PACIFIC SOUTHWEST REALTY CO. v. McCOLGAN.

Civ. 13585.

District Court of Appeal. Second District. Division 2, California.

July 24, 1942.

1. Taxation ⚷376(2)

Securities designated as cumulative preferred stock drawn in usual form, and providing for the acquisition of voting rights by holders thereof if dividends were not paid constituted "preferred stock" and not "evidences of indebtedness" and payments made thereunder were "dividends" and not payments of "interest" on indebtedness for which a deduction could be made in computing franchise tax notwithstanding such securities were redeemable at end of fixed period at par plus any unpaid accumulated dividends and in the event of failure to redeem, holders would have the rights of a general creditor to sue for the principal value of securities and any accumulated unpaid dividends.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Dividend", "Evidence of Indebtedness", "Interest" and "Preferred Stock".

2. Taxation ⚷376(1)

Discount at which securities were sold and expense of issuance of securities were not "deductible expenses" in computation of franchise tax of issuing corporation where securities were in fact preferred stock and not mere evidence of indebtedness.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Deductible Expense".

3. Taxation ⚷376(1)

Where bonds are issued by a corporation at a discount, the net amount of such discount, together with the expense incurred in the issuance of the bonds, is deductible in computing the corporation franchise tax.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Pacific Southwest Realty Company against Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, etc., for the recovery of corporation franchise taxes paid. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Modified and as modified affirmed.

Claude I. Parker and Bayley Kohlmeier, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., H. H. Linney, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Adrian A. Kragen, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of defendant after trial before the court without a jury in consolidated actions for the recovery of corporation franchise taxes paid for the taxable years 1935 and 1936 upon the basis of its net income for the years 1934 and 1935, plaintiff appeals.

The undisputed facts are:

In the years 1923, 1924, and 1925 plaintiff issued securities which were designated as 6½ per cent cumulative preferred serial stock. These securities were drawn in the usual form establishing a relationship between a stockholder and a corporation. They were required to be redeemed at the end of a fixed period of years for the par value of $100 and any unpaid accumulated dividends. They provided for a quarterly dividend payable out of profits in the aggregate annual amount of 6½ per cent for one serial issue and 5½ per cent for another. In the event profit was not made and the quarterly dividend not paid, the holders of the preferred shares who otherwise had no voting rights acquired all of the voting rights of the stockholders and could assume control of the corporation and through ordinary corporate processes compel declaration and payment of a dividend. The preferred stockholders had no power to pay the quarterly dividends otherwise than by the corporate process of declaration of dividends from profits then existing. This power was never invoked and all dividends paid in the years in question were declared paid by usual corporate procedure by action of the board of directors.

[1, 2] These are the questions presented for our determination:

First: Was the so-called preferred stock in fact not preferred stock but a mere evidence of indebtedness?

Second: Were the so-called dividends which had been paid on the preferred serial stock in fact not dividends but payments of interest on indebtedness?

Third: Was the discount at which the securities were sold a deductible expense?

Fourth: Was the expense of issuance of the securities a deductible expense?

Fifth: Was the expense of issuing appellant's bonds and the discount at which said bonds were sold a deductible expense?

The first four questions must be answered in the negative. An examination of the facts surrounding the issuance of the cumulative preferred serial stock in the instant case presents a very close question as to whether the cumulative preferred serial stock was in fact stock or merely evidence of an indebtedness of the plaintiff to the holders of the securities. However, since the appeal in the present case was filed, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has had the first four questions above stated presented to it on the identical facts involved in this case in reviewing a decision of the Board of Tax Appeals. The title of this case is Pacific Southwest Realty Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 9 Cir., 128 F.2d 815, filed June 8, 1942. We have examined this decision, which holds that the cumulative preferred serial stock is in fact stock and not a mere evidence of indebtedness, and we are of the opinion that the conclusions reached in such case are sound as applied to the facts of the present case. Therefore, we follow such decision in holding that the cumulative preferred serial stock was stock and not evidence of indebtedness. The same reasoning applies to the second, third, and fourth questions.

[3] The fifth question must be answered in the affirmative. If bonds are issued by a corporation at a discount, the net amount of such discount, together with the expense incurred in the issuance of the bonds, is deductible under federal regulations (see Federal Regulations 86, art. 22(a) 18, Regulations 103, § 19.22(a) (18), Chicago, Rock Island & Pac. Railway Co. v. Commissioner, 13 B.T.A. 988).

It is our opinion that the same rule should be applied in fixing the amount of a corporation franchise tax. In the present case it was stipulated that plaintiff had outstanding certain bonds which had been issued at a discount and that plaintiff had incurred expenses in connection with the issuance of such bonds. It was further stipulated that $2,220.24 of the discount was properly allocable to the year 1934 and that $16,849.98 of the discount was properly allocable to the year 1935, also that $472.45 of the expense of issuance of plaintiff's bonds was properly allocable to the year 1934, and $3,740.46 of such expense was properly allocable to the year 1935.

For the foregoing reasons the trial court is directed to modify the judgment by allowing plaintiff as a deduction the stipulated amount of the discount and expense incurred in the issuance of its bonds. As thus modified the judgment is affirmed.

NEWMAN v. SUNSET-McKEE SALES-BOOK CO.

Civ. 12061.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

July 15, 1942.

1. Sales 🔑383

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase machines known as "registers", evidence of conduct of parties established either that parties at no time intended that contract should call for more than 400 machines, which number defendant accepted and paid for, or that, if such intention had been expressed, it was abandoned by mutual consent.

2. Sales 🔑383

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase machines known as "registers", evidence of conduct of parties at inception of contract and at time of its modification required a finding that, if any damage resulted from modification of the contract, or from defendant's failure to comply therewith, such damage was invited by seller and hence was not subject to recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge Assigned.

Action by L. Newman against Sunset-McKee Sales-Book Company for damages for alleged failure of defendant to perform a contract for purchase of machines equipped with a continuous form sales tag, adaptable for use on the sales counter, and known to the trade as "registers". From a judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Clark & Heafey, of Oakland, for appellant.

Edward J. Silver and Louis B. DeAvila, both of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued for damages for the alleged failure of defendant to perform a contract for the purchase of machines equipped with a continuous form sales tag, adaptable for use on the sales counter, and known to the trade as "registers." The plaintiff had judgment for the full sum prayed for and defendant's appeal attacks the findings as not supported by substantial evidence.

On August 19, 1936, defendant delivered to plaintiff its written order to manufacture two hundred model "A" registers at $10 each, and two hundred model "C" registers, at $11 each. Plaintiff proceeded to manufacture the required number, delivery was made from time to time, payments were promptly made, and on July 22, 1937, the last of the four hundred registers were delivered and defendant was billed for the balance due under the contract. This sum was paid in full, together with miscellaneous charges for dies and other outlays, and nothing further was done under the contract until September, 1939, when plaintiff notified defendant that he was ready to complete the order. This notice was based upon a modification of the order, or contract, of August 19, 1936, whereby a figure "1" was inserted before the figure "2" so that, as to both models the order was changed to read "1200" instead of "200." The litigation rests upon this modification and the reasons for it.

The complaint alleged that "on August 19, 1936, * * * defendant * * * delivered to plaintiff its written order to manufacture 1200 model 'A' registers. * * *" The plaintiff was forced to admit that the allegation was untrue. The trial court found, in accordance with the only credible evidence, that the order pleaded was for two hundred registers of each model. It also found, upon undisputed evidence, that "several months thereafter" the order was changed to call for twelve hundred of each model. It was also found that the four hundred registers were duly manufactured, delivered, and paid for, and that defendant also paid the additional charges for extra dies and material as billed by the plaintiff. Defendant's explanation of the modification of the figures in the contract is that it was done by mutual agreement of the parties to enable plaintiff to exhibit the contract to an eastern manufacturer and thus enable him to establish his credit and build up his trade with that concern. Plaintiff does not directly deny this, but testified that he found that additional dies would be needed and the contract was increased to cover that expenditure. He does not deny, however, that after the modification he billed defendant for his expenditures for extra dies and that these were fully paid for. The plaintiff also testified that throughout his operations under the contract he carried the account upon his books under the heading "Sunset-McKee Sales Job 2169—400 Registers."

[1, 2] There is one question of law which calls for discussion and, since that requires a reversal of the judgment, it would serve no purpose to consider other points raised by appellant. The appellant contends that all the evidence supports the defense that the contract was abandoned by mutual consent, and that the trial court erred in failing to find upon this special defense. We are satisfied that the undisputed evidence of the conduct of the parties at the inception of the contract, at the time of its modification some months later, and during all the period of manufacture and sale of the original number of registers, together with the entries in respondent's books of account, all compel a finding that either the parties at no time intended that the contract should call for the manufacture of more than four hundred registers, or that, if such intention had been expressed at any time, it was abandoned by mutual consent. This evidence of the conduct of the parties together with the evidence that respondent for a period of two years, made no effort to manufacture, deliver, or tender any portion of the goods in excess of the original number ordered also compel a finding that respondent did not suffer the damages awarded in the judgment, but that, if any damage resulted from the modification of the contract, or from appellant's failure to comply with such modification, such damage was invited by respondent and hence not subject to recovery.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis Howell Smith, Judge.

Action by F. W. Miles for injuries sustained in an automobile accident against H. W. Van Hagen and K. L. Acker and others, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Imperial Ice Cream Company, wherein Henry W. Van Hagen filed a cross-complaint. From judgments for the plaintiff and the cross-complainant, K. L. Acker and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Sigurd E. Murphy, of Hollywood, and George Finucane, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Thomas P. Walker and Alfred R. Meyers, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Miles.

Philip W. Erbsen, of Los Angeles, for respondent Van Hagen.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

Appellants (defendant Acker and his employers) with commendable conciseness, state that "there is one and only one question before the court on this appeal and that is—Is the negligence of Van Hagen the proximate cause of the accident in which the plaintiff received his injuries?" Appellants urge that their question must be answered in the affirmative. They do not (and on the record they could not properly) contend that the evidence is insufficient to establish negligence of the defendant Acker but they zealously argue that his negligence is but a remote wellspring of plaintiff's injuries, separated causally by the independent intervening agency of defendant Van Hagen. The facts, however, provide a negative answer which the zeal of appellants' counsel cannot overcome.

The accident involved three motor vehicles and is novel to this extent: the vehicle held solely responsible did not come in physical contact with either of the other two. The collision was between an automobile being driven by plaintiff Miles in a westerly direction on Foothill Boulevard and a car traveling east which was being operated by defendant Van Hagen. The point of impact was stipulated to be on the north half of Foothill Boulevard 109 feet east of the center of its intersection with Magnolia Avenue in the city of Monrovia. Foothill Boulevard at the locale in question is a four-lane paved thoroughfare running east and west, with a roadway 62 feet in width. Magnolia Avenue runs north and south and its roadway is 34 feet wide.

Immediately preceding the collision defendant Acker was driving a truck, owned by the other defendants, excluding Van Hagen, in an easterly direction along the south side (most southerly traffic lane) of Foothill Boulevard just west of its intersection with Magnolia Avenue. Behind the truck, and overtaking it, defendant Van Hagen, in his car, was in the traffic lane just south of the center line of Foothill Boulevard and was traveling at a speed of approximately 25 miles per hour. About 50 to 75 feet back of the intersection Acker operated the mechanical arm of the truck to indicate a left turn but as the truck reached the intersection, traveling slowly, he dropped the mechanical arm (he said he needed both hands to steer) and turned to about a 40° angle toward the south in the Magnolia intersection. He proceeded to a point near the southerly limit of the intersection and then turned north in a circular pattern, intending to make a U turn. Prior to turning north in the intersection the truck had not been in the traffic lane nearest the center of the highway as required by subdivision (b) of section 540 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 184, and Van Hagen's car had been in a position where it could lawfully overtake and pass the truck. When the truck, in execution of the described maneuver, had reached a point in the intersection where it was headed northeasterly with its front end about five feet south of the center of Foothill Boulevard defendant Van Hagen's car, traveling about 25 miles per hour, was in the traffic lane immediately south of the center line and was just entering the intersection. The truck continued moving slowly in its unlawfully approached and attempted left turn and Van Hagen to avoid colliding with it, accelerated the speed of his car and swung it to his left to a point north of the center line of the boulevard. He said that the front of the truck had itself reached a position north of the center line as he passed it, and that his car cleared the truck by two or three feet. At this point he had attained a speed of about 35 miles per hour.

Having so passed the truck Van Hagen directed his attention to the highway ahead and to bringing his car back to the southerly side of the center line. He saw plaintiff's automobile coming but he did not attain his objective of getting his own car back onto the south half of the boulevard. The collision occurred at a point about 10 feet north of the center line and 109 feet east of the center of the intersection. It is to the handling of Van Hagen's car after it passed the truck that appellants direct the weight of their criticism. That he proceeded for approximately 100 feet at 35 miles per hour on the wrong (his left) side of the road before the collision is in itself conclusive evidence of negligence, say appellants. Not only was it negligence, they urge, but as a matter of law it was independent, intervening negligence which was the sole proximate cause of the collision. The jury returned verdicts for plaintiff Miles on his complaint and for defendant Van Hagen on his cross-complaint against Acker (the truck driver) and the latter's employers. We find the verdicts tenable.

An inspection of the map attached to the Reporter's Transcript (Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1) discloses that the truck was near the easterly limit of the intersection when Van Hagen's car passed it. Magnolia Avenue, as previously mentioned, is 34 feet in width. Hence Van Hagen's machine traveled less than 100 feet after clearing the truck before it collided with plaintiff's car. At its speed of 35 miles per hour it was traversing 51.33 feet a second. Less than two seconds of time, therefore, was available to Van Hagen, after narrowly averting a crash with the truck, to survey the roadway to the east, to perceive plaintiff's oncoming automobile, to determine the seemingly best course to pursue, and to execute it. It must be recognized that in avoiding the truck Van Hagen had turned his car to head somewhat north of east and it had the momentum caused by acceleration to a speed of 35 miles per hour. It is reasonable to believe that the jury may have concluded that such heading and momentum carried the car somewhat farther north than was its position at the moment it cleared the truck. Certainly some substantial portion of the fleeting interval of less than two seconds before the impact must legitimately have been consumed in altering the heading from a direction north of east to a direction south of east. Van Hagen testified that he did not see plaintiff's automobile until it was within about 50 feet of his car. Because of the nature of the maneuver in which he was engaged, and the position of the truck, neither is this statement incredible nor is the fact unreasonable.

[1] By way of argument in their opening brief appellants assert, "Had the impact occurred immediately after Van Hagen had passed the truck or so close to the point of passing that no reasonable opportunity was presented to Van Hagen either to return to the proper side of the street or to stop his vehicle, then injury to Miles was reasonably to have been anticipated; but, to say the least, the present factual situation taken in retrospect shows the consequence of Acker's act to have been 'extraordinary rather than normal.'" The difficulty with this argument is that the jury may well have found that the impact did occur so close to the point of passing that no reasonable opportunity was presented to Van Hagen either to return to the right side of the highway or to stop his vehicle. In a situation of this kind closeness is a relative matter involving proximity of time as well as of space. And within the bounds of reason, which we cannot say have here been transcended, it is the exclusive province of the jury to determine, by classification of the act, where closeness ceases and remoteness commences. At least the jury did find that Van Hagen was not guilty of any breach of ordinary care which contributed proximately to cause the collision. We are definitely of the opinion that such finding is not unreasonable.

[2] If the truck under the circumstances related, had actually struck Van Hagen's automobile and impelled it purely as an inanimate and wholly uncontrolled object directly into plaintiff's car the proximate cause of the collision would be obvious beyond argument. Because the truck did not physically contact the car and because the human agency of Van Hagen still exercised control over such car, it is contended that the causal chain is broken. But it must be recognized that control of any moving vehicle is a matter of relativity. An automobile traveling 25 or 35 miles an hour may be said to be under control of its operator—but that operator cannot at any moment immediately and instantaneously change the status of that vehicle from a moving object to a stationary one. Both time and space are required for the transmission of the nerve impulse to sensory and motor centers and thence into muscular action and for the transition of the state of the object from momentum to rest. With the physical objects as they were, Van Hagen's control of his car was not complete in himself and exclusive of external factors. The movement of his car to avoid contact with the truck, if it was reasonable under the circumstances, was no less proximately caused by the truck because Van Hagen consciously turned the steering wheel and depressed the foot throttle than would its movement have been so caused if the truck had in fact contacted it and physically impelled it. The question, within reasonable limits, is one of fact. Was the pattern of its motion, to a controlling degree under the circumstances shown, shaped by the acts of Acker? The jury found that the sequence was natural, that the causal chain was unbroken. With that conclusion we are satisfied.

Appellants turn to the cases of De Vito v. Peterson (1933), 134 Cal.App. 100, 25 P.2d 19, and Petersen v. Lewis (1935), 2 Cal.2d 569, 42 P.2d 311, and urge that the factual circumstances of those cases are similar to the case before us and that in each of those cases the court held that as a matter of law the negligent act of the defendant was not a proximate cause of the accident. We fail to find that either of those cases is controlling here.

In the De Vito case the plaintiff's automobile was struck by a car which, at an intersection, had gone far to the left of the center of a highway to pass another machine which was making a left turn. Plaintiff endeavored to hold the driver and the owner of the latter machine responsible for the accident, on the theory that its driver had neglected to give a left turn signal. The opinion does not show that in that case (as the facts do establish in our case) the left turn was started from an improper approach or that the passing car was originally (and until forced over by the illegal turn) in a lawful position to pass the overtaken car; furthermore the court apparently was of the opinion in that case that the evidence did not show that the pattern of the course of the colliding machine was proximately caused by the turning car. In our case we have discussed the evidence sufficiently to show that the jury were warranted in coming to a contrary conclusion.

The case of Petersen v. Lewis, supra, is merely authority for the proposition that (2 Cal.2d at page 572, 42 P.2d at page 313), "By proving the negligence of the defendant without in some way fastening that negligence to the injury, a case is not made out." With that rule we are in full accord; but under the evidence in our case the jury impliedly and justifiably found that appellants' negligence was proximately fastened to the plaintiff's injury. In that case the plaintiff was following a car and trailer being operated by the defendant. The defendant, about 20 feet before he reached an intersection, signaled for a left turn and proceeded to execute it before reaching the center of such intersection. Another car coming at excessive speed in a direction opposite to that in which plaintiff was proceeding, instead of slowing down or stopping swung his car over to plaintiff's side of the highway, and the collision ensued. It appeared that the colliding car was about 150 feet north of the intersection when the defendant started his left turn and was being operated at a speed of 45 or more miles per hour. It appears that the court was of the opinion that the negligence of the turning driver in failing to signal for the required space (now Vehicle Code, sec. 544, St.1935, p. 185, then Calif. Vehicle Act, sec. 130) and in starting the left turn to the left of the center of the intersection (now Vehicle Code, sec. 540(b), St.1935, p. 184, then Calif.Vehicle Act, sec. 129) was not a proximate cause of the accident; that as a matter of law the sole proximate cause was the negligence of the driver of the colliding car in proceeding for so great a distance at such an excessive rate of speed and in directing his machine to the extreme (his) left side of the highway.

We do not need to suggest (as did the late Mr. Justice Seawell in his dissenting opinion, at page 573 of 2 Cal.2d, at page 313 of 42 P.2d) that the evidence in that case should have gone to the jury to determine the fact as to whether the defendant's negligence was a proximate cause of the accident. For the purposes of this opinion we may accept unqualifiedly the holding of the majority of the court in that case, and still find ample difference in their factual bases to warrant our conclusion. In that case the driver of the colliding car was clearly guilty of negligence. Had it not been for his excessive and negligent speed the accident need not have occurred. In our case Van Hagen was found not to be negligent. His conduct was found to be normal and natural under the circumstances. Only the negligence of the truck driver Acker proximately caused the collision and plaintiff's injuries.

[3, 4] "The law does not require that a defendant's negligence be both a direct and proximate cause of the injury in order to render him liable. It is sufficient if such negligence be a proximate cause of the injury, and a proximate cause may be either a direct or an indirect cause." (Goehring v. Rogers (1924), 67 Cal.App. 253, 259, 227 P. 687, 689). The acts of the defendant Van Hagen, influenced and to a substantial extent controlled as they were by the conduct of the defendant Acker, must be regarded in law under the circumstances depicted not as an independent cause but as conjoining incidents of the original negligence of Acker, which negligence operated long enough and extensively enough to efficiently produce the accident and the injuries to plaintiff and to Van Hagen (see Harmon v. M. H. Sherman Co. (1938), 29 Cal. App.2d 580, 587, 85 P.2d 205). That questions of negligence and proximate cause are normally questions of fact for the jury needs no citation of authority. We hold that the evidence legally supports the verdicts rendered.

The judgments, in favor of plaintiff on his complaint and in favor of defendant Van Hagen on his cross-complaint, are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McEVERS et al.

Cr. 3589.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 17, 1942.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1942.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1942.

1. Criminal law ⚷1186(4)

Where defendant in robbery prosecution was positively identified by four witnesses and confessed in open court, he suffered no prejudice which would justify a reversal of his conviction by reason of alleged mistreatment by the police used to secure his original confession. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

2. Criminal law ⚷407(2)

Where trial court, after excusing the jury, heard testimony of defendants and officers concerning occurrences when defendants' confessions were made in the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion, admission of testimony as to statements and conduct of defendants when accused was not error.

3. Criminal law ⚷736(2)

Determination of whether a confession is voluntary is for the trial judge.

4. Criminal law ⚷532

In ruling upon the admissibility of statements purporting to constitute a confession, the court is governed largely by the circumstances surrounding the purported confession.

5. Criminal law ⚷519(4, 9)

The fact that a confession may have been made to an arresting officer or after many hours of interrogation does not make the confession "involuntary".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Involuntary Confession".

6. Constitutional law ⚷266

Where trial court after a voir dire session determined that facts were such as to warrant the admission of confessions and issue of voluntary character of confession was submitted to jury and both court and jury found against defendants on conflicting evidence of police brutalities, contention that defendants were denied "due process of law" by reason of alleged brutalities could not be sustained.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Due Process of Law".

7. Criminal law ⚷407(2), 781(7)

Where defendant had denied guilt in face of accusatory statements of third persons, denial rendered both statements and denial inadmissible, since only admissions of a litigant against his own interest may be given in evidence by a third party and instruction that jury could consider defendant's denial was properly refused.

8. Criminal law ⚷829(18)

The reading by the court to the jury of the statute defining reasonable doubt rendered unnecessary any further instruction on the subject. Pen.Code, §§ 1096, 1096a.

9. Criminal law ⚷780(1)

Where testimony of codefendant, which detailed defendant's participation in robbery, was given on behalf of defense, and codefendant, on cross-examination by district attorney, denied his direct testimony, defendant was not entitled to instruction which was directed at testimony of codefendant that conviction could not be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it were corroborated by such other evidence as tended to connect the defendant with the crime.

10. Criminal law ⚷1186(4)

Where defendant's confession of participation in robbery and the presence of money in his trunk, to which he led officers, together with other circumstances, would have supported his conviction without testimony of codefendant which connected defendant with robbery, defendant was not prejudiced by refusal of requested instruction regarding necessity for corroboration of testimony of accomplice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

11. Criminal law ⚷781(4)

Where defendant had testified to the truth of codefendant's statement to police, instruction which imposed on jury, duty to determine whether defendant's statement to police, that if codefendant told whole story it was true as to what defendant did, was an admission or acquiescence in accusatory statements made by police was not objectionable as misleading.

12. Criminal law ⚷407(2), 519(4), 781(7)

Where defendant had been accused by police officers of robbery, either his silence or his spoken confession was admissible and testimony relating thereto justified instruction permitting jury to take defendant's silence against him if he stood silent in face of accusation and instruction, that accusatory statements are admissible solely that jury may know the attitude of defendant in the face of accusatory statements by third persons in his presence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

Gilbert McEvers and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CURTIS and EDMONDS, JJ., dissenting.

Walter L. Gordon, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., R. S. McLaughlin, Deputy Atty. Gen., John F. Dockweiler, Dist. Atty., and Thomas F. O'Brien, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

By information appellants were accused jointly with one Jack Jones of the robbery of one Gertrude Coffey by means of force used against said Gertrude Coffey and by putting her in fear. They were convicted by a jury of the crime charged. Their co-defendant Jones was acquitted. The appeal is from the judgment on the grounds that the court committed prejudicial error: (1) in admitting testimony concerning the asserted confessions; (2) in modifying a correct instruction offered by Davidson with reference to such alleged confessions which proposed instruction was peculiarly applicable and not covered by other instructions; (3) in refusing other instructions proposed by Davidson correctly stating the law as to the testimony of accomplices not covered by other instructions; (4) in giving instructions which covered an assumed issue.

On January 7, 1942, Mrs. Coffey was cashier in a market on East Olympic Boulevard in Los Angeles. McEvers approached her with a basket of groceries. As she was about to check them, he pointed a gun at her and stated: "Hurry, I don't want to kill any one; act as though nothing was happening; put the bills in a sack; put the half dollars in a bag and do not make too much noise." Thus the robber took about $1,183.68 and departed from the scene.

On the second day thereafter all three defendants were arrested and they were interviewed by the police in the robbery bureau of the city hall of Los Angeles.

At the interview McEvers stated that he had planned and committed the robbery; that he and Davidson drove from the latter's home on Hooper street to the market; that Davidson waited in his car on a side street while the robbery took place; that after the two had returned to Hooper street, they divided the money among themselves and Jones, giving each $380; that he had been with Jones and Davidson for a day and a half prior to the robbery.

At the same interview Davidson told the officers that he had driven the car and that upon their return to his home they divided the money three ways; that his unspent portion was in his trunk. Following the conference with defendants, the officers accompanied by Davidson, visited his home and recovered $190 from his designated depository.

[1] After the foregoing admissions had been given in evidence by the officers, defendants attempted to refute them with testimony of promises made, of floggings administered, of frights provoked and of fears inspired by threats of violence and by being deprived of sleep and food. Inasmuch as McEvers was positively identified by four witnesses as the bandit who committed the crime and since he confessed his guilt to the jury in open court, there could be no reversal of his conviction because he could have suffered no prejudice by the rulings with reference to the admission of the confessions. Const. Art. VI, § 4½.

[2-5] We proceed therefore to a consideration of the assignments on behalf of Davidson.

(1) When testimony as to the conduct and attitude of this defendant was offered in evidence, the jury was excused while the court heard their testimony as well as that of the officers concerning the occurrences at the interview in the robbery bureau. There is nothing in the recitals of such witnesses to suggest that the trial court did not exercise a reasonable discretion in considering and admitting testimony as to statements and behavior of defendants when accused. In the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion upon the part of the trial judge, we cannot say that his ruling was error. People v. Luzovich, 127 Cal.App. 465, 470, 16 P.2d 144. It was for the trial judge to determine whether the confession was voluntary. People v. Lehew, 209 Cal. 336, 341, 287 P. 337. In ruling upon the admissibility of statements purporting to constitute the confession of an accused, the court is governed largely by the circumstances surrounding the purported confession. Id. The fact that it may have been made to an arresting officer or that the accused had been interrogated many hours does not render his statements involuntary. People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 394, 95 P. 863; People v. Dyer, 11 Cal. 2d 317, 319, 79 P.2d 1071. But after a voir dire session in the presence of the court alone, each of the parties present at the interview in the robbery bureau was examined before the jury; each repeated his own version of the incidents and the conversation between the officers and the accused and each was subjected to cross examination.

[6] Thereupon the issue as to whether the confessions were free and voluntary, along with other issues of fact, was submitted to the jury with an instruction that it was for them to determine whether the statements by defendants to the police "amounted to a confession and were made free and voluntary without influence of hope or fear"; that if they were not so freely made, they should be disregarded; that the slightest menace or threat, or any hope engendered in the mind of the accused that he will be more favorably dealt with if he will confess, should exclude the confession. Under such instruction the jury decided that the statements of the accused did constitute confessions and that they were freely and voluntarily made.

Counsel's eloquent portrayal of the savage mistreatment of appellants at the hands of the police is sufficient to arouse cold lethargy into heated action if the picture were true. But we are in no position to act upon his persuasions. The trial judge has determined that the facts were such as to warrant the admission in evidence of the statements. After their deliberations the jury impliedly found that such statements were confessions and that they were voluntarily made. In this connection it is contended that appellants were denied due process by reason of the brutalities they claimed to have suffered at the hands of the police. But after a jury and the court both determined there was no brutality we cannot say there was a want of due process. Had the alleged maltreatment of defendants been established we could not do otherwise than reverse the judgment. But upon that issue there was a conflict in the evidence resolved against appellants.

(2) It is contended on behalf of appellant Davidson that in view of the testimony that the brutality of the officers induced the alleged confessions, he was entitled to an instruction that "if the attitude of defendant in the face of the accusatory statements made by third parties in his presence, taken into conjunction with all the other facts and circumstances in the case creates a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, it was the duty of the jury to acquit him." Pursuant to such contention his counsel offered the following instruction which the court modified by striking the portion in brackets:

"The statements of third parties made in the presence of a defendant are admissible in evidence, not for the purpose of binding the defendant to the truth of such statements, nor as proof of his guilt, but they are receivable solely and alone that the jury may know the attitude of the defendant in the face of accusatory statements made against him by third persons in his presence. [If, therefore, in the face of such accusatory statements the defendant denied his guilt, the Jury has a right to take into consideration his denial of the truth of such accusatory statements, and if the attitude of the defendant in the face of the accusatory statements made by third parties in his presence, taken in conjunction with all the other facts and circumstances in the case creates a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, then it is the duty of the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty.]"

[7, 8] The court properly excluded from the proposed instruction the bracketed passage. At the time of the accusatory statements by the officers, Davidson denied his guilt. Such denial rendered the statements of the officers inadmissible. People v. Smith, 25 Cal.App.2d 241, 247, 77 P.2d 277. It is only the admissions of a litigant against his own interest that may be given in evidence by a third party. Since the accusatory statements were inadmissible, a denial of them was also inadmissible and it was therefore not proper to instruct the jury to consider appellant's denial of them. Moreover, on behalf of appellants the court admonished the jury that in considering the asserted confessions, all of the circumstances attendant upon such confessions and the fears and hopes and state of mind of the accused should be considered. That portion of the deleted sentence which refers to the creation of a reasonable doubt by the behavior of Davidson at the time the officers accused him, was covered by the court's reading to the jury section 1096 of the Penal Code. The reading of that section renders unnecessary any further instruction on the subject of reasonable doubt. (Penal Code, § 1096a.)

[9, 10] (3) Davidson's next assignment is that the court refused to give his proposed instruction to the effect that "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect" the accused with the crime. Such instruction was not in order. It was aimed at the testimony of McEvers who detailed Davidson's participation in the crime. But that testimony was given on behalf of the defense. The fact that on his cross-examination by the district attorney he denied his direct testimony leaves the contention utterly baseless. Furthermore, no prejudice could have been suffered by Davidson by reason of the court's rejection of the offered instruction for the reason that after McEver's confession at the Robbery Bureau, Davidson himself told the officers of his part in the crime and of the unspent share of his portion of the booty which the officers recovered. His confession and the presence of the money in his trunk, to which he led the officers, together with other circumstances, would have supported his conviction without McEver's testimony. No judgment shall be set aside unless after an examination of the entire cause the court shall be of the opinion that the asserted error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. VI, § 4½.

(4) Davidson's final assignment is that the giving of the following instruction constituted prejudicial error: "You are instructed that when a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstance of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt. The only purpose for which an accusatory statement is received in evidence is to show acquiescence or admission on the part of a defendant in the face of an accusatory charge and unless you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did stand mute when the accusatory statements were made, such statements should be entirely disregarded by you."

Davidson contends that since his defense is the brutality of the police the last-quoted instruction places upon him a greater burden than the law exacts. He did not stand mute but, on the contrary, he said he had nothing to do with the robbery and told the officers "if McEvers told you the whole story, I expect that is what I did."

[11, 12] Under the instruction it was the duty of the jury to determine whether such response was an admission of or acquiescence in the accusatory statement. Since Davidson testified that he stated that McEver's inculpatory statement was true, he was in no better position than if he had stood mute. In view of that testimony, the jury could not have been mislead by the instruction criticized (People v. Swanson, 120 Cal.App. 173, 178, 7 P.2d 380) especially in view of the instruction given at appellant's request to the effect that accusatory statements are admissible in evidence "solely and alone that the jury may know the attitude of the defendant in the face of accusatory statements made against him by third persons in his presence." The fact sought to be established by proof of the attitude of Davidson when accused was that he participated in the robbery. Either his silence or his spoken confession was admissible in evidence and such testimony justified either the instruction criticized or that given at appellant's request.

Judgments affirmed.

MILLER v. JANSEN.

Civ. 12108.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 16, 1942.

1. Deeds 🔑194(3)

In suit to quiet title, introduction of deed to defendant, bearing acknowledgment and notary's certification, made "prima facie" showing of due execution of deed, which invoked presumption that it was duly delivered on date of its execution. Civ.Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Prima Facie".

2. Deeds 🔑44

The "execution" of an instrument is the subscribing and delivery of it.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Execution".

3. Deeds 🔑194(1)

The presumption of due delivery arising from proof of execution and certification of instrument is disputable, but must prevail unless controverted by clear, satisfactory and convincing evidence. Civ.Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

4. Evidence 🔑598(1)

"Preponderance of evidence", within statute providing that question of fact is to be determined according to preponderance of evidence in civil cases, means greater weight of credible evidence. Code Civ.Proc. § 2061.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Preponderance of Evidence".

5. Evidence 🔑89

Where presumption is invoked and evidence is offered to contradict it, presumption is dispelled if contradictory evidence preponderates against presumption and party against whom presumption is invoked satisfactorily meets burden of proof imposed upon him by the presumption itself. Code Civ.Proc. § 2061.

6. Deeds 🔑194(1)

In suit to quiet title, wherein deed to defendant, bearing acknowledgment and notary's certification, was introduced, evidence consisting principally of documents which allegedly disclosed grantor's intention, a year or more prior to date borne by deed, to dispose of grantor's estate without probate did not overcome presumption of due execution and delivery of deed. Civ.Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

7. Deeds 🔑194(1)

The retention of deed by grantor after its execution for purposes of safekeeping is not in itself evidence sufficient to overcome statutory presumption of delivery. Civ. Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

8. Deeds 🔑194(1)

In suit to quiet title, wherein defendant relied on statutory presumption of delivery of deed to defendant found, properly acknowledged and certified, in safe deposit box in envelope bearing witnessed notation that contents of envelope belonged to defendant, such presumption was not overcome by general presumption that deed duly executed and subsequently found in grantor's possession is presumed not to have been delivered. Civ.Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

9. Deeds 🔑194(1)

The statutory presumption of delivery of deed controls over presumption of nondelivery arising from grantor's possession of deed where burden of proof rests on party invoking presumption of nondelivery. Civ.Code, § 1055; Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1948, 1951.

10. Deeds 🔑208(2)

In suit to quiet title, evidence that deed to defendant, properly acknowledged and certified, was found in safe deposit box in envelope bearing witnessed notation that contents of envelope belonged to defendant, established grantor's delivery of deed to herself as "trustee" or "agent" for defendant.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent" and "Trustee".

11. Quieting title 🔑44(1)

In suit to quiet title, plaintiff had burden of proving his title and could not prevail on the weakness of defendant's proof.

SPENCE, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by David E. Miller against Robert N. Jansen. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Hill & Hill, of Eureka, E. E. Grant, of San Francisco, and Busick & Busick, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Morrison & Morrison, of Eureka, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, as executor of the estate of Meta Rasmussen, deceased, sued to quiet title to real property. The defendant claims title to the property through a deed executed eight months prior to the death of deceased. The plaintiff had judgment upon findings that the deed had not been delivered by the grantor in her lifetime. The appeal is from this judgment.

On May 4, 1938, the grantor executed the deed conveying a life estate to her sister Maria Beck, the remainder to the defendant herein. Maria Beck died some time prior to the commencement of this action. The deed, offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was duly acknowledged before a notary and bears the endorsement: "Signed, Sealed and Delivered in the Presence of Beatrice Myers Winslow." The latter is the name of the notary who took the acknowledgment, and the above endorsement bears her signature. After the death of the grantor this deed was found in her safe deposit box in a sealed envelope bearing the inscription "5–4–38. This envelope and contents is the property of Maria Beck of Ferndale, and Robert N. Jansen, of Manteka, California. (Signed) Meta Rasmussen. Witness B. M. Winslow."

After offering the deed and this envelope in evidence, the plaintiff called two witnesses whose testimony had no bearing upon the case excepting as to the identification of other documents found in deceased's safe deposit box. The defendant rested wholly upon the presumptions hereinafter noted and offered no evidence. At the opening of the trial the plaintiff asked and was granted leave to amend the complaint to change the allegation from one that the deceased "executed" the deed in question to one that she "signed and acknowledged" it.

The appeal is grounded on the contention that the finding that "said instrument was not ever delivered to said Maria Beck, to defendant Robert N. Jansen, or to any other person or put out of the possession or beyond the control of the said Meta Rasmussen," as alleged in the complaint, is not supported by any evidence, and that the presumption of delivery found in section 1055 of the Civil Code, together with the provisions of sections 1948 and 1951 of the Code of Civil Procedure, require a reversal of the judgment.

Section 1055 of the Civil Code provides: "A grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date." Section 1948 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part: "Every private writing, except last wills and testaments, may be acknowledged or proved and certified * * *, and the certificate of such acknowledgment or proof is prima facie evidence of the execution of the writing * * *." Section 1951 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "Every instrument conveying or affecting real property, acknowledged or proved and certified, as provided in the Civil Code, may together with the certificate of acknowledgment or proof, be read in evidence in an action or proceeding, without further proof * * *."

[1, 2] In conformity with these Code sections, when the respondent voluntarily offered in evidence the deed with its acknowledgment and certification, he thereby completed a prima facie showing of the due execution of the instrument which invoked the presumption that it was duly delivered upon the date of its execution. This is so because the "execution of an instrument is the subscribing and delivery of it; and * * * a grant duly executed is presumed to have been delivered on its date." 1 Cal. Jur. p. 232. Thus, when the respondent offered as his evidence the acknowledged instrument "Signed, Sealed and Delivered in the Presence of" a witness, he made competent and substantial proof of a conveyance of the property to appellant by a duly executed and delivered deed as of the date subscribed. This proof was supplemented by the additional proof also offered by respondent, showing the grantor's endorsement on the sealed envelope that the deed was the property of the grantees, and by her letter addressed to the appellant in which she stated that she had given her sister Maria a life lease on the property "the house to be yours after her death." (This letter was dated May 2, 1938, whereas the deed was dated May 4th. The only reasonable explanation for the difference in dates is that the deceased made a mistake in her letter. From its contents it is apparent that the letter was written after the deed was executed, or at least upon the same day.)

[3-5] The presumption of due delivery arising from the respondent's proof of the execution and certification of the instrument is a disputable presumption, but it is one which must prevail unless controverted by clear and convincing evidence, or, as is frequently said in the decisions, "satisfactory" evidence. Lewis v. Burns, 122 Cal. 358, 362, 55 P. 132; Marple v. Jackson, 184 Cal. 411, 415, 193 P. 940. As to the legal effect, and evidentiary value of presumptions generally, see Westberg v. Willde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 365, 94 P.2d 590. From the cases there cited we understand the rule to be that, unless the presumption is dispelled by clear, satisfactory and convincing evidence, the court or jury is bound to find in accordance with it. But what is meant by "clear, satisfactory and convincing" evidence is a subject upon which there is a wide difference of opinion. See 20 Am. Jur., pages 1103, 1104. Our Code provides that a question of fact is to be determined "according to the preponderance of evidence" in civil cases. Section 2061, Code Civil Procedure. This we understand to mean the greater weight of the credible evidence, and hence when a presumption is invoked and evidence is offered to contradict it, the presumption is deemed to have been dispelled if the contradictory evidence "preponderates" against the presumption and the party against whom the presumption is invoked "satisfactorily" meets the burden of proof imposed upon him by the presumption itself.

With these principles in mind we may look at the evidence which respondent tendered to dispel the presumption of due execution and delivery of the deed. Exhibit No. 1 is a copy of decedent's will executed January 21, 1937. Exhibit No. 2 is a letter dated to two friends November 30, 1936, and apparently referring to an earlier will. Exhibit No. 3 is the letter of May 2, 1938, which the deceased addressed to appellant and in which she told him she had given him the property in suit and had assigned the "pink slip" to her auto which she wanted him to have. Exhibit No. 4 is the pink slip showing assignment by the legal and registered owner of the auto. Exhibit No. 5 is an assignment of shares of stock dated August 19, 1936. Exhibit No. 6 is an assignment or bill of sale of certain personal property to her sister dated August 19, 1936. Exhibit No. 7 is the deed hereinabove referred to dated May 4, 1938. Exhibit No. 8 is the envelope, and its endorsement, in which this deed was enclosed. Exhibit No. 9 is another assignment or bill of sale of certain shares of stock dated January 21, 1937. Exhibit No. 10 contains portions of a letter which have no bearing on the case. This is all the documentary evidence that was offered. No oral testimony relating to the issue of delivery was tendered. The appellant states in his brief that the notary who certified to the execution and delivery of the deed was present during the trial. The respondent correctly states that the record does not show that she was present. It is a fact, however, that she was not called to testify and respondent made no showing why her testimony of the surrounding circumstances was suppressed.

[6, 7] Returning to the exhibits it will be noted that most of the documents were executed a year or more prior to the execution of the deed. Respondent argues that they disclose an intent of the deceased to dispose of her estate without probate. If this were so it would have no bearing on the question here presented. An intention entertained and expressed in 1936 and 1937 is no proof that the same intention was entertained in May, 1938. Shaver v. Canfield, 21 Cal.App.2d 734, 739, 70 P.2d 507. Furthermore, the question of intent was not pleaded in the complaint and no finding was made covering it. The issue pleaded and found as the sole basis of the judgment was that the deed was not delivered. On this question the case is controlled by Thomas v. Fursman, 177 Cal. 550, 554, 171 P. 301; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 409, 221 P. 191; Drummond v. Drummond, 39 Cal.App.2d 418, 423, 103 P.2d 217; and the subsequent retention of the deed by the grantor for purposes of safekeeping is not in itself evidence sufficient to overcome the statutory proof of delivery. Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 581, 185 P. 665; Goodman v. Goodman, 212 Cal. 730, 300 P. 449; Longley v. Brooks, 13 Cal.2d 754, 762, 92 P.2d 394; Shaver v. Canfield, 21 Cal.App.2d 734, 739, 70 P.2d 507.

[8, 9] But the respondent suggests that this presumption should be deemed to have been overcome by the general presumption that a deed duly executed and subsequently found in the possession of the grantor is presumed not to have been delivered. 26 C.J.S., Deeds, § 184, p. 593. There are two answers to the argument, first, that the proof here did not show exclusive possession, and second, that the presumption of delivery controls over the presumption of non-delivery where the burden of proof rests upon the party invoking the latter presumption.

The undisputed evidence is that the deed was found in the grantor's safe deposit box after her death enclosed in a sealed envelope upon which was endorsed, in the grantor's handwriting, the following: "5-4-38. This envelope and contents is the property of Maria Beck of Ferndale, and Robert N. Jansen, of Manteka, California. (Signed) Meta Rasmussen. Witness B. M. Winslow." This evidence discloses that the grantor did not retain exclusive possession of the deed, but that she openly, and in the presence of a witness, declared it to be the property of the grantees. It discloses further a deliberate intention to pass title at the very time the deed was executed, and that she at least believed and intended that all the formal steps necessary to make a complete and valid delivery had been taken. By this endorsement the grantor made herself a trustee for the grantees to hold the deed for them, and effectively passed out of her hands the control over the deed and any right which she might theretofore have had to recall or revoke it. It is inconceivable that, with this endorsement on the envelope, she would have assumed that she had the right to retake the deed and to either alter or destroy what she had voluntarily certified to be "the property" of the grantees.

[10] The facts of the case bring it squarely within the rule of Cahlan v. Bank of Lassen County, 11 Cal.App. 533, 105 P. 765, where on a similar state of facts it was held that such an endorsement and deposit constituted the holder a trustee. The one essential difference in the facts is that in the Cahlan case the enclosures were certificates of stock where here the enclosure was a deed to real property. But this does not affect the rule of the case. It was sufficient for the purposes of this case if the grantor had made herself a trustee of the deed alone and had assumed to hold the deed in trust for the grantees. She did not need to become a trustee of the real property and did not need to assume to hold that property in trust for the grantees. Thus the statutory requirements relating to the creation of a trust in real property had no application, and it is not necessary that the word "trust" be used to create that relationship. "Any words which indicate with sufficient certainty an intention or purpose to create a trust will be effective in so doing, without the use of the words 'trust' or 'trustee'." Cahlan v. Bank of Lassen County, supra, 11 Cal.App. 540, 105 P. 767. As trustee of the deed alone she took delivery as trustee, or agent, of the grantees. Hence, if we disregard the presumption of due delivery arising from section 1055 of the Civil Code, the proof of a complete delivery for the benefit of the grantees is not only satisfactory and clear but is beyond reasonable doubt.

[11] The question of the effect of conflicting presumptions and when one controls over the other is one of wide dispute. This is discussed in McKay v. McKay, 184 Cal. 742, 195 P. 385, 387, where a judgment of the trial court based upon the presumption that money paid was money due was reversed upon the ground that the presumption was overcome by the presumption that money obtained by a husband from his wife was obtained by undue influence. Section 2235 of the Civil Code. The court there said that the latter presumption prevailed over the former because, for one reason, "[it is] the less general of the two." That rule would seem to apply here because the presumption arising from mere possession is the more general, and of far wider use and application. But a firmer ground for determining the relative weight of the conflicting presumptions in this case is that since the action is one to quiet title in the respondent the burden of proof is on him to prove his title and he can prevail only by proof of his title and not upon the weakness of appellant's proof. Such being the case if these presumptions are of equal weight—the one of delivery balancing the one of non-delivery—there is no substantial evidence to support the finding of nondelivery since the burden rested upon respondent to prove his title by a clear "preponderance" of the evidence. For these reasons there is no basis upon which the trial court, or this court, could reach a conclusion that one presumption was dispelled by the other. The judgment therefore is not supported by a preponderance of the evidence showing title in the respondent and "no right, title, or interest," in the appellant. To the contrary these essential allegations of the complaint upon which respondent's cause of action rests remain unproved and the only legal conclusion that a court could make upon the record is that the moving party failed to sustain his burden of proof.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to amend the findings of fact and conclusions of law in accord herewith, and to enter judgment for the defendant.

STURTEVANT, J., concurred.

SPENCE, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. The determinative question on this appeal is whether the evidence was sufficient to support the trial court's finding that the deed had not been delivered. There was no direct evidence on this issue and the trial court's finding was necessarily based upon the indirect evidence which was before it. In my opinion, that evidence was ample to sustain the trial court's finding.

It is undisputed that the deed was found in a safe deposit box over which the deceased had exclusive control. It has been said that this fact alone "supports a presumption that it was never delivered" (Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388, 390, 153 P. 708, 709) and that the burden of proof on the issue of delivery then rests upon the party claiming under the deed. Lample v. McDougall, 103 Cal.App. 779, 781, 285 P. 328. See, also, 26 C.J.S., Deeds, § 184, 593; 16 Am.Juris. 664. The defendant here offered no proof on this issue.

But there were other surrounding circumstances to support the trial court's finding of non-delivery. "Delivery or non-delivery is always a question of fact to be found from the surrounding circumstances of each transaction." Donahue v. Sweeney, supra, 171 Cal. page 391, 153 P. page 710. The deed was found in deceased's safe deposit box with many other papers. Among these papers was a will which purported to dispose of the entire estate of the deceased. There were also the deed, bills of sale and other instruments signed by the deceased purporting to dispose of the same property. The bills of sale covered, among other things, all personal effects as well as money in banks. There were also letters addressed to various persons. In the letters, deceased stated, "I have tried to fix my bit of property, if there should be any left when I pass on where it would do most good"; also "I have tried to fix things so there would be no expense. I hope it works;", also "I have tried to arrange it so it would not have to go through court, but you never know what might be done, so I have also made a will. * * *"

Considering all of these papers together, the trial court was entirely justified in concluding that the deceased had no intention of presently divesting herself of title to any of said property but had the intention of making testamentary disposition thereof to be effective only upon her death. Under such circumstances, the finding that there had been no delivery of the deed should not be disturbed as the intention to make a present transfer is an essential element of a valid delivery. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann.Cas.1916E, 703; 9 Cal.Jur. 153, § 52.

In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

JOLTON v. MINSTER-GRAF & CO. et al.

Civ. 13395.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 23, 1942.

1. Brokers 🔑38(4)

In action against brokers for breach of duty with result that plaintiff was unable to exercise option to purchase lease of hotel property, evidence sustained findings that plaintiff did not misrepresent the term of the lease and that brokers did not terminate their agency, but that agency continued during life of the option and until the lease was sold by brokers.

2. Brokers 🔑38(4)

In action against brokers for breach of duty with result that plaintiff was unable to exercise option to purchase lease of hotel property, evidence sustained finding that agreement between owners of lease and plaintiff was in fact an option and that plaintiff was not the agent of the owners of the lease and did not represent himself to the brokers as such agent.

3. Appeal and error 🔑205

Defendant could not complain of the exclusion of testimony of a witness on cross-examination where no offer was made to prove such statements by the testimony of other witnesses.

4. Appeal and error ⚿1047(3)

In action against brokers for breach of duty with result that plaintiff was unable to exercise option to purchase lease of hotel property, with defense that plaintiff was merely an agent of owners of the lease to sell the lease, striking testimony whether optionor ever conversed with plaintiff relative to plaintiff's acting as the optionor's agent was not error and was harmless in any event where the answer was negative.

5. Brokers ⚿3

An optionee was not barred from recovery against brokers for breach of duty with result that optionee was unable to exercise an option to purchase a lease of hotel property because he was not a licensed real estate broker where the evidence disclosed that he was buying and selling real estate on his own account, since he was not required to hold a broker's license to engage in business for himself.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚿74

Option to purchase lease of realty for $2,000 was not invalid because of the fact that the lease was subsequently sold for $9,600.

7. Brokers ⚿38(4)

In action against brokers for breach of duty with result that plaintiff was unable to exercise an option to purchase lease of hotel property, evidence was not sufficient to defeat a recovery on the ground that the owner of the leased realty would not have consented to an assignment of the lease, which would have been necessary to a valid transfer of the lease.

8. Brokers ⚿10

Brokers employed by holder of option to purchase lease of realty, to obtain purchasers of the lease, were under duty to act in the highest good faith and to inform the optionee of every fact material to the optionee's advantage.

9. Brokers ⚿38(7)

Where broker employed by holder of option to purchase lease of realty, to obtain purchasers of the lease, fraudulently delayed consummation of the sale of the lease until after option expired, trial court properly awarded optionee damages in the amount of the gross profits that the optionee would have made on the sale of the lease to those who subsequently purchased it from the brokers, after deducting therefrom the amount which the optionee had agreed to pay the brokers for obtaining purchasers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Nat Jolton against Minster-Graf & Company (a partnership) and others, to recover damages for breach of duty and fraudulent conduct in failing to represent plaintiff diligently and faithfully as his agents in the matter of the sale of property which defendants had been engaged to sell for plaintiff. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Jensen & Jensen, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry S. Cohen and Bernard B. Cohen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

Appeal by defendants from a judgment in an action for damages for breach of duty and fraudulent conduct in failing to diligently and faithfully represent plaintiff as his agents in the matter of the sale of property which defendants had been engaged to sell for plaintiff.

The basis of the judgment, as established by the findings, was that defendants actually found a purchaser and made a sale of the property for the owner but intentionally delayed consummating the sale until an option which plaintiff held to purchase the property had expired, as a result of which conduct plaintiff suffered a loss to the extent of the profit that he would have made had the sale been concluded during the lifetime of his option.

On or about March 21, 1940, one Linck and his wife, owners of a lease upon the Breevort Hotel in Hollywood, executed and delivered to plaintiff an option to purchase the lease, on or before April 27, 1940, for the sum of $2,000 cash. Two days later plaintiff engaged J. D. Minster and Fred Graf, doing business under the name of Minster-Graf & Co. and who are licensed real estate brokers, to act for him as his agents to procure a purchaser at a price of $6,000 and they agreed to accept for their services in the event of a sale $1,000. Defendants advertised the property for sale and early in April they contacted G. N.

Nickson and Elias Sternglanz as prospective purchasers and notified plaintiff in writing of their plans to sell the property to them. On or about the 10th of April plaintiff introduced Graf to Linck and shortly thereafter Graf, Linck, Nickson and Sternglanz had a conference from which plaintiff was excluded, and from the date of the introduction of Graf to Linck defendants would have nothing to do with plaintiff and refused to confer with him regarding their plans to sell the property. On April 15, through defendants' efforts, an agreement was entered into between Nickson and Sternglanz as purchasers and Linck and wife as sellers for the sale of the property to the former for a price of $9,600; $4,800 in cash and $4,800 to be paid at the rate of $100 a month, this agreement providing that it was conditional upon plaintiff's failure to exercise his option to purchase the property on or before April 27. On April 16 defendants obtained from each of the purchasers a check for $250 as deposit and part payment on the purchase. On April 25 Linck wrote to plaintiff reminding him that his option would expire at midnight on April 27 and notifying him that it would not be extended. On or about May 2 the sale to Nickson and Sternglanz was concluded and they received from the owners of the real property a new lease for the unexpired term of the existing lease for the consideration theretofore agreed upon, and defendants received a commission of $1,000 from Linck.

The court found that defendants concealed from plaintiff the fact that they had made a sale of the property to Nickson and Sternglanz and intentionally concealed the fact that they had received a deposit on the sale until plaintiff's option had expired; that they were guilty of fraud, bad faith and deceit in their dealings with plaintiff; that they did not exercise diligence in completing the sale for plaintiff and prevented a consummation of the sale with intent to deprive plaintiff of the profit he would have received had the sale been made during the life of his option, to his damage in the sum of $3,000, for which plaintiff received judgment. His demand for exemplary damages was denied.

[1] As a defense to the action and in attempted justification of their refusal to close the sale as plaintiff's agents, defendants alleged by answer that plaintiff had represented himself to be the agent of Mr. and Mrs. Linck, had misrepresented the terms of the lease, that plaintiff's option had been obtained without consideration, that plaintiff could not have obtained the written consent of the owner of the real property to a transfer of the lease to the proposed purchasers, and that for these reasons defendants, upon learning the true facts, notified plaintiff that they would not represent him further in the transaction. The court found that plaintiff did not make all or any of the representations alleged by the defendants, did not make any representation to them fraudulently, and that defendants did not terminate their agency but that the same continued during the life of plaintiff's option and until the property was sold. The evidence fully sustains these findings.

[2] Much of appellants' argument fails because it is based upon assumed facts consistent with their theories but contrary to the findings of the court. It is contended by appellants that plaintiff did not hold an option from Linck and wife but that while his agreement was, in terms, an option to purchase, it created a mere agency; that the agreement of Linck and wife to sell the property for $2,000 to their agent was unfair to the former; that plaintiff would have made an unfair profit if he had effected the sale for $6,000, and that therefore his contract was unenforceable and worthless. Plaintiff's agreement with Linck and wife was in form an option to purchase the lease for $2,000 cash, duly acknowledged by Linck and wife. There was no evidence that plaintiff was acting as the agent of Mr. and Mrs. Linck other than the testimony of defendants that plaintiff stated to them that he was so acting, which was denied by plaintiff. In a letter of April 16, 1940, written to defendants, signed by Nickson, Sternglanz and Mr. and Mrs. Linck, and another letter written by Mr. Linck to plaintiff April 25, 1940, the agreement was referred to as an option which would expire at midnight, April 27. The court found upon ample evidence that the agreement was an option and that plaintiff was not the agent of Mr. and Mrs. Linck and did not represent himself to defendants as such agent.

[3, 4] Appellants complain of certain rulings in the exclusion of testimony, all relating to the question whether plaintiff was representing Mr. and Mrs. Linck as their agent and so represented to defendants. The court admitted all the conversations between plaintiff and defendants on that subject but refused to allow defendant on cross-examination of plaintiff to question him whether he had listed the property for sale with other brokers and had made statements to other brokers that he was the agent of plaintiff. No offer was made to prove such statements by the testimony of other witnesses. We see no error in these rulings. Defendants asked Mr. Linck if he had ever had a conversation with plaintiff relative to plaintiff's acting as his agent. The witness answered that he had not, the answer was stricken, and the ruling is now assigned as error. The ruling was proper and obviously harmless, considering the answer.

[5] It appeared that plaintiff was not a licensed real estate broker although he had been formerly licensed as a salesman. It is contended that he could not lawfully have received compensation in his transaction with Mr. and Mrs. Linck unless he had been a licensed broker. The evidence was that he had been buying, selling and building on real estate on his own account, and the finding of the court that he was not acting as the agent of Mr. and Mrs. Linck but only as an optionee dealing on his own account is conclusive on this point. He was not required to hold a broker's license to engage in business for himself.

Appellants' next contention is that defendants had a right in good faith to terminate their agency for just cause and thereafter to enter into transactions involving the matters embraced within the agency on their own account. The weakness of this argument is that the court found from abundant evidence that defendants had no just cause for terminating their agency, did not terminate it, and that they disregarded and violated their obligations to their principal in bad faith.

[6, 7] The next contention is that plaintiff's evidence failed to show that the sale could have been made to Nickson and Sternglanz by defendants as agents of plaintiff; also that it failed to show that plaintiff could have enforced his option against Mr. and Mrs. Linck, and further that plaintiff's evidence did not show that the owner of the real property would have consented to an assignment of the lease to Nickson and Sternglanz, which consent would have been necessary to a valid transfer of the lease to them by Mr. and Mrs. Linck. These contentions are without merit. It is true that plaintiff had an option to purchase property for $2,000 which Mr. and Mrs. Linck subsequently sold for $9,600, but that fact alone would not render the contract invalid and apparently it was considered by Mr. and Mrs. Linck to be binding upon them. Their letters which we have mentioned would bear this construction. Defendants questioned a witness named A. Brigham Rose as to whether he had ever expressed his willingness or unwillingness to consent to a transfer of the lease to plaintiff and the answer of the witness was "Definitely yes" which answer was stricken out. Mr. Rose was an attorney at law and held a power of attorney which would have authorized him to act in the matter on behalf of the owner of the realty. A sufficient answer to the contention that plaintiff's evidence did not show his ability to obtain the consent of the lessor is that a new lease was executed to Nickson and Sternglanz, as lessees, at the rental and for the unexpired term of the lease under option to plaintiff. It conclusively appears that the new lessees were regarded as satisfactory tenants and the fact that they entered under a new lease instead of under an assignment of the existing lease is quite immaterial. There is no reason to believe that the same new lease could not have been obtained by negotiations through plaintiff, as optionee, as well as by negotiations through the Lincks.

[8, 9] The law governing the case is clear. Defendants were plaintiff's agents and were under duty to act in the highest good faith. Gammon v. Ealey & Thompson, 1929, 97 Cal.App. 452, 458, 275 P. 1005, and cases there cited. It was their duty to inform their principal of every fact material to the advantage of the principal. McPhetridge v. Smith, 1929, 101 Cal.App. 122, 139, 281 P. 419; Orfanos v. California Insurance Co., 1938, 29 Cal.App.2d 75, 80, 84 P.2d 233. The court found from ample evidence that defendants were guilty of the concealments and breaches of duty toward plaintiff which we have noted and that plaintiff was thereby damaged to the extent of $3,000, consisting of the gross profit he would have made upon a sale of the property to Nickson and Sternglanz of $4,000, after deducting therefrom $1,000 which he had agreed to pay defendants. We find no error in the manner in which the trial was conducted nor in the result reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOBLEY et al. v. RICHFIELD OIL CORPORATION.

Civ. 3036.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.
July 14, 1942.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑28(1)

In landowner's suit to cancel lease of gasoline station, evidence sustained finding that oil company secured execution of lease by fraudulent representations and failed to carry out oral promises to paint the service station and erect electric signs which promises were made as an inducement to the execution of the lease.

2. Contracts 🔑270(1)

A prompt disaffirmance is necessary to the maintenance of an action to cancel an instrument.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑112(1)

Generally, a party having knowledge of a breach of a covenant in a lease has no right to continue to accept benefit to which he would not be entitled if he desired to exercise his right of forfeiture.

4. Cancellation of instruments 🔑32

The principles applicable to a suit for the termination of a contract because of a subsequent breach giving rise to the right of forfeiture are not controlling in a suit involving the setting aside of a contract on the ground that it was never legally entered into.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑31

Where benefits received by landlord after discovery of fraud by which oil company obtained lease on gasoline station were not such as landlord would not otherwise be entitled, landlord did not "waive" right of rescission by continuing to receive such benefits.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waive".

6. Contracts 🔑99(3)

In suits for rescission of a contract for fraud, defendant relying on a claimed waiver of the right of rescission has burden of proving waiver by clear and convincing evidence.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑31

In landowner's suit to cancel lease of gasoline station to oil company for fraud in procuring execution of lease where, upon discovery of fraud, landlord immediately objected and thereafter sought to bring matter to adjustment, and was lulled by acts of oil company, and oil company was in no way misled as to landlord's intention, and landlord received no benefit to which she was not otherwise entitled in attempting to keep the matter in status quo until the case could be tried, landlord did not "waive" right to rescind by continuing to perform and accept benefits under lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by Joseph Mobley and others against Richfield Oil Corporation to rescind and cancel a written lease for fraud and for declaratory relief. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

H. L. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

N. E. Youngblood, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Judge.

This is an action to rescind and cancel a written lease on the ground that it had been fraudulently obtained, and for declaratory relief. The main defense relied upon was a claimed waiver by the plaintiffs of the right of rescission through continued compliance, after discovery, with the terms of the lease and a sublease and the payment of certain amounts thereunder. The court found in all respects in favor of the plaintiffs finding, among other things, that the lease had been obtained by fraudulent representations, that the plaintiffs immediately after discovery had demanded the cancellation of the lease contract, and that the plaintiffs had acted as ordinary and reasonably prudent persons under the circumstances and had not waived their rights to a rescission and cancellation. From a judgment canceling the lease, the defendant has appealed. The property in question was owned by Nannie E. Mobley as her separate property and she will be referred to as the respondent.

In 1929, the respondent acquired certain lots in Mojave upon which were located a motel, a cafe and a service station, all of which she has since owned and operated, the service station portion being also used for a number of purposes in connection with the cafe and motel. From 1929 to 1940, the respondent sold Richfield products in the service station under various contract arrangements. On June 15, 1938, she entered into a purchase and sale contract with the appellant under which she purchased gasoline and other products and under which she made a profit of 5 cents a gallon on gasoline, 1 cent per gallon of which was in the form of a rebate given to her by the appellant. This contract was to expire on July 30, 1940. Shortly before that date the parties began negotiations for a new agreement. Appellant's agent informed the respondent that because of certain policies of the company a new agreement similar in form to the old one could not be entered into; that it would be necessary for her to lease the service station to the appellant; that the appellant in turn would sublease the service station to the respondent's son, Roger White, who was working for his mother on a salary; that the son would simply be a "dummy"; that the change in the form of agreement was a matter of form only; that she could continue to operate the service station in the same manner as under the previous contract; and that she would receive the same profit. A ten-year lease from the respondent to the appellant and a short time sublease from the appellant to Roger White were executed on July 19, 1940, the entire transaction being carried on between the appellant and the respondent. The respondent did not read the lease, being assured by one Williams, an agent of the appellant, that there was no need for her to read it; that it was exactly as represented to her, and that it was the same contract as she then had except for the length of the term and Roger White's position as her "dummy."

In practical effect, the new arrangement differed from the one it was to succeed mainly in that under the new arrangement the profit which the respondent was to receive was divided into two classes, one in the way of rental under the lease and the other as profit on the sale of products. An important difference, however, which was unfavorable to the respondent and not disclosed to her, was that under the new arrangement the rental under the sublease and the purchase price of gasoline and other products purchased from appellant by the respondent were to be paid for monthly in cash, with only a slight reduction from retail prices, and the larger part of the rental coming to the respondent under the main lease was not to be paid until the end of each year.

After the execution of the leases the respondent continued in possession and in operation of the service station exactly as she had previously done, paying the appellant for merchandise as she had been doing under the previous contract, and her son continued to work for her on a salary. The station continued under her sales tax permit, the same as before. The respondent first learned of the true nature of the contract on or about November 6, 1940, when the appellant through one Goddard demanded an additional payment of $225.71 for merchandise and rentals under the sublease and threatened to evict Roger White as subtenant. The respondent was then given a copy of the leases for the first time. Immediately, she demanded that an adjustment be made so that the contract would conform with her understanding of the terms and asked Goddard what he would advise. Goddard advised her to pay the $225.71 and stated that he would take the matter up with the appellant and have it adjusted to her satisfaction. The respondent paid the money and, when nothing was done, made a number of efforts to get in touch with Williams, appellant's agent who had concluded the original negotiations, asking him to come out and adjust the matter. He finally came out in December and promised to adjust the matter and return, but he never came back. The respondent consulted an attorney in January, 1941, and in an effort to adjust the matter the time for a settlement of the controversy was extended. No settlement having been reached a formal notice and demand for cancellation and rescission was served and this action was filed on February 11, 1941.

[1] The appellant states as one of its grounds for reversal that the evidence does not support the court's findings that the execution of the lease was procured by a fraudulent representation, that the appellant had failed to paint the service station as it orally agreed to do, and that it had failed to erect certain electric signs in accordance with an oral promise made as an inducement to the execution of the lease. While some portions of the testimony are set forth in the opening brief no argument is made in this regard and the reply brief indicates an abandonment of this ground. In any event, the point is without merit as the evidence amply sustains the findings.

[2, 3] The appellant earnestly contends, however that it must be held as a matter of law, that the respondent waived any right of rescission she might have had by continuing, after discovery of the fraud in November, 1940, to comply with appellant's demands and by receiving rent, purchasing gasoline, paying rent on the sublease, and paying for the merchandise in accordance with the terms of the lease and sublease of July 19, 1940, as the bills therefor were presented by the appellant. In addition to the general rule that a prompt disaffirmance is necessary, the appellant relies on such cases as McGlynn v. Moore, 25 Cal. 384; Jones v. Maria, 48 Cal.App. 171, 191 P. 943; Kern Sunset Oil Co. v. Good Roads Oil Co., 214 Cal. 435, 6 P.2d 71, 80 A.L.R. 453, in which it has been held that the acceptance of rent after full knowledge of the breach of a covenant to build or a covenant to drill for oil, unless the covenant breached was a continuing one, constitutes a waiver of the right to declare a forfeiture and terminate the lease. The general principle involved in such cases is that a party having knowledge of the breach has no right to continue to accept benefits to which he would not be entitled if he desired to exercise his right of forfeiture.

[4-6] In our opinion, different principles are applicable under the circumstances here appearing and the cases relied upon by appellant are not controlling. This action involves the setting aside of a contract on the ground that it was never legally entered into, rather than the termination of a contract because of a subsequent breach giving rise to the right of forfeiture. While forfeitures are not favored, relief from established fraud is another matter. Moreover, the respondent did not continue to receive benefits arising from the contract and to which she could not otherwise be entitled, under the rules and principles properly applicable to the situation which here appears. It has been said that a claimed waiver of the right of rescission for fraud "ought to be watched with the utmost strictness, and to stand only upon the clearest evidence as an act done with all the deliberation that ought to attend a transaction the effect of which is to ratify that which in justice ought never to have taken place." See Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 P. 234, 239. In such a case the burden is on the party asserting and relying on a waiver to prove it by evidence which does not leave the matter doubtful or uncertain. Aronson v. Frankfort, etc., Ins. Co., 9 Cal.App. 473, 99 P. 537; Mott v. Cline, 200 Cal. 434, 253 P. 718.

In Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808, it was held that the payment of assessments on stock after discovery of the fraud did not necessarily bar a right of rescission. In French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515, 519, where the trial court had found that the plaintiff had not waived the right of rescission, the court said: "The question of waiver or nonwaiver was one of fact for the trial court to pass upon, and the acts or conduct which defendant claims constituted said waiver were the evidence to be considered in determining the ultimate fact of waiver or nonwaiver. * * * Whether or not a person has ratified a voidable contract, or elected to affirm it rather than to rescind it, depends primarily upon his intention, and this is shown by his declarations, his acts, or his conduct, which are matters of fact. The question is therefore a question of fact for the determination of the jury." In Sutton-Watts v. Sarnow, 80 Cal.App. 91, 251 P. 654, 655, a payment was made after notice of rescission and another payment after the action was filed. The court there said: "Respondent's intention to rescind was clearly manifested by the prompt service of notice to that effect, which was followed and confirmed by the commencement of suit, and we think that the payments mentioned, standing alone, cannot be reasonably construed as a revocation of the legal course already adopted by her to rescind the sale, nor did the fact that they were made mislead appellant or operate to respondent's benefit, but, as remarked by the trial court, were doubtless made by respondent under the fear that if she defaulted in that respect she would become more deeply involved." "'In the absence of an express agreement a waiver will not be presumed or implied contrary to the intention of the party whose rights would be injuriously affected thereby, unless by his conduct the opposite party has been mislead, to his prejudice, into the honest belief that such waiver was intended or consented to.'" Craig v. White, 187 Cal. 489, 202 P. 648, 652; 27 R.C.L., p. 908.

In Switzler v. Robert A. Klein & Co., 94 Cal.App. 410, 271 P. 367, 370, it was held that there was no waiver of a right to rescind where on discovery the plaintiffs employed an attorney to investigate the facts and to take up with the defendant the matter of adjustment and settlement. The court said: "The record shows that no considerable time elapsed while these negotiations were being carried on, and instead of being construed as a waiver of any rights to rescind, we think the effort to secure settlement without litigation should be looked upon favorably." It was also claimed in that case that the plaintiffs had waived the right to rescind by making one of the monthly payments on the purchase price of the property after the discovery of the fraud and during the period of attempted settlement. In that regard the court said: "While the payment of the purchase price has in many cases been held to indicate a ratification, it cannot be held that keeping up monthly payments for a short period of time during the pendency of negotiations seeking a settlement, is such a ratification as to bar rescission. Such payments, under the circumstances, constituted merely facts or acts to be considered by the trial court in determining whether the plaintiffs had or had not ratified the transaction." It was further held in Curtis v. Title Guarantee, etc., Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 612, 40 P.2d 562, 42 P.2d 323, that the making of payments after discovery is not necessarily a waiver of rescission where fears have been lulled by representations or promises of the other party.

[7] In the instant case, it appears that the respondent protested and demanded an adjustment immediately after discovery of the fraud; that she was advised by an agent of the appellant to pay the amount claimed and he promised to have the matter adjusted; after considerable effort the respondent secured an interview with Williams, the agent of appellant who had been in charge when the contract was executed; when he finally appeared he promised to adjust the matter; after a not unreasonable time an attorney was consulted with a further attempt to adjust the matter; and notice and demand for rescission was then given, followed by the filing of this action. The respondent was attempting at all times to bring the matter to an adjustment, she was lulled by the acts and promises of the appellant, and the appellant was in no way misled as to her intentions. If she had not kept up the rentals on the sublease, paid for the merchandise furnished her and made the payments demanded from her, she might well have feared that she would lose control of the property in question. She might then have been in an intolerable position in view of the relation and connection of the leased property to the other portions of her business enterprise. As the court specifically found, the appellant had not painted the buildings, erected the signs or made any other expenditures, and it was in the identical position it had been in before the lease contract was executed. The appellant was not mislead or prejudiced and the respondent received no benefit to which she was not otherwise entitled, by her efforts to keep the matter in status quo until the case could be tried. Under the principles and rules to which we have referred it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that respondent waived her right to rescind and the court found to the contrary upon rather clear and convincing evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

RICHFIELD OIL CORPORATION v. MOBLEY.

Civ. 3014.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 14, 1942.

Pleading ⟹93(2)

In lessee's action against lessor for forcible entry and detainer in taking possession of premises allegedly abandoned by subtenant, who was lessor's son, lessor could properly plead invalidity of lease as a defense and in the alternative, if lease were held valid, that lessor was in possession under a power of attorney from her son and such defenses were not inconsistent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Warren Stockton, Judge.

Action by Richfield Oil Corporation against Nannie E. Mobley in forcible entry and detainer for purpose of securing possession of certain premises used for a service station. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

N. E. Youngblood, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Judge.

This is an action in forcible entry and detainer for the purpose of securing possession of certain premises used for a service station. It involves the same parties and property as those involved in Mobley v. Richfield Oil Corporation, Cal. App., 128 P.2d 105, this day decided. The case referred to was tried on May 21–22, 1941, and taken under submission. Before it was decided and on June 10, 1941, a notice and demand for possession was served by this plaintiff, followed by the filing of this action on June 20, 1941.

The complaint alleged, among other things, that on or about June 1, 1941, Roger White abandoned his sublease from the plaintiff and abandoned the leased premises and that thereafter the defendant Nannie E. Mobley, with her agents and employees, unlawfully entered and took possession of the premises in question and refused to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff on demand therefor. The answer of Mrs. Mobley alleged that on July 11, 1940, she had signed a lease of this property to the plaintiff; that she had been induced to sign this lease by fraudulent representations; that she had brought an action for rescission of said lease, which had been tried and was then under submission; that for these reasons the plaintiff had no right to sublet the premises to Roger White; and that at all times named in the complaint she had been in the sole and exclusive possession of the premises, as sole owner thereof. In a separate answer, it was denied that Roger White had abandoned the leased premises and alleged that on June 1, 1941, the said Roger White was duly inducted into the United States Army, where he still is, and that on May 9, 1941, the said Roger White had executed and delivered to this answering defendant his general power of attorney, and that said defendant has held and now holds said demised premises as agent and attorney-in-fact for said Roger White.

This action was tried on September 8, 1941, after judgment had been entered in the other case, canceling the original lease and decreeing that this plaintiff had no further interest in the property. The court found herein that the defendant Nannie E. Mobley is, and at all times here involved has been, the owner of and entitled to the possession of the premises in question, and that the plaintiff is not and at no time has been entitled to possession of said premises or any part thereof. From a judgment in favor of Mrs. Mobley the plaintiff has appealed.

It is not contended that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. The sole contention here made is that the allegation of the answer, to the effect that Mrs. Mobley is in the sole and exclusive possession of the property in her own right, and the further allegation in a separate answer that she is holding the property under a power of attorney from her son Roger White, together with the testimony of Mrs. Mobley in connection with these allegations, are all so inconsistent that the trial court should not have believed any of her testimony. It clearly appears that the allegations in the answer were intended to set up the invalidity of the lease as a defense to the appellant's cause of action and as an alternative defense in the event it should be held that appellant's lease was valid, that she was holding possession under a power of attorney as agent for her son. We see nothing improper in these inconsistent defenses, under the circumstances, and anything appearing on this appeal is immaterial so long as the judgment in the other action remains in force and effect.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑533(1), 717

Where trial judge's memorandum, prepared subsequent to decision, did not constitute a part of the judgment roll, and appeal was on judgment roll alone, memorandum did not constitute a part of the "record" under the statute and appellate court would not consider findings with the memorandum, but would assume absence of conflict between memorandum and findings, notwithstanding that memorandum was inserted in and certified as part of judgment roll. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Katherine P. Jensen against Jones Miller, Incorporated, Limited, and others, to recover commissions paid defendants upon a sale of real estate. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Cryer & Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry Sutton, of Hollywood, Charles R. Morfoot, of Los Angeles, and George W. Zent, of Hollywood, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an action by a principal against her brokers to recover secret profits and commissions paid upon a sale of real estate. By her complaint plaintiff alleged that on or about June 20, 1939, she and her co-trustee authorized defendants Jones Miller, Inc., Ltd., and Harry Miller, as brokers, to procure a purchaser for certain described real property at a minimum price of $35,000 or such higher price as said defendants might obtain, and orally agreed that in the event that such purchaser was procured through the efforts of the named defendants, the latter would be paid a commission of five per cent of the amount of the agreed selling price. That thereafter, on or about July 15, 1939, defendants just named employed defendant L. L. Hullet to assist them in finding a purchaser for said real property and agreed with said defendant Hullet that in the event he should procure a purchaser he would receive as commission for his services the entire amount of the selling price of the property in excess of $34,125. The complaint further charged that defendants did not at any time report to plaintiff or her co-trustee the employment of said Hullet and that she and her co-trustee had no knowledge of the employment or the terms thereof, and that such employment was wholly without authority from plaintiff or her co-trustee. It was then alleged that on July 24, 1939, defendant Hullet procured one Jennie Grawoig as a purchaser of the property at an agreed price of $36,000 and obtained from said Jennie Grawoig a deposit of $1,000 on the purchase price; that on the same day defendants placed the transaction in escrow. The complaint further charged that defendants did not ever report to plaintiff or her co-trustee the sale to said Jennie Grawoig, but that on the contrary the defendants "deliberately and with intent and purpose to deceive and to defraud plaintiff and her co-trustee, concealed and withheld from said trustees all knowledge and information relative to said sale to said Jennie Grawoig at and for said price of $36,000."

Plaintiff further alleged in her complaint that in furtherance of the alleged plan and scheme to deceive her and her co-trustee and to conceal from them the sale to Jennie Grawoig, the defendants caused one Charles E. Grimes and Wilma Grimes, his wife, to be named as vendors of the property in escrow and caused to be opened another escrow wherein plaintiff and her co-trustees were named as vendors of the property and the Grimes' named as vendees at a sale price of $35,000. Then followed allegations that no report of such proceedings was ever made by defendants to plaintiff or her co-trustee, and that neither they nor the Grimes' had ever been consulted or had any knowledge of said escrow or the use of their names therein. The complaint then charged that on July 28, 1939, without disclosing to plaintiff or her co-trustee any information whatever relative to any pending sale to Jennie Grawoig, defendants "falsely and fraudulently reported to plaintiff and to her co-trustee that they had procured a buyer for the above described property, to wit, one Charles E. Grimes, at a price of $35,000; that said sum of $35,000 was the best price they could obtain for the property, and the best price for which it could be sold under prevailing conditions"; that at the time this last mentioned information was transmitted to plaintiff and her co-trustee the defendants "well knew that said Grimes was not the purchaser of said property, at any price; that he was a mere 'dummy' being used by defendants in furtherance of their scheme to conceal from their principals" (plaintiff and her co-trustee) "all knowledge of the proposed sale of the property to Jennie Grawoig at a price of $36,000, and said defendants well knew that the simulated sale to Grimes * * * was solely for the purpose of placing the title to the property in Grimes to be immediately deeded to Jennie Grawoig."

By her complaint plaintiff further alleged that relying upon the representations of defendants that Charles E. Grimes was the buyer of the property and that the sum of $35,000 was the best price for which the property could be sold, plaintiff and her co-trustee accepted and approved the sale upon the terms and conditions aforesaid and executed their deed to said property in favor of said Grimes. It was further alleged that the intent and purpose of defendants' activities in the use of the two escrows was to enable them to collect and obtain for themselves, and that they did collect and retain, in addition to the regular commission of five per cent, the difference between the amounts of the respective selling prices of the two sales, to wit, the sum of $1,000. In the prayer of her complaint plaintiff asked that defendants be required to account to her for the selling price of the property; that she have judgment against defendants for the sum of $1,750 paid to them as commission and for the sum of $1,000 allegedly taken and retained without authority by defendants out of the "true selling price of the property."

Defendants Jones Miller, Inc., Ltd., and Harry Miller filed an answer denying that they or either of them entered into any plan or scheme of concealment as charged in the complaint, or that the sale to Grimes was a simulated sale, or that they ever made any sale of the property in question to Jennie Grawoig for the price of $36,000 or any other price. These answering defendants also denied participation in any double escrow as alleged in the complaint or any double escrow for the purpose of obtaining a sum greater than the sum of $1,750 which they claimed was due them as a commission pursuant to their agreement with plaintiff and her co-trustee. These defendants specifically denied that they obtained any secret profit or any portion of the sum of $1,000 received in excess of the agreed sale price of $35,000.

The defendant Hullet filed a separate answer in which he denied participation in any scheme or plan for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff and alleged that he acted in good faith and made no concealments, statements or representations to any parties in connection with the transaction other than as was reflected in the escrows through which the transactions were consummated.

[1-3] The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury and resulted in a judgment for the defendants, from which judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal. No reporter's transcript has been filed, and this appeal comes before us on the judgment roll alone. Following trial of the action the judge presiding thereat wrote a "memorandum for judgment" apparently for the purpose of assisting counsel in the preparation of findings and the framing of a judgment. The clerk included this memorandum among the documents contained in the purported judgment roll. We are invited by appellant to consider the findings of the court in the light of the aforesaid memorandum of the trial judge, it being contended that such memorandum becomes a part of the record by reason of the provisions of section 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1919, St.1919, p. 290, and particularly the following language appearing therein:

"* * * If it appear that there is any paper or record in the custody of the clerk of the trial court which was before the trial court but which is not included in the record on appeal, and an examination of such paper or record will assist in a determination of the appeal on its merits, the court in which the appeal is pending may, on motion of either party, or on its own motion, require the production of a certified copy of such paper or record, and the same shall thereupon be deemed a part of the record on appeal."

The provision just quoted has no reference to a document such as the memorandum prepared by the trial judge in the instant case. In the first place, such document was never "before the trial court," nor did it in any manner influence his decision. It was prepared subsequent to the rendition of such decision and simply as an aid to counsel, as heretofore pointed out, in drawing the findings and judgment. There are several other reasons why appellant's contention cannot be sustained. In the first place, the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 670, subd. 2) clearly specifies what documents constitute the judgment roll, and manifestly the memorandum above mentioned is not one of the documents specified in the statute. Nor is any additional standing given to such a document because it is inserted in the judgment roll and certified as a part thereof. Sutcliffe v. Sutcliffe, 220 Cal. 398, 401, 31 P.2d 195. Though in some instances an appellate court may examine such a memorandum for certain purposes, it is well established that a reviewing court will not give consideration to such a memorandum for the purpose of defeating the trial court's judgment. Under a record such as is here presented, we must assume the absence of any conflict between the "memorandum for judgment" and the findings as made and signed by the trial judge; and if there be any such conflict, we must presume that the memorandum was changed to conform to the findings as signed. Wittman v. Wittman, 32 Cal.App.2d 184, 186, 89 P.2d 419. Furthermore, this appeal being before us on the judgment roll alone, we must presume that evidence was introduced which would support the findings as made without any objection on the part of appellant, and that the facts so found were treated by all parties as issues properly before the court at the trial. A different situation might be presented if the entire record were before this court, but not otherwise. First Trust & Savings Bank v. Warden, 18 Cal.App.2d 131, 133, 134, 63 P.2d 329.

[4-6] The main and most important point urged by appellant is that while the findings are adverse to plaintiff as to the issue of actual fraud, in that the court found that the defendants did not conspire together to defraud plaintiff, there are no findings which operate to exonerate defendants of the charge of constructive fraud predicated on the claim that defendant brokers took advantage of a fiduciary relationship to mislead plaintiff to her prejudice. Civ.Code, § 1573. We are not unmindful of the universally recognized rule that where a fiduciary relationship has been established and the acts of an agent are questioned by his principal, the burden is cast upon the agent to prove that he acted with the utmost good faith toward such principal and that he made a full disclosure of all the facts relating to the transaction under attack. Schwarting v. Artel, 40 Cal. App.2d 433, 105 P.2d 380. But in the instant case the court found, and, we must assume, upon sufficient and competent evidence, that defendants Jones Miller, Inc., Ltd., and Harry Miller at no time employed defendant Hullet to aid or assist them in finding a purchaser for or making a sale of plaintiff's property, but on the contrary found that defendant Hullet was at all times acting as "an independent dealer and contractor." Further, the court found that defendant corporation, acting through its secretary, defendant Harry Miller, agreed to sell the property to Hullet or his nominee for a net price of $34,125, "which said net price was arrived at by deducting one-half of a 5 per cent commission of $35,000, or the sum of $875, from said price of $35,000." The court found that there was no conspiracy or plan between defendants to prejudice plaintiff, and a summarization of the court's findings indicates that it was found that plaintiff agreed with defendant corporation and defendant Harry Miller to sell the property for $35,000 and pay them $1,750 as commission—in other words, to sell for a net consideration to her and her co-trustee of $33,250; that defendant Hullet, acting for himself and not in concert with his co-defendants, provided a buyer who would not pay $35,000, but would pay $34,125, and that defendant corporation and Harry Miller waived one-half of their commission, thereby effecting a sale of the property and paying to plaintiff and her co-trustee the amount agreed upon by them as consideration for such sale, viz., the sum of $33,250. True, defendant Hullet had a buyer for the property who would pay $36,000, and Grimes was used as a "dummy"; but the court found that defendant corporation and Harry Miller were not parties to such transaction, had no knowledge thereof, and never profited thereby. Under the court's findings Hullet never was the agent of plaintiff and her co-trustee, while he, as well as defendant corporation and defendant Harry Miller, was absolved of participation in any conspiracy or plan to effectuate a sale of the property under circumstances which would enrich plaintiff's agents beyond the terms of the agreement between such agents and plaintiff principal. It was also found that none of the defendants was guilty of any concealment, misrepresentation, fraud or deception, or of receiving any unauthorized profit in connection with the sale of the property. In short, the findings negative each and every material allegation contained in the complaint. If a specific finding upon an allegation incident to the charge of constructive fraud or deception has been omitted, plaintiff may not complain for further findings, if adopted by the court, upon any of the issues of this case would be bound to be adverse to appellant. Remembering the rule that findings should be construed to uphold rather than to defeat a judgment (Ensele v. Jolley, 188 Cal. 297, 302, 204 P. 1085), it follows, under the circumstances here present, that the failure to adopt more complete findings is not reversible error. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 572, 217 P. 750.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought this action to quiet her title to four lots, alleged to be her separate property, against defendant as the trustee in bankruptcy of plaintiff's husband. Defendant filed a cross-complaint in which he alleged that a deed of these lots, made to plaintiff by her husband, was fraudulent and void as against creditors of the husband, and sought to have his title as trustee quieted against plaintiff and her husband. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff on both complaint and cross-complaint, from which defendant appeals.

[1] Plaintiff and her husband were married more than forty years before the trial, lived in Nebraska from 1903 to 1921, and have lived in California since 1921. While they lived in Nebraska the plaintiff acquired some real property which she and her husband testified was her separate property, although the title stood of record in her husband's name. This property was sold for $3,100 at or before the purchase of any of the property now in question. The plaintiff's husband also gave her, back in Nebraska, the profit, amounting to $2,800, on the sale which she negotiated of some property belonging to him. She also worked at dressmaking and other things, under an agreement with her husband that what she made should be her own property. Altogether she had more than $7,000. Defendant criticizes the testimony by which these facts are shown and asks us to reject it, as far as it goes to establish plaintiff's ownership of funds which were her separate property. But, while this testimony contains some inconsistencies and discrepancies, these presented only a question for the trial court, whose acceptance of the testimony is conclusive here.

In 1919 plaintiff's husband came to Los Angeles on a visit, apparently preliminary to their move out here, and saw some property which he liked, being two of the lots here in question, on which was a house. On his return to Nebraska he told plaintiff of it; he sent some of her money out here to hold the deal, with her consent, and later the property was conveyed to him, the entire purchase price being paid from plaintiff's separate funds, above described. A year or two later plaintiff bought three more lots, taking the title in her husband's name and mortgaging those first bought for enough money to make the down payment. Then she sold one of these three lots for enough to pay the price of all three, leaving all the lots clear of encumbrance.

[2] It is plaintiff's contention that, although the title to all the lots above named was taken in her husband's name, yet, since she paid the entire price, a trust resulted in her favor and he held the property merely as her trustee. It is further contended that, assuming the existence of this trust, the conveyance which he made to her was merely in execution of this trust and for that reason it was valid as against this defendant and the creditors whom he represents. As defendant tacitly concedes, where one who holds property as trustee for another under a resulting trust conveys to that other the property so held, neither the creditors nor the trustee in bankruptcy of such grantor can attack the conveyance. Nishi v. Downing, 1937, 21 Cal.App.2d 1, 3, 67 P.2d 1057; Zeller v. Knapp, 1933, 135 Cal.App. 122, 128, 26 P.2d 704; Bank of Cottonwood v. Henriques, 1928, 91 Cal. App. 88, 95, 266 P. 836; Murphy v. Clayton, 1896, 113 Cal. 153, 159, 45 P. 267.

Defendant denies, however, that there was such a trust as plaintiff claims. Section 853 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "When a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made." In line with this presumption it has been held: "Where a husband purchases property with money which is part of the separate estate of his wife and takes title in his own name, equity regards the purchase as made in trust for the wife. From such facts alone there is no presumption of a gift from the wife which would change the status of the property to that of the community, the presumption being that it continues to be the separate property of the wife held in trust for her by her husband." Zeller v. Knapp, supra, 135 Cal. App. 126, 127, 26 P.2d 706. To the same effect, see Title Insurance and Trust Company v. Ingersoll, 1908, 153 Cal. 1, 5, 94 P. 94; Title Insurance and Trust Company v. Ingersoll, 1910, 158 Cal. 474, 481, 111 P. 360; Shaw v. Bernal, 1912, 163 Cal. 262, 271, 124 P. 1012; Harris v. Hensley, 1927, 83 Cal.App. 283, 288, 256 P. 832.

[3, 4] The presumption declared by section 853 is rebuttable, the question finally being as to the intention of the parties at the time. Lezinsky v. Mason Malt W. D. Co., 1921, 185 Cal. 240, 251, 196 P. 884; Code Civ.Proc. sec. 1961. In addition to the facts above stated, the record contains the following testimony regarding the understanding between plaintiff and her husband for the purchase of the first two lots. The plaintiff testified:

> "Well, I told him to take the title in his name. He knew the people that were to buy the place, I didn't, and I was sent out here by the doctor expecting to live not longer than six years, and said, 'Take the title in your name, and if anything happens to me, you won't have to go through a lot of court procedure; and if I get well, you can give them back to me if I ever want them.'"
> "Q. What was the understanding with reference to how Mr. Owings should hold the title to that, in trust for you, or otherwise? A. Why, just in trust for me; if I ever wanted it, he would give it back to me, if I ever got well."

On the same subject plaintiff's husband testified:

"Q. What, if anything, was said between you and she regarding the taking of the legal title to that property at the time the purchase was made and payments were made?"

"Q. By Mr. Kleber: Tell the court what the agreement was between you and the other party as to how this title was to be taken. A. She suggested the title to be out in my name on account of her own health and the health of the daughter; we had the best doctors that you have here and in Nebraska at that time, we had a very good name there, I believe—

"Q. Never mind that. What was done? A. She had the title put into my name.

"Q. Did you make any agreement with her about transferring to her if she asked for a transfer? A. Yes, that was specifically stated, that at any time if she wanted it transferred into her own name, I should do it, I would do it."

Regarding the second purchase of three lots the testimony is:

By plaintiff, "A. I borrowed this money, made the down payment, and told Mr. Campbell to put it in my husband's name, to put it in trust for me."

"Q. What did you say was your agreement with your husband when these Lots 71, 72 and 73 were bought, as to taking the title in your name? Was there any agreement?"

"Q. By Mr. Kleber: Did you have any agreement? A. Yes, I told him when I bought them I was going to take them in his name, just the same as 104 and 105 were."

Defendant concedes that under the circumstances of this case the ownership of the second group of lots is the same as that of the first group. In some respects the testimony quoted seems inconsistent with the presumption above stated, but we cannot say it is so wholly irreconcilable with the presumption that the latter is dispelled, or overcome as a matter of law. The trial court undoubtedly considered this testimony and weighed it against the presumption; its conclusion that the presumption was not overcome was one of fact, which is binding upon us.

[5, 6] The trust here was properly proved by parol evidence. Even though it be regarded as an express trust, orally agreed upon, and in this respect running counter to the provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code requiring a writing for that purpose, plaintiff's husband, who might have objected to its validity on that ground, has, instead, carried it out. The defendant is not, thereafter, in position to assert its invalidity on that ground. Polk v. Boggs, 1898, 122 Cal. 114, 116, 54 P. 536; Nishi v. Downing, supra, 1937, 21 Cal.App. 2d 1, 3, 67 P.2d 1057. Indeed, oral testimony to show a trust other than that resulting by operation of law has been held improper. Root v. Kuhn, 1921, 51 Cal.App. 600, 603, 197 P. 150.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA CASUALTY INDEMNITY EXCHANGE v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 12130.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

July 25, 1942.

1. Workmen's compensation 🔑1487, 1753

Findings that a particular employee sustained injury arising out of employment and in the course of employment are sufficient, but, when sufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings is raised, the inquiry is whether the evidence is sufficient to fulfill all conditions of the act. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600.

2. Workmen's compensation 🔑609

In determining whether employee's injury is compensable as "proximately caused by the employment", the place of the injury is not the sole test, and there must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than mere fact that employment brought the employee to the place of injury. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proximately Caused by the Employment".

3. Workmen's compensation ⚷609

Under Workmen's Compensation Act providing for compensation for injuries to claimant "arising out of and in the course of his employment", where injury is "proximately caused" by employment, it must be shown that the injury was the natural or probable result of the employment or of the conditions thereof. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Arising Out of and in the Course of Employment".

4. Workmen's compensation ⚷609

In order for injury to be compensable as being "proximately caused by the employment", there must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that by reason of the employment there was an unusual or additional exposure of the employee to the kind or character of hazard and danger which caused the injury. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600.

5. Workmen's compensation ⚷667

Where office employee, who had left employer's premises to engage in personal errand, caught her heel in her skirt after she was about to alight from her automobile after returning to the employer's premises to finish her work, and sustained injury when she fell from the automobile to employer's private driveway, the employee's injury was not one "arising out of the employment" and was not "proximately caused by the employment", and was therefore not compensable. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by the California Casualty Indemnity Exchange, insurance carrier, against the Industrial Accident Commission and Cecelia E. Cooper, employee, to annul the workmen's compensation award made by the commission in favor of the employee.

Award annulled.

Burbank & Laumeister, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corton and Dan Murphy, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

Petitioner, as the compensation insurance carrier of Lathan Company, seeks the annulment of an award made by the respondent commission in favor of Cecelia Cooper, an employee of said Lathan Company.

The facts are undisputed. Said employee had worked for her employer as a bookkeeper many years. Her duties were performed entirely within the building of her employer. Said building was set back from the street on a corner lot and a private driveway of the employer ran in a semicircular fashion from one street to the other and in front of the entrance to said building. Said employee's normal working hours were from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. She had the implied consent of her employer however to go upon short personal errands if she desired to do so.

On the day of the accident said employee drove her car to work in accordance with her usual custom. Said car belonged to her and was not used in any way for the purpose of her employer's business. On said day she desired to have said car greased while she was at work and she telephoned to a service station and requested such service. Said automobile was picked up and was taken to the service station for that purpose at 8:30 a.m. At about 4 p.m. she noticed that the car had not been returned. She telephoned the service station and, as the attendant was alone at that place, it was agreed that he would deliver the car to her and that she would drive him back to the service station. This was done and said employee then drove her car back and parked it on the private driveway on her employer's premises. As she was about to alight from her car and return to her employer's building to finish her work for the day she caught her heel in the hem of her dress and fell from the car to said private driveway and broke her wrist.

Upon the foregoing undisputed facts the respondent commission found that "Cecelia Cooper, while employed as a bookkeeper on October 27, 1941, at South San Francisco, by Lathan Company, Inc., sustained injury arising out of and in the course of her employment when she fell and broke her left wrist. * * *" The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain said findings and the award based thereon is the question presented in this proceeding to review said award.

Section 3600 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 269, provides: "Liability for compensation * * * shall * * * exist against an employer for any injury sustained by his employees arising out of and in the course of the employment * * * in those cases where the following conditions of compensation concur: * * * (b) Where, at the time of the injury, the employee is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and is acting within the course of his employment. (c) Where, the injury is proximately caused by the employment * * *."

[1] It has apparently been the practice of the respondent commission to confine its findings under said section to findings with respect to whether the particular employee sustained injury (1) "arising out of" his employment and (2) "in the course of" his employment. In other words, no specific findings are ordinarily made following the wording of all the specified concurrent conditions found in subsections (b) and (c) of the section above quoted. We believe, however, that the concurrent conditions mentioned in said subsections are merely definitive of the preceding terms "arising out of" and "in the course of" the employment, and that findings in the ordinary form above mentioned are sufficient. When the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings is raised, however, the inquiry then is whether the evidence is sufficient to fulfill all of said conditions.

Petitioner herein contends that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings, express or implied, with respect to any of the above mentioned conditions specified in said section 3600 of the Labor Code. We need not discuss the evidence in its relation to all of these conditions as we believe it is clear under the authorities that the material finding herein that said employee's injury was one "arising out of" her employment finds no support whatever in the evidence and that the award must therefore be annulled.

The respondent commission takes the position that "since the evidence in this case shows that the employee was injured on the employer's premises to which she had returned for the purpose of finishing her work, she is entitled to compensation." In other words, respondent commission thereby necessarily takes the position that the place of the injury is the sole test under the circumstances without regard to the cause of the injury. This position is obviously untenable as it totally ignores the express conditions of the section that the injury must be one "arising out of" the employment and must be one "proximately caused" by the employment.

We believe that the position so taken is the result of a misconception by the respondent commission of the effect of certain decisions which have sustained awards to injured employees where the employees had been injured on the employer's premises, or in close proximity thereto, while going to or coming from their actual work. The general rule commonly known as the going and coming rule, which ordinarily denies compensation to employees for injuries sustained while going to and coming from their actual work, has certain well recognized exceptions, and one of these so-called exceptions is illustrated by the decisions upon which the respondent commission relies. But none of these decisions has ignored the cause of the injury or made the place of the injury the sole test.

[2, 3] That the place of injury cannot be made the sole test under said section is well illustrated in the case of Storm v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 4, 214 P. 874. The court there said, on page 6 of 191 Cal., on page 875 of 214 P.: "An injury, in order to be compensable under the terms of the Compensation Act (St.1917, p. 831), must have been sustained by the employee 'arising out of and in the course of the employment,' and must have been 'proximately caused by the employment.'" It was conceded there that the injury had been sustained on the employer's premises and "in the course of" the employment but the award was annulled upon the ground that it was not one "arising out of" the employment and was not one "proximately caused by the employment." On page 7 of 191 Cal., on page 875 of 214 P., the court said: "To render an injury compensable there must be discernible some relationship of cause and effect between the employment and the injury. 'It is not sufficient for a workman to say, "I should not have been injured unless I had been where I was and doing the work which I was employed to do."' Cooper v. Northeastern Ry. Co., 9 B.W.C.C. 129. It must be shown, in addition, that the injury was a natural or probable result of the employment, or of the conditions thereof. Such would seem to be the meaning of the requirement that it must have been 'proximately caused by the employment.' This case would have been no different, on principle, if the employee had been injured by a stray bullet coming from the scene of an attempted hold-up, several blocks away. Under those circumstances it would scarcely be claimed that the injury was proximately caused by the employment."

[4] The necessity of the existence of a causal connection between the employment and the injury is further illustrated by decisions in Larson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 406, 224 P. 744; California C. I. Exch. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257; and Lumbermen's M. C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 134 Cal.App. 131, 25 P.2d 22. In the last mentioned case, the court said at page 134 of 134 Cal.App., at page 23 of 25 P.2d, "There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that, by reason of the employment, there was an unusual or additional exposure of the injured party to the kind or character of hazard and danger * * * which caused the injury. The injury must have its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and must have flowed from that source as a rational and natural course."

In treating the subject of "Parking Cars on Employer's Premises," Campbell in his work on "Workmen's Compensation," Vol. 1, p. 198, cites certain cases from other jurisdictions in support of the rule in those jurisdictions but states, "A contrary and possibly better rule requires the premises in some way to cause the injury." He cites in support of the "better rule," Herrera v. Hartford Acc., etc., Co., 17 I. A. C. 28 and Industrial Comm. v. Enyeart, 81 Colo. 521, 256 P. 314. In both of said cases the employees were injured while on the employers' premises but the cause of the injuries in each case was a defect in the employee's automobile which the employee was driving at the time. In the Herrera case, the respondent commission held that "* * * although at the time of the injury applicant was within the actual confines of the employer's premises, the injury did not arise out of the employment since the injury was the result solely of a defective instrumentality brought to the employer's premises by the applicant herself for her own purposes, in no way related to the employment."

The respondent commission cites and relies upon the holdings or language used in the following decisions: Bountiful Brick Co. v. Giles, 276 U.S. 154, 48 S.Ct. 221, 72 L.Ed. 507, 66 A.L.R. 1402; Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 300, 184 P. 1; Globe Ind. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661; Makins v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 198 Cal. 698, 247 P. 202, 49 A.L.R. 411; Starr Piano Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 433, 184 P. 860; and Pacific Elec. Ry. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 137 Cal.App. 245, 30 P.2d 444. To these may be added Freire v. Matson Navigation Co., 19 Cal.2d 8, 118 P.2d 809. These cases illustrate the principle that an injury may be compensable even though the employee may not be actually at work with his tools at the time the injury is sustained. They further support the proposition that an employee may be said to be "in the course of the employment" under certain circumstances when he is going to or coming from his work and is at a point either on the employer's premises or in such close proximity thereto that the place of injury should be treated in the same manner as though it were a part of the employer's premises. But none of said cases involves the question before us here. In all of said cases, it was assumed or held that if the employee could be said to be "in the course of his employment," then the cause of the injury was one "arising out of" the employment and the injury was "proximately caused by the employment." Such causes were generally causes having to do with the condition of the premises or the condition of the traffic thereon. The dangers and risks involved were risks "connected with the employment," and the injuries "flowed from that source as rational and natural cause." In other words there was "some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that, by reason of the employment, there was an unusual or additional exposure of the injured party to the kind and character of hazard and danger * * * which caused the injury."

[5] The authorities cited by the respondent commission do not sustain their position here. While the employee was admittedly injured on the employer's premises, the accident occurred at a time when she was not actually performing her duties but at a time when she was returning from a purely personal errand to resume the performance of said duties. She was in her own automobile and the cause of the injury was the catching of her heel in the hem of her skirt while she was still in said automobile. Said injury was in the same category as an injury resulting from a defective automobile brought upon an employer's premises for the employee's own purposes. In such cases there is no causal connection between the employment and the injury under the authorities above cited. We therefore conclude that the employee's injury here was not one "arising out of the employment" nor was it one "proximately caused by the employment." Such injury was therefore not compensable.

The award is annulled.

CAMPBELL v. BIRCH et al.

Civ. 2626.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 14, 1942.

1. Corporations 🔑1

A corporation's acts and obligations cannot be legally recognized as those of particular person or vice versa, unless it appears that corporation was not only influenced and governed by such person, but that there is such unity of interest and ownership between them that their individuality or separateness has ceased, and that adherence to fiction of corporation's separate existence would sanction fraud or promote injustice.

2. Corporations 🔑1

Tenants' transfer of all or practically all of their property to corporations in exchange for all stock thereof held not to show that corporations were tenants' alter ego and authorize direct levy of execution on property to satisfy judgments against tenants for unpaid rents, though they subsequently assigned stock to certain persons as security for debts, especially in view of corporations' large indebtedness to others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dudley S. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Roy Campbell, as trustee, against A. Otis Birch and wife for a declaratory judgment holding assets transferred by defendants to corporations in exchange for all stock thereof subject to levy of execution on plaintiff's judgments against defendants for unpaid rents. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Syril S. Tipton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George Edward Acret, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Chas. L. Nichols, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for declaratory relief. It is another of the actions which arose out of a breach of the covenants of a ninety-nine-year lease and the formation of certain corporations as described in the case of Campbell v. Birch, 19 Cal.2d 778, 122 P.2d 902. In that case, a claim for damages on the ground that a modification of the terms of the lease had been secured through fraudulent representations that the stock of the corporations had been pledged to a Miss Minter as security for a large existing indebtedness was upheld. In the instant case, it was sought, without alleging fraud and without seeking to set aside any transfers, to have it held that the assets which had been transferred to the corporations in exchange for all of the stock thereof, as distinguished from the corporate stock itself, were subject to the levy of an execution on judgments obtained by the plaintiff for unpaid rentals under the ninety-nine-year lease. The plaintiff's theory seems to have been that upon pleading and proving that all or nearly all of the property owned by Mr. and Mrs. Birch had been transferred to the corporations and that all of the stock of the corporations is owned by them he was entitled to a judgment declaring that an execution on his judgment might be levied directly upon the assets held by the corporations.

The complaint alleges a failure to pay the rent under the lease after April 1, 1937, and the recovery of judgments amounting to $14,321.42 against A. Otis Birch and M. Estelle C. Birch; that Mr. and Mrs. Birch owned 100 per cent of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, a corporation.

which in turn owned 100 per cent of the stock of Birch Ranch and Oil Company and of the Birch Securities Company; that Birch Ranch & Oil Company owns an 87½ per cent copartnership interest in Birch-Royer Oil Company, a copartnership, and also owns about 71 per cent of the copartnership interest of Birch Oil Company, another copartnership; that A. Otis Birch operates, governs and has complete charge of the operations of all of the corporations and copartnerships above mentioned; that prior to October 15, 1934, Mr. and Mrs. Birch owned all of the properties now owned by the above named Birch corporations; that the Birch Holding Company, Birch Ranch & Oil Company and Birch Securities Company were organized for the express purpose of owning and operating the properties of Mr. and Mrs. Birch; and that these three corporations, the Birch Oil Company and the Birch-Royer Oil Company are the double or alter ego of Mr. and Mrs. Birch. A second cause of action sets up a claim for attorney's fees. The prayer is that the three corporations and the two copartnerships be declared to be the alter ego of the Birches, that all properties and assets of the three corporations and the two copartnerships be declared to be the property and assets of Mr. and Mrs Birch, and that said property be subject to levy in satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgments, and for attorney's fees as against Mr. and Mrs. Birch.

This case was tried while the abovementioned case of Campbell v. Birch was pending on appeal. Very little evidence was received, aside from the introduction of certain exhibits, and about thirty pages of the typewritten transcript cover all of the testimony. The court found, among other things, that the defendant A. Otis Birch has had, and now has, no authority in connection with the operation or control of the defendant corporations other than as a manager subject to the control of the directors of each of said corporations; that following the sale of the stock of these corporations to Stanley C. Benson in 1935 the said Benson named the directors of the corporation and for a period of about 2½ years "said defendants were not shown by the evidence to have any authority at all"; that each of said corporations and copartnerships are engaged in separate businesses and each has different creditors separate and apart from the credit and liability of the Birches and separate and apart from each other; that the total amount of such indebtedness of said corporations and copartnerships is at least $800,000; that at the time of the organization of the three corporations Mr. and Mrs. Birch transferred to said corporations various portions of their property, not including certain real property of the value of $200,000; that subsequently the Birches lost this real property by foreclosure but a portion thereof was acquired by Hollymont Corporation and later acquired by the Birch Ranch & Oil Company as a part of the consideration when Birch repurchased from Benson the stock of the Birch Holding Company in November, 1937; that in 1935, the Birches transferred and assigned to Benson all of the stock of the Birch Holding Company, subject to a pledge thereof to secure an indebtedness of $155,000 to Lulu M. Minter and further subject to a pledge of said stock to Anna M. Conaway securing an indebtedness of $76,000; that subsequently the Birches reacquired from Benson all of the said stock of the Birch Holding Company subject to the indebtedness to Minter and Conaway, all of which continues to exist; that none of the said corporations or copartnerships is the alter ego of the other defendants or copartnerships or of the Birches, or either of them; that the defendant corporations and copartnerships have never had any dealings with the plaintiff or with the property involved in the ninety-nine-year lease; and that at the time these corporations and copartnerships were formed the Birches were not in default in the payment of rentals under the lease and no such default was contemplated. As conclusions of law, the court found that these corporations and copartnerships are not the alter ego of the Birches and that none of the property or assets of the corporations or copartnerships is subject to levy of execution by the plaintiff. A judgment to the same effect was entered and the plaintiff has appealed.

No question is here involved as to who was originally liable on the ninety-nine-year lease or who is liable now. No attempt has been made to assign that lease either with reference to the liability for rent or as to the possession of the leased property. The corporations and copartnerships, as such, have had nothing to do with the lease or the leased property. No attempt was here made to set aside any transfers as having been fraudulently made. The appellant contends that an allegation of fraud is to be implied from the allegation that these companies were the alter ego of the Birches. This is not necessarily true insofar as the matter is here presented, and no specific amendment was offered during the trial although appellant's attention was called to the deficiency in the complaint. The appellant's contention that he was unduly restricted in the introduction of evidence is without merit and the record shows that no real attempt was made to enlarge or change the issues during the trial and there was no offer of proof in support of any such theory. It was stipulated, and the court found, that there was no past due indebtedness in connection with the ninety-nine-year lease at the time the corporations were formed. There is evidence, and the court found, that these corporations owed more than $800,000 to other creditors for which the Birches were not directly liable and there is no contention that these were not legitimate debts. The appellant argues in his briefs that all of this indebtedness is secured, but there is no evidence to that effect in the record. While the court found that there was an existing indebtedness of the Birches in favor of Lulu M. Minter, the Supreme Court has held otherwise in Campbell v. Birch, supra. While the court found that there was an existing indebtedness to Anna M. Conaway, secured by a pledge of the stock of these corporations, we can find no evidence of this other than a statement of such a situation at that time contained in the 1935 agreement between Birch and Benson, which agreement was introduced in evidence. Disregarding immaterial matters, the controlling question here is whether, in an action of this nature, evidence to the effect that all or practically all of the property of the Birches was transferred to these corporations in exchange for all of the stock thereof compels the conclusion that these corporations were the alter ego of these individuals within the meaning of that doctrine, with the further effect that the property so transferred to the corporations may be directly levied upon by the appellant as the property of the individuals and in disregard of the corporate entities and debts.

[1] There is no question that a separate corporate entity may be disregarded in a proper case and upon sufficient pleading and proof. The general principles governing such a situation are thus stated in Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673, 676: "Before the acts and obligations of a corporation can be legally recognized as those of a particular person, and vice versa, the following combination of circumstances must be made to appear: First, that the corporation is not only influenced and governed by that person, but that there is such a unity of interest and ownership that the individuality, or separateness, of the said person and corporation has ceased; second, that the facts are such that an adherence to the fiction of the separate existence of the corporation would, under the particular circumstances, sanction a fraud or promote injustice." The doctrine has usually been applied for the purpose of imposing liability under a contract upon a person or corporation on account of an obligation ostensibly made by the one but which, in equity, should also bind the other. Examples are to be found in the cases of Shea v. Leonis, 14 Cal.2d 666, 96 P.2d 332, and Marr v. Postal Union Life Ins. Co., 40 Cal.App.2d 673, 105 P.2d 649. It may be assumed that the doctrine of alter ego could be applied in a proper case where all of the person's property is transferred to a corporation organized for the purpose of receiving the property in order to prevent the collection of a judgment obtained against the transferor. The appellant cites Sunset Farms, Inc., v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.App.2d 389, 50 P.2d 106, as being such a case. While the theory of alter ego was there applied, it appeared that the assets in question were transferred to the corporation without any consideration therefor. This circumstance justified equitable relief under the established rule pointed out in Minifie v. Rowley, supra.

[2] In the instant case, there was no attempt to get rid of the assets by transferring them without consideration to another entity. The assets in question were transferred to the corporations in exchange for all of their stock which was still held by the Birches, who still owned and held property of the same value as they had before. Of itself, this change in the form of the assets neither affected the obligation of the lease nor the enforcement thereof and there is nothing in that, standing alone, which would in any way make it inequitable to recognize the separate entities of the corporations or sanction a fraud or promote injustice. The assets, although changed in form, were still in the hands of the same individuals and still subject to levy on execution.

If as now claimed in the briefs but not alleged in the complaint, this corporate stock was improperly assigned as security to Miss Minter that matter would present another question as to the right of the Birches to prefer that creditor, but is immaterial upon the question as to whether the identity of the corporations should be ignored as presented in this action. Moreover, the assignment to Miss Minter was held invalid in Campbell v. Birch, supra. It is further argued that this stock was also assigned as security to Mrs. Conaway. Assuming this to be true, it furnishes no reason for ignoring the corporate entities in the absence of proper pleading and proof.

A further consideration is the matter of the large obligations incurred by these corporations and the rights of its other creditors. While the appellant had a right to levy upon the Birches' interests as stockholders in the corporations and sell the same at execution, it is a far different matter to say that he has the right, under such a showing as was here made, to take the assets of these corporations away from their creditors on the theory that the separate entity of the corporations should be ignored. In Nighbert v. First Nat. Bk. of Bakersfield, 26 Cal.App.2d 624, 79 P.2d 1105, 1110, this court said: "The doctrine has been employed * * * in order to permit the plaintiff to recover against the party actually responsible, but it * * * should not be applied where its effect would be to permit a stockholder to seize assets properly belonging to a corporation and thereby deprive other stockholders and creditors of something properly belonging to the corporation and in which they were entitled to share." Similar considerations are applicable here.

The Birches, at least after the cancellation of the Benson agreement in 1937, owned and possessed property of exactly the same value as that possessed by them before the organization of the corporations. Assuming that complete unity of interest and ownership appears as between the Birches and the corporations, the second requisite of the rule in question is lacking. Not only does it not appear that a continued recognition of the separate existence of the corporations would sanction a fraud or promote injustice, but it more probably appears that to ignore the separate entity of the corporations would work an injustice as to the creditors of the corporations. So far as disclosed by the record before us, the appellant has his remedy by proceeding against the property admittedly owned by the Birches, their corporate stock, and no reason appears for thus preferring the appellant over the creditors of the corporations.

As we view the record before us, it would have supported no other conclusion and judgment than that drawn and entered by the trial court. The appellant now complains because at the hearing of his motion for a new trial the trial court refused to allow him to reopen the case for further evidence and refused to allow him to file an amended complaint which was then proffered. The case had previously been reopened for further evidence, no substantial reason for a still further delay was given, the offered complaint was still not sufficient and no abuse of discretion appears.

The judgment is affirmed.

POWELL v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N. et al.

Civ. 6733.

District Court of Appeal, Third District.
California.

July 18, 1942.

Hearing Denied Sept. 14, 1942.

1. Banks and banking 🔑169

Where warehouse receipts for grain were delivered by lienholder to bank with directions to collect and remit certain amount to lienholder and balance to grain owner, but bank applied balance on an outlawed judgment held by it against grain owner, assignee of grain owner was entitled to recover from bank on theory of conversion where grain owner was neither a customer nor depositor of the bank and the instruction for "collection and remittance" did not create relationship of debtor and creditor between bank and grain owner. Civ.Code, § 3054.

2. Banks and banking 🔑169

Where warehouse receipts for grain were delivered by lienholder to a bank for "collection and remittance" to lienholder and to grain owner, bank did not acquire a lien under the statute on the proceeds due grain owner where owner was neither a customer nor a depositor of the bank and funds were not held in the relationship of debtor and creditor but only as "trustee" or "agent" for the fulfillment of instructions. Civ.Code, § 3054.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent" and "Trustee".

3. Banks and banking 🔑156

Where a bank receives commercial paper for "collection" merely, the proceeds become property of the collecting bank and the relationship of debtor and creditor arises between it and the owner but where such paper is received for "collection and remittance", the relationship of principal and agent is created and the bank becomes an agent until paper is collected and then becomes a trustee of the proceeds.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Collection" and "Collection and Remittance".

4. Banks and banking 🔑169

Where warehouse receipts for grain were delivered by lienholder to the bank with instructions to sell the grain and after paying a specified sum to lienholder to "remit direct to L. M. Miller" balance of proceeds, the bank custom of crediting an account and creating relationship of debtor and creditor had no application, since the instruction made the bank an "agent" for collection and a "trustee" of the proceeds.

5. Banks and banking 🔑175

Where warehouse receipts for grain were delivered by lienholder to a bank with instructions to collect and remit amount due to lienholder and balance to grain owner, but bank applied balance on its outlawed judgment against grain owner, latter's action against bank and lienholder for conversion of money was properly dismissed as to lienholder since latter was not a party to bank's misappropriation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. G. Bruton, Judge.

Suit by Robert Powell against Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association and another for conversion of money. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part with directions.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for appellant.

G. D. Schilling, D. Bianco, Louis Ferrari, and C. H. White, all of San Francisco, Rich, Weis & Carlin, of Marysville, and Hugh L. Preston, of Ukiah, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff, Robert Powell, has appealed from a judgment which was rendered against him in a suit for conversion of money. The lienholder of certain warehouse receipts for a quantity of grain delivered them to the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association, at Woodland, with written instructions to sell the grain to designated dealers for a specified sum of money, and to pay said lienholder from the proceeds of sale the sum of $240.09, and to remit the balance directly to the owner, L. M. Miller. The bank sold the grain and paid the lienholder said sum of $240.09, as directed, but refused to remit to the owner any portion of the balance of the proceeds of sale. On the contrary, the bank retained and applied the balance of said money toward the satisfaction of a judgment, upon which the statute of limitations had expired, which the bank held against L. M. Miller and others. It does not appear that L. M. Miller was, at any time, a customer or a depositor in that bank. After the application of that fund to the satisfaction of the judgment, and the refusal of the bank to pay the same to L. M. Miller, he assigned and transferred his claim therefor to J. M. Miller and Robert Powell. This suit for conversion of the funds was then commenced.

On account of the death of one of the plaintiffs, J. M. Miller, which occurred before the judgment was rendered, the defendant bank moved this court to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the cause abated as to the interest of J. M. Miller, upon his death, for failure to substitute in his place another party plaintiff. Thereupon, the plaintiff Powell, who in the meantime had acquired from the estate of Mr. Miller his undivided interest in that chose of action, moved this court to substitute himself to also represent that interest in the suit. Those motions were presented to this court separately from the appeal on its merits. Both motions were determined adversely to the bank, in an opinion which was recently filed (Miller v. Bank of America, etc., 52 Cal. App.2d 512, 126 P.2d 444), to which reference is made for a more particular statement of facts in that regard.

From the record we have gleaned the following facts: Mr. L. M. Miller was the owner of 1,667 sacks of barley which he deposited in a warehouse in Yolo county, for which he held warehouse receipts, subject to a lien to secure the payment of $240.09 owing to Chico Production Credit Association. By agreement between L. M. Miller and the Chico association, these warehouse receipts were delivered to the Bank of America at Woodland on August 14, 1936, with written directions to sell the barley to Gill & Gill, grain dealers, for the sum of $2,186.89, to pay the lienholder, Chico Production Credit Association, the sum of $240.09, and to remit direct to L. M. Miller the balance of the purchase price. The written directions contained the following language:

"You are authorized and requested to deliver these warehouse receipts to Gill and Gill, grain dealers, when you have collected for our account the amount of $2,186.89. From this amount you are to remit to this association the sum of $240.09, plus interest at the rate of 3¢ per day from August 17 to the date of our receipt of payment.

"The balance of the proceeds are to be remitted direct to L. M. Miller, Knights Landing, California. The above collection is to be net to this association."

At the time when these warehouse receipts were sent to the bank for sale of the grain and collection and remittance of the proceeds pursuant to the foregoing written directions, the bank was the owner and holder of a judgment which was rendered against L. M. Miller and others, April 5, 1928, for the sum of $3,569.17, no part of which was paid. The judgment had never been renewed, and the statute of limitations (§ 336, Code Civ.Proc.) had run against it. Neither L. M. Miller nor the Chico association was a customer or depositor in the bank.

On August 18, 1936, the bank sold the grain for $2,186.89, from which sum it paid the Chico association the full amount of its lien of $240.09, leaving in the possession of the bank a balance of $1,946.74, which, without the knowledge or consent of the owners thereof, the bank applied toward the payment of its outlawed judgment of $3,569.17. L. M. Miller promptly demanded of the bank payment to him of said sum of $1,946.74, which was refused. August 29, 1936, for value received, L. M. Miller sold and assigned that claim jointly to the original plaintiffs in this action, J. M. Miller and Robert Powell. This suit for conversion of the funds was commenced against the bank and Chico association, on April 21, 1937. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. At the close of the evidence a nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Chico association. Findings were adopted favorable to the defendant bank. Judgment was accordingly rendered to the effect that plaintiffs take nothing by this action. From that judgment this appeal was perfected.

The chief issue to be determined on this appeal is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association was authorized under section 3054 of the Civil Code, or otherwise, to appropriate the proceeds remaining in its possession which were derived from the sale of the grain belonging to L. M. Miller, and apply it toward the satisfaction of the judgment which it held against L. M. Miller and others, upon which the statute of limitations had expired.

[1] We are of the opinion the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence for the reason that the owner of that fund was neither a customer nor a depositor in the bank which acquired the money pursuant to specific instructions to remit the balance direct to L. M. Miller. Under no reasonable construction of the written instructions may it be said that the bank was authorized to deposit the money in the bank to the credit of L. M. Miller, or to create the relationship of debtor and creditor between them. That being true, it becomes immaterial that the statute of limitations had expired against the judgment held by the bank.

[2] From the written instructions which were given to the bank by the Chico Production Credit Association, it is clear that the bank was not authorized to deposit any portion of the proceeds of sale of the grain, either to the credit of the association or to the credit of the owner of the grain, L. M. Miller. On the contrary, the bank was clearly instructed to pay to the lienholder, association, the sum of $240.09, and to remit the balance of the proceeds direct to L. M. Miller. Not only did the bank violate its clear instructions, but it arbitrarily applied the balance of the proceeds, in the sum of $1,946.74, towards the satisfaction of an outlawed judgment which it held against L. M. Miller and others. It does not even appear that either Miller or the association was a customer or depositor in the bank. This conduct on the part of the bank amounted to a wrongful conversion of the balance of the funds contrary to the trust established by the written instructions. The bank held no lien upon the funds, pursuant to section 3054 of the Civil Code, under the circumstances of this case. Miller was not a customer of the bank, and the funds were not held in the relationship of debtor and creditor, but only as trustee or agent for the fulfillment of its written instructions.

[3] The principle applicable to the right of a bank to offset a debt due to the bank by the application of proceeds derived from sales of property or the collection of paper pursuant to specific instructions to remit the same to the owner thereof, is aptly stated in 8 Zollmann on Banks and Banking, Perm.Ed. § 5621, page 402, as follows: "The receipt by a bank of paper for collection and such receipt for collection and remittance are thus on entirely different planes. Where the receipt is for collection merely, in view of the general custom of collecting banks to mingle the proceeds of collections, such proceeds become the property of the collecting bank, and the relationship of debtor and creditor arises between it and the owner. On the other hand, a commercial paper sent to a bank for 'collection and remittance' clearly creates the relationship of principal and agent, not that of creditor and debtor. The collecting bank becomes an agent until the check is collected, and then becomes a trustee of the proceeds, and can avoid such relationship and create that of debtor and creditor only by consent." (Italics added.)

The preceding text is supported by numerous authorities, many of which are cited by the appellant. While there is apparently some conflict of authorities regarding the question as to whether a deposit of paper with a bank for "collection and remittance" constitutes a relationship of agency, bailment or trust, the majority of the cases so hold. In an elaborate note upon that subject, which is found in 90 A.L.R. page 6, it is said in the heading to the paragraph on page 15 thereof: "The rule supported by the majority of the cases in which paper has been sent to a bank for 'collection and remittance' or 'collection and return' is that the relationship of the parties to the proceeds of the collection is not that of creditor and debtor, but one of agency, trust, or bailment."

It is true that the relationship between a bank and one who deposits with it a check or other paper to be collected or transferred for cash will be determined by the intention of the parties as shown by the circumstances of the transaction or by the instructions of the depositor. In support of its contention that the relationship between the bank and L. M. Miller, with respect to the proceeds derived from the sale of the grain represented by the warehouse receipts, was that of debtor and creditor, the respondent cites 7 American Jurisprudence, page 504, section 696. That section, however, contains the following statement: "If they intended that the proceeds should be remitted immediately upon the receipt thereof, or if in any other way it can be shown that the parties intended that the proceeds of the paper as well as the paper itself should remain the property of the owner of the paper, such intention will control and the bank will not take title to the proceeds."

In the present case it is not contended that Chico Production Credit Association, the lienholder of the warehouse receipts, was a creditor of the bank. The association had no authority to deposit in the bank the proceeds of the sale of barley to the credit of L. M. Miller. The instructions to the bank were just the contrary. The bank was directed to sell the grain and send to the Chico association, the lienholder, the sum of $240.09, and that "the balance of the proceeds are to be remitted direct to L. M. Miller." Certainly that language may not be construed to authorize the bank to deposit the balance of that fund to the credit of L. M. Miller and thus create the relationship of debtor and creditor between them.

Nor is the language of the late Mr. Justice Cardozo, which is found in the case of Jennings v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 294 U.S. 216, 55 S.Ct. 394, 395, 79 L.Ed. 869, at page 872, 99 A.L.R. 1248, thereof, which is quoted by the respondents, in conflict with the foregoing statement of law. That quoted language reads: "In the absence of tokens of a contrary intention, the better doctrine is, where the common law prevails, that the agency of the collecting bank is brought to an end by the collection of the paper, the bank from then on being in the position of a debtor, with liberty, like debtors generally, to use the proceeds as its own." (Italics added.)

The basis of the statement of the court in the preceding quotation is that the bank becomes the debtor of the depositor, after the proceeds of the check or paper are received by it, only "in the absence of tokens of a contrary intention." In the present case, the token of a contrary intention is clearly expressed in the written instructions which were furnished to the bank.

We find nothing in Gonyer v. Williams, 168 Cal. 452, 143 P. 736, or any of the other authorities relied upon by the respondent, in conflict with what we have previously said regarding the relationship of the bank to one who delivers to it paper, such as warehouse receipts for grain in storage, with specific written instructions to collect or sell the property and remit the proceeds to the owner thereof.

In the case of Gonyer, supra, the plaintiff, who for several years had been a regular depositor in Kern Valley Bank, deposited therein on May 11, 1911, a check in his favor for the sum of $300, drawn upon another bank. No instructions accompanied the deposit of that check. According to custom, the check was immediately credited to his account. It appears that the Kern Valley Bank was then insolvent, but the depositor had no knowledge of that fact. That money was not applied as an offset to a debt due to the bank. The depositor owed the bank no debt. Upon failure to pay that amount on demand, suit was brought to recover the money on the theory that it was held by the bank in trust. The trial court so held. On appeal it was properly determined that, under the circumstances of that case, "the transaction was not one which created the relation of principal and agent but rather that of creditor and debtor." In conclusion the court said: "The contract was for the collection of the draft, and the manner of disposing of the assets was clearly one resting in general usage." There is no doubt that principle is true in the absence of specific directions to the contrary, such as existed in the present case. The syllabus of that case correctly announces the well-known principle upon which that case was determined, as follows: "Where a regular depositor of a bank in the ordinary course of business, deposits with it a check drawn in his favor on another bank and bearing his indorsement in blank, the title to the check is transferred to the depositary, and upon its placing the amount of the check to the credit of the depositor on its books the relation of debtor and creditor is created between them."

[4] Contrary to the facts of that case, a banking relationship of debtor and creditor did not exist between the bank and either L. M. Miller or the Chico association. Neither of them was given credit on the books of the bank. Moreover, the warehouse receipts were delivered to the bank with specific written instructions to sell the grain represented thereby, and, after paying a specified sum to the lienholder, to "remit direct to L. M. Miller" the balance of the proceeds. Under such definite instructions there is no room for application of the "bank custom" of crediting an account and creating the relationship of debtor and creditor, as was done in the Gonyer case. That case has no application to the facts of this suit.

[5] The court properly granted the motion for nonsuit in favor of the codefendant, Chico Production Credit Association. It was a mere holder of the warehouse receipts as collateral security of its claim for payment of a debt of $240.09. The association did not convert or misappropriate any part of the proceeds of sale of the grain. The receipts were delivered to the bank with specific directions to pay direct to L. M. Miller the balance of the proceeds. These directions were given to the bank in writing with the consent of Miller. This suit involves only the conversion of the balance of the purchase price. It does not involve the satisfaction of the lien for $240.09 which was paid with the consent of all parties to the association. The association clearly was not a party to the misappropriation of the balance of that fund. It was converted by the bank in direct violation of the written instructions which were signed by the association. The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

The judgment in favor of the bank is reversed and the court is directed to render judgment in favor of the appellant, Robert Powell, for the sum of $1,946.74, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from August 18, 1936, and costs of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Ben R. Ragain, Judge Assigned.

Action by Bryce Swartfager against Henry W. Wells and others to set aside a judgment and to quiet title, wherein the named defendant filed a cross-complaint. During the pendency of the action the named defendant died and the administrator of his estate was substituted in his stead as defendant. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Bryce Swartfager in pro per., of Santa Rosa, and E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for appellant.

King & King, of Napa, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff, who is an attorney at law, appears in proper person in an appeal from a judgment which was rendered against him in a suit to quiet title to 200 acres of land in Napa County. The appellant holds a deed to the land, which was executed to him by his client, E. E. Morrison, former owner of the paper title thereto, pending the trial of a previous suit brought by Henry W. Wells to quiet title to said land, in which action Mr. Swartfager appeared as attorney for Mr. Morrison, who was a party defendant therein. Before judgment was rendered in the former action, Mr. Morrison died and the administrator of his estate, who was represented by an attorney other than this appellant, was duly substituted in the place of Morrison as a party defendant. With full knowledge of the proceedings in that previous suit, Mr. Swartfager made no application, as successor to the title held by Morrison, or otherwise, to be substituted or to be permitted to appear as a party defendant in that action. Judgment was rendered in the previous suit quieting title, by adverse possession, in this defendant Henry W. Wells. That decree became final. It was received in evidence on the trial of this suit and the court held it to be res judicata and conclusive of the issues herein, and that the grantee, Bryce Swartfager, has no right, title or interest in the land in question. Judgment was accordingly rendered against him. From that decree he has appealed. This appeal is presented on a bill of exceptions.

The facts which are necessary to consider in determining this appeal appear from the record as follows: E. E. Morrison was former owner of the record title to the 200-acre tract of land in Napa County, which is involved in this suit, subject to a mortgage held by Henry W. Wells, to secure a debt amounting to $5,500. In December, 1930, Wells commenced suit against Morrison and others to foreclose that mortgage. Bryce Swartfager appeared in that litigation as attorney for Mr. Morrison. That suit seems to have been abandoned. It was not finally terminated. The status of that case has no legal bearing on this appeal. It is not necessarily involved herein.

May 11, 1935, Henry W. Wells brought suit in Napa County against E. E. Morrison and others to quiet title to the said 200-acre tract of land. At the time of filing the complaint in that suit, the plaintiff recorded notice of lis pendens, pursuant to section 409 of the Code of Civil Procedure. June 14, 1935, this appellant, Bryce Swartfager, appeared as attorney for Mr. Morrison and filed therein his answer and cross-complaint, and he represented his client in all proceedings until November 16, 1936. It appears that on June 27, 1935, after Mr. Swartfager had appeared as attorney and had filed in that suit an answer and cross-complaint in behalf of Mr. Morrison, his client executed and delivered to him a deed to that property, described by Morrison as a quitclaim deed, which was not recorded until April 28, 1936. That deed was not called to the attention of the court until after the first suit to quiet title was completed. On November 16, 1936, E. E. Morrison died, and Mr. Swartfager's relationship as his attorney then ceased. Subsequently, on application of another lawyer, and upon proceedings duly had in the Superior Court of Napa County, Theodore J. Treadway was appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate of E. E. Morrison, deceased. On September 3, 1937, the administrator was substituted for E. E. Morrison, deceased, as a party to that action, under the provisions of section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the application for letters of administration, and in all subsequent proceedings, including the trial of the former suit to quiet title, the interest of E. E. Morrison, deceased, in said property, and of his heirs, was represented by W. W. Everett, Jr., as attorney for the administrator. By consent of all parties to that action, it was regularly set for trial for September 3, 1937. Evidence was adduced by the respective parties. Notwithstanding the fact that Byrce Swartfager held the deed to said land, dated June 27, 1935, which was executed about a month after he appeared for Mr. Morrison and filed an answer in the former suit to quiet title, with full knowledge of all proceedings in that action, he failed to call the court's attention to that deed, or to make an application to become a party to that suit. Findings in that action were adopted favorable to the plaintiff in every respect. The court held that the plaintiff, Henry W. Wells, acquired title to said land by adverse possession thereof for a period of more than twenty years; that he was therefore the owner and entitled to possession, and that the heirs, the representatives of the defendant, E. E. Morrison, or any of the other defendants in that suit did not have any right, title or interest in the land. Judgment in that suit was thereupon rendered in favor of the plaintiff Wells, quieting title in him to said land. Subsequently, this appellant, Bryce Swartfager, appeared in that action and made two separate motions to set aside that decree on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction or authority to appoint Theodore J. Treadway as administrator of the estate of E. E. Morrison, deceased, or to substitute him as a party defendant in that suit. Both motions were denied. No appeal was taken from those orders. The decree quieting title in Henry W. Wells became final.

This suit was then instituted by Bryce Swartfager, on September 22, 1938, against Henry W. Wells, and his attorney and against the administrator of the estate of E. E. Morrison, to set aside the decree in the former action on the ground of fraud, and to quiet title to said land in the plaintiff, Bryce Swartfager, as successor in interest of the title of his deceased client, E. E. Morrison. Each of the defendants in this action separately answered the complaint. A cross-complaint was also filed in behalf of Mr. Wells, asking that title to the land be again quieted in him. He also pleaded the decree of the former action quieting title in him as a bar to this suit. On April 4, 1939, during the progress of this action, Mr. Wells died. The administrator of his estate was duly appointed and substituted in his stead as defendant in this suit. The decree and proceedings of the former action, together with other evidence, were received at the trial. The court adopted findings favorable to the defendants and cross-complainant, and against the plaintiff, on every essential issue, including that of the alleged fraud, and it thereupon rendered a decree that plaintiff take nothing by his action and also quieting title to said land in the heirs of Henry W. Wells, deceased. From that judgment this appeal was perfected.

[1] The appellant contends that the judgment is not supported by the evidence for the reason that the former decree quieting title to the land in Henry W. Wells was procured, without notice to him, by means of fraud consisting of securing the appointment and substitution of an administrator of the estate of E. E. Morrison, deceased, through the representation of another attorney, and in prosecuting that suit to final judgment, with full knowledge that Bryce Swartfager then held a deed to the property, executed by his client after the commencement of the suit, rendering that judgment void, and that, since Morrison's interest in the land was transferred to this appellant after the commencement of that action, it was not necessary, under section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the grantee be substituted as a party defendant, but, on the contrary, that that section authorizes the continuation of the suit "in the name of the original party."

[2, 3] We are of the opinion the findings and judgment in the present case are adequately supported by the evidence. The judgment and proceedings in the former suit quieting title to the same real property which is here involved, in Henry W. Wells against this appellant's predecessor in title, were properly received in evidence. Riverside Land & Irr. Co. v. Jensen, 108 Cal. 146, 41 P. 40. That judgment is res judicata of the appellant's claim of title, in the present action, and it became a bar to this proceeding. This suit constitutes a collateral attack upon that judgment which, under the circumstances of this case, is controlling upon the appellant.

[4, 5] The previous cause of action to quiet title to the real property in question, which was filed May 11, 1935, did not abate on account of the death during the pendency of that suit of the defendant, E. E. Morrison. § 385, Code Civ.Proc.; Miller v. Bank of America N. T. & Sav. Ass'n, 52 Cal.App.2d 512, 126 P.2d 444. The death of Mr. Morrison, however, absolutely terminated the authority of this appellant, Bryce Swartfager, to represent him, as attorney in that suit Deiter v. Kiser, 158 Cal. 259, 110 P. 921; 3 Cal.Jur. 631, § 40. In the text last cited it is said in that regard: "The authority of an attorney necessarily ceases with the death of the client, for no one can act for a dead man. After the death of the client, his attorney therefore becomes a stranger to the proceedings."

[6-8] As a grantee of the interest of Mr. Morrison in the real property Bryce

Swartfager might have moved the court for substitution as a party defendant in that action, in the place of his former client, but he failed to do so. The relationship of attorney for his deceased client having ceased, the appellant may not complain of a lack of personal notice of the subsequent application for letters of administration of the estate of E. E. Morrison or of the selection of another attorney to represent the estate. The administrator had a perfect right to select his own lawyer. 5 Am. Jur. 279, § 30. The administrator, having been duly substituted as a party defendant, had authority to consent to the trial of the case. That stipulation was made. The cause was regularly tried and the administrator appeared and participated therein. Findings were adopted against the administrator and favorable to Henry W. Wells, the plaintiff in that action. Judgment was rendered accordingly. That judgment became final.

[9] The remaining question is whether this appellant Bryce Swartfager, as successor in title to E. E. Morrison, deceased, by a deed of conveyance which was executed to him after the commencement of the former action and after the filing of a lis pendens therein, is bound by that decree.

We are of the opinion this appellant is bound by the judgment in the former suit quieting title to the real property in Henry W. Wells, for the reason that his interest therein is in privity with that of his client, E. E. Morrison, since he acquired it by deed subsequent to the commencement of that action and after the lis pendens was filed therein. § 1214, Civ.Code; § 1908, Code Civ.Proc.; Warnock v. Harlow, 96 Cal. 298, 31 P. 166, 31 Am.St.Rep. 209; 22 Cal.Jur. 195, § 62; 15 Cal.Jur. 95, § 165; 25 Cal.L.Rev. 480; 30 Am.Jur. 959, §§ 226, 227. In the text last cited it is said regarding the conclusiveness of a judgment upon the grantee of property under such circumstances: "In the absence of the applicability of a statutory provision requiring a different result, the general rule is that although one to whom an assignment is made or property is granted by a party to an action during the pendency thereof is regarded as in privity with such party within the meaning of the doctrine of res judicata, a judgment is regarded as conclusive only between the parties and their successors in interest by title acquired subsequent to the commencement of the action, so that a person to whom a party to an action has made an assignment or granted property or an interest therein before the commencement of the action is not regarded as in privity with the assignor or grantor so as to be affected by a judgment rendered against the assignor or grantor in the subsequent action." (Italics added.)

In 15 California Jurisprudence, page 185, section 216, it is said: "Judgments affecting title are conclusive against the holders of prior conveyances and mortgages which were not recorded before the lis pendens."

The preceding text, which is supported by numerous authorities, is a mere statement of the principle declared in section 1214 of the Civil Code, which provides that: "Every conveyance of real property * * * is void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded, and as against any judgment affecting the title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action." (Italics added.)

[10] Conversely, the statement of the foregoing section is equally true that when the subsequent deed to real property is not "recorded prior to the record of notice of action," a judgment affecting that title is not void even though the subsequent purchaser acquired the property "in good faith and for a valuable consideration." That clearly means that a judgment quieting title to real property is absolutely controlling against one, though not a party to the action, who acquires from a party thereto a deed to that property subsequent to the commencement of the suit and after the recording of the lis pendens.

In the present case, the appellant not only took his deed of conveyance to the property in question after the filing of the lis pendens pursuant to section 409 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but he also had actual notice of the pendency of that action, for he appeared as attorney in behalf of his own client and represented him until the time of his death. In 30 American Jurisprudence, page 954, section 222, it is said:

"With regard to the persons in whose favor or against whom the doctrine of res judicata is applicable, the rule is well settled that a judgment is binding upon all parties to the proceedings in which it is rendered, and their privies. In the strict sense of the term, parties to a judgment in the eye of the law are those only who are named as such in the record, and are properly served with process, or enter their appearance, but the term 'parties,' within the contemplation of the rule of res judicata, is sometimes extended beyond the mere nominal parties to the record."

This is a clear case in which the preceding rule is extended to include as a party who is bound by the judgment one who claims title to real property as a grantee by deed secured from his client during the pendency of a former case in which he represented the grantor.

The judgment is affirmed.

DIETERLE et al. v. YELLOW CAB CO. et al.

Civ. 12869.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 30, 1942.

1. Trial 🔑296(3)

In taxicab passengers' action against taxicab company and operator of taxicab for personal injuries sustained in intersectional collision with motorist, where passengers contended that there was concurrent negligence of defendants and motorist, instruction using the article "the" preceding the words "proximate cause" instead of the article "a" was improper, but was not misleading where the jury was adequately instructed regarding essential legal principles on subject of concurrent negligence.

2. Trial 🔑295(8)

In taxicab passengers' action against taxicab company and taxicab driver for personal injuries sustained in intersectional collision with automobile, instruction that if inference of proximate cause arising from happening of accident was not overthrown by evidence or if inference preponderated over contrary evidence, it "warranted" a verdict for passengers was not objectionable on ground that it deprived passengers of full benefit of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" where remainder of instruction indicated that it was not optional with jury whether to return verdict for passengers if inference was not rebutted.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur" and "Warrant".

3. Trial 🔑296(3)

In taxicab passengers' action against taxicab company and taxicab driver for personal injuries sustained in intersectional collision with an automobile, instruction that while defendants were charged with duty of exercising the utmost care, that did not mean that they were obliged to use exceptional skill or foresight to anticipate the conduct of others was not objectionable on ground that no distinction was made between utmost and ordinary care relative to the duty of the defendants, where in view of other instructions the jury was not misled.

4. Carriers 🔑321(23)

In taxicab passengers' action against taxicab company and taxicab driver for injuries sustained in intersectional collision with motorist, where sole liability of motorist was an issue, it was proper to give an instruction stating in effect that if negligence of motorist was sole proximate cause of accident verdict should be for taxicab company and taxicab driver.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1170(1)

In taxicab passengers' action against taxicab company and taxicab driver for injuries sustained in intersectional collision with motorist, where there was evidence that motorist did not make boulevard stop at stop sign erected according to law, and that taxicab was first in the intersection, consideration of instructions and examination of evidence did not disclose that judgment for defendants resulted from prejudicial error. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Samuel R. Blake, Judge.

Personal injury action by William Dieterle and others against the Yellow Cab Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

A. Ronald Button, Paul Barksdale D'Orr, and Thomas A. Reynolds, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry B. Ellison and J. L. Ronnow, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiffs were passengers for a reward in a taxi-cab of defendant Yellow Cab Company, operated by defendant Nave. The action was for damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision at an intersection between the cab and an automobile. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment for defendants Yellow Cab Company and Nave entered upon the verdict of a jury.

This is the second appeal in this action. Upon the first trial the defendants were the Yellow Cab Company, Nave, one LaForce, who was the driver of the automobile, and one Whelan, the alleged owner thereof. Judgment in that trial was for plaintiffs against LaForce, and in favor of Whelan, the Yellow Cab Company and Nave. The trial court directed the verdict for Yellow Cab Company and Nave. Plaintiffs appealed from the judgment in favor of Whelan, the Yellow Cab Company and Nave. The judgment in favor of Whelan was affirmed. In reversing the judgment in favor of the Yellow Cab Company and Nave the District Court of Appeal stated that it was error to direct the verdict and, "Since plaintiffs were being transported as passengers for a reward by respondents, they could rely upon the obligation of the driver of the taxicab to use the utmost care and diligence for their safety. In presenting their case to the trial court they were entitled to the presumption embodied in the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur." Dieterle v. Yellow Cab Co., 1939, 34 Cal.App.2d 97, 100, 93 P.2d 171, 173.

The collision occurred in December, 1937, about 8 p. m., at the intersection of Beverly Boulevard and Lucerne Street in Los Angeles. The taxicab was going east on Beverly. The automobile was going north on Lucerne. A boulevard stop sign had been erected, according to law, at the south entrance to said intersection requiring vehicles approaching Beverly from the south on Lucerne to stop before entering the intersection. The streets were wet; it had been raining but was not raining at the time of the accident; the night was dark and Beverly Boulevard was lighted.

The complaint alleged that the collision between the cab and the automobile was caused by the concurrent negligence of all defendants.

Appellants contend that the trial court erred prejudicially in giving certain instructions and in refusing other instructions requested by plaintiffs.

The court instructed the jury, in defining the issues to be determined, that if it found defendants were negligent plaintiffs could not recover unless that negligence was the proximate cause of any injury to plaintiffs. Appellants claim that this instruction disregarded the issue of the concurrent negligence of Yellow Cab Company and Nave, defendants herein, and LaForce, a defendant in the first trial, as the proximate cause of the injuries to plaintiffs; that by reason of the use of the definite article "the" instead of the indefinite article "a", preceding the words "proximate cause", the whole issue was changed and plaintiffs were restricted to a recovery based upon the negligence of the Yellow Cab Company and Nave as the sole proximate cause of the accident and thus were prevented from recovering for "any, even the slightest negligence," on the part of said defendants Yellow Cab Company and Nave. That instruction was incorrect. The jury, however, was instructed further: "* * * that even if you should believe from the evidence that the driver of the Plymouth car was negligent at the time and place of the accident, in failing to make the boulevard stop or otherwise, nevertheless if you also believe from the evidence that the driver of the taxicab failed at said time and place to use the utmost care and diligence for the safe carriage of plaintiffs, to provide everything necessary for that purpose and exercise reasonable degree of skill, under the circumstances, for the safety of his passengers (as I have defined such care elsewhere in these instructions), and that his failure to exercise said degree of care contributed to proximately cause injury and damage to the plaintiffs, then regardless of the negligence of the driver of the Plymouth car, the taxicab company and its employee would be liable for damages suffered by the plaintiffs." After defining the expression "proximate cause" in an instruction, the court gave a further instruction: "This does not mean that the law seeks and recognizes only one proximate cause of an injury, * * *. To the contrary, the acts and omissions of two or more persons may work concurrently as the efficient causes of an injury, and in such a case, each of the participating acts or omissions is regarded in law as a proximate cause." The court also instructed the jury: "When the negligent acts * * * of two or more persons * * * contribute concurrently, and as proximate causes, to the injury of another, each of such persons is liable. * * * it is no defense for one of such persons that some other person, not joined as a defendant in the action, participated in causing the injury even if it should appear to you that the negligence of that other person was greater, * * *."

In the case of Hellman v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 1933, 135 Cal.App. 627, at page 645, 27 P.2d 946, 28 P.2d 384, referring to the expression "the proximate cause" in an instruction, it was stated: "If such instruction stood alone, we would unhesitatingly declare it to be prejudicially erroneous. A similar defect existed in an instruction complained of in the case of Squier v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 181 Cal. 533, on page 537, 185 P. 391, 392, concerning which the court says: 'The sentence containing the objectionable words is immediately preceded by a sentence requiring the jury to determine whether plaintiff's negligence, if any, was "a proximate cause" of the injuries received by him. Moreover, the jury was elsewhere fully and correctly instructed on the law of contributory negligence. Considering the instructions as a whole, we consider the possibility that the jury could have been misled by the error complained of so remote as to be altogether unworthy of serious consideration.' "

The case of Chandler v. Benafel, 1934, 3 Cal.App.2d 373, 374, 39 P.2d 892, 893, involved an injury to plaintiff, a pedestrian, as the result of a collision between two automobiles. One of the issues therein was the alleged concurrent negligence of the drivers. The jury was instructed, in referring to one of the drivers, that in order to hold that driver liable, it must find that his negligence was the proximate cause of injury to plaintiff. The court held that the instruction was incorrect but stated further: "The jury, however, was further instructed: 'If the concurrent or successive negligence of two persons combined result in an injury to a third person, he may recover of either or both.' The whole theory of the case upon which it was submitted to the jury, and the discrimination with which they decided it, supports the contention * * * that the jurors understood the law and knew just what they were doing in returning their verdicts in this case. Under such circumstances, their determination should not be disturbed."

[1] In the present case, considering all the instructions together, it cannot be held that the jury was misled by the defect in the instruction wherein the article "the" was used preceding the words "proximate cause" instead of the article "a". The jury was adequately instructed as to the essential legal principles upon the subject of concurrent negligence.

[2] The opinion upon the former appeal stated, as shown above, that plaintiffs were entitled to the presumption embodied in the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. At the retrial the court on its own motion gave the following instruction: "From the happening of the accident involved in this case, as established by the evidence, there arises an inference that the proximate cause of the occurrence was some negligent conduct on the part of the defendant. That inference is a form of evidence, and if there is none other tending to overthrow it, or if the inference preponderates over contrary evidence, it warrants a verdict for the plaintiff. Therefore you should weigh any evidence tending to overcome that inference, bearing in mind that it is incumbent upon the defendant to rebut the inference by showing that it did, in fact, exercise the utmost care and diligence or that the accident occurred without being proximately caused by any failure of duty on its part."

It will be noted that the instruction did not include the word "presumption" which was used in the former opinion in stating that plaintiffs "were entitled to the presumption embodied in the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur." As noted, the instruction stated "there arises an inference that the proximate cause * * * was some negligent conduct. * * * " (Italics added.)

Appellants assert that the instruction did not give plaintiffs the full benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. They state that their claim of error is not based upon the use therein of the word "inference" rather than "presumption", but upon the use of the word "warrants" in the expression therein, "it warrants a verdict for the plaintiffs." Their argument is that the word "warrants" makes the drawing of the inference by the jury permissive rather than mandatory; that such inference of negligence, which is founded upon a doctrine of law rather than the permissive reasoning of the jury, must be accepted by the jury as necessitating a verdict for plaintiffs in the absence of sufficient evidence produced by defendants to satisfy the jury that the inference, so created, has been rebutted or overcome.

The remainder of the instruction immediately following the sentence in which the word "warrants" was used indicates that the meaning to be ascribed to the word as there used was not, as suggested by appellants, that it was optional with the jury whether it returned a verdict for plaintiff if the inference was not rebutted. The remainder of the instruction, which was in the nature of a deduction based upon the preceding statements, was: "Therefore you should weigh any evidence tending to overcome that inference, bearing in mind that it is incumbent upon the defendant to rebut the inference by showing that it did, in fact, exercise the utmost care and diligence or that the accident occurred without being proximately caused by any failure of duty on its part." (Italics added.)

That such a meaning was not to be attributed to that word was also indicated by two other instructions given next succeeding the one in which the word "warrants" was used. The first one commenced, "Lest these statements give you an incorrect understanding of the law generally, I would inform you that they constitute an exception to the general rule that the mere happening of an accident does not support an inference of negligence. However, certain exceptional circumstances, when existent, authorize the exceptional rule. They are as follows: * * * (here various circumstances are stated). * * *" The last paragraph of that instruction was: "When the conditions I have mentioned exist, the inference of negligence, to which they give birth, will support a verdict for the plaintiff, in the absence of a showing by defendant that offsets the inference." The next instruction was:

"In making such a showing, it is not necessary for a defendant to overcome the inference by a preponderance of evidence. Plaintiff's burden of proving negligence by a preponderance of the evidence is not changed by the rule I have mentioned. It follows, therefore, that in order to hold the defendant liable, the inference of negligence must have greater weight, more convincing force in the mind of the jury, than the opposing explanation offered by the defendant.

"If such a preponderance in plaintiff's favor exists, then it must be found that some negligent conduct on the part of defendant was a proximate cause of the injury; but if it does not exist, if the evidence preponderates in defendants's favor, or if in the jury's mind there is an even balance as between the weight of the inference and the weight of the contrary explanation, neither having the more convincing force, then the verdict must be for the defendant." (Italics added.)

The instructions, relative to such inference, show from the whole context thereof that the jury was instructed that an inference of negligence on the part of defendants existed; that such inference was evidence in favor of plaintiffs and defendants were required to rebut, offset or overcome it; that if the inference was of greater weight than the explanation offered by defendants it "must be found" that defendants were negligent.

In addition to giving the instructions above mentioned that the inference of negligence was evidence in favor of plaintiffs, that plaintiffs' burden of proving negligence was not changed because such inference existed, and that such inference evidence should be weighed with that opposed to it, the court told the jury in other instructions that, "The burden is upon the plaintiffs to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants were negligent * * *." and, "If plaintiffs fulfill this burden, they are entitled to recover from defendants. If plaintiffs fail in carrying this burden, the defendants are entitled to your verdict." (Italics added.) A further given instruction was that the jury should consider the instructions as a whole and regard each in the light of the others.

It thus appears from the whole context of the instructions above referred to, that the direction to the jury, relative to the inference, was that the verdict should be for plaintiffs if the inference of negligence to which plaintiffs were entitled under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was not rebutted or overcome by defendants.

"* * * while the defendants were charged with the duty of exercising the utmost care * * *, that this does not mean that they were obliged to use exceptional skill or * * * foresight to anticipate the conduct of others. While exceptional skill is to be admired * * *, the law does not demand it as a standard of conduct.

"In other words, if you find that * * * Nave in the operation of the taxicab conducted himself as might reasonably be expected of the ordinary prudent person charged with the duty of exercising a high degree of care for his passengers, then I instruct you that he was not negligent, * * *."

The criticism thereof is that no distinction was made between "utmost" and "ordinary" care relative to the duty of defendants to anticipate the conduct of others, and that the cab driver was required to conduct himself as an ordinary prudent person only. In another instruction the court stated that defendants were "required by law to use the utmost care and diligence for the safe carriage of plaintiffs to provide everything necessary for that purpose and to exercise a reasonable degree of skill." Thereafter, in six different instructions, the court stated that defendants were required to use "the utmost care and diligence," and in another instruction stated that they were "bound to exercise the highest degree of care." In view of these various instructions, it does not appear that the jury was misled by the criticized instruction as to the degree of care required of defendants.

[4] Appellants also object to an instruction which stated in substance that if the negligence of LaForce was the sole cause of the accident the verdict should be for the Yellow Cab Company and Nave. The claim is that the instruction ignored the theory of joint liability of all the original defendants for concurrent negligence. The sole liability of LaForce was an issue in the case and it was proper to give the instruction.

It is claimed further that other instructions which were given, although correct as statements of law, were unnecessary and tended to mislead the jury. Such instructions, so referred to, were entitled: "Guessing Cause of Accident not Permitted"; "Elaboration on Duty of Carrier"; "Negligence, Definition"; "Negligence not to be Compared"; and "Imminent Peril." The substance of each of the instructions was in accord with the ordinary implications of its title. It does not appear that these instructions were improper.

Concerning the happening of the collision, four witnesses who were not acquainted with any of the parties testified as follows:

A pedestrian, who was at the intersection, testified that LaForce did not make the boulevard stop and that the cab was in the intersection first.

A person in an automobile following the cab, said the cab was going 20 miles per hour; that he saw the other car about 75 feet south of the intersection, going 30 miles per hour, and its speed was not reduced and it did not stop; that LaForce said he did not stop.

A person in an automobile going west on Beverly, said that the cab was going 20 miles per hour; that he saw the other car about 50 feet south of Beverly going over 25 miles per hour and it did not stop.

A person in an automobile about 60 feet back of the cab, said that the cab was going about 20 miles per hour and the car was going about 30 miles per hour.

There was other testimony as follows:

Plaintiff Charlotte Dieterle said that the cab was going 30 miles per hour and that it did not decrease its speed; that she saw a light coming from the right side, then there was an impact.

Plaintiff William Dieterle said that the cab was going 30 miles per hour and that he did not see the other car before the accident.

Defendant Nave said that he was going about 20 to 25 miles per hour as he approached the intersection and he went on compression to cross the dips on the west and east sides of Lucerne; that he saw the other car about 125 feet away when he was 60 feet from the intersection and that he did not judge its speed; that he did not see LaForce stop and the only time he took his eyes from the other car was for a second when he went through the dip.

A police officer said that LaForce told him he did not make the boulevard stop.

LaForce did not testify.

[5] When all of the instructions are considered as a whole and the evidence (the substance of which as to liability is above set forth) is examined, it should not be concluded in view of the provisions of section 4½, article VI of the State Constitution that prejudicial error has resulted.

The judgment is affirmed.

The statutory presumption that deed duly executed has been delivered at its date extends to the fact, as well as the time, of delivery. Civ.Code, § 1055.

4. Pleading ⇨8(3), 129(2)

In action to set aside order confirming executrix' sale of decedent's realty, wherein complaint alleged that party named in order as grantee had made no bid, had no intention to purchase, and did not in fact purchase, failure to deny such allegations admitted that there was no sale to such party, notwithstanding allegation in answer of conclusion that sale was an actual sale.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨375

An order finding that sale of decedent's realty by executrix was fairly conducted and legally made to certain party as alleged in return, and confirming sale, was a direct adjudication that there was such a sale, which adjudication was binding as against executrix and in favor of party named as grantee and his successors. Probate Code, §§ 754, 755, 780, 785, 788, 1200; Code Civ.Proc. § 1908.

6. Executors and administrators ⇨375

An order finding that sale of decedent's realty by executrix was fairly conducted and legally made to certain party as alleged in return, and confirming sale, was not void for want of "jurisdiction" on ground that no such sale had been made. Probate Code, §§ 754, 755, 780, 785, 788, 1200; Code Civ.Proc. § 1908.

"Jurisdiction" always depends upon the allegations and never upon the facts.

8. Executors and administrators ⇨380(3)

In action to set aside order confirming executrix' sale of decedent's realty, plaintiff could not prevail on evidence showing, outside the record, that no such sale as was described in order was in fact made, notwithstanding that fact that no such sale was made was admitted in pleadings, and that no objection was made to evidence of such fact. Probate Code, § 785.

9. Executors and administrators ⇨383

An action to set aside order confirming executrix' sale of decedent's realty, except in so far as plaintiff sought to set aside order for fraud, was a "collateral attack" on order. Probate Code, § 785.

Possession of land by one other than seller puts intending purchaser on inquiry as to possessor's rights, and charges intending purchaser with knowledge of all that such inquiry, if pursued, might have developed, but if inquiry is made, intending purchaser is not charged with notice of anything beyond what it discloses.

12. Executors and administrators 🔑380(1)

An order confirming executrix' sale of decedent's realty would not be set aside for fraud on executrix inducing sale, where title had passed through two parties to purchasers who had no actual notice of fraud, and where, although tenants were in possession, executrix did not claim title, but told such purchasers that she was collecting rents "for" their vendor. Probate Code, § 785.

"For" is often used to import an agency, and, when so used, means as agent of, or in behalf of.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ingall W. Bull, Judge.

Action by Phoebe A. Marlenee, sometimes known as Phoebe A. Colvin, as executrix of the last will and testament of Charles Lee Marlenee, against James E. Brown and others to set aside an order confirming the executrix' sale of realty belonging to decedent's estate. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, as executrix of the will of Charles Lee Marlenee, deceased, brought this action to set aside an order, made in the probate proceedings on his estate, confirming a sale of real property of the estate, to have a deed thereof signed by her as executrix and other conveyances purporting to vest the title to the property in the defendants declared void, and to recover possession of, and quiet the title of the estate to, the property. She appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants.

Plaintiff's letters testamentary on the estate were issued May 9, 1931, and the estate is still in course of administration. On February 27, 1935, there was filed in the estate proceedings a return, signed and verified by plaintiff, of a sale of the real property here in question to William Gaston, with a prayer for its confirmation. Due notice of a hearing on this return was given, and on March 15, 1935, the court made an order purporting to confirm this sale and direct a conveyance to be made accordingly. On July 1, 1935, plaintiff as executrix signed and acknowledged such a deed and it was recorded June 2, 1936. Plaintiff denied the execution of this deed but there was testimony that she did execute it, sufficient to support the trial court's finding that she did so. Gaston, named as the purchaser, conveyed the property to Taylor O. Taylor, by deed recorded June 2, 1936. Taylor sold and conveyed the property to defendants, his deed to them being delivered March 31, 1937, and recorded the same day. They paid him $17,500 therefor.

Plaintiff makes no objection that the above mentioned return of sale and order confirming sale were not in all respects regular and valid, if regard is had only to matters appearing on the face thereof. She contends, however, that in fact there was no sale at all to Gaston and so no subject matter on which an order confirming the sale could operate, and that the order was therefore void. While apparently admitting that her attack on the order here may be regarded as collateral, in the ordinary sense of that term, she further claims that the facts from which its invalidity results were admitted by the answer and also proved without objection at the trial and that hence the case is the same as if those facts appeared on the face of the order, and the order must here be held void by reason thereof. Further contentions by plaintiff are that her deed to Gaston was never delivered and for that reason passed no title to him, that it is void because not in conformity to the order of confirmation, and that Gaston's deed to Taylor also was not delivered. Plaintiff also claims that she was induced to take the proceedings above mentioned, resulting in an apparent conveyance of the property to Gaston, by fraud of Taylor, the grantee of Gaston, who was also her attorney and confidential adviser, that this fraud was not discovered by her until a short time before this action was brought, that she was in possession of the property, by her tenants, when defendants bought it and that defendants did not make inquiry as to her rights and are hence subject to them.

Defendants concede here that there was in fact no sale to Gaston, take no position as to the asserted fraud of Taylor, and dispute all the other contentions of plaintiff. Defendants also contend that by reason of plaintiff's proceedings above mentioned and other matters to be mentioned later, plaintiff is estopped to deny the validity of the probate sale and of her deed to Gaston, and that they bought the property from Taylor, who appeared of record to be its owner, for value and without notice, actual or constructive, of plaintiff's claims, and therefore they hold it free therefrom.

[1] Plaintiff's contention that her deed to Gaston was in violation of the order of confirmation is not supported by the record. That order directed a conveyance for a total price of $10,000, Gaston to assume "the existing liens and encumbrances on said property" and to deduct from the price "the amount of said liens and encumbrances up to March 1st, 1935" and pay the balance in cash. The deed recites a consideration of $5,670 received, which is $4,330 less than the stated price. Plaintiff's argument is that it was stipulated at the trial that on March 1, 1935, the liens and encumbrances amounted to only $3,773.79, and hence the deed was for too little cash. But the record referred to shows only a stipulation that on March 1, 1935, "the total amount of unpaid and due taxes and assessments against the property amounted to $3,773.79." This does not show the total amount of liens and encumbrances, for there might have been liens other than taxes and assessments, and liens for taxes and assessments which were not due, all of which would have been included in the terms of the order, but not in the stipulation. We find nothing else anywhere in the record on this subject, and in the absence of a contrary showing the presumption is that the deed was regular in this respect.

[2, 3] There is no direct testimony that plaintiff's deed was delivered to Gaston or that Gaston's deed was delivered to Taylor. The notary who took plaintiff's acknowledgment testified that Taylor brought plaintiff into the notary's office, that he produced the deed and plaintiff signed it, but said nothing as to what became of it. The same notary testified that Gaston signed his deed to Taylor in her presence and acknowledged it before her, but did not say what became of it. Gaston testified that he never had possession of plaintiff's deed and did not knowingly sign and acknowledge a deed to Taylor, but admitted that he went to the notary's office to sign a paper for Taylor, and that there one more document, the nature of which he did not know, was handed back and forth between himself and Taylor and the notary. The record of each deed in the Recorder's office states that it was recorded at the request of the grantee. A certified copy of the record of each deed was admitted in evidence on plaintiff's offer, and such certified copies were prima facie evidence of the genuineness, due execution and delivery of the original deeds. Anthony v. Chapman, 1884, 65 Cal. 73, 76, 2 P. 889; Davis v. Pacific Improvement Co., 1897, 118 Cal. 45, 49, 50 P. 7; Dockstader v. First Nat. Bank of Lemoore, 1930, 104 Cal.App. 169, 172, 285 P. 715; see, also, Campbell v. Genshlea, 1919, 180 Cal. 213, 223, 180 P. 336; Keele v. Clouser, 1928, 92 Cal.App. 526, 532, 268 P. 682. A deed duly executed is presumed to have been delivered at its date (Civil Code, § 1055), and this presumption extends to the fact, as well as the time, of delivery. Marple v. Jackson, 1920, 184 Cal. 411, 417, 193 P. 940; Lewis v. Burns, 1898, 122 Cal. 358, 362, 55 P. 132; McDougall v. McDougall, 1902, 135 Cal. 316, 319, 67 P. 778; McGorray v. Robinson, 1902, 135 Cal. 312, 314, 67 P. 279.

[4] One of the contentions most strongly urged by appellant is that there was in fact no probate sale of the property to Gaston and hence no subject matter on which the order of confirmation could operate, and therefore the order is void. The facts in this matter are admitted by the pleadings. The complaint alleges that Gaston "never at any time made any bid for said property or for any part thereof; he never at any time offered to purchase said property. * * * At no time did said Gaston have any intention of purchasing said property or any part thereof and never at any time did he purchase it or any part of it. At no time was there a sale of said property or any part thereof to said Gaston." These allegations are undenied by the answer, except by an affirmative statement, not directed at these allegations of the complaint, that the sale was "an actual sale." The specific facts thus admitted are sufficient to show that there was no sale to Gaston, and their effect is not overcome by a mere denial (affirmatively stated) of the conclusion that there was no sale. Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 1906, 148 Cal. 548, 551, 83 P. 999; Easom v. General Mortgage Co., 1929, 101 Cal.App. 186, 190, 281 P. 514; Gillons v. Turner Oil Co., 1921, 51 Cal.App. 139, 141, 196 P. 276.

We take it as a fact, therefore, that there was actually no sale by plaintiff to Gaston, up to the time of the return of sale and the order of confirmation; but we cannot agree to the proposition that this fact makes the order void. As already stated, it is tacitly conceded that both the return of sale and the order were complete and regular in form and appeared, on the face of the record, to be valid, and examination of the record discloses no defects in them. Under the statute in force now and at the time of these proceedings, where a sale of real property of the estate is necessary to pay debts, legacies, family allowance or expenses, an executor can make such a sale without any preliminary proceedings other than a notice of sale. Probate Code, §§ 754, 780. Such a sale must, however, be reported to and confirmed by the court before title to the property passes, and notice of hearing such a report, commonly called a "return," is given by the clerk by posting (Probate Code, § 755), which notice directs all persons interested to appear and show cause, if any they have, why the sale should not be confirmed. Probate Code, § 1200. At the hearing the court is required to examine into the necessity for the sale and examine the return and witnesses in relation to the sale, and to confirm the sale if it appears "that the sale was legally made and fairly conducted," that good reason existed for it, and that it complied with other requirements set forth in the statute. Prob.Code, § 785. If the purchaser does not comply with the terms of sale, the sale may be vacated and a resale ordered, with liability on the purchaser for any deficiency in the price on such resale. Prob.Code, § 788.

[5] In following the procedure thus laid down an executor must necessarily file a return stating, with other matters, that a sale has been made, and the court is clearly given the power and duty to determine whether the sale so returned should be confirmed. One of the facts necessarily included in an affirmative determination of this question is that the sale reported has been made. The return here did allege a sale to Gaston, giving its terms, and the order found "that said sale was fairly conducted and legally made," and confirmed it. This was a direct adjudication that there was such a sale and it was binding as such against the plaintiff, who was a party to, and in fact the initiator of, the confirmation proceeding, in favor of defendants, the successors in interest of Gaston, who was also a party by virtue of the allegations of the return and had due notice of the hearing by the clerk's posting. Code of Civ.Proc. § 1908. In Baldwin v. Stewart, 1933, 218 Cal. 364, 368, 23 P.2d 283, 284, the court said of the statutory provisions referred to above: "By requiring the court to inquire into the regularity and fairness of the sale, by making specific provision for the liability of the purchaser for a deficiency in the event of his default and a possible resale, and by giving the right of appeal from an order confirming sale, the Legislature has evidenced a clear intent to make conclusive an order confirming sale which has become final. And we can see no good reason why parties who have been duly notified of the proceeding and extended every opportunity to present their objections, if any they have, should not be concluded thereby." It was further declared in that case that the notice provided for by section 1200 of the Probate Code was notice to the purchaser, and the order confirming a sale was held binding on a purchaser as to several facts relating to the sale which he sought to dispute. Regarding the validity of this notice by posting, see Security-First Nat. Bk. v. Superior Court, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 749, 756, 37 P.2d 69, 72, where the court, speaking of a posted notice of a testamentary trustee's account, said: "The notice required by the sections is constructive notice to everyone of the pendency of the proceedings, and a hearing had and order entered pursuant thereto is conclusive upon all parties in interest. [Citing cases.] Absence of a personal notice in such proceeding does not deprive any person in interest of any of his constitutional rights. [Citing cases.]"

[6, 7] Plaintiff further contends, however, that because there was in fact no sale there was nothing on which the order of confirmation could operate, and hence the court had no jurisdiction to make the order. This point relates to jurisdiction of the subject matter, the rule on which is: "Jurisdiction always depends upon the allegations and never upon the facts. When a party appears before a judicial tribunal and alleges that a certain right is denied him, and the law has given the tribunal the power to enforce that right—his adversary being notified—it must proceed to determine the truth or falsity of his allegations. The truth of the allegations does not constitute jurisdiction. The tribunal must have jurisdiction before it can take any adverse step. Its jurisdiction, necessarily, has to be determined from the allegations, assuming them to be true." Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 60, pp. 73, 74. This rule was followed in Stuart v. Allen, 1860, 16 Cal. 473, 501, 76 Am.Dec. 551, where the court, upholding an order authorizing a probate sale made under our former procedure requiring such an order, said: "* * * it is immaterial, so far as this question of jurisdiction is concerned, whether the statements of the petition are true or not; the jurisdiction resting upon the averments of the petition, not upon proof of them." This rule was followed in case of an order confirming sale in Johnston v. Kitchin, 1928, 203 Cal. 766, 769, 265 P. 941. Likewise following this rule the court in Security-

First Nat. Bk. v. Superior Court, supra, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 749, 755, 756, 37 P.2d 69, 72, said of a proceeding for settling the account of a testamentary trustee under the Probate Code: "The filing of the petition setting forth the matters required by the Code sections noted vests jurisdiction in the probate court (see Estate of Simmons, 168 Cal. 390, 395, 143 P. 697), whether or not the allegations of the matters necessary to vest jurisdiction accord with the actual facts. Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 663, 666, 51 P. 1078; Nicholson v. Leatham, 28 Cal. App. 597, 601, 153 P. 965, 155 P. 98." Similarly, it was held in Wood v. Roach, 1932, 125 Cal.App. 631, 639, 14 P.2d 170, that, while the court confirming a probate sale is required to ascertain the existence of proper grounds for the sale before acting, an erroneous conclusion in that regard would constitute error in the exercise of jurisdiction rather than a want of jurisdiction.

In this connection the case of Townsend v. Tallant, 1867, 33 Cal. 45, 91 Am.Dec. 617, is cited to us. There the validity of an order confirming a sale of real estate by an administrator was in question. At that time the statute required the administrator, before making a sale, to obtain an order authorizing him to sell, and to obtain such an order a petition must be filed and four weeks' notice by publication given of a hearing thereon. In case of the sale there in question such notice was published for only three weeks and it was held that by reason of this defect the order of sale was void. The order of confirmation, which recited the three weeks' publication of the notice, and thus showed the invalidity of the order of sale, was also held void. In so holding the court used some language which tends to favor plaintiff here, saying at page 54 of 33 Cal.: "But if the order of sale was coram non judice, then the 'sale' was no sale, and it could not be made valid and binding by any number of so-called confirmations. The sale being void, there was no subject matter upon which the order of confirmation could act. If the Court had no jurisdiction to order the sale it had none to confirm it. Where there is no power to render a judgment or to make an order, there can be none to confirm or execute it; or none, at least, without the help of legislation." These statements were made in view of the statutory proceeding then provided for a sale, which included a petition for sale, a notice of hearing it, and an order of sale, to be followed by a return of sale, notice, and order of confirmation, and the court evidently regarded this whole proceeding as a unit, with the order of sale the principal element, or judgment, and all the following steps merely ancillary or subordinate to it. On this view of the matter the proceedings leading up to the order of sale would be a part of the record of the order of confirmation and if they showed any fatal defect it would be deemed to be carried over, of record, to the latter order. On any other view, the language just quoted appears inconsistent with the rule above stated in regard to the manner of obtaining jurisdiction of the subject matter, for if the proceeding for confirmation were independent of what had gone before, the allegation of a valid sale in the return of sale would give the court jurisdiction to determine whether there was such a sale. Of course the order of confirmation there showed that the order of sale was void, so the language quoted was not strictly necessary to the decision.

[8, 9] The fact that there was no sale to Gaston does not appear anywhere in the record of the probate proceeding for confirmation of the sale. Ordinarily, therefore, such fact could not be shown by evidence outside of the record for the purpose of avoiding the order of confirmation in a collateral attack thereon. Except as the plaintiff seeks by this action to set aside the order for fraud, this is a collateral attack on the order. Plaintiff, however, calls our attention to the admission of the fact in the pleadings in this case and the introduction of evidence of it without objection and contends that this works an exception to the rule above stated, or rather that thereby the case is put in the same legal condition as if the fact of no sale actually appeared in the record of the confirmation. In support of this contention plaintiff cites Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 1889, 79 Cal. 188, 191, 21 P. 728; People v. Harrison, 1895, 107 Cal. 541, 546, 40 P. 956; Akley v. Bassett, 1922, 189 Cal. 625, 639, 209 P. 576; Follette v. Pacific L. & P. Co., 1922, 189 Cal. 193, 205, 208 P. 295, 23 A.L.R. 965, and Estate of Ivory, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 22, 30, 31, 98 P.2d 761. These cases all relate to jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, not to jurisdiction of the subject matter, and none of them holds that jurisdiction of the latter disappears merely because the allegations showing it turn out to be untrue. We find nothing in any of them to suggest, for instance, that proceedings to collect or renew a superior court judgment would be defeated if the judgment creditor should admit, contrary to his pleading and the finding, that the value of the subject matter of the action was below the jurisdiction of that court. The holding of these cases is thus summed up in Estate of Ivory, supra, 37 Cal.App.2d at page 31, 98 P.2d at page 766: "These cases establish the rule that, although a judgment cannot be collaterally attacked because of lack of service, if that fact is stipulated to, the judgment must be read as if that fact appeared on the face of the judgment. In such event the judgment is then void on its face." We see no reason to apply this rule to a case like that at bar, involving only jurisdiction of the subject matter.

[10] None of the rules above stated prevent one in the plaintiff's situation from bringing an action to set aside the order by reason of fraud and this the plaintiff here has undertaken to do. She alleges that she was induced to sign the return of sale and consent to the order of confirmation, and to sign the deed, if she did so, by reason of fraud perpetrated on her by Taylor, who was a lawyer and had at one time been her attorney of record in the estate and continued to be her confidential friend and legal adviser in estate matters, although retiring as attorney of record, and who falsely represented to her that a sale of the property in question was necessary and that it had been sold to Gaston. Taylor later took the title by deed from Gaston. Further details of the fraud are alleged, but need not be recapitulated here. A person acquiring title to property in good faith and for value, under a judgment not void on its face, and without knowledge or notice of fraud by which it was procured, is fully protected against one assailing the judgment for fraud. Newport v. Hatton, 1929, 207 Cal. 515, 519, 279 P. 134; Garrison v. Blanchard, 1932, 127 Cal.App. 616, 622, 16 P.2d 273; Wood v. Roach, 1932, 125 Cal.App. 631, 640, 14 P.2d 170. We think this rule must be applied to protect defendants from the charge of fraud here.

[11] Plaintiff's contention in this matter is that she was in possession of the property by her tenants at the time defendants bought it, and therefore defendants took it subject to her rights. It is not claimed that they had any actual knowledge regarding them. It appears that after the deeds from plaintiff to Gaston and from Gaston to Taylor, plaintiff continued to rent the property and collect rent from the tenants as she had done before. She testified that she did this on her own account. Assuming this to be the fact, it is not sufficient, under the circumstances of this case, as the trial court could have viewed them, to charge the defendants with notice of her rights. It is true that possession of land by one other than the seller is sufficient to put an intending purchaser upon inquiry as to the rights of such person in possession, and charges the purchaser with knowledge of all that such inquiry, if pursued, might have developed (J. R. Garrett Co. v. States, 1935, 3 Cal.2d 379, 383, 44 P.2d 538), but if such inquiry is made, the purchaser is not charged with notice of anything beyond what it discloses. Porter v. Johnson, 1916, 172 Cal. 456, 156 P. 1022.

[12, 13] In this case, inquiry of the actual tenants would have led the defendants to plaintiff, as their landlord, we may assume. It appears that defendants did come in contact with plaintiff before the sale. The defendant James E. Brown appears to have acted, throughout the transaction, for the other defendant, who is his wife; and, no contention being made to the contrary, we assume she must bear the burdens, and is also entitled to the benefits, of his acts and information in negotiating the purchase. Before the contract of purchase was signed, James E. Brown visited Taylor, who told Brown that he, Taylor, had a woman taking care of the rents and that she would go over them with Brown and introduce him to the tenants. Taylor called plaintiff from his office, and next day, but still before the purchase was consummated, plaintiff met Brown at the office of the real estate broker by whom the deal was handled and said to him, "I came down to check the rents with you." She also said to Brown at this time that she was "collecting the rent for Mr. Taylor." The word "for" has many meanings. It is often used to import an agency, and when so used means "as agent of" or "in behalf of". 26 C.J 791. Such is the most obvious interpretation of it as used in this statement of plaintiff. She argues now that this statement might merely mean that Taylor was her agent and that when she collected rent she turned the money over to him to use on her behalf. This puts a strained and unusual meaning on the word "for" and we see no reason why the trial court should have so understood it, or should have attributed that understanding of it to defendants. After this conversation plaintiff went with Brown to the property and introduced him to several of the tenants, saying that he "was going to be the new purchaser of the property." She also told him that she owned some of the furniture in the property and offered to sell it to him, stated that some of the rents were unpaid and she would come back to attempt their collection and the sale of the furniture to tenants and asked him what he was paying for the property, but at no time told him that she claimed an interest in the property. Plaintiff, as a witness, denies most of the facts just recited, which were testified to by Brown or the real estate broker, but in view of the trial court's decision for defendants we must accept them as facts. We think they are sufficient to relieve defendants from the rule imputing to a purchaser notice of the rights of the possessor. Here defendants found the possessor, who, in effect, told them her possession was in behalf of the seller with whom they were dealing, said nothing of her own rights, and treated them as persons who would become owners of the property by the transaction. The case is very much like Porter v. Johnson, supra, 1916, 172 Cal. 456, 156 P. 1022 1023, where plaintiff, the buyer, talked to the occupant, who to his knowledge had an uncompleted contract of purchase, and she told him that she consented to a sale of the property to him by her vendor, saying nothing of any other rights she claimed in the property. Later she claimed that the contract was a mortgage in disguise, but it was held that her possession did not charge plaintiff with notice of her rights in this respect, the court saying: "The defendant relies on decisions to the effect that possession by her was notice of her claim sufficient to put the plaintiff upon inquiry at the time of his purchase. This proposition is not disputed. The answer is that, under the circumstances as appearing to the plaintiff, and under the statements made by the defendant herself, there was no occasion for inquiry. The possession of the defendant was fully explained, and it was in no manner inconsistent with the proposition that the investment company owned the legal title and was selling it with the consent and for the benefit of the defendant. The principle contended for is well established, but it has no application to the present case."

Defendants contend that for several reasons plaintiff is estopped from asserting her title, that is, the title of the estate, against them. "An executor or administrator, in his capacity as such, is as much bound by the laws of estoppel as if he were acting in his individual capacity." 23 C.J. 1178; see, also, Larco v. Casaneuava, 1866, 30 Cal. 560, 569. The plaintiff in her return of sale and in her deed of the property to Gaston stated the fact which she now seeks to deny, that is, that there had been a sale of the property to Gaston. Defendants and Taylor entered into a contract of sale which required Taylor to furnish a "guarantee" showing his title to be free and clear, and they also placed the matter in escrow with a title company under instructions calling for such a title to be insured by a policy running to defendants, and the transaction was closed through this escrow; from all of which the court might properly infer that the title company investigated the title, examined the documents just mentioned, and by means of the policy issued communicated the results of such examination to defendants, and that the defendants in legal effect relied on the facts stated in the return and deed.

[14-17] The legal rule applicable to this situation is thus stated in section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "The following presumptions, and no others, are deemed conclusive: * * * 2. The truth of the facts recited, from the recital in a written instrument between the parties thereto, or their successors in interest by a subsequent title; but this rule does not apply to the recital of a consideration; * * *." This provision is applicable to plaintiff's deed, for defendants are the successors in interest of her grantee by a subsequent title. Recitals by deeds, it has been held, do not constitute estoppels when they are immaterial and not contractual or essential to the purposes of the instrument. 31 C.J.S. Estoppel, § 37, p. 215; 21 C.J. 1091; Osborne v. Endicott, 1856, 6 Cal. 149, 153, 65 Am.Dec. 498; Ingersoll v. Truebody, 1871, 40 Cal. 603, 610. But a recital of the giving of a notice which is necessary to the validity of the deed is material and is binding on the grantor as an estoppel. Simson v. Eckstein, 1863, 22 Cal. 580, 592. A recital in a deed made by an executor as such that he has letters testamentary is conclusive against him as to this fact. Larco v. Casaneuava, supra, 1866, 30 Cal. 560, 569. Recitals in the deed of a city that certain proceedings necessary to authorize the deed have been taken are binding on the city. Gordon v. City of San Diego, 1894, 101 Cal. 522, 527, 36 P. 18, 40 Am.St.Rep. 73. So here, the making of a sale to Gaston was one of the facts necessary to support plaintiff's deed to him and its recital in the deed is binding on plaintiff.

[18, 19] In opposition to the claim of estoppel plaintiff argues that an estoppel to dispute a fact does not arise unless the party against whom it is urged is "apprised of the true state of his own title" when he does the acts claimed to constitute an estoppel, citing Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 1859, 14 Cal. 279, 367, 368, in support of the argument. This case has been cited and followed in many later cases and the rule declared by it must be regarded as settled in this state. But it relates only to an estoppel by conduct, otherwise known as an estoppel in pais. This is a different matter from an estoppel by deed. The latter is provided for by the part of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure above quoted, and that does not state any such qualification to the estoppel, which is therein stated in the form of a conclusive presumption. No authority is cited to show any such limitation on an estoppel by deed, and the rules regarding such estoppels, as set forth in 31 C.J.S., Estoppel, §§ 36–39, pp. 213–219, do not state any such limitation. We think there is none. One who recites a material fact in his deed must at his own peril make sure of the truth of the recital and cannot later be heard to deny the existence of such fact merely because he was ignorant of the truth or deceived in regard to it, as against one entitled to rely on the estoppel.

[20, 21] Other estoppels claimed by defendants do arise from conduct. The conduct of plaintiff in her communications to and dealings with defendants in connection with the sale of the property to them by Taylor, which we have already recited, are sufficient to raise this sort of estoppel. Porter v. Johnson, supra, 1916, 172 Cal. 456, 156 P. 1022. The act of plaintiff in making a return of a sale to Gaston and stating therein that a sale to him had been made is sufficient to create an estoppel to dispute the fact of a sale, in favor of defendants, who, as the trial court could properly infer, relied upon that return and statement. Conceding that plaintiff's knowledge of the real facts is necessary to these estoppels, we find evidence of such knowledge. Defendants' Exhibit A, which is in evidence, is an affidavit purporting to be signed and sworn to by plaintiff July 7, 1937. She admitted that the signature to it was hers, but testified that when she signed the affidavit it contained only a part of the matter now appearing in it. Her testimony is uncertain on the question whether the part of the affidavit we are about to quote was in it when she signed it. Plaintiff further testified that she signed the affidavit at Taylor's office, then went to the notary with it and the notary did not notarize it, and plaintiff brought it back to Taylor and left it with him. The notary before whom the affidavit purports to have been made testified that plaintiff "executed" it in her presence and the witness "notarized" it, but had no recollection of the details of the incident. It was a question of fact for the trial court to determine whether the affidavit as signed was the same as that presented in court, and we must presume a decision that it was, which is binding on us. The affidavit contains this statement: "On March 1–35 the court ordered me to sell at once all the property then belonging to said estate, and I therefore carried through a probate sale of said property—(Lots one and eight of the Blondeau Tract with the buildings thereon and the furniture therein) to William Gaston. The fixed price was $10,000 gross, or $5,670 net, subject to liens and incumbrances amounting to more than $4,330. But Gaston couldn't raise the $5,670 and we couldn't get another offer from anyone. In order to avoid the expense of a second probate sale, enable us to hold the property for a better market, and enable me, in the meantime, to receive the rents thereof, I arranged with T. O. Taylor to take the title in his own name, through Gaston, hold it as long as he could, sell it for the best price obtainable, apply the net proceeds on my indebtedness to him, and meanwhile take care of all my litigation. The date of said transaction was July 1–35, and T. O. Taylor has fully kept and performed his agreement." The property described is that involved in this action. This is sufficient to show plaintiff's knowledge, at all times material here, that there was in fact no sale to Gaston.

[22, 23] Plaintiff contends that this affidavit was signed by her at the request of Taylor, who was then her legal adviser, and that it is therefore presumed to have been obtained by undue influence, which presumption is not rebutted, and for that reason it cannot be used in evidence against her as an admission. The evidence of the fact on which this argument depends is doubtful. Plaintiff's testimony does not show that Taylor requested the signature, but only that it was made in his presence. In view of plaintiff's interest in the case and the various contradictions of her testimony in the record, in regard to this affidavit and other matters, the trial court may have rejected her testimony on this point. But if it be accepted as true and showing the affidavit was made at Taylor's request, no authority is cited in support of plaintiff's contention. While it is the rule that all transactions between attorney and client by which the attorney obtains an advantage over his client are presumptively invalid (3 Cal.Jur. 624; Civil Code, § 2235), we know of no rule that a written statement of fact signed by the client at the attorney's request, even though it may conceivably be useful to the attorney at some time as evidence in a controversy with the client, is to be regarded as an "advantage" to which this rule applies. All the cases cited by plaintiff to the rule above stated and all others which have come to our attention relate to contracts or other business dealings, or to matters affecting property, such as wills, deeds, gifts and other transfers. In 31 C.J.S., Evidence, § 298, p. 1067 and 22 C. J. 329, in the articles on Evidence, we find the rule that "The time and place of the making of an extrajudicial admission and the circumstances surrounding the admission bear only on its weight and not on its competency as evidence"; but neither in these articles, nor in the discussion of the subject of extrajudicial admissions in 4 Wigmore on Evidence, 3d (1940) Ed., §§ 1048 to 1087, do we find a hint of any such rule as that for which plaintiff now contends. The applicable rule is that just quoted from Corpus Juris and C.J.S. The affidavit was properly admitted in evidence and the matters now raised against it go only to its weight, on which the trial court's decision is binding on us.

Plaintiff's other contentions have been considered and found not determinative of the appeal, and it is not deemed necessary to lengthen this opinion by further discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. YECNY.

Cr. 1797.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 20, 1942.

1. Perjury 🔑33(1)

Evidence warranted conviction for perjury of woman who having described to deputy district attorney and constable acts of sex perversion committed upon her by her husband testified in preliminary examination denying that she had ever made any such statement. Pen.Code, §§ 118, 288a.

2. Criminal law 🔑829(3)

Where jury was instructed that the specific intent willfully to swear falsely as to material facts known to the accused to be untrue coupled with the act of making such false statements under oath was necessary to warrant conviction for perjury, it was not error to refuse to give requested instructions to the same effect seeking to emphasize supposed misunderstanding by alleged perjurer of the questions put to her and the possibility of perjured testimony having been given under duress, particularly in the absence of any evidence of such misunderstanding or duress. Pen.Code, § 118.

3. Criminal law 🔑713

Closing argument of district attorney in prosecution for perjury that because of accused's false statements at preliminary examination charges against her husband of sex perversion committed upon accused had been dismissed and that accused ought to be punished therefor did not constitute "misconduct" preventing accused from securing a fair and impartial trial. Pen.Code, §§ 118, 288a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Misconduct".

4. Criminal law 🔑1037(1, 2)

Where admonition to jury to disregard misconduct of district attorney will remove its prejudicial effect, possible effect upon jury of improper argument or other misconduct of district attorney will not be considered on appeal, unless accused promptly called the attention of the court to alleged impropriety and assigned misconduct thereon, or requested court to admonish jury to disregard the improper argument or conduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Gertrude Yecny was convicted of the crime of perjury, and she appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

W. A. McGugin and Nicholas H. Dubsick, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and J. Q. Brown, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Appellant was convicted of the crime of perjury, it being charged in the information that she gave false testimony after being sworn as a witness at a preliminary examination in a case in which her husband, James A. Yecny, had been charged with a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code, to-wit, certain sex perversions. The perjured testimony with which appellant was charged consisted of answers made, in which she denied having had a conversation on October 8, 1941, in which she stated that James A. Yecny had committed sex perversions upon her on several specific dates.

Upon the trial, the shorthand reporters who had taken down appellant's statement on October 8, 1941, and also the testimony at the preliminary examination, were called as witnesses, and said statement and testimony were introduced in evidence. In addition, several witnesses testified to having heard appellant make the statements attributed to her on October 8, 1941, and also her testimony at the preliminary examination.

Appellant contends "that there is no evidence showing that appellant at any time freely and wilfully, and with freedom of thought and action, stated as true any material fact that she knew to be false." Appellant merely refers us "to the entire testimony at the trial as set forth in the reporter's transcript," and does not cite any testimony or go into any detail, or cite any authority. We have, however, read the record carefully, and it is quite clear therefrom that after making a statement to the deputy district attorney and the constable on October 9, 1941, in which she went into detail as to the acts of sex perversion committed upon her by James A. Yecny, appellant went upon the witness stand in the preliminary examination and denied ever having made any such statements, or any statement accusing her husband of sex perversion.

The crime of perjury is defined by section 118 of the Penal Code as follows:

"Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any of the cases in which such an oath may by law be administered, willfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury."

[1] There was ample evidence in the record to justify the jury in concluding that appellant wilfully and contrary to her oath, stated as true, material matter which she knew to be false.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instructions offered by appellant:

"1. You are instructed that the intent to swear falsely is the specific criminal intent that must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the district attorney to establish the crime of perjury and, if you find from the evidence that Mrs. Yecny was honestly mistaken in her testimony, you must then return a verdict of Not Guilty.

"2. You are instructed that, if you find the defendant, Mrs. Yecny, did not understand the questions put to her by Mr. Coffee when she was under oath, then you must find her Not Guilty.

"3. You are instructed that it is not perjury to swear to that which a witness honestly believes to be true.

"4. You are instructed that it is essential to the crime of perjury that the sworn statement be made with knowledge of its falsity by the perjurer and with freedom of thought and action in so far as menace, threats or kindred inducing causes are concerned and, if you find from the facts introduced in this case that Mrs. Yecny acted by reason of any menace, or threats and not without absolute freedom of thought on her part, then you must find her Not Guilty."

It will be observed that all of these instructions point to the necessity that the prosecution prove a specific intent to swear falsely before the crime of perjury can be proved, and that if the appellant was honestly mistaken in her belief that her statements were true, she cannot be convicted of perjury.

The court in the instant case gave the following instructions upon this point:

"You are instructed that every person who having taken an oath that he will testify truly before a duly elected, qualified and acting Justice of the Peace sitting as a magistrate, wilfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury.

"In every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence. Intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots or lunatics or affected with insanity. * * *

"The court further instructs the jury that it is not necessary to prove or establish all of the matters alleged and set up in the Information as constituting the charge of perjury against the defendant herein: It is sufficient if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prosecution has proven that any of the matters charged in the Information were so sworn to or testified by the defendant under oath on the occasion of the preliminary examination of the complaint against James A. Yecny, as charged in the Information, and that the same is proven by the prosecution, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have been false and untrue at the time the same was sworn to, or testified to, to the then knowledge of the defendant, as charged in the Information, and that the same was material.

"You are instructed that criminal intent is a vital element in the crime of perjury, and if you find from the facts of this case that Mrs. Yecny did not have any criminal intent in making the statements as alleged in the Information, then you must find her Not Guilty."

The court also instructed the jury:

"A witness is presumed to tell the truth. This presumption, however, may be overcome by the manner in which such witness testifies, as well as by other circumstances or conditions such as may be used in testing the credibility of any witness, as I have heretofore instructed you. If you are convinced that a witness has sworn falsely to a material matter, and being convinced that such false testimony was not the result of mistake or inadvertence, but wilfully given with the design to deceive, then all of the testimony of such witness should be disregarded by you, unless such testimony or any portion thereof may be supported by other testimony entitled to greater weight, or for other reasons you may be convinced that the witness has testified truthfully as to a portion of his or her testimony."

[2] We believe the instructions given by the trial court covered all the material matter which was included in the proposed instructions of the appellant. The jury, in determining whether or not the appellant knew the nature of the questions, and fully understood her answers to them, and whether she was under any duress or menace, was determining her criminal intent. We see no reason for the court to have gone into further detail as to how the jury should have arrived at its decision in determining criminal intent. The evidence does not indicate that the false testimony for defendant was induced by reason of threats, menace or duress, and her own testimony suggests evasiveness rather than any lack of understanding of the questions asked her.

In the case of People v. Mizer, 37 Cal. App.2d 148, at page 154, 99 P.2d 333, at page 336, where perjury was defined by the court in its instructions in the language of the statute, this court had the following to say in regard to the necessary instructions regarding intent in a perjury case:

"The jury was properly instructed with respect to the intent with which the false testimony was given. Perjury was defined in the language of the statute. The jury was plainly told they could not convict the defendant unless it appeared beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that, under oath, in a trial before a competent court, he wilfully testified falsely as to material facts, which were not only false, but which he knew to be untrue. It follows that such false testimony is necessarily given with the deliberate intent to deceive the jurors or the court with respect to the essential facts involved."

[3, 4] Lastly, appellant complains "that the district attorney committed error in his argument, and denied appellant a fair and impartial trial." In his closing argument the district attorney asserted in rather strong language that, because of the perjury of appellant, "this filthy man here (referring to James Yecny, appellant's husband), has been dismissed and goes scott free, and this woman ought to be punished for it." We do not believe that the district attorney exceeded the bounds of legitimate argument in this case. Furthermore, counsel for defendant did not assign said, or any statements of the district attorney as misconduct, or ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. As is stated in 8 California Jurisprudence, page 508:

> "It is a general rule that where an admonition to the jury to disregard misconduct of the district attorney will remove its prejudicial effect, the possible effect upon a jury of improper argument or other misconduct of a district attorney will not be considered upon appeal, unless the defendant promptly called the attention of the court to the alleged impropriety and assigned misconduct thereon, or requested the court to admonish the jury to disregard it. The reason for this rule is that the court should be given the opportunity to correct the irregularity to prevent any prejudicial effect, if that be possible."

In view of the foregoing, we conclude that appellant was fairly tried, that the judgment of conviction is supported by sufficient evidence, and that there is no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAGUIRE et al. v. HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. et al.

EDWARDS et al. v. SAME.

CRILLY v. SAME.

CROWLEY v. SAME.

Civ. 11584, 11586, 11590, 11593.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

July 23, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 22, 1942.

1. Banks and banking 🔑293

Under by-laws and rules of incorporated savings and loan society providing that those who signed by-laws and paid entrance fees should be considered members, and otherwise referring to "members and stockholders", all "stockholders" were necessarily "members", but all "members" were not necessarily "stockholders". St.1853, p. 87.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Member" and "Stockholder".

2. Action 🔑6

Actions in 1934 for declaratory judgments as to plaintiffs' membership in incorporated savings and loan society, which would involve investigation of plans, intentions, and acts of original incorporators and their associates from 1859 to 1864, were barred by "staleness of claims". St.1853, p. 87; St.1862, p. 199.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Staleness of Claim".

3. Action 🔑63

The defense of "staleness of claim" exists independently of any statute of limitations, and does not rest alone upon the doctrine of "laches".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Laches".

4. Action 🔑63

A "stale demand or claim" is one that has for a long time remained unasserted, one that is first asserted after unexplained delay of such great length as to render it difficult or impossible for court to ascertain truth of matters in controversy and do justice between the parties, or as to create presumption against existence or validity of claim, or presumption that it has been abandoned or satisfied.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Stale Demand or Claim".

5. Action 🔑63

Strictly speaking, "laches" and "staleness of claim" are distinct conceptions, and staleness of claim necessarily implies great lapse of time, while, to constitute laches, delay need not necessarily be long continued.

6. Action 🔑63

To constitute "laches", change in conditions must have occurred that would render it inequitable to enforce a claim, while no such change need have occurred in order to make defense of "staleness of claim" available.

7. Action 🔑63

The defense of staleness of claim is recognized in California.

8. Pleading ⚿193(4)

The defense of staleness of claim is available on demurrer when such staleness appears on face of complaint.

9. Banks and banking ⚿307

Under by-laws of incorporated savings and loan society providing that, until otherwise provided, depositors should be entitled to same share of profits and same dividends as members, depositors who were not members were not entitled to share with members in reserve fund on reincorporation of society as a capital stock corporation. Civ. Code, § 1643; St.1853, p. 87; St.1862, p. 199.

SPENCE, Justice.

The above entitled appeals have been submitted on one set of briefs as precisely the same questions are involved in all four cases. Plaintiffs in said actions sought declaratory relief as alleged members of and as alleged depositors in defendant The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, a corporation. In each case defendants interposed a general and special demurrer to the final complaint therein, a motion to strike portions thereof and a motion to dismiss the action upon the ground that declaratory relief was not "necessary or proper." Code of Civil Procedure, section 1061. The trial court entered a written order in each case containing several provisions. Defendants' demurrer to the final complaint in each case was sustained without leave to amend upon the grounds specified in the order including the ground that neither the final complaint nor the first or second count thereof stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer in each case was sustained upon the further ground that the alleged causes of action were barred by the statute of limitations and by laches. It was further ordered in each case that the motion to dismiss, made under section 1061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be granted. The order in each case expressly recited that other grounds of demurrer, including those set forth in the special demurrer, were not passed upon and likewise that the motion to strike portions of the final complaint was not passed upon. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendants in each of said actions. An appeal was thereupon taken by the plaintiff or plaintiffs in each of said actions from the judgment so entered.

As the final complaint in each of said four actions contained substantially the same allegations, we will discuss the allegations of the final complaint in Maguire v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society et al., No. 11584, in the same manner as though that case was the only one before us and we will make only passing reference to the allegations in the final complaints in the other three actions. Before proceeding to such discussion, however, it appears appropriate to refer generally to the historical background of this litigation. This background may be gleaned from the allegations of the final complaint, the early statutes of this state relating to corporations and from facts which are matters of common knowledge and of which we may take judicial notice.

In 1859, The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society was organized as a corporation under the act of 1853 entitled "An Act To Provide for the Formation of Corporations for Certain Purposes." St.1853, p. 87. By section 25 of that act, chapter five of the act of 1850 entitled "An Act Concerning Corporations" (St.1850, p. 347) was repealed. The act of 1850 had been divided into chapters providing for the formation of corporations for various purposes but there was no provision in said act for the formation of corporations for the purpose of conducting the business of banking. Chapter five of the act of 1850 provided only for the formation of corporations "for the purpose of carrying on any kind of manufacturing, mining, mechanical, or chemical business." Said chapter five was replaced by the act of 1853 which provided for "Corporations for manufacturing, mining, mechanical, or chemical purposes, or for the purpose of engaging in any species of trade or commerce. * * *" St.1853, p. 87, § 1. Four corporations, including The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, purported to incorporate between 1853 and 1862 under said act of 1853 for the purpose of conducting the business of savings banks, but the question was soon raised as to whether savings banks could be legally incorporated thereunder. See Archbald, Savings Banks of California, 2 Overland Monthly 363. In 1862, there was enacted "An Act to Provide for the Formation of Corporations for the Accumulation and Investment of Funds and Savings." St.1862, p. 199. This was the first act relating to corporations which specifically provided for the formation of corporations for the purpose of conducting the business of savings banks. Thereafter and in 1864, section 27 of said act of 1862 was amended to provide that: "All corporations for the accumulation, preservation, and investment of funds and savings, all Savings and Loan Societies, and all associations or societies for the like purpose, claiming in good faith to be incorporated under the laws of this State, may avail themselves of the provisions of and become incorporated under this Act by filing with the County Clerk of the county in which their principal place of business is located, and a certified copy thereof in the Office of the Secretary of State, a certificate stating their intention and election to become so incorporated, which intention and election may be made and declared by the Trustees or Acting Trustees of such corporation, association, or society, or a majority thereof. * * * Such certificate shall in other respects conform to the requirements of this Act." Stats. 1863–64, p. 531. In 1864, The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society availed itself of the provisions of the act of 1864 by filing the certificate above mentioned.

Neither plaintiffs nor defendants question the validity of the original incorporation of 1859 under the act of 1853 or the reincorporation of 1864 under the act of 1862 as amended in 1864. Plaintiffs' claim of membership in the defendant corporation, as reincorporated in 1864, is based upon the original deposit of plaintiffs' predecessor, Michael Maguire, which original deposit was made in 1862 with the corporation organized in 1859. It is alleged that at the time of the original deposit in 1862, a passbook was issued to Michael Maguire containing a copy of the by-laws then existing. It is upon the alleged contract which came into existence at that time that plaintiffs predicate their present claim of membership as successors in interest of Michael Maguire. It therefore becomes necessary first to discuss briefly the act of 1853, the incorporation thereunder in 1859 and the by-laws adopted in 1859 and, thereafter, to discuss briefly the act of 1862 as amended, the incorporation thereunder in 1864 and the by-laws adopted in 1864 and later.

The Act of 1853, the Incorporation Under Said Act in 1859, and the By-Laws Adopted in 1859.

The act of 1853, St. 1853, p. 87, appears to contain many of the provisions ordinarily found in statutes providing for the formation of corporations of specified classes. It will suffice to call attention to a few provisions thereof. It provided only for the formation of corporations having a capital stock and made no provision for the formation of corporations without capital stock. In other words, there were no provisions for corporations to be composed of members rather than stockholders. It was required that the certificate of incorporation should state the amount of the capital stock and the number of shares of which the stock should consist. § 2. The corporate powers were to be exercised by a board of not less than three trustees who were to be elected by the stockholders. § 5. A stockholders' liability was imposed (§ 16) in conformity with the provisions of section 36 of article IV of the Constitution of 1849. The act also contained the provision that "the total amount of the debts of the corporation shall not at any time exceed the amount of the capital stock actually paid in." § 14.

The certificate of incorporation of 1859 provided for a capital stock of $600,000 consisting of 6,000 shares. It also set forth the other matters required by the act. Eleven trustees were named therein and it was signed by twenty incorporators. Plaintiffs' predecessor was not among the incorporators. Our attention is called to the statement therein by the incorporators "that we have associated ourselves together for the purpose of forming a Society, and that we desire to incorporate the same under" the act of 1853; and the further statement "that the object for which it is formed is, that by means of it the members thereof may be enabled to find a secure and profitable investment for small savings, and may have an opportunity of obtaining from it the use of a moderate capital, on giving good and sufficient security for the repayment of the same." We note the further statement in said certificate "that the Society shall go into operation as soon as thirty shares shall have been subscribed for, and an installment of five dollars per share paid thereon."

At the time of the incorporation in 1859, by-laws and rules of order were adopted. Our attention is called to the preamble which recited: "We, the undersigned, being desirous of forming a Society, by means of which its members may be enabled to find a secure and profitable investment for small savings, do, each for himself, covenant, promise and agree to and with all the other subscribers hereto, that the following By-Laws shall govern us, and determine our mutual duties, rights and privileges, as members of such Society." The by-laws stated the amount of capital stock as $600,000 and the number of shares as 6,000. It was provided that "Those who shall sign these By-Laws in the book to be kept for that purpose by the Secretary, and pay the entrance fee of two dollars, shall be styled and considered members of this corporation. Those, who, in addition to the above, shall hold one or more shares of its Stock, shall further be styled and considered Stockholders. * * * The entrance fee will in no case be repaid or credited back, but shall be considered part of the sinking fund hereinafter provided for." It was provided that the trustees should be elected by the stockholders and further provided that one of the trustees should be "elected by the Society" as President and another as Vice President. The members were "at liberty to make deposits" in sums of not less than $2.50. Each depositor was to be furnished with a pass-book having a printed copy of the by-laws appended to it, in which pass-book his deposits were to be entered. It was provided that "As soon as the amount to his credit shall form a full share, he shall be entitled to a Certificate of Stock, up to the number of twenty shares, the corresponding debt being entered on his pass-book, and such share may be transferred on the books of the Society to any member of the same, by the owner paying a fee of Fifty Cents, for the transfer of each share, and surrendering the Certificate which shall be marked 'cancelled' on its face; but whenever a member would thereby become the owner of more than twenty shares, then the excess over this number shall become a simple deposit, as contemplated in the preceding article, and shall be credited to the owner thereof on his pass-book." Provision was made for monthly meetings and annual meetings "of the Society" as well as monthly meetings of the board of trustees. Special meetings "of the Society" were to be called upon written request of ten stockholders and notice thereof was to be given to the "members and stockholders." The funds of the society were to be employed (1) "in refunding to members the whole or part of their shares, or deposits, which shall be done in order of their applications"; (2) in loans on shares in the society; and (3) in loans to members at one per cent per month, the funds being put up at auction by the presiding officer at the meetings of the society and being awarded to the member bidding the greatest premium. The by-laws could be amended only by three-fourths of the shares represented at a meeting of the society. It was also provided that "No money shall at any time be borrowed, nor shall any debt be contracted, for account, or in the name of this society."

[1] Other provisions of said by-laws and rules of order will be noted as the occasion may require. We may merely state here that as we understand the contentions of the parties, plaintiffs contend that the words "members" and "stockholders" were used synonymously in said by-laws and rules of order while defendants contend that the word "members," as used therein, was synonymous with "depositors." A reading of said by-laws and rules of order convinces us that the provisions thereof were somewhat anomalous, but it seems entirely clear that while all "stockholders" were necessarily "members," it may not be said that all "members" were "stockholders."

The Act of 1862 as Amended, the Incorporation Under Said Act in 1864, and the By-Laws Adopted in 1864 and Later.

The act of 1862, St.1862, p. 199, as already noted, was an act providing specifically for the incorporation of savings banks. That act permitted the formation of such corporations with or without a capital stock. § 2 and § 17. The corporate powers of such corporation were to be exercised by a board of not less than five directors who were required to be stockholders in the event that a capital stock was provided in the certificate of incorporation, or "members, each having deposits with the corporation to the amount of at least one hundred dollars," in the event that the corporation had no capital stock. § 6. In the case of corporations having no capital stock, the directors were required to retain, on each dividend day, at least five per cent of the net profits, to constitute a reserve fund. The disposal of any reserve fund in excess of $100,000 could be provided for in the by-laws. § 11. One section of said act purported to exempt the stockholders or members of such corporations from any liability in the nature of a stockholders' or members' liability § 27, but said section was later declared unconstitutional. McGowan v. McDonald, 111 Cal. 57, 43 P. 418, 52 Am.St.Rep. 149.

The amendment of 1864, St.1863–64, p. 531, which has been mentioned above, permitted savings banks "claiming in good faith to be incorporated under the laws of this State" to become incorporated under the act of 1862. Such a corporation could become so incorporated whenever the trustees of such corporation declared the "intention and election" of the corporation to become so incorporated and filed the required certificate. § 27. There was no specific method provided, however, for reincorporating a corporation, previously existing as a capital stock corporation, into a corporation without a capital stock under said act of 1862 as amended.

Following the adoption of said amendment of 1864, a certificate of incorporation, dated August 29, 1864, was signed by the president and secretary and was filed. It contained the required statements and was accompanied by a copy of the resolution of the trustees declaring the intention and election to become incorporated under the act of 1862. Said resolution and said certificate recited that "said corporation shall have no capital stock."

On September 29, 1864, a new code of by-laws was adopted which expressly repealed all former by-laws. Being a membership corporation rather than a capital stock corporation, no mention was made of stockholders. With respect to membership, this code provided in section I, article 4 as follows: "All persons who were members of The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society on the twenty-ninth day of August, 1864, shall be deemed and considered members of this corporation, and the signatures of such persons to an agreement on their part to become members of this corporation, and ratifying and confirming the incorporation of said The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, as directed by a resolution of its Board of Trustees, adopted August 8th, 1864, shall be procured as speedily as may be. Other persons may be allowed to become members of this corporation by a vote of the Board of Directors, and not otherwise. Membership shall not pass with the ownership of moneys deposited with or under control of the corporation."

In 1867, the first portion of said article of the by-laws of 1864 was amended to apply only to those persons who were members on August 29, 1864, "and whose accounts have not since been closed." In 1868, said article was again amended to apply only to those persons who, on August 29, 1864, "had respectively not less than one hundred dollars to their credit." There was further added to the end of said article, a provision that "No one shall be deemed a member whose account is once closed." In 1870, said article was amended by changing the entire first portion of said article to read: "All persons, who, on November 1, 1870, had signed the agreement to become members of, and who then had accounts open with this Corporation, are deemed and considered members thereof." In 1871, the entire first portion of said article was again amended to read: "Those persons who, on January 17th, 1871, had signed the agreement to become members of The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society as a Corporation, incorporated and existing under an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled 'An Act to provide for the Formation of Corporations for the Accumulation and Investment of Funds and Savings,' approved April 11th, 1862, and who at the date aforesaid, had accounts open with said Corporation, shall be deemed and considered the only members thereof at that date."

In 1874, said article was further amended by changing the first portion thereof to read "The only members of this Corporation are the persons who have signed the agreement hereinafter described, and who have kept accounts open with the Corporation since they respectively signed said agreement." In 1886, an amendment was added reading "Any person shall cease to be a member of this Corporation, The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, who shall not have continuously and at all times, at least One Hundred Dollars to his or her credit upon an open deposit account on the books of this Corporation. Membership therein shall continue only so long as such credit shall exist, and shall cease whenever such credit shall cease to exist. Any provision of any By-Law in conflict with this By-Law is hereby repealed."

The record does not disclose any later amendment making any substantial change relating to membership. Other provisions of the by-laws adopted in 1864 or later will be mentioned as the occasion may require. We will now proceed to a discussion of the first and second counts of the final complaint.

First Count.

The first count of the final complaint is based upon plaintiffs' claim of the rights of a member of the defendant corporation. The incorporation of 1859 and the reincorporation of 1864 are alleged. The certificates are attached as exhibits as well as the various by-laws. As to the individual defendants, it is alleged that said defendants claim to be the only members of the defendant corporation and that "plaintiffs deny that said defendants, or any of them, are members of defendant The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society."

The theory of the first count appears to be that the incorporation of 1859, under the act of 1853, resulted in effect in the formation of a membership corporation rather than of a capital stock corporation because of the alleged "plan and intention" of the incorporators and their actions pursuant to such plan and intentions; that Michael Maguire, plaintiffs' predecessor, became a member of said corporation in 1862 and that plaintiffs as the successors in interest of Michael Maguire now have the rights of a member in the membership corporation formed in 1864; and that plaintiffs have the right as such member, and the individual defendants have not the right, to share in the alleged reserve fund of approximately $8,000,000 in the event that the present membership corporation may be reincorporated at any time as a capital stock corporation and the reserve fund converted into capital stock. It will be recalled that the act of 1853 provided only for the formation of corporations having a capital stock and made no provision for membership corporations.

The main allegations in support of plaintiffs' theory are found in paragraph four of the final complaint. Said paragraph reads as follows:

"That it was the plan and intention of the incorporators of said defendant The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society that said corporation should be conducted as a membership corporation, wherein the members were to be the owners, proprietors, and constituents of the corporation; that the members, stockholders and trustees carried out said plan, and no member, stockholder or trustee raised any objection thereto at any time; that the members of said corporation alone exercised the right to vote and to elect the trustees of said corporation and to amend the by-laws of said corporation, and to hold monthly, semi-annual, annual and special meetings of the corporation; and the trustees of said corporation at all times were elected from the members, not the stockholders of said corporation; that no dividends were ever declared or paid upon the outstanding stock of said corporation, but that all dividends were paid to the members upon their deposits.

"That no shares of stock of said corporation were issued prior to June 14, 1859; that during the period from June 14, 1859, to November 29, 1861, said corporation issued to certain members shares of stock in said corporation, but that no shares were issued subsequent to November 29, 1861; that after November 29, 1861, the outstanding shares were voluntarily surrendered, retired and cancelled; and that on or about June 27, 1863, all but four certificates had been retired and cancelled and the whereabouts of said four certificates were unknown, and after said last mentioned date the said corporation was composed of members only, none of whom held or owned any share or shares of stock; and that said members were the only owners, proprietors and constituents of the said corporation, recognized and considered as such by all persons interested in said corporation."

It is also alleged that in 1862, Michael Maguire entered into a "contract of membership" by signing the by-laws and by paying the entrance fee of two dollars; that a pass-book was issued to him showing the payment of said entrance fee and the deposit of the sum of $2,498; that since said time, Michael Maguire and his successors have continuously maintained a deposit evidenced by said pass-book, which deposit at the time of the commencement of this action in 1934 amounted to approximately $135; and that plaintiffs have succeeded to all the rights of said Michael Maguire as a member.

In further support of their theory, plaintiffs allege that no by-laws had ever been adopted by the members of the defendant corporation, other than the by-laws of 1859; that all by-laws adopted in 1864 and later, including those purporting to restrict membership, were invalid for the reason that all such by-laws were adopted by the directors and not by the members and such by-laws were adopted without any authority in law. It is alleged "That plaintiffs and each of them, and all their predecessors in interest have performed all conditions and requirements of all by-laws of the corporation, but have not performed the conditions and requirements of alleged by-laws referred to in paragraph IX hereof, except as to matters specifically alleged in this amended complaint." The "by-laws referred to in paragraph IX" are the by-laws adopted in 1864 and later.

Plaintiffs then allege in said final complaint the existence of an actual controversy between plaintiffs and defendants relating to the legal rights of the parties in the defendant corporation. The alleged claims of the parties are set forth at length and in some detail. Suffice it to state that it is alleged that plaintiffs claim the rights of a member in the present membership corporation as the successors in interest of Michael Maguire and further claim the defendants are not members and it is further alleged that these claims of plaintiffs are denied by defendants. The prayer of the complaint is that the court enter its judgment "declaring the rights and duties of plaintiffs and defendants in said defendant corporation."

Plaintiffs contend that the trial court erred in sustaining defendants' demurrer to said first count of the final complaint but in our opinion said contention cannot be sustained. Plaintiffs' claim of membership in the membership corporation incorporated in 1864 is based upon the several facts alleged in said first count of the final complaint. We believe the facts alleged therein are insufficient to sustain such claim. It may first be noted that there is no allegation that plaintiffs or their predecessors ever complied or offered to comply with any of the requirements of the by-laws of said membership corporation adopted in 1864 and later relating to membership. In fact, plaintiffs allege that plaintiffs and their predecessors "have not performed the conditions and requirements of alleged by-laws referred to in paragraph IX hereof. * * *" In other words, plaintiffs are not claiming membership under any by-law relating to membership adopted by the membership corporation incorporated in 1864 but are claiming membership therein solely because of the claimed status of Michael Maguire, their predecessor, as an alleged "member" of the corporation incorporated in 1859. As we view the contentions of the plaintiffs, it is conceded that the corporation incorporated in 1859 was formed under the act of 1853 which provided only for the formation of corporations having a capital stock and that the certificate of incorporation of 1859 and by-laws of said corporation provided for a capital stock. It is nevertheless contended that because of the claimed "plan and intention" and acts of the incorporators of 1859 and those associated with them from 1859 to 1864, a de facto membership corporation existed in 1864 immediately prior to and at the time of the reincorporation in that year; that Michael Maguire, plaintiffs' predecessor was a "member" and as such "member" was one of the "owners, proprietors and constituents" of said de facto membership corporation at that time; and that therefore Michael Maguire became ipso facto a "member" of the de jure membership corporation incorporated in 1864 without complying with any of the by-laws of said last mentioned corporation with respect to membership therein.

[2] While much is said in the briefs regarding the meaning of the word "member," as used in the by-laws and rules of order adopted in 1859, it appears unnecessary to discuss the contentions of the parties concerning the meaning of that word as so used or the contentions of the parties with respect to the legal effect of the alleged plan, intention and acts of the incorporators of 1859 and of those associated with them from 1859 to 1864. These questions and many others are not free from difficulty as appears from the exhaustive discussion of said questions by able counsel in presenting their conflicting views. As we see the situation, the striking feature of plaintiffs' contention is that it is entirely apparent therefrom that an investigation of the alleged facts upon which plaintiffs' theory is based would involve an investigation, in this action commenced in 1934, of the plan, intention and acts of persons in the year 1864 and prior thereto; and that there is nothing alleged in said complaint to show the reason for the failure of plaintiffs and their predecessors to institute such investigation at an earlier date through some appropriate proceeding. There is nothing in the complaint to show that plaintiffs or their predecessors ever claimed the right of membership in the corporation as reincorporated in 1864 or that they were ever willing to accept membership therein, with the obligations as well as rights incident thereto, at any time before said corporation had accumulated an alleged reserve fund of approximately $8,000,000. If they had claimed such right of membership after the reincorporation of 1864 and if that right had been denied them, the alleged facts now presented for investigation could have been investigated at that time and the issues of fact and law could have been determined many years ago when evidence relating to any material issues of fact would have been readily available. To ask a court for the first time in this action commenced in 1934 to investigate such claims, constitutes an attempt on the part of plaintiffs to secure an investigation by a court of equity of stale claims.

[3-6] The defense of the staleness of plaintiffs' claims is a defense which exists independently of any statute of limitations and it does not rest alone upon the doctrine of laches. United States v. Beebee, C.C., 17 F. 36, affirmed 127 U.S. 338, 8 S.Ct. 1083, 32 L.Ed. 121. In 30 C.J.S. 521, Equity, § 112, it is said: "A stale demand or claim in its proper sense is one that has for a long time remained unasserted; one that is first asserted after an unexplained delay of such great length as to render it difficult or impossible for the court to ascertain the truth of the matters in controversy and do justice between the parties, or as to create a presumption against the existence or validity of the claim, or a presumption that it has been abandoned or satisfied. Strictly speaking, laches and staleness of demand are distinct conceptions; staleness of claim necessarily implies great lapse of time, while to constitute laches, the delay need not necessarily be long continued. Another point of distinction lies in the fact that, to constitute laches a change in conditions must have occurred that would render it inequitable to enforce the claim, while no such change need have occurred in order to render the demand stale."

[7] This defense has long been recognized in this state. Garrity v. Miller, 204 Cal. 454, 268 P. 622; Emerson v. Kennedy, M. & M. Co., 169 Cal. 718, 147 P. 939; Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, 14 P. 791, 2 Am.St.Rep. 791; Elliott v. Bunce, 10 Cal. App. 741, 103 P. 897. The language used by the court in United States v. Beebee, C. C., 17 F. 36, is quoted with approval in Emerson v. Kennedy, supra, 169 Cal. at page 722, 147 P. at page 941, as follows: "The authorities support the proposition that lapse of time may be a good defense in equity, independently of any statute of limitations, and they show that the doctrine rests not alone upon laches; it is often put upon one or all of the following grounds, namely: First, that courts of equity must, for the peace of society and upon grounds of public policy, discourage stale demands by refusing to entertain them; second, that lapse of time will, if long enough, be regarded as evidence against the stale claim equal to that of credible witnesses, and which, being disregarded, would, in a majority of cases, lead to unjust judgments; third, that, after the witnesses who had personal knowledge of the facts have all passed away, it is impossible to ascertain the facts, and courts of equity will, on this ground, refuse to undertake such a task." Said language is again quoted with approval in Garrity v. Miller, supra, 204 Cal. at page 459, 268 P. at page 624.

[8] It has been held further that the defense of the staleness of a claim is available upon demurrer whenever the staleness of the claim appears upon the face of the complaint. In Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, at page 289, 14 P. 791, at page 793, 2 Am.St. Rep. 791, it is said, "It is contended, however, that this question cannot be raised on demurrer. But the preponderance of authority (and we think the better reason) is to the effect that it can. Lansdale v. Smith, 106 U.S. [391], 392, 1 S.Ct. 350, [27 L.Ed. 219]; Bliss v. Prichard, 67 Mo. [181] 189, 190; Shorter v. Smith, 56 Ala. [208] 210. The defense is, in substance, that the bill does not show equity; or, in the language of our statute, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This was one of the grounds of the demurrer; and if it had not been it would not have been waived, but could be taken at any time." See, also, Garrity v. Miller, 204 Cal. 454, 268 P. 622; Elliott v. Bunce, 10 Cal.App. 741, 103 P. 897.

We believe there can be no dispute here that the staleness of plaintiffs' claims appears upon the face of the first count of their final complaint and we conclude that the demurrer to the first count of plaintiffs' final complaint was properly sustained upon that ground. It therefore appears unnecessary to discuss the other grounds urged by defendants in support of the judgment of the trial court insofar as said judgment relates to said first count.

Second Count

The second count of the final complaint is based upon plaintiffs' claim to certain alleged rights as a depositor in the defendant corporation, in addition to their admitted right to receive the amount of the deposits in their account together with accrued "interest" thereon. The claim to greater rights is based upon certain by-laws adopted in 1864 and later, relating to depositors who were not members, which by-laws are treated as valid by plaintiffs for the purposes of the claims made by them in their second count.

Plaintiffs in the Maguire case allege the original deposit of $2,498 by Michael Maguire in 1862; the continued existence of a deposit to the time of the commencement of the action and the existence of a balance on deposit at that time of $135. Similar allegations are found in the final complaints in the other three actions alleging original deposits in varying amounts by predecessors of the plaintiffs therein between 1859 and 1864 and the existence of various small balances. In all other respects, the material allegations in the second counts of the four final complaints are the same and we will therefore discuss only the allegations appearing in the second count of the final complaint in the Maguire case.

In addition to the above-mentioned allegations, plaintiffs incorporate by reference several paragraphs of the first count. They then allege the adoption of certain by-laws relating to "profits" and "dividends" adopted in 1864 and later. It is plaintiffs' claim that by reason of these laws, plaintiffs as depositors, have the "same rights in the reserve fund . . . as any member of said corporation." It is alleged that an actual controversy exists for the reason that defendants deny that plaintiffs have such rights in the reserve fund or in any distribution thereof upon dissolution.

It is appropriate, before proceeding to a consideration of the alleged by-laws, to refer to some of the provisions of the act of 1862 as amended, under the authority of which act defendant corporation was reincorporated in 1864 and under the authority of which act said by-laws of 1864 and later were adopted. Said act made numerous references to "dividends," "earnings," "interest" and "profits." It first made provision for the formation of corporations "for the purpose of aggregating the funds and savings of the members thereof and others. * * *. § 1. It gave a corporation so formed the power to receive deposits, invest its funds "and to repay such deposits without interest, or with so much of the earnings and interest as the by-laws of the corporation may provide" and to make by-laws prescribing "the conditions on which deposits shall be received, the time and manner of dividing the profits." § 4, as amended by St. 1863–64, p. 159. It also provided "It shall not be lawful for the corporation, or the directors, to make any dividend, except from the surplus profits arising from the business of the corporation; and the directors shall, at such times and in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe, declare and pay dividends of so much of the profits of the company, and of the interest arising from the capital stock and deposits, as may be appropriated for that purpose by the provisions of the by-laws." § 10. It further provided that corporations could prescribe by by-laws "the time and conditions on which repayment is to be made to depositors. * * * And the directors of any corporation formed under this act, and having no capital stock, shall retain, on each dividend day, at least five per cent of the net profits of the corporation, to constitute a reserve fund, which shall be invested in the same manner as other funds of the corporation, * * * and the corporation may provide, by its by-laws, for the disposal of any excess in the reserve fund, over one hundred thousand dollars, and the final disposal, upon the dissolution of the corporation, of the reserve fund, or of the remainder thereof, after payment of losses." § 11. It required publication annually of a statement of "all depositors who shall have deposits, dividends, or interest, to their credit" and of whom the officers of the corporation had no knowledge for two years. § 16. It also made the directors, upon dissolution, the "trustees for the members and others interested in the corporation dissolved" and gave them "full power and authority to * * * divide among the members and stockholders, in such proportion as the by-laws shall direct, the money and other property that shall remain after the payment of all expenses. * * *" § 25.

Plaintiffs set forth in the second count of their final complaint the adoption of three by-laws following the reincorporation in 1864. The first is alleged to have been adopted in 1864 and to have read as follows: "The board of directors shall have the right to determine the terms and conditions upon which deposits will be received from persons not members of the corporation, and to make contracts in the name of the corporation with such persons for that purpose. Until otherwise provided by such contracts, depositors shall be entitled to the same share of profits as members." It is then alleged that said provision was amended in 1868 to read as follows: "The board of directors shall have the right to determine the terms and conditions upon which deposits will be received from persons not members of the corporation. Until otherwise provided, depositors shall be entitled to the same share of the profits as members." It is then alleged that said provision was repealed in 1888 and that a by-law was adopted in that year "providing that 'The board of directors shall have the right to determine the terms and conditions upon which deposits will be received' but that 'until otherwise provided by the board of directors, depositors who are not members shall get a dividend equal to that given to members.' That there has been no alteration of said last-mentioned provisions of said by-laws since October 19, 1888."

[9] In their opening brief, plaintiffs make reference to the by-laws of 1859 but it appears from their closing brief that they rely solely upon the by-laws adopted in 1864 and later to sustain the claim made in the second count. They seek to have the words "profits" and "dividend" as used in the above-quoted by-laws construed so that said provisions would mean that the depositors, who were not members, would be entitled to be paid not only the same periodical "dividend" or "interest" on deposits as that paid to members but would also be entitled to share in the reserve fund at some indefinite future time to the same extent as members. We do not believe that this construction is warranted.

The wording used in the quoted provisions of the by-laws of 1864, 1868 and 1888 differed to some extent but, in each instance, the phrase upon which plaintiffs rely commenced with the words "Until otherwise provided. * * *" The use of this phrase necessarily negatives the idea that it was intended to grant any right which would endure indefinitely and would continue until such time as there might be a dissolution of the corporation and a disposal of the reserve fund. It clearly implies that it was intended to grant a mere temporary right subject to termination. It therefore appears that the right granted must be construed as a right to share equally with members in the periodically declared "dividends" on deposits or in other words, a right to receive on the dividend days a rate of return on deposits equal to that received by members.

We believe this construction is borne out by a reading together of all of the provisions of the act of 1862 and of the by-laws adopted in 1864 and later. For example, article 15 of said by-laws of 1864, incorporated by reference into the second count, required the board of directors to ascertain the "net profits" at the meetings in January and July of each year and to set apart and credit to the reserve fund a part thereof not to exceed one-tenth and also to set apart an amount sufficient to pay a "dividend" to members and a "dividend to depositors"; and provided that "moneys withdrawn before the dividend for the current half year is due, shall be entitled to interest at the rate of one-half of one per cent per month. * * * Dividends not called for within fifteen days from the date of their being declared will be carried to the credit of whom it may concern and * * * treated in all respects as other deposits of members." A reading of said by-laws shows that the word "dividend" was used practically synonymously with "interest" as those words are commonly employed in connection with deposits in savings banks; and a reading together of all of said by-laws shows that it was equality of treatment with respect to "dividends" which was intended in the by-laws upon which plaintiffs rely.

We further believe that the above mentioned construction is borne out by a consideration of the practical difficulties which would be encountered if the portions of the by-laws upon which plaintiffs rely were given the construction for which plaintiffs contend. We have not been informed by plaintiffs of the proportions in which they believe that the reserve fund should be shared upon dissolution by the thousands of the then depositors and the thousands of former depositors in the defendant corporation. We know of no formula which could be used to determine such proportions and conclude that plaintiffs' construction would render the alleged contract between the defendant bank and its depositors incapable of being carried into effect. Such construction may not be adopted. Civ.Code, § 1643.

We further are of the opinion that any possible uncertainty which may have arisen from the use of the word "profits" in the quoted by-laws adopted in 1864 and 1868 was clarified by the adoption of the above mentioned by-law in 1888 which dropped the word "profits" and provided that depositors should get a "dividend equal to that given to members." This is the by-law which, according to plaintiffs' allegations, had been in effect for almost fifty years before this action was commenced. It is not alleged that the defendant corporation has ever given to members any "dividend" greater than that given to depositors other than members or that said corporation is threatening or intends to do so or claims the right to do so "until otherwise provided." On the contrary, plaintiffs allege that "no distribution of any dividend or share of profits has been made to any depositor or to any member" other than "interest." This allegation shows that depositors and members have been accorded the same treatment with respect to "profits" and "dividends," in the sense in which those terms were employed in the by-laws upon which plaintiffs rely. As we construe said by-laws it appears from the allegations of the final complaint that plaintiffs have been accorded their full rights, which rights will continue only while plaintiffs remain depositors and only "until otherwise provided."

We are therefore of the opinion that the second count of plaintiffs' final complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to show that plaintiffs have the rights claimed therein and we therefore conclude that the trial court properly sustained defendants' demurrer thereto. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the other grounds urged by defendants in support of the judgment of the trial court insofar as said judgment relates to said second count.

The judgments in the above entitled actions are, and each of them is, affirmed.

These three appeals are companion appeals to the appeals in Maguire v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society et al., 128 P.2d 149, and related cases, which last-mentioned appeals have been considered in an opinion this day filed.

These three cases differ slightly from the Maguire and related cases heretofore considered. In these three cases, the final complaints contained but one count, which count was somewhat similar to the first count of the final complaint in the Maguire case. In other words, the complaints in these cases involved the claims of plaintiffs as alleged "members" of the membership corporation incorporated in 1864, which claims were based upon original deposits made by the predecessors of plaintiffs between 1859 and 1864. The only material difference between the allegations in the final complaints in these three cases and the allegations in the first count of the final complaint in the Maguire case is that the allegations in each of these final complaints show that there had been no continuous maintenance of a deposit.

It therefore follows that if the demurrer to the first count of the final complaint in the Maguire case was properly sustained, the demurrers to the final complaints in these three cases were likewise properly sustained. We held that the demurrer to said first count in the Maguire case was properly sustained and we therefore hold that said demurrers to the final complaints in these three cases were properly sustained for the reasons stated in the opinion in the Maguire case.

The judgments in the above-entitled cases are, and each of them is, affirmed.

These three appeals are companion appeals to the appeals in Maguire v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society et al., 128 P.2d 149 and related cases, which last-mentioned appeals have been considered in an opinion this day filed.

Plaintiffs' opening brief on these three appeals states: "The allegations of both the first and second counts are the same as the allegations in the Maguire-Edwards-Crilly-Crowley group. They differ only in the allegations as to deraignment of plaintiffs' title and the amounts of their deposits. Consequently, the question whether each count states a cause of action is governed by the law set forth in the Maguire-Edwards-Crilly-Crowley brief."

For the reasons stated in the opinion heretofore filed in the Maguire case, we conclude the trial court properly sustained the demurrers to the first and second counts of the final complaints in these three cases.

The judgments in the above-entitled cases are, and each of them is, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Henry G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Paul Guerrero was convicted of conspiracy to commit rape, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Bruce Fratis, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Ward Sullivan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Appellant was tried with six other codefendants upon an information framed in four counts—the first charging kidnaping; the second assault with intent to commit rape; the third, conspiracy to commit rape; and the fourth, rape. A fifth count charged one of the defendants alone with robbery. The jury returned its verdict finding all seven defendants not guilty on count 1; three of the defendants guilty on counts 2, 3, and 4; three of them guilty on count 3 alone; one guilty on counts 2 and 3; and the one guilty on the separate count of robbery applicable to him alone. In addition to the verdict on count 1, three of the defendants, including this appellant, were found not guilty on counts 2 and 4. A motion of this appellant for a new trial was denied, he was granted probation, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order.

The single ground urged for a reversal is that, since the overt acts alleged in the conspiracy count are identical with the acts alleged to constitute kidnaping, the acquittal of the charge of kidnaping results in an acquittal of the conspiracy charge.

Briefly the facts are that the defendants met the prosecutrix late at night on a street in the city of Salinas and took her in a truck several miles into the country where the attack was made. The only material dispute in the evidence is whether the prosecutrix accompanied the defendants of her own accord, as testified to by them, or whether she was taken forcibly and against her will as she testified. The jury apparently accepted the defendants' version and for that reason found them not guilty of the kidnaping charge. There is no conflict that a forceful and mass assault was committed without the consent of the prosecutrix, and that this appellant knew that such was the purpose of his codefendants, and that he aided them in the accomplishment of this purpose.

Though the overt acts alleged in the conspiracy count relate to the alleged forceful taking of the prosecutrix from the city of Salinas to a point outside the city upon which the count charging kidnaping is based, it is clear that two separate crimes were pleaded and that the pleader intended that the act of removing the prosecutrix into the country was for the purpose of enabling the entire group to accomplish their purpose of a combined assault.

Appellant rests his case upon Oliver v. Superior Court, 92 Cal.App. 94, 267 P. 764, and similar cases holding that where identical offenses are charged in separate counts an acquittal on one count renders the verdict of guilty on the other count void. Because of these decisions section 954 of the Penal Code was amended in 1927 to provide that: "A verdict of acquittal of one or more counts shall not be deemed or held to be an acquittal of any other count." Since the amendment People v. Derenzo, 46 Cal. App.2d 411, 115 P.2d 858, and People v. Amick, 20 Cal.2d 247, 125 P.2d 25, followed the clear intent of this amendment and refused to follow the earlier cases cited by appellant. He now argues that the rulings in these cases were dicta and hence not controlling. But dicta or not the cases merely follow the plain language of the code amendment, and, in the late case of People v. Kearney, 20 Cal.2d 435, 126 P.2d 612, the Supreme Court cited the Amick case as authority for the full application of the amendment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STATE OF INDIANA ex rel. DEPARTMENT OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS OF STATE OF INDIANA v. HOFFMAN.

Civ. 13156.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Aug. 6, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 1, 1942.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑34(5)

An action to enforce bank stockholder's liability was within three-year limitation on actions against stockholders of corporations to enforce liability created by law. Code Civ.Proc. § 359.

2. Limitation of actions 🔑58(5)

Under three-year limitation on action against corporate directors or stockholders to enforce liability created by law, action is barred at expiration of three years from time when liability was created, even though no cause of action has accrued on such liability within that time. Code Civ.Proc. § 359.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑2(1)

Where California limitation on action to enforce liability of stockholder in Indiana bank began to run when such liability was created, California court would look to Indiana law to determine when the liability was created. Code Civ.Proc. § 359.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie E. Still, Judge.

Action by the State of Indiana, on the relation of the Department of Financial Institutions of the State of Indiana, against Fred Hoffman, to enforce defendant's liability as a bank stockholder. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Denio, Hart, Taubman & Simpson, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Arthur Metzler, of Rochester, Ind., and Swaffield & Swaffield and Joseph E. Madden, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him after a trial upon the merits. This action is brought by plaintiff to enforce the liability imposed by the constitution and laws of Indiana on defendant as a stockholder of a bank organized under the laws of that state and doing business there which has become insolvent. The deposits to payment of which any sum recovered from defendant will be applied were made before February 24, 1933, and more than three years before this action was brought, the complaint having been filed on October 28, 1936. The defense principally insisted on, both here and in the trial court, is that plaintiff's action is barred by section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires an action "to enforce liability created by law" to be brought "within three years after * * * the liability was created."

[1, 2] It is well settled, and the parties here agree, that section 359, supra, is the statute of limitations applicable to such a case as this. Richardson v. Craig, 1938, 11 Cal.2d 131, 134, 77 P.2d 1077; Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, 1914, 168 Cal. 642, 646, 144 P. 139; Miller v. Lane, 1911, 160 Cal. 90, 116 P. 58. As noted in Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, supra, 168 Cal. at page 648, 144 P. 139, the language of section 359 is peculiar, and under it an action is barred at the expiration of three years from the time when the liability was created, even though no cause of action has accrued on such liability within that time. To the same effect, see Richardson v. Craig, supra, 11 Cal.2d at page 135, 77 P.2d 1077; Gardiner v. Royer, 1914, 167 Cal. 238, 139 P. 75, and cases therein cited.

[3, 4] To determine when the liability in this case was created we must look to the law of Indiana. The Indiana Constitution of 1851 contained a provision which has remained in force ever since its adoption and reads as follows: "The stockholders in every bank or banking company shall be individually responsible, to an amount, over and above their stock, equal to their respective shares of stock, for all debts or liabilities of said bank or banking company." Art. 11, sec. 6. Construing this provision the Indiana courts have held that it is self-executing, and that an action to enforce the liability therein declared may be brought by one creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors. State ex rel. Dept. of Fin. Inst. v. Sonntag, 1935, 101 Ind.App. 557, 565, 195 N.E. 601, 605; Gaiser v. Buck, 1931, 203 Ind. 9, 13, 14, 179 N.E. 1, 3, 82 A.L.R. 1348; Rowley v. Pogue, 1932, 203 Ind. 655, 659, 663, 178 N.E. 449, 450, 181 N.E. 589, 590, 185 N.E. 273. In Gaiser v. Buck, supra [203 Ind. 9, 179 N.E. 3], the court said: "This section of the Constitution creates a definitely limited liability on the part of the appellee [bank stockholder] for the benefit of the appellant [creditor] and it is self-executing, there being a manifest intention that it should go into immediate effect and no ancillary legislation being necessary to the enjoyment of the right given or the enforcement of the duty imposed. * * * It is uniformly held that a constitutional provision imposing double liability on bank stockholders is self-executing." In support of the last quoted proposition the court cited several cases, including Western Pac. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 1913, 166 Cal. 346, 136 P. 284, Ann.Cas.1915B, 825, where it was held that the California constitutional provision then in force regarding liability of stockholders was self-executing and made every stockholder liable for his proportion of all debts of the corporation incurred while he was a stockholder—in that case, for deposits in a banking corporation. The last sentence just quoted from Gaiser v. Buck, supra, was also quoted therefrom in Rowley v. Pogue, supra (opinion denying rehearing, 203 Ind. 663, 181 N.E. 589, 590), and the court in Rowley v. Pogue added: "To this last proposition we cited a number of cases from Arizona, California, * * * in each of which a constitutional provision quite similar to section 6, art. 11 of our Constitution was involved." The California constitutional provision thus referred to imposed on stockholders a liability which accrued as soon as the debt of the corporation was incurred. This appeared from the California case which the Indiana court cited, and yet that court regarded the two constitutional provisions as "quite similar." Their language indicates that they are, indeed, similar in this respect. The California provision was that: "Each stockholder of a corporation * * * shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder * * *." Art. XII, sec. 3, repealed in 1930. The Indiana provision is: "The stockholders in every * * * banking company shall be individually responsible, to an amount, * * * for all debts or liabilities of said * * * banking company." The Indiana provision, like ours and some others presently to be mentioned, purports to impose liability absolutely, without any terms or conditions to its devolution. It does not, like the Canadian statute considered in Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, supra, 1914, 168 Cal. 642, 649, 144 P. 139, condition the liability upon insolvency, and hence we do not regard the case last cited as authority for respondent's contention here that no liability of defendant was created when the bank became indebted.

In some of the cases cited in Gaiser v. Buck, supra, 1931, 203 Ind. 9, 15, 179 N.E. 1, 3, 82 A.L.R. 1348, similar constitutional provisions in other states were construed to impose a liability on stockholders concurrently with the incurring of a debt by the corporation. In Smith v. Olson, 1926, 50 S.D. 81, 89, 208 N.W. 585, 586, so cited, the court was considering a constitutional provision that: "The shareholders * * * of any banking corporation shall be held individually responsible and liable for all contracts, debts and engagements of such corporation * * *", and said, "by this provision the freedom from individual liability for the debts of a business as such, which is normally conferred by conducting such business by means of a corporation rather than by means of a copartnership, is removed pro tanto, * * *." In Golden v. Cervenka, 1917, 278 Ill. 409, 419, 116 N.E. 273, 277, 278, the constitutional provision was that "every stockholder in a banking corporation * * * shall be individually responsible and liable to its creditors * * * to an amount equal to his or her respective shares so held, for all its liabilities accruing while he or she remains such stockholder." The court said: "By whatever transaction a bank becomes liable for the payment of money, whether at a fixed time or on demand, a liability has accrued. Whether a cause of action has accrued depends upon whether the creditor could then maintain a suit. Whether a liability has accrued depends upon whether an obligation to pay has arisen. The meaning of the constitutional provision was that the persons who were stockholders of the bank at the time credit was extended to it or a liability was incurred by it should be individually and personally liable, as partners, to the creditor to an amount equal to their stock." This case was approved in American Nat. Bank v. Holsen, 1928, 331 Ill. 622, 627, 163 N.E. 448, 450, which was cited by the Indiana court in Gaiser v. Buck, supra.

In a New York case, not cited by the Indiana court, under a New York statute providing that bank stockholders "shall be individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such corporation, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein" it was held that the "liability accrues, not when the company or bank is ascertained to be insolvent, but when it incurs the indebtedness for which the statute renders the stockholder liable. * * * The liability is made absolute. The enforcement of it only is postponed." Van Tuyl v. Schwab, 1916, 174 App.Div. 665, 161 N.Y.S. 323, 325, affirmed without opinion, 1917, 220 N.Y. 661, 116 N.E. 1081. See, also, Hyatt v. Anderson's Trustee, 1903, 74 S.W. 1094, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 132, where a like holding was made on a statute substantially the same as that of New York. In Miller v. Lane, 1911, 160 Cal. 90, 93, 116 P. 58, 59, the court had before it an action against a stockholder in a Colorado bank under a statute declaring that such stockholders "shall be held individually responsible for debts, contracts and engagements of said associations, in double the amount of the par value of stock owned," and said: "The right of action against the stockholder on account of his individual liability for debts of the company accrues at the same time as against the corporation."

[5] We conclude that under the Indiana constitutional provision a liability of the stockholders of a banking company is created as soon as the debt of the bank is incurred.

In opposition to this conclusion respondent calls our attention to Carey v. State, 1938, 213 Ind. 181, 12 N.E.2d 131, 134, where the court said: "When one becomes a stockholder in a bank, the law imposes upon him an obligation, in the nature of a contract of suretyship, in favor of creditors of the bank, in an amount equal to the face value of the stock." Upon this statement respondent contends that the liability of a surety is secondary and not primary and that section 359, Code of Civil Procedure, applies only to a primary liability. No authority is cited supporting this construction of section 359, and it seems inconsistent with the statement in Hunt v. Ward, 1893, 99 Cal. 612, 615, 34 P. 335, 336, 37 Am.St.Rep. 87, made in discussing that section, that: "A liability may be absolute or contingent; it may be unconditional or limited; it may be presently enforceable by action, or there may be time given for its performance; but, whatever its character, it is created by the consummation of the contract, act, or omission by which the liability is incurred." Compare, also, this statement in Miller v. Lane, supra, 1911, 160 Cal. 90, 93, 116 P. 58, 60, regarding a Colorado statute imposing a liability on bank stockholders in terms much like those of the Indiana Constitution: "Even if the liability of a stockholder under the statute of Colorado is secondary, it is nevertheless a statutory obligation which cannot be postponed, even by the corporation itself, against the will of the stockholder."

But we do not accept the statement of the Indiana court in Carey v. State, supra, as establishing the proposition that for all purposes a stockholder of an Indiana banking corporation is to be regarded as a surety of the corporation. The language quoted above and relied on by plaintiff is only an instance of argument by analogy and such an argument does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the two things compared are alike in all respects. The court used the analogy there only for the purpose of reaching the conclusion that a bank stockholder could not evade his liability in favor of its creditors on the ground that he was induced by fraud to become a stockholder unless the creditors were parties to the fraud. It does not follow that the court would have held that there was no liability of the stockholder to creditors until the bank became insolvent or failed to pay its debts. The Indiana cases previously cited, as well as the wording of the Indiana constitution, indicate a liability accruing earlier and no Indiana case is cited holding otherwise.

After the making of the above cited Indiana decisions holding that creditors could bring suit directly against bank stockholders upon the constitutional liability of the latter, the legislature of Indiana in 1933 passed a statute, effective July 1, 1933, known as "The Indiana Financial Institutions Act" (Burns Ind.Stats.Annotated, 1933, Title 18), which set up a different scheme for enforcing the liability of stockholders of banks. This act created a Department of Financial Institutions, and gave it general power to supervise banks and other such institutions, to examine into their business and affairs and to take charge of and liquidate them when they should become insolvent or in a variety of other circumstances indicating danger to their creditors if they should continue to operate. Burns, supra, sec. 18-301. Section 63 of this act provided that: "If, at any time after the department has taken possession of the business and property of any financial institution, pursuant to the provisions of this act, * * * it shall appear to the department that such financial institution is insolvent or that the cash value of its assets is not sufficient to pay its creditors in full, the department is hereby authorized and shall have the exclusive right to enforce the individual liability imposed by law upon the shareholders of such financial institution, * * *." Burns, supra, sec. 18-323. This section further provided for a written demand for payment to be made by the department on each shareholder, setting forth the total amount required from each shareholder and his proportionate part thereof. If any shareholder does not pay as demanded, the department, it is further provided in this section, may sue him in any court of competent jurisdiction in Indiana or any other state, and in such suit the department's written statement of its determination to enforce the liability of shareholders, of the value of the bank's assets and of its liabilities are made conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated.

This statute has been held by the Indiana courts to confer on the Department of Financial Institutions an exclusive power to enforce the liability of bank stockholders, an action by an individual creditor for that purpose not being maintainable after the statute took effect. Hiatt v. Howard, 1937, 104 Ind.App. 167, 8 N.E.2d 136, 138. The court in this case further held that the statute affected the remedy only and for that reason could be and was retroactive, so as to cut off the right to maintain an action against stockholders filed by a creditor prior to its passage. In this connection the court said: "The 'right' of a creditor to maintain such an action, * * * was not a 'substantive right,' but merely a right in adjective law. Appellant's substantive rights were not and will not be impaired by the application of said act, or the denial, as to him, of the right to maintain such action. The relief afforded under said act was substantially similar to the relief which was available prior to its enactment. The act, in effect, merely modified the procedure by which appellant could prosecute his substantive rights against the stockholders of the bank." This decision was approved and followed by the Indiana Supreme Court, without further discussion, in Siegel v. Archer, 1937, 212 Ind. 599, 10 N.E.2d 626, 629. The statute in question was also held valid, against attacks on several grounds, in Carey v. State, supra, 1938, 213 Ind. 181, 12 N.E.2d 131.

Plaintiff argues that this statute is like the federal statute imposing a liability on stockholders of national banks, as to which it has been held that the statute of limitations, under section 359 of our Code of Civil Procedure, begins to run "at least as early as the order of the Comptroller fixing the amount payable by the stockholders." Johnson v. Greene, 9 Cir., 1937, 88 F.2d 683, 684. But under the federal statute it is held that the comptroller's order, usually called an assessment, is necessary to fix the liability of stockholders. 9 C.J.S. 1140, Banks and Banking, § 603. And the case last cited does not hold that the liability was not created before the assessment. It was unnecessary for the court to go into that question, for the action there was barred if the liability arose, as the court said, "at least as early as" the assessment.

We have also considered the decision in Richardson v. Craig, supra, 1938, 11 Cal. 2d 131, 77 P.2d 1077, where it was held that under the California Bank Stockholders Liability Act (Stats.1931, p. 338, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1931, Act 652a), passed after the repeal of the California constitutional provision above referred to, the period of limitation prescribed by section 359, Code of Civil Procedure, does not begin to run until an assessment is levied, and we find it distinguishable from the present case. There, the liability was imposed by the same act which provided for the assessment. The provision for liability in that act is that the stockholders "shall be held individually liable." This differs from our former constitutional provision and from that of Indiana that stockholders "shall be" liable. The provision that they "shall be held" liable manifestly contemplates some further proceeding to hold them before the liability is complete. Later provisions of the present California statute are that the superintendent of banks may, "if necessary to pay the debts of such corporation" enforce this stockholder's liability, and for that purpose may levy an assessment on the stockholders, on which he may sue them if they do not pay. No right of action is given to the creditors. Under this scheme the court held, in Richardson v. Craig, supra, that no liability of the stockholders was created until the superintendent of banks levied an assessment, saying: "The liability of the stockholder is not for the corporation debt, but for the assessment; and it is not to the creditor, but to the bank superintendent, a state administrative officer. This liability is not 'created' when the corporation incurs the debt, nor even when the corporation becomes insolvent; it does not exist at all prior to the making of the assessment." 11 Cal.2d 137, 77 P.2d 1080. In the case at bar we have the liability imposed by a constitutional provision which is self-executing and hints at no conditions to be fulfilled before liability arises. The Indiana statute which forbids the creditors to sue and requires the Department of Financial Institutions to do so does not provide for an assessment or anything of like nature. It merely requires a demand on the shareholder, and makes the department's written statement of certain important facts conclusive evidence of those facts. As far as we are advised, no decision has yet been made on the question whether this part of the statute is valid. The decisions upholding the statute in its shift of parties plaintiff do not intimate any change in the nature of the liability; in fact, those decisions are based on the proposition that the "substantive rights" of the creditors were not impaired by the change. Hence if there was under the constitution a liability of shareholders to creditors arising and existing when the debts of the corporation were incurred, the statute did not purport to remove or alter such liability; it merely placed its enforcement in other hands than those previously controlling it.

[6, 7] Indiana adheres to the general rule that a deposit in a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and the depositor. Peoples State Bank v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 1938, 213 Ind. 235, 12 N.E.2d 123, 126. In this case, therefore, the liability of defendant as a stockholder of the bank in question was created when deposits in the bank were made. Under the rule above stated, our statute of limitations (sec. 359, Code Civ. Proc.) began to run against this liability as soon as those deposits were made, even though no action could possibly be brought at that time to enforce the liability. See cases already cited to this point. The fact that the deposits out of which defendant's liability in this case arose were made more than three years before this action was brought is not disputed. The action is therefore barred.

HELMS BAKERIES v. STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION et al.

Civ. 11992.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 15, 1942.

Hearing Denied Sept. 10, 1942.

1. Taxation 🔑608(9)

A property owner is not necessarily entitled to injunctive relief merely because a tax demanded of him is illegal, and if taxpayer has an adequate remedy at law it is not entitled to injunctive relief.

2. Taxation 🔑608(9)

Alleged fact that State Board of Equalization did not have jurisdiction to make assessment, and that sum sought to be exacted would not constitute a tax, did not entitle taxpayer to injunctive relief on theory of inapplicability of statutory provision that no injunction shall issue to prevent collection of tax. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31.

3. Taxation 🔑608(9)

Even though a taxing statute is unconstitutional and the alleged tax is void, property owner is not entitled to injunctive relief if he has an adequate remedy at law.

4. Licenses 🔑35

Where State Board of Equalization had threatened to revoke or suspend taxpayer's permit under Retail Sales Tax Act unless additional or reassessed tax was paid, injunction restraining the board from revoking or suspending the permit could not be sustained on theory that it did not enjoin the collection of tax in view of fact that resort to statutory remedy by way of action to recover tax paid under protest would not involve prohibitive expense or multiplicity of suits. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31.

5. Licenses 🔑35

The Retail Sales Tax Act authorizing an action to recover tax paid under protest furnished an "adequate remedy at law" so as to preclude the granting of an injunction restraining State Board of Equalization from revoking or suspending seller's permit for nonpayment of additional or reassessed tax. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Adequate Remedy at Law".

6. Licenses 🔑35

Decree enjoining State Board of Equalization from revoking or suspending taxpayer's permit under Retail Sales Tax Act for nonpayment of additional or reassessed tax could not be sustained on theory that "irreparable injury" would have been suffered if permit had been forfeited, where taxable sales involved amounted to less than three-tenths of one per cent. of taxpayer's total business and those sales alone would have been affected by suspension or revocation of its permit. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31; St.1935, p. 1253, § 5.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Irreparable Injury".

7. Taxation 🔑608(8), 611(6)

Clear proof of irreparable injury is required to justify interference by court with taxing power of a branch of state government.

8. Equity 🔑46

Generally, an injury is not "irreparable" so as to authorize equitable relief when it can be adequately compensated in damages.

9. Licenses 🔑35

Where taxpayer by payment of tax under protest could have prevented threatened revocation or suspension of its permit under Retail Sales Tax Act for nonpayment of additional or reassessed tax, decree enjoining State Board of Equalization from revoking or suspending the permit could not be sustained on theory of "irreparable injury", since taxpayer would have been adequately compensated by recovery of the amount of tax with interest from date of its payment under statute authorizing action to recover tax paid under protest. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31.

10. Licenses 🔑35

Where State Board of Equalization threatened to suspend or revoke taxpayer's permit under Retail Sales Tax Act for nonpayment of additional or reassessed tax, decree granting injunction against the board could not be sustained on theory that the board by its threatened action was seeking to deprive taxpayer of property right or privilege without "due process of law" in view of fact that taxpayer had adequate remedy at law by way of action to recover tax paid under protest. St.1933, p. 2600, § 3; St.1939, p. 2184, § 31.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action for injunction by Helms Bakeries, a corporation, against the State Board of Equalization and others. From a judgment granting an injunction, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Hearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., H. H. Linney, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Adrian A. Kragen, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants.

Faries & McDowell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McWILLIAMS, Justice pro tem.

The defendants, constituting the State Board of Equalization, have appealed from a judgment under the terms of which they were permanently enjoined by the trial court from revoking or suspending plaintiff's "Seller's Permit." The permit referred to had been issued to plaintiff under the provisions of the California Retail Sales Tax Act of 1933, Stats.1933, p. 2599, Gen.St. Supp.1933, Act 8493. Under the provisions of that act there was imposed a tax at the rate of 2½ per cent of the gross receipts of all "retailers" from the sale of tangible personal property sold at retail from August 1, 1933, to and including June 30, 1935, § 3. In its complaint plaintiff alleged, and in their answer defendants admitted, that in May, 1940, the State Board of Equalization notified plaintiff to appear before the board to show cause why its permit should not be revoked for failure to pay certain sums claimed by the board to be due and owing by plaintiff as an additional or reassessed tax imposed under the provisions of the act. Defendants also admitted the allegation of plaintiff that at the hearing which occurred pursuant to the notice given they notified plaintiff that in the event plaintiff did not pay the amount of such additional or reassessed tax the board intended to revoke plaintiff's permit.

Plaintiff's principal contention is that it had paid all that it owed to the state and that therefore the threatened action of defendants was illegal. The basic question involved on this appeal which is argued most fully by the parties is whether or not plaintiff had paid all that it could lawfully be called upon to pay, or whether it owed the additional sum of $6,572.29 demanded by defendants.

But we are met on the threshold of a consideration of this question by the contention of appellants that, conceding that the claim of the Board of Equalization was untenable and that the amount demanded of respondent was not legally owing, plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law and therefore was not entitled to injunctive relief. This claim is based on the provisions of section 31 of the act which, say appellants, afforded respondent such a remedy. That section provides in part as follows:

"Sec. 31. No injunction or writ of mandate or other legal or equitable process shall issue in any suit, action, or proceeding in any court against this State or against any officer thereof to prevent or enjoin the collection under this act of any tax sought to be collected, and no suit or proceeding shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any amount alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected unless a claim for refund or credit has been duly filed as provided in section 23 hereof.

"Within ninety days after the mailing of the notice of the board's action upon such claim, the claimant may bring an action against the board on the grounds set forth in such claim in a court of competent jurisdiction in the county of Sacramento for the recovery of the whole or any part of the amount with respect to which such claim has been disallowed. * * *" St. 1939, p. 2184.

[1] As the Supreme Court of this state pointed out at an early date, it does not necessarily follow that a property owner is entitled to injunctive relief merely because a tax demanded of him is illegal. Savings & Loan Society v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415, 488. The reason for such a doctrine had theretofore been stated by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Dows v. City of Chicago, 78 U.S. 108, 110, 20 L.Ed. 65: "Any delay in the proceedings of the officers, upon whom the duty is devolved of collecting the taxes, may derange the operations of government, and thereby cause serious detriment to the public. No court of equity will, therefore, allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the rights of the citizen whose property is taxed, and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of the law. It must appear that the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits, or produce irreparable injury, or where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked." This language was quoted with approval by the California Supreme Court in the case of Savings & Loan Society v. Austin, supra, and also in the more recent case of Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 594, 87 P. 102.

Respondent concedes that if it has an adequate remedy at law it is not entitled to injunctive relief but contends that such is not the case. However, it also advances certain preliminary arguments to avoid the effect of section 31 of the act to which we shall first address ourselves. Respondent first contends that appellants assume the very point at issue when they argue that respondent has an adequate remedy by paying the "tax" and suing for a refund under section 31. The basis for this argument is that section 31, by its terms, applies to a tax and that since appellants never had authority or jurisdiction to make the assessment involved herein the sum sought to be exacted of it would not constitute a tax and that therefore the section has no application.

[2, 3] In our opinion the argument of respondent is untenable. If it were sound it would apply with equal force to cases involving attempts to collect taxes imposed under unconstitutional statutes. But the law is settled that even though a taxing statute is unconstitutional and the alleged tax is therefore void, the property owner is not entitled to injunctive relief if he has an adequate remedy at law. Thus in the case of Shelton v. Platt, 139 U.S. 591, 11 S.Ct. 646, 35 L.Ed. 273, the law there involved provided that if a taxpayer considered the tax demanded of him to be unjust or illegal he might pay it under protest and then sue for the recovery of the amount so paid. The court held that in view of the remedy so allowed a suit for an injunction would not lie in the absence of evidence of irreparable injury or other ground for equitable interposition. To the same effect see Arkansas Building & L. Association v. Madden, 175 U.S. 269, 20 S. Ct. 119, 44 L.Ed. 159, and Bailey v. George, 259 U.S. 16, 42 S.Ct. 419, 66 L.Ed. 816. The same doctrine has been enunciated in a case in which the taxing authorities sought to collect an income tax from a property owner over his contention that the taxing authorities had no jurisdiction to assess the tax against him by reason of the fact that he was not a resident of the state. Long v. Norman, 1 Cir., 289 F. 5.

[4] The next argument advanced by respondent to avoid the effect of section 31 is that the decree of the lower court did not restrain the collection of the tax in question but merely prevented the cancellation of respondent's permit to do business. In support of this contention respondent cites Hughson Condensed Milk Co. v. State Board, 23 Cal.App.2d 281, 73 P.2d 290. That case involved the construction of a section of the California Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, Stats. 1933, p. 928, as amended in 1935, St.1935, p. 2176, which section is substantially the same, so far as the subject in which we are here interested is concerned, as section 31 of the Retail Sales Tax Act. It is true that there is certain language in the opinion in the Hughson case that supports respondent in its present contention. But there are also vital differentiating features. Thus the court pointed out that any other proceeding by the plaintiff than a suit for an injunction would have involved a multiplicity of actions and from a practical standpoint would have been almost prohibitive since the different sections of the act there involved required the payment of considerable sums of money to different departments of the state government. Thus, as the court went on to point out, under the Motor Vehicle Transportation Act the operator is required to pay an original license fee to the State Board of Equalization and to pay a certain fee to the Department of Motor Vehicles for special plates and also to pay to the State Board of Equalization each month a tax imposed upon gross receipts. As the court very properly held, in view of those circumstances a citation of authorities was not necessary to show that a multiplicity of suits would necessarily follow. Respondent in the instant case makes no serious claim that a resort to the remedy contained in section 31 of the Sales Tax Act would involve a prohibitive expense or a multiplicity of suits.

[5] In support of its position that section 31 of the Sales Tax Act does not furnish an adequate remedy at law, respondent cites the opinion of the Federal District Court in the case of Printers & Publishers Corporation, Ltd., v. Corbett, 25 F.Supp. 369. It is true that the court in that case held that section 31 of the California Retail Sales Act does not furnish an adequate remedy at law. Unfortunately for respondent, since its brief was filed, the holding of the District Court in that case was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 9 Cir., 127 F.2d 195. The latter court held that section 31 of the act did afford to the plaintiff therein a plain, speedy and sufficient remedy and that therefore the District Court was without jurisdiction of a suit to enjoin the collection of a tax assessed under the Sales Tax Act. The court in its opinion cites among other authorities the case of Nevada-California Electric Corporation v. Corbett, 22 F.Supp. 951. In that case a statutory three-judge District Court held that a section of the California Use Tax Act, St. 1935, p. 1297, as amended, substantially similar to section 31 of the California Retail Sales Tax Act, afforded a property owner an adequate remedy at law and that therefore a suit to enjoin the collection of the amount claimed of the plaintiff under such act would not lie.

The decision of the court in the case last cited was followed in a three-judge District Court case decided in Iowa and involving a similar state of facts. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Roddewig, 24 F.Supp. 321. That case is particularly relevant because in it, as in the instant case, the plaintiff had sought, not directly to enjoin the collection of the tax claimed to be owing by plaintiff, but to enjoin the state taxing board from cancelling its sales permit. Under the laws of Iowa, unlike in California, a suit for an injunction will lie, as the court pointed out, to restrain the collection of an illegal or a void tax even though the property owner may have an adequate remedy at law. But under a federal statute, 28 U.S.C.A. § 41(1), a federal court has no jurisdiction of a suit to enjoin the collection of a tax when the taxpayer has a plain, speedy and adequate remedy at law in the state courts. The question was therefore presented to the court whether the suit brought by plaintiff could reasonably be held to be one to enjoin the collection of a tax. The question was answered in the affirmative. Said the court (24 F.Supp. at page 324): "A suit to enjoin a tax and a suit to enjoin the use of the means provided by the taxing statute for the collection of the tax would seem to be the substantial equivalents of each other." The relevancy of this language in the instant case needs no emphasis from this court.

[6] The next contention of respondent is that the doctrine invoked by appellants is not applicable because irreparable injury would have been suffered by it by the forfeiture of its permit to do business in the absence of injunctive relief. We fail to find a sufficient showing of such irreparable injury. As appellants point out, since the amendment of the Sales Tax Act § 5, in 1935, St.1935, p. 1253, exempting the gross receipts from the sale of food products from taxation, the taxable sales of respondent involved in this litigation amounted to less than three-tenths of one per cent of respondent's total business. The taxable sales referred to consisted of such items as flour sacks and barrels which, to use appellants' phrase, were in essence the residue of respondent's business of producing and selling bakery products. It is those sales alone that would be affected by the suspension or revocation of respondent's permit to do business.

[7] In attempted justification of the absence of any substantial evidence on this issue of irreparable injury respondent claims that it was unnecessary for it to introduce evidence on the subject because of the admissions in the answer of appellants and because of the recitals in the agreed stipulation of facts introduced by the parties. In our opinion there is no basis for this claim. It is true that the complaint of respondent made some far reaching although very general allegations of irreparable injury which, however, were denied by appellants. But the proof failed to measure up in any substantial degree to the allegations so made. We have not overlooked the fact that the president of the respondent company testified that the sales in question constituted a "necessary" and an "essential" part of respondent's business. No data, documentary or otherwise, was supplied by him or by respondent in support of the naked assertion so made. No further testimony on this subject of irreparable injury was offered by respondent. Clear proof of irreparable injury is required to justify the interference by a court with the taxing power of a branch of the state government. As the Supreme Court of this state has held, with respect to injunctions generally, quoting the language of a federal court, "To issue an injunction is the exercise of a delicate power, requiring great caution and sound discretion and rarely, if ever, should be exercised in a doubtful case. 'The right must be clear, the injury impending and threatened, so as to be averted only by the protecting preventive process of injunction.'" Willis v. Lauridson, 161 Cal. 106, 117, 118 P. 530, 535, citing St. Louis S. F. M. Co. v. Sanitary S. F. M. Co., 8 Cir., 161 F. 725, 88 C.C.A. 585. Also see, Miller & Lux, Inc., v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corp., 120 Cal.App. 589, 603, 8 P.2d 560; Almaden Vineyards Corp. v. Arnerich, 21 Cal.App. 2d 701, 705, 70 P.2d 243; 4 Cooley on Taxation, 4th ed., § 1640. Since it is a taxing statute with which we are here concerned the showing made by the plaintiff of irreparable injury should have been correspondingly clear and specific in order to justify injunctive relief against the taxing authorities. We are constrained to hold that the showing of irreparable injury that was made by respondent was insufficient.

[8, 9] A more conclusive answer to the contention of respondent that it was entitled to equitable relief by reason of the fact that otherwise it would have sustained irreparable injury, than the insufficiency of the evidence adduced is that by the very nature of the remedy extended to it, it could have sustained no such injury. The general rule is that damage is not irreparable when it can be adequately compensated in damages. See 32 Cor.Jur., p. 53, and cases there cited. Obviously respondent, if required to pay the tax in question, would have been adequately compensated by the recovery of the amount of the tax with interest from the date of its payment as authorized by section 31 of the Sales Tax Act. As held in Dunker v. Field & Tule Club, 6 Cal.App. 524, 529, 530, 92 P. 502, 504: "The essential features, marking an injury as irreparable are: (1) That the injury is an act which is a serious change of, or is destructive to, the property it affects, either physically or in the character in which it has been held and enjoyed. (2) That the property must have some peculiar quality or use such that its pecuniary value, as estimated by a jury, will not fairly recompense the owner for the loss of it." In the case of Matthews v. Rodgers, 284 U. S. 521, at page 526, 52 S.Ct. 217, at page 220, 76 L.Ed. 447, being an action to enjoin the collection of a state tax, the court said: "It may be assumed that, if appellees do not pay the challenged tax, and in consequence of that omission they are subjected, as it is alleged they will be, to the civil and criminal penalties for nonpayment, the resulting injury to their business will be irreparable, and can be avoided only by resort to equity to prevent the threatened wrong. But appellants insist that the appellees are under no such constraint, either to expose themselves to the penalties for failure to pay the tax or to seek equitable relief against its collection, since each of them may pay the tax to the collecting officer under protest, and, under the laws of Mississippi, may maintain a suit at law for its recovery on the ground that it was exacted in violation of the Constitution of the United States." The court held with appellants in their view of the case and reversed the judgment of the trial court which had granted the injunction prayed for by appellees. Also, see, Dows v. City of Chicago, 78 U.S. 108, 112, 20 L.Ed. 65; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Dayton, 11 Nev. 161; Loud v. City of Charlestown, 99 Mass. 208; Merchants' State Bank v. McHenry County, 31 N.D. 108, 153 N.W. 386.

[10] Respondent also suggests the point that appellants by their threatened action are seeking to deprive respondent of a property right or privilege without due process of law. We consider the point to be untenable. See Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Roddewig, D.C., 24 F.Supp. 321, and Morrison-Knudsen Co. v. State Board of Equalization, D.C., 35 F.Supp. 553.

In view of our conclusion that plaintiff was not entitled to injunctive relief since it had an adequate remedy at law, we need not consider the further contention of appellants that subdivision 4 of section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure deprived the lower court of any power it might otherwise have had to issue an injunction.

The judgment is reversed.

REYNOLDS v. REYNOLDS.

Civ. 12032.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

July 29, 1942.

1. Divorce 🔑309

In divorce suit by wife moving for increase of allowance for support of parties' minor children, service of moving papers on defendant outside state by registered mail was ineffectual for any purpose.

2. Attorney and client 🔑76(4)

The authority of attorney for party to action ordinarily terminates with entry of judgment therein, except for purpose of sustaining and enforcing judgment or seeking to have it set aside or reversed.

3. Divorce 🔑309

Orders for support of minor children, though contained in interlocutory or final judgments of divorce are not final, in view of statutes authorizing modification or vacation thereof, but court retains continuing jurisdiction over such matter. Civ.Code, §§ 138, 139.

4. Divorce 🔑309

In wife's divorce suit, affidavits of nonresident defendant and his attorney on trial that such attorney's employment by defendant terminated on date before plaintiff moved for increase of allowance for support of parties' minor children did not conclusively show such fact and consequent ineffectiveness of service of moving papers by mail on such attorney, in view of conflict presented by statement in affidavit of service that papers were addressed to defendant's attorneys of record at their office address in state. Code Civ.Proc. § 1015.

5. Army and navy 🔑34

In wife's divorce suit against nonresident defendant, served with notice of plaintiff's motion to increase allowance for support of parties' minor children by mailing of copies of moving papers to his attorneys of record in state, section of federal Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, prohibiting entry of judgment against defaulting defendant until appointment of attorney to represent him, unless plaintiff files affidavit that defendant is not in military service, was inapplicable. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 200, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix § 520.

6. Divorce 🔑309

In divorce suit by wife, moving to increase allowance in divorce judgment for support of parties' minor children, service of moving papers on member of dissolved law firm, which represented nonresident defendant on trial, was sufficient, if either such member or firm was still defendant's counsel of record in case. Code Civ.Proc. § 1015.

7. Divorce 🔑312

In wife's divorce suit, where notice of her motion to increase allowance for support of parties' minor children was served on law firm, which represented nonresident defendant on trial, court's rejection of supplemental affidavits of defendant and member of such firm that such member was only lawyer ever employed in case by defendant and was defendant's attorney, though he used firm name in signing pleadings, and that firm was dissolved before service of notice, was not prejudicial to defendant. Code Civ.Proc. § 1015.

8. Divorce 🔑182

In domestic relations case, such as divorce suit, wife is entitled, on proper showing, to allowance of suit money to defend order, made by trial court in her favor, on husband's appeal therefrom.

9. Divorce 🔑309

In divorce suit by wife, moving for allowance of suit money to present her case on appeal from order increasing allowance in judgment for support of parties' minor children, service of moving papers on nonresident defendant's counsel of record at time of service was valid as service on defendant, though their authority on appeal was restricted to pressing of jurisdictional point presented by them at hearing on motion. Code Civ.Proc. § 1015.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William S. Baird, Judge.

Action for divorce by Helene Louise Reynolds against Jacob George Reynolds. Judgment for plaintiff, and from orders increasing an allowance to plaintiff for support of the parties' two minor children, and allowing plaintiff an attorney's fee and costs for defending appeal from the order increasing allowance, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Freston & Files and Gordon L. Files, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leonard Comegys, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GOODELL, Justice pro tem.

Two appeals are presented upon this record, the first from an order increasing the allowance for the two minor children of the parties hereto from $55 to $116 a month, and the second from an order allowing suit money—attorney's fee and costs—to the respondent for defending the appeal from the first order.

By an interlocutory judgment of divorce dated October 24, 1933, entered in favor of respondent against appellant for extreme cruelty, appellant was ordered to pay $40 a month for the support of the children. A final judgment was entered on October 29, 1934. A few days thereafter, on November 8, 1934, the allowance was increased from $40 to $55, with respect to which no complaint is made. Six years later, on December 27, 1940, the court increased this allowance from $55 to $116, and it is this increase that gives rise to the first of these appeals, the appellant's contention being that the court had no jurisdiction to make it.

The history of this case is as follows: On June 3, 1933, respondent sued for divorce. Appellant filed an answer and with it a cross-complaint which he later withdrew. On the pleadings and on the trial appellant was represented by the firm of Loucks & Phister of San Pedro, and the order of November 8, 1934, recites that E. O. Loucks represented the defendant (appellant). Respondent's present counsel has represented her throughout. In the interval from November 8, 1934, to October 30, 1940, there were no proceedings in the case so far as the record shows.

On October 30, 1940, a notice was drawn up by respondent's counsel directed to the appellant and to Loucks & Phister, his attorneys, to the effect that on November 27, 1940, respondent would move for an increase from $55 to $116 a month for the support of the two children. An affidavit of the respondent was filed with this notice and an order to show cause was issued. On the same day counsel for respondent (whose office was, and is, in Los Angeles) mailed a copy of the notice of motion, affidavit and order to show cause to Loucks & Phister. The affidavit of service by mail deposes that these papers were "addressed to the attorneys of record for said defendant at the office address of said attorneys, as follows: Loucks & Phister * * * San Pedro, California." The appellant at that time was on military duty in Iowa and an affidavit shows that respondent's counsel on October 31, 1940, "served" a copy of the order to show cause, notice of motion and affidavit on him by mail from Los Angeles. Attached to this affidavit of service is a registry return receipt signed by appellant acknowledging delivery in Iowa on November 4, 1940. On the day appointed for hearing, a special appearance was made by appellant's counsel of record on this appeal "for the sole purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court" on the grounds that appellant was not a resident of California, had not been personally served with notice of the hearing within this state, or at any time or place, and that E. O. Loucks was not, and had not been, counsel for appellant for more than three years theretofore and that the service by mail upon his firm was ineffective. At the hearing this point was presented; the court ruled that it had jurisdiction, and appellant's counsel who had specially appeared declined thereafter to participate. The hearing proceeded, the court granted the motion, and this appeal was taken.

[1] The first point presented is whether the service of the notice and order to show cause upon the attorneys who had represented the appellant in the divorce case six years before was valid as a service made upon attorneys then of record, and, hence, a valid service upon the appellant, § 1015, Code Civ.Proc. The "service" of the moving papers by registered mail upon appellant outside the state, this not being a case where service by publication was proper, was, of course, ineffectual for any purpose.

[2, 3] It is the general rule, as contended by appellant, that the authority of an attorney ordinarily terminates with the entry of judgment, except for the purpose of sustaining and enforcing the judgment, or seeking to have it set aside or reversed. 3 Cal.Jur., 668, § 71. On this point appellant cites Knowlton v. Mackenzie, 110 Cal. 183, 188, 42 P. 580; Frowley v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 220, 226, 110 P. 817, and

Widener v. Hartnett, 30 Cal.App.2d 165, 168, 85 P.2d 925. Sections 138 and 139 of the Civil Code provide that orders for the support of minor children may be modified or vacated from time to time. Such orders, therefore, although contained in interlocutory or final judgments of divorce, cannot, by any means, be treated as final. Rosher v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.2d 556, 559, 71 P.2d 918; Lamborn v. Lamborn, 190 Cal. 794, 214 P. 862. Indeed, in such cases the court retains continuing jurisdiction, the nature of which is discussed at length in Moore v. Superior Court, 203 Cal. 238, 241, 263 P. 1009. Hence, cases such as this are not within the general rule mentioned above. The appellant frankly concedes that under some circumstances, an attorney who has appeared for a party after final judgment may be presumed to continue to represent such party, and he concedes, further, that it is a question of fact whether an attorney so continues. The appellant's position is stated by his counsel as follows: "Where the evidence shows conclusively that the attorney has been discharged and no longer represents a party, service of notices upon such attorney is ineffectual for any purpose." Citing the Moore case, supra, and Smith v. Smith, 42 Cal.App.2d 19, 20, 108 P.2d 47. The real inquiry on the present appeal is whether, as claimed by appellant, the evidence does, in fact, conclusively show that E. O. Loucks or Loucks & Phister were discharged as attorneys for appellant before the proceedings in 1940 were launched, and, if so, whether in the absence of a filed substitution of attorneys or court action they nevertheless remained attorneys of record for the purpose of the service of notices designed to bring their client into court from time to time.

[4] Both sides rely upon the Moore case. Rarely are two cases more nearly parallel. In the Moore case, E. G. Ryker had represented the defendant husband in a divorce case where the judgment ordered the defendant to pay $30 a month for the support of the children and $12.50 at stated intervals for their clothing. The final judgment was entered April 12, 1915. Two years later the defendant went to reside in Portland, Oregon. On September 8, 1926, the plaintiff filed a notice of motion to increase the allowance from $30 to $60 and the clothing allowance from $12.50 to $50. Service of the notice was made by mail on said Ryker (whose office was in Oakland, while that of plaintiff's counsel was in San Francisco) and by mailing the papers to the defendant himself in Portland. The motion was resisted by a new attorney who appeared specially to question the jurisdiction and who moved to quash the service, and who, after an adverse ruling on jurisdiction declined to further participate. In presenting the jurisdictional point the defendant filed an affidavit of said Ryker showing that he had ceased to represent the defendant upon the entry of the final judgment. In each case the defendant-husband had left the state after the final judgment. In the Moore case eleven years elapsed, in this case six, between the final judgment and the new motion. In each case the motion was to increase an allowance for minor children. In each, the service was made upon the attorney whose name had appeared of record in the divorce case years before, and, in each, such service was supplemented by the mailing of the papers to the defendant himself out of the state. In each case there was a special appearance by a new attorney for the sole purpose of raising the jurisdictional question, and a declination by him to go further in the proceeding after that question had been settled. In each case the former attorney of record made a positive showing by affidavit that he had long since ceased to represent the defendant, and in each case there was an affidavit of service characterizing him as the attorney of record.

In the case at bar a very positive showing was made by the appellant. In his affidavit made in Iowa and used at the hearing, appellant deposed that E. O. Loucks never represented him after April 7, 1937, and, further, that on October 20, 1937, he wrote to Mr. Loucks from Washington, D. C., dismissing him and "terminating the authority of E. O. Loucks to longer represent" him as attorney or counsellor at law; and that since October 20, 1937, no attorney in California has represented, or had authority to represent, him in connection with this action, or in any other matter. The affidavit of Mr. Loucks fully corroborates appellant's affidavit, and states that since October 20, 1937, he had never represented, or had any authority to represent, appellant in connection with the action. It states further that on October 31, 1940 (the day upon which the notice of motion presumably was received), he had written to respondent's counsel "that this affiant's relationship as attorney for the defendant Jacob George Reynolds was officially terminated in the month of October, 1937." The only showing in this record bearing upon the continued representation of appellant by E. O. Loucks or Loucks & Phister is, first, the fact that their names appear on the pleadings and files as attorneys for appellant, that is to say, upon such as were filed or entered prior to November 9, 1934, and, second, the affidavit of service by mail, made by respondent's counsel on October 30, 1940, wherein he deposed that on that day he had served the moving papers on the defendant "by placing a true copy thereof in an envelope addressed to the attorneys of record for said defendant at the office address of said attorneys, as follows: Loucks & Phister, Attorneys at Law, 215 Bank of San Pedro Building, San Pedro, California" and mailing the same, postage prepaid. (Emphasis ours.) In other words, there was no affidavit setting forth facts to show that E. O. Loucks or Loucks & Phister were, in October, 1940, still authorized to represent appellant, or otherwise contradicting the affidavits of appellant and E. O. Loucks to the effect that the employment had been terminated on October 20, 1937, except the affidavit of service. This, however, was precisely the situation in the Moore case where the Ryker affidavit definitely stated that his representation of Moore had terminated on the entry of the final judgment, and the only affidavit that could be said to contradict it was the affidavit of service. The Moore opinion does not say, in so many words, that the affidavit of service created the conflict but it does show that in resisting defendant's motion to quash, the plaintiff "introduced the affidavit of service of the moving paper therein, wherein it was asserted that said Ryker had at all times been and still was the defendant's attorney of record in said action." 203 Cal. at page 240, 263 P. at page 1011. In the absence of such a showing in the affidavit of service in the Moore case there would have been no conflict presented by affidavit. Precisely the same may be said of the instant case. The fact that here there are two affidavits, each corroborative of the other, on the side of the appellant, as against one in the Moore case, is only a difference in the quantum of proof. If there was a conflict in the Moore case then there is a conflict in this case, for there is no distinction to be found between the facts of the two cases. In the order appealed from there is an implied finding of fact that there had been a valid service of the notice.

[5] Appellant urges for the first time on appeal that the trial court had no jurisdiction to proceed because under the terms of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C.A., 50, Appendix § 520, when a defendant defaults the plaintiff must file an affidavit showing defendant is not in military service, and unless such affidavit is filed no judgment shall be entered until the court appoints an attorney to represent defendant. The obvious answer to this contention is that there was no default, the trial court having held that defendant was already represented by counsel. The section has no application to this proceeding.

[6, 7] Two supplemental affidavits, tendered to the court at the hearing, were rejected. One was made by the appellant himself, wherein he deposed that the only lawyer he had ever employed in this case was E. O. Loucks, and that M. Phister had never been so employed. The other, made by Mr. Loucks, was to the same effect, and it showed also that while he had used the firm name of Loucks & Phister in signing the pleadings, he was the attorney for appellant; further that that firm had been dissolved on February 1, 1937, which was almost four years before the service of the notice in question. We are satisfied that although the firm had been dissolved, service upon Mr. Loucks (one of its former members) was sufficient if the firm had been, in fact, the attorneys of record, as the pleadings indicated, and service upon him was certainly sufficient if he, alone, had been the attorney of record, provided, of course, that the court found (as, impliedly, it did find) that either he or his firm still continued to be counsel of record in the case. While we think the court should have admitted these affidavits, there was no prejudice suffered by appellant because of their rejection.

In view of the language of the Supreme Court in the Moore case we are constrained to hold that the action of the lower court on the first appeal cannot be disturbed.

[8, 9] After the court had made the order just discussed a notice of appeal therefrom was filed by appellant's counsel of record on this appeal, whereupon the respondent served upon them and filed an application for the allowance by the trial court of suit money—$500 attorney's fees and $150 costs—"to enable her to properly appear, defend herself, and present her case" on appeal. At the hearing, appellant's counsel on this appeal presented in court a special appearance challenging, as in the first instance, the jurisdiction of the court. When the court disposed of that point counsel, as in the first instance, declined to take any further part in the proceedings. The court proceeded, and granted the motion as made. In the first instance the notice of motion was addressed to the appellant and to Messrs. Loucks & Phister, as his attorneys of record, and it was served by mail on the attorneys. In the case of the second motion, the notice was addressed to the appellant and to Messrs. Freston & Files, his attorneys, and it was served upon them. The record shows, as already indicated in the discussion of the first appeal, that Freston & Files appeared specially to challenge the jurisdiction of the court on the first motion, and that their authority then was limited to that alone. They did, however, file a notice of appeal from that order, and the record shows that their authority is now limited to the carrying on of the same challenge on this appeal. Granting that such is the limitation, the fact remains that, the appeal having been perfected, the respondent is entitled, of course, to present her side on appeal, and be represented by counsel. It is well settled that in domestic relations cases a wife is entitled, upon a proper showing, to the allowance of suit money to defend on appeal an order made in her favor by a lower court. Lamborn v. Lamborn, 190 Cal. 794, 214 P. 862, supra; Parker v. Parker, 22 Cal.App.2d 139. 70 P.2d 1003. Conceding that the authority of appellant's counsel of record on this appeal is restricted to the pressing of their jurisdictional point herein, we are satisfied that, being counsel now of record for appellant, a service upon them of the moving papers was valid as a service upon the appellant. § 1015, Code Civ.Proc. In so holding we are not to be understood as indicating that there was anything in the nature of a general appearance for appellant when this second notice of appeal was filed or that the door was thereby opened for the service upon appellant's counsel (of record on this appeal) under section 1015 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or otherwise of any and every notice in the future. All we do hold is that for the limited purpose of this appeal on the sole question of jurisdiction the authority of appellant's counsel of record on this appeal is broad enough to justify the service upon them of these moving papers, and that such service was valid as a service upon appellant.

For the reasons and upon the authorities discussed herein, we are satisfied that both orders appealed from should be, and each is, hereby affirmed.

PETERS, Presiding Justice (concurring).

I agree that the appeal from the order granting respondent's request for attorney's fees and costs to permit her to defend the appeal from the order increasing the allowance for the maintenance of the children should be affirmed for the reasons set forth in the main opinion. I also agree that the order increasing the allowance should be affirmed, but I arrive at that conclusion upon reasoning different from that used in the main opinion. It is there held that there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether Loucks and Phister were attorneys of record for appellant in October of 1940, so that service upon them or upon Loucks was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over appellant. This conflict is found to exist because the affidavit of service by mail upon Loucks and Phister contains an averment that copies of the moving papers were "addressed to the attorneys of record for said defendant * * * Loucks & Phister." It is held that this averment in an affidavit of service by mail creates a conflict with the positive averments of the affidavits of appellant and Loucks that the latter had been discharged in 1937. Support for this conclusion, it is held, is found in Moore v. Superior Court, 203 Cal. 238, 263 P. 1009. Although the factual situation there presented was practically identical with that in the instant case, and although there are clear implications in that opinion in favor of the interpretation placed upon it by the author of the main opinion in the instant case, that case was a proceeding in certiorari, and the actual holding was that, even if the trial court had committed error, such error could not be corrected on certiorari.

To hold that a mere averment in an affidavit of service by mail creates a conflict with the positive averments of opposing affidavits directed to the issue involved, does violence, in my opinion, to the purposes of the conflict rule. An appellate court is not a trial court, and where there is substantial evidence to support a finding that finding should not be disturbed. But for the rule to apply, the supporting evidence must be substantial. A formal averment in an affidavit of service is frail support indeed for a finding on a vital contested issue.

In my opinion there is a more substantial reason than that given in the main opinion to support the trial court's holding. It can be assumed that the evidence shows, as a matter of law, that Loucks was discharged by appellant in 1937, so that, as between appellant and Loucks, the latter was no longer the appellant's counsel. The record also shows that this change of relationship was not noted in the record of the divorce proceeding. It must be remembered that this is a divorce action involving the custody and maintenance of minors. In such cases by virtue of statute, § 138, Civ.Code, the court retains a continuing jurisdiction over its decree. That means that when the interlocutory decree was entered in 1933, and the final decree in 1934, such decree became final only as to the divorce. As to the care, custody, and maintenance of the children, the decree was not final—the court retained jurisdiction to modify such award dependent upon changed circumstances. It is conceded that in 1933 the court secured jurisdiction over appellant, and that at that time Loucks and Phister were his attorneys and appeared as such of record. Of course, a client may discharge his attorney at any time, and between the client and his attorney such discharge is effective when notice of discharge is communicated to the attorney. But if, during the litigation, an attorney who appears as such on the records is discharged, and the court and opposing counsel have no notice of the discharge, the court and opposing counsel may continue to deal with the attorney of record. Service of papers upon him, where service upon the attorney is proper, is good service until such attorney is discharged or substituted out of the case in the manner provided by law. See §§ 284, 285, 286, Code Civ.Proc. There would be no doubt that this rule would apply to an attorney of record prior to entry of final judgment. The same rule applies, in my opinion, after entry of judgment, in cases where the trial court retains a continuing jurisdiction. The reason for this rule is made clear when the provisions of section 1015 of the Code of Civil Procedure are considered. That section provides that when a person has an attorney in the action "the service of papers, when required, must be upon the attorney instead of the party" except certain designated papers not here involved. The section also provides: "When a plaintiff or a defendant, who has appeared, resides out of the State, and has no attorney in the action or proceeding, the service may be made on the clerk * * * for him." After personal service has been secured over a defendant in a divorce action, he should not be able to nullify the continuing jurisdiction of the court by discharging his attorney and moving out of the state. If, after discharging Loucks, the fact of such discharge had been noted in the record, respondent, under section 1015 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, could have made a proper service by simply serving the clerk of the court. But the record showed Loucks and Phister as counsel. The court, and opposing counsel were, in my opinion, entitled to rely on the record until that record was changed in the manner prescribed by law.

The law is clear that once a judicial proceeding is commenced with jurisdiction over the person of the party concerned, it is within the power of the Legislature to provide that the court may bind such person by every subsequent order which the court retains jurisdiction to make, and this notwithstanding that the order is made after the removal from the state of the party affected by the order. Michigan Trust Co. v. Ferry, 228 U.S. 346, 33 S.Ct. 550, 57 L.Ed. 867; McSherry v. McSherry, 113 Md. 395, 77 A. 653, 140 Am.St.Rep. 428; Laing v. Rigney, 160 U.S. 531, 16 S. Ct. 366, 40 L.Ed. 525.

In my opinion, the order increasing the allowance should be affirmed on the ground here set forth.

WARD, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the affirmance of both orders. On that increasing the allowance, it is my opinion that the order should be affirmed for the reasons given by Justice pro tem. GOODELL and the additional reasons given by Presiding Justice PETERS. I do not agree in the concurring opinion of the latter that "A formal averment in an affidavit of service is frail support indeed for a finding on a vital contested issue." An affidavit of service may be used in evidence. Code Civ.Proc. § 2009. The weight to be given the probative effect thereof is ordinarily a question for the trial court.

53 Cal.App.2d 566

MILTON v. LOS ANGELES MOTOR COACH CO. et al.

Civ. 13364.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 24, 1942.

1. Automobiles 🔑243(17)

In commercial photographer's action for injuries sustained when struck by bus while standing in street to take a picture, photographer's testimony of commercial photographers' custom to place a camera in the street to take pictures was inadmissible, since custom cannot make due care out of negligent conduct.

2. Automobiles 🔑243(17)

In commercial photographer's action against bus line for injuries sustained when struck by bus while standing in street to take a picture, photographer's testimony of commercial photographers' custom to place cameras in street to take pictures was not admissible to show photographer was not a trespasser or negligent as a matter of law where trial court had ruled against bus line's objection on ground that there could be no usual practice of committing a trespass on a street. Pen.Code, § 370.

3. Automobiles 🔑219

One whose duties require using a street traveled by automobiles, in the absence of warning, is not required to keep a sharp lookout from behind to see whether an automobile is approaching.

4. Automobiles 🔑219

The rule relieving one whose duties require him to use a street traveled by automobiles of the necessity of keeping a sharp lookout to see whether an automobile is approaching does not protect photographers or others occasionally using the streets to pursue their occupations, if they do so from choice and not from necessity.

5. Automobiles 🔑246(58)

In action for injuries sustained by a commercial photographer when struck by a bus while photographer was standing in a street at night to take a picture, instruction placing photographer in position of street workers whom every motorist must expect to find on the street was error where under the evidence the photographer was not entitled to the instruction upon the showing made as to his presence in the street either as it applied to his own duty to use ordinary care, or as it applied to defendant's duty to anticipate his presence.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1066

In action for injuries sustained by a commercial photographer who was struck by a bus while standing in a street at night to take a picture, an instruction placing photographer in position of street workers whom every motorist must expect to find on the streets was prejudicial where, in view of conflicting testimony as to what precautions photographer took to avoid injury, it was impossible to know to what extent the instruction influenced the verdict in favor of photographer.

7. Trial 🔑295(7)

In action for injuries sustained by a commercial photographer when struck by a bus at night while attempting to take a picture in the street, error in instruction in placing photographer in the position of street workers whom every motorist must expect to find on the streets and in receipt of evidence of custom of photographers to stand in streets to take pictures was not cured by court's further statement in instruction as to purpose in receiving evidence of such custom.

8. Automobiles 🔑246(53)

In commercial photographer's action against bus line for injuries sustained when struck by bus while standing in street beyond parked automobile to take a picture, trial court erred in refusing to instruct regarding bus line's statutory duty to drive its vehicle near the right hand curb, under evidence that bus was proceeding near the right hand curb at time of the accident. Vehicle Code § 525. St.1939, p. 2197.

9. Trial 🔑251(8)

If an instruction regarding a statute would be helpful to jury in deciding the issues of a negligence case, it should be given, though there is no charge of negligence based upon alleged violation of the law.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1067

In commercial photographer's action against bus line for injuries sustained when struck by bus at night while standing in street to take a picture, trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing defendants' offered instruction on doctrine of imminent peril under evidence that automobile ahead of bus swerved when bus was within some 50 feet of photographer, affording bus driver, at that time, a view of the street ahead.

11. Automobiles ⚷219

A photographer standing in the street to take a picture was not as a matter of law committing a "nuisance" in using the street so as to be barred from recovering for injuries sustained when struck by a bus. Pen. Code, § 370.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Nuisance".

12. Trial ⚷194(16)

In commercial photographer's action against bus line for injuries sustained when struck by bus while standing in street to take a picture, trial court did not err in refusing defendants' offered instruction that it would have been difficult because of darkness and color of photographer's clothes for driver to have seen him.

Appeal trom Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by Donald L. Milton against the Los Angeles Motor Coach Company and another for injuries sustained when plaintiff was struck by a motor coach. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Hearing denied; CARTER and TRAYNOR, JJ., dissenting.

Frank Karr, C. W. Cornell, and O. O. Collins, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Freston & Files, Gordon L. Files, August J. O'Connor, and George J. Hider, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

At 9:15 p. m. December 14, 1939, plaintiff, a commercial photographer, was standing in Wilshire Boulevard in Beverly Hills three or four feet northerly of an automobile parked against the south curb and about seventy-five feet easterly from the intersection of Wilshire and Bedford; he had a black hood over his head and was viewing through his camera, which rested on a tripod placed against the automobile, a store window on the south side of the boulevard, which was the subject of a picture he intended to take. There was testimony to the effect that he had with him as a temporary assistant a young man named Kirst, who stood in the street eight or ten feet westerly of the location of the camera, using a flashlight in directing traffic away from plaintiff. While so occupied plaintiff was struck by a motor coach moving easterly, operated by defendant Los Angeles Motor Coach Company, driven by its employee Koonse. In an action against the motor coach company and its driver plaintiff recovered judgment after jury trial and defendants' appeal. Errors are assigned in the giving of some of the instructions, in the refusal of others and in the admission of evidence.

Plaintiff testified that he had been doing commercial photography since 1914 and had taken at least 500 pictures in Beverly Hills. Over defendants' objection he testified as follows:

"Q.: Mr. Milton, in your experience as a photographer do you know whether the placing of a camera in the street as your camera was placed on the night of the accident was the usual and customary practice?

"Mr. Collins: Which is objected to as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial for the reason there can be no usual practice of committing a trespass on a street.

"The Court: So far as the question of nuisance is concerned, or obstruction, I don't see there is anything to the objection. On the question as to whether the custom is admissible that would be a different question. * * *

"By Mr. Files (continuing): Q. I will ask this question. From your experience as a commercial photographer in Beverly Hills do you know whether or not there was a custom in 1939 in the performance of the work of commercial photography to place the camera in the street in the taking of such pictures? A. There was.

"Mr. Collins: I move that the answer be stricken. Same objection. It is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial. No proper foundation has been laid and it calls for a conclusion of the witness.

"The Court: I have forgotten for the moment whether there was testimony prior to the recess that he had knowledge of the custom.

"Mr. Collins: All he has testified to was what he did himself.

"Mr. Files: The question I am asking is whether he knows if there was such a custom.

"The Court: Overruled.

"By Mr. Files (continuing): Q. What is your answer? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was the custom in Beverly Hills at that time with respect to the presence of the camera temporarily in the street for the taking of commercial photographs? A. If I had to take a picture of a building I had to place the camera wherever it was necessary for me to place it to take this photograph whether it was in the center or the edge. Naturally, we never went out to the center unless we had to, but we had to take the picture from where it was necessary to take it from according to our lens we were using.

"Q. Was that the custom in Beverly Hills at that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Collins: We object to that on the ground no proper foundation has been laid.

"The Court: Overruled."

Even though it might be proper in some situations to show the existence of customary practices or conditions which were known to the parties or were of such notoriety as to be presumptively within their knowledge and the existence of which would reasonably have influenced their conduct, we have no such situation here nor anything approaching it.

No evidence was offered to prove knowledge on the part of either defendant of the alleged custom and the evidence received fell far short of establishing the existence of a condition so common and notorious as to warrant an inference that it was known to the defendants. In the latter connection conspicuous deficiencies in the proof are to be noted. Beverly Hills is a large city with extensive residential areas. It has a business section traversed for a number of blocks by Wilshire Boulevard, a busy, congested traffic artery. From the testimony of plaintiff it cannot be ascertained whether the alleged custom was a general one, commonly and extensively followed by the profession, or only a practice that was resorted to upon rare and exceptional occasions, whether it was followed in the residential districts or in the heavy traffic of Wilshire Boulevard, whether it was the custom of photographers using the streets to hold their cameras in their hands and to be prepared to move out of danger or to use tripods with their heads covered with black cloths, whether it was customary to take pictures from the streets after dark as well as in the daytime and what, if any, precautions were usually taken to prevent injuries by automobiles. And in addition to this, it is somewhat difficult to see that plaintiff was testifying to anything more than what his own practices were.

The law is well settled that mere custom or usage cannot make due care out of conduct that is in fact negligence under circumstances disclosed by the evidence. Phoenix Assur. Co. v. Texas Holding Co., 1927, 81 Cal.App. 61, 74, 252 P. 1082; Rudd v. Byrnes, 1909, 156 Cal. 636, 642, 105 P. 957, 26 L.R.A.,N.S., 134, 20 Ann. Cas. 124; Anstead v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 1928, 203 Cal. 634, 638, 265 P. 487; Perry v. Angelus Hospital Association, 1916, 172 Cal. 311, 315, 156 P. 449; Robinet v. Hawks, 1927, 200 Cal. 265, 273, 252 P. 1045; Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 1929, 96 Cal.App. 161, 165, 273 P. 875, 274 P. 594.

[2] The introduction of the evidence as to custom is sought to be justified upon the ground that the use of the streets in a customary and lawful manner without unlawfully obstructing their use by others does not constitute a public nuisance under section 370 of the Penal Code, which was one ground of defendants' objection, and that therefore plaintiff was not a trespasser or guilty of negligence as a matter of law. Citing Fisher v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., 1913, 21 Cal.App. 677, 682, 132 P. 767, and Katz v. Helbing, 1928, 205 Cal. 629, 633, 271 P. 1062, 62 A.L.R. 825. But as appears from the portions of the record quoted above, before the evidence of custom was admitted, the court had ruled against defendants' objections to the evidence of custom upon the stated ground that "there can be no usual practice of committing a trespass on a street" the court stating, "So far as the question of nuisance is concerned, or obstruction, I don't see there is anything to the objection."

Plaintiff availed himself of the evidence not as supporting his position upon the strictly legal question whether he was committing a trespass or maintaining a nuisance but as establishing a fact having a vital bearing upon the issues of negligence and contributory negligence. This was accomplished by means of an instruction given at plaintiff's request, reading as follows: "While sidewalks are for the use of pedestrians and not at all for the use of automobiles, busses, or other vehicles, a street, on the other hand, is for the use of automobiles, busses, vehicles, pedestrians, workmen and others having need for using the street. However, even though the street is for the use of both vehicles and persons on foot, that fact does not give license to anyone, whether operating a vehicle or on foot, to fail to use ordinary care for his own safety or for the safety of the other. The law imposes on each the duty of ordinary care. That duty of care is that care which persons of ordinary prudence would exercise under similar circumstances; that is to say, the circumstances as they arose in this case, as disclosed by the evidence. When a person is engaged in work of a customary nature, that requires him to be in a portion of the street for a temporary period, he occupies a somewhat different category from that of a pedestrian. The law recognizes, for instance, that what would be ordinary care for one engaged in the performance of work on the street, would not necessarily be the ordinary care that a pedestrian merely crossing the street should exercise. While engaged in work, one is not required to maintain a constant watch for traffic on the street, but such a watch, or regard thereto, or protection therefrom, as under the circumstances a reasonably average prudent person would have exercised while engaged in the work which the plaintiff was doing."

[3] The principle of law thus declared is well recognized as applying to those whose work has to be done in the streets. It was stated in State, etc., Ins. Fund v. Scamell, 1925, 73 Cal.App. 285, 290, 238 P. 780, 781, where the plaintiff, employed as a street sweeper, had been run down by an automobile, as follows: "One using a street traveled by automobile, in the absence of warning, is not required to constantly keep a sharp lookout from behind to see whether a machine is approaching [citing cases]; and his failure so to do does not constitute negligence as a matter of law. [Citing cases.] Much less so is a laborer whose duties require him to be in the street in the performance of his occupation. Pedestrians are not continuously in the street, and their attention is devoted to a safe passage, while the attention of a street laborer must be to a considerable extent devoted to his task. There can be and there is no duty imposed on a workman to be constantly on the lookout for motor vehicles; on the contrary, it is the duty of drivers of vehicles to observe the street laborers and to avoid contact with them. It is not negligence as a matter of law for a workman to keep his mind on his work or to fail to look and listen for approaching vehicles. He may properly assume that the automobilist will not be guilty of negligence in running him down without warning. (King v. Green, 7 Cal.App. 473, 94 P. 777), and especially is this true where he remains within a space established for the parking of cars. (Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal.App. 242, 137 P. 1078.)" Other similar cases are Milosevich v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 1924, 68 Cal.App. 662, 230 P. 15; Driscoll v. California St. Cable R. Co., 1926, 80 Cal.App. 208, 250 P. 1062; Woods v. Wisdom, 1933, 133 Cal.App. 694, 24 P.2d 863, and Mecham v. Crump, 1934, 137 Cal.App. 200, 30 P.2d 568, in all of which injuries had been sustained by workmen engaged in the performance of labor on public streets either as employees of cities, street railway companies, gas and electric companies or construction companies engaged in public work.

[4] Plaintiff's testimony that it was customary for photographers in Beverly Hills to use the streets in the taking of pictures and that it was necessary for him to place his camera in the street in order to get the particular picture he wished to take with the lens he was using, was evidently intended to bring him within the rule stated in the instruction, but that rule cannot be exended to protect photographers or others who may occasionally use the streets in the pursuit of their occupations if they do so from choice and not from necessity. In Carlsen v. Diehl, 1922, 57 Cal.App. 731, at page 737, 208 P. 150, it was held that a truck driver who was loading his truck in a hazardous position alongside a driveway and who was not forced to remain in that particular place as a matter of duty, although he had a right to be there, was not to be classed with laborers engaged in street work; an instruction in less objectionable form than the one in the instant case was held to be erroneous.

There was no proper factual basis for the application of a rule which affords an unusual measure of protection to those whose work cannot be done except in the streets. Reduced to its essentials the testimony was that if plaintiff wished to take a particular picture, using a particular lens, he had to stand in the street in order to get the desired result. There is nothing in this testimony to suggest, much less to prove, that substantially the same result could not have been reached by the use of a different lens, with the camera placed in another location. While it was shown to be desirable, in some cases, to take a picture from a location in a street, it was not shown to be necessary to do so in order to carry on the business of commercial photography.

[5, 6] A careful study of the instruction convinces us that it would naturally have been understood by the jury as warranting them in assuming, upon the basis of the evidence of custom, that plaintiff was "engaged in work of a customary nature that require(d) him to be in a portion of the street for a temporary period," thus placing him in the category of workers in the street whose rights and duties are measured by a rule of conduct which fits their own peculiar situation. The jury was told in substance that it was not necessary for plaintiff in the work he was doing to maintain a constant watch for traffic on the street, and the instruction went far to place upon defendants responsibility for the accident. It is not contended that plaintiff himself was paying any attention to the traffic; obviously he was in no position to do so. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether the witness Kirst was directing traffic around plaintiff with a flash light. Two eyewitnesses testified that no one was standing westerly of plaintiff, that a young man was standing toward the east but that there was no one using a flash light. An officer of the State Highway Patrol, in making an immediate investigation of the accident, talked with the witness Kirst and testified that the latter had stated at the time that he had not been using a flash light. This officer and another talked at that time with a spectator, one Nagle, who testified at the trial that Kirst had used a flash light. The officers testified that Nagle had told them that Kirst was not using a flash light. Defendant Koonse denied having seen Kirst before the accident. In view of the conflicting testimony as to what precautions plaintiff did take to avoid accidental injury it is impossible to know to what extent the instruction influenced the verdict. It placed plaintiff in the position of street workers whom every motorist must expect to find on the streets and highways and thus placed defendants under the same duty to anticipate plaintiff's presence in the street as they were under to anticipate the presence of highway workers. The dissimilarity of the two situations that were treated as essentially the same is obvious. If the rule stated in the instruction was applicable to plaintiff's case it would be applicable to anyone who found it desirable or advantageous to do some of his work in the streets.

We do not think it can be said that the jury could not have believed from all of the evidence in the case that plaintiff, while engaged in taking pictures at night, on a busy highway, with a black cloth over his head, was in at least as great danger of injury as a pedestrian usually is when crossing the highway. The jury also could have believed that ordinary prudence would have demanded that a constant watch for vehicles be maintained by plaintiff or someone acting for him, that neither plaintiff nor his alleged helper and agent, Kirst, maintained such watch, and that responsibility for the accident rested upon plaintiff and not upon defendants. Plaintiff was not entitled to the instruction, upon the showing made as to his presence in the street, either as it applied to his own duty to use ordinary care or as it applied to the duty of defendants to anticipate his presence in the street. The principle of law stated in the instruction, insofar as it relates to the conduct of those who are obliged to make temporary use of the streets for purposes other than travel, is, as we have stated, well established, and the rule of conduct which it declares is so manifestly right and salutary as to admit of no modification or relaxation in situations where it applies. Those situations are necessarily numerous and we undertake to place no limitations upon the application of the rule except with relation to the facts of the case before us. The factual foundation which called forth the instruction was not only insufficient but its corner stone was the improper testimony as to custom.

[7] The vice of the instruction was not removed nor was the error in receipt of evidence of custom cured by general statements in the instruction or by a further instruction which the court gave, reading as follows: "The Court has permitted testimony to be given as to the custom and practice of photographers in Beverly Hills where the accident occurred in respect to taking pictures from the street where it is necessary to do so in order to get a picture of an entire building. This evidence was not received as showing that the plaintiff was or was not negligent. It was received simply as an evidential matter of fact, if it be a fact, which is for you to determine, and in order that you might have information as to the custom and practice prevailing in Beverly Hills. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the photographers in Beverly Hills operate in a certain manner or in the same manner is not proof that they do or do not operate in a proper manner. The standard for determining what is proper practice is to be ascertained by you by determining what an average reasonably prudent person would or would not have done under the circumstances as you find the circumstances to exist." This statement had to be read with the instruction we have quoted, which invaded the province of the jury in its statement that plaintiff would not have been negligent in failing to maintain a constant watch for approaching vehicles; it implied that defendants should have anticipated his presence in the street, and it again definitely linked the evidence of custom with the issues of negligence.

[8,9] Defendants requested and the court declined to give an instruction reading as follows: "Section 525 of the Vehicle Code of the State of California [St. 1939, p. 2197], in force and effect on the 14th day of December, 1939, reads in part as follows: 'Upon all roadways of sufficient width a vehicle shall be driven upon the right half of, and as close as practicable to the right-hand curb or edge of, such roadway.'" In Christiansen v. Hollings, 1941, 44 Cal.App.2d 332, 112 P.2d 723; Skulte v. Ahern, 1937, 22 Cal.App.2d 460, 71 P.2d 340, and Casalegno v. Leonard, 1940, 40 Cal.App.2d 575, 105 P.2d 125, it was held proper to instruct the jury as to the provisions of this section where negligence was charged consisting in part of a violation of its provisions. While we have a different case, we think it was error to refuse the instruction. We do not know that the members of the jury or some of them did not believe the bus driver to have been negligent in driving so close to the parked cars. The law should have been stated in order to remove any possible uncertainty in their minds as to the right and duty of the bus driver in that respect and also as to the duty of plaintiff in taking his station in the street to have in mind the fact that east-bound vehicles were required to travel as close as practicable to the southerly curb. Where an instruction as to the provisions of a statute would be helpful to the jury in deciding the issues in a negligence case it should be given, even though there is no charge of negligence involved, based upon alleged violation of the law.

[10] Defendants offered an instruction in standard form on the doctrine of imminent peril which the court declined to give. We believe that this instruction also should have been given. Defendant Koonse, driver of the bus, testified that he was traveling easterly three or four feet from the parked cars; that he had stopped at Bedford and Wilshire and that the accident happened when he had traveled about seventy-five feet easterly from the intersection at a speed of between twenty and twenty-five miles per hour; that he saw plaintiff's tripod and camera just as a car in front of him traveling easterly swerved around plaintiff to the left; that he saw plaintiff looking through the camera but that he did not see a man with a flashlight; that the bus was fifteen or twenty feet to the rear of the car ahead when it swerved to the left. He estimated that plaintiff was about fifteen feet away from the front end of the bus when he first saw him and testified that he swung his bus to the left and tried to put on the brakes as soon as he saw plaintiff. Plaintiff's witness Kirst, who had testified to having directed traffic away from plaintiff by use of a flash light, testified that an automobile preceded the bus; that he directed it around plaintiff; that he saw the bus approaching and that the bus driver wasn't looking ahead; that he, Kirst, jumped out of the way, yelled at plaintiff just before the bus hit him and that the bus was traveling about fifteen feet behind the car ahead of it. He further testified that the bus did not change its direction from the time it crossed Bedford to the time it struck plaintiff; that he tried to direct the bus around plaintiff until it was within about three feet of him, when he jumped aside, and that the speed of the bus was not decreased up to the time of the accident. There was also testimony that when the car swerved out, the bus was about forty-five feet from where plaintiff was standing. The jury could well have believed that if the bus driver was negligent his negligence occurred in the interval between the turning out of the car and the contact of the bus with plaintiff. Plaintiff contends that the instruction should not have been given because the bus driver did not see him until it was too late to avoid the accident and that therefore the rule would have been inapplicable to the case on the theory that the driver was not confronted with a situation of peril until he actually saw plaintiff. This is too narrow a view of the situation. As long as the car ahead of the bus was proceeding in an uninterrupted course and at an unvarying speed, and in the absence of anything to alarm him, the bus driver would have been justified in assuming that the highway ahead of the car was clear. The swerving of the car to the left might have warned him that there was some obstruction in the street which caused the car to turn. We think it could reasonably have appeared to the jury that a situation of imminent peril arose when the car which had been obstructing the view of the bus driver turned aside so as to afford him a view of the street ahead. The conduct of the driver should have been considered by the jury with an understanding of the imminent peril doctrine and we cannot say that the jury, knowing the rule, would not have found that it had application to the facts proved and that the bus driver was not negligent. The failure to give this instruction, alone, would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[11] Several instructions were requested by defendants to the effect that plaintiff was committing a nuisance in using the street as he did and was therefore guilty of negligence which would bar recovery. No authority is cited in support of the argument except a single case from another state which turned upon the violation of a city ordinance and which obviously is not in point here. The court properly declined to give the requested instructions. Section 370 of the Penal Code, insofar as its provisions are pertinent, provides that anything which unlawfully obstructs the use of a public street is a public nuisance. Plaintiff's temporary use of the street was not a violation of any law to which our attention has been called nor did it amount to negligence as a matter of law. Fisher v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., supra, 1913, 21 Cal.App. 677, 682, 132 P. 767; Katz v. Helbing, supra, 1928, 205 Cal. 629, 633, 271 P. 1062, 62 A.L.R. 825; Wright v. Salzberger & Son, 1923, 63 Cal.App. 450, 452, 218 P. 785.

[12] The court did not err in refusing defendants' instruction on negligence calling attention to the darkness of the night and the color of plaintiff's clothes and in effect stating that it would have been difficult under the circumstances for the bus driver to have seen plaintiff.

In view of the conflicting evidence upon material issues and the relevancy of the legal principles stated in the instructions which were refused, we are unable to say that the result would not have been different had the trial been free from the errors we have discussed.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Action by Demetrio Gamalia and others against Louis G. Badillo and others for injuries and damages sustained in an automobile collision. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Morris Oppenheim, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Phillips & Munck, of Oakland, and Sandford, Barry & Spencer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants rendered by the court sitting without a jury, and in which findings were waived. The sole contention of appellants is that the judgment is totally unsupported by the evidence, and that, under the evidence, defendant Louis G. Badillo, as a matter of law, was guilty of negligence proximately causing the accident out of which the injuries complained of arose. Appellants have filed a six and one-half page opening brief, in which not one authority is cited, and have not filed a reply brief. A reading of the transcript demonstrates that there is no merit to the appeal; in fact, the point urged approaches the frivolous.

The action arose out of an automobile accident that occurred on the main highway south of San Rafael at about 7:30 a. m. on September 30, 1939. Defendant Louis G. Badillo, accompanied by his wife and another passenger, was driving his car northerly toward San Rafael at a speed of about 35 miles per hour. Plaintiff Demetrio Gamalia, accompanied by his wife, was driving on the same highway in a southerly direction, that is, towards San Francisco. The highway is a three-lane highway, and, immediately preceding the accident, each of the automobiles was in its proper outside lane. As defendants' car approached within several hundred feet of the Gamalia car, the axle on defendants' car broke alongside the left rear wheel, causing that wheel to fly off, and causing the car to fall onto the brake shield. When this occurred the Badillo car was proceeding down a rather steep grade. Badillo testified that the effect of the accident was to cause his car, equipped with four-wheeled mechanical brakes, to lose its braking power. He tried both the foot brake and the emergency brake, but neither would stop the car. The car was zigzagging back and forth, and he tried to manipulate the steering wheel so as to keep the car on his side of the highway. After his car had proceeded about 160 feet, it turned sharply to the left and crashed into the side of the Gamalia car that was coming up the grade. The accident occurred in the lane of the highway in which Gamalia was properly driving. As a result of the collision, Mrs. Gamalia sustained injuries from which she died, Mr. Gamalia incurred minor injuries, and the Gamalia car was damaged.

The evidence shows that as the Badillo car was proceeding down the grade, to its right, and just beyond the shoulder of the highway, was a steep drop of some three or four hundred feet. On the left of the highway there was a steep embankment. Neither in the pleadings nor at the trial did plaintiffs attempt to raise any issue as to the negligent maintenance of the car by defendants. The sole contention then, and now, made is that Badillo negligently handled the car after the wheel broke off. Appellants urge that in the exercise of care Badillo should have refrained from applying the brakes and should have concentrated solely upon steering his car in a straight line. This contention is predicated upon the testimony of an auto mechanic that, after the wheel flew off, whatever braking power was left would tend to concentrate in the left front wheel, and that the application of the brakes would tend to force the car to the left. This same mechanic testified that the breaking of the axle was due to crystallization; that such axle breaks are unforeseeable; that generally such breaks occur towards the center of the axle; that in such a break the wheel does not come off and the brakes may be applied; that this break was about flush with the wheel; that when the wheel flew off it interfered with the operation of the mechanical brakes because it removed the equality of pressure which must be applied to each wheel in order to have mechanical brakes operate properly.

[1] From this brief resumé, it must be apparent that the question of whether Badillo acted reasonably, in the face of the sudden peril with which he, through no fault of his own, was presented was a question of fact for the trier of the facts. The situation is simply one where Badillo was driving down a three-lane highway on his own side of the road at a lawful speed when, without fault on his part, his left rear axle broke and the wheel flew off. He was immediately confronted with a sudden, serious and unexpected emergency. There was a dangerous drop to his right, the Gamalia car was approaching up the hill to his left, he was going down hill, his brakes were gone, the left rear side of his car was bumping along on the brake shield, and the car was swerving out of control. He tried to keep the car in a straight line and tried to stop it. He was unsuccessful, but that does not mean that, as a matter of law, he was negligent.

[2-4] The law is clear, of course, that one who, without negligence on his part, is suddenly confronted with an unexpected imminent danger, is not required to exercise the same quantum of care imposed upon one who acts after careful deliberation. The test is, Did he act as a reasonably prudent man would act under similar circumstances? Where a person, in such sudden emergency, is presented with an immediate choice between alternative courses of conduct, he is not necessarily negligent if he makes what turns out to be an unwise choice, if a reasonable man, under identical circumstances, would have made a similar choice. The conduct of a person in such sudden emergency must be viewed in the light of the confusion and excitement of the moment, and not judged by what a person would have done had time existed deliberately to plan a course of conduct. In each case, whether the person acted reasonably is a question of fact for the trier of the fact. These principles are well settled. Dewees v. Kuntz, 106 Cal.App. 665, 289 P. 912; Miller v. Geary, 113 Cal.App. 573, 298 P. 843; see annotation and cases collected 79 A.L.R. 1277; see cases collected 19 Cal.Jur. 598, § 36.

In the instant case it is obvious that the implied finding that Badillo acted reasonably and was not negligent finds ample support in the record.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, C. J. Goodell, Judge.

Action by Edward Brown & Sons against Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, to recover franchise tax paid, claim for refund having been denied. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; SHENK and EDMONDS, JJ., dissenting.

Long & Levit, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., H. H. Linney, Asst. Atty. Gen., and James E. Sabine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

This is an action to recover taxes paid by plaintiff in 1935 under the California Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act (Gen.Laws Supp.1935, Act 8488; California Const. art. XIII, § 14, as amended in 1933) after claim for refund therefor was denied by the Franchise Tax Commissioner.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written stipulation that certain of the material allegations of the complaint, among which were the following, were true: "* * * plaintiff was and now is an insurance agent doing business in California and representing insurance companies as their agent; that during the said calendar years 1934 and 1935 the insurance companies represented by plaintiff as agent were: [the names of eighteen insurance companies are set forth]; * * * that each of said insurance companies was at all times herein mentioned authorized to transact an insurance business in and by the State of California; that plaintiff's entire income during the said period was derived from its said insurance agency business, and plaintiff engaged in no other business activity during said period. That plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges that at all times herein mentioned each of said above-mentioned insurance companies paid to the State of California the full amount of the gross premium tax required of each of them under and by virtue of the provisions of section 14, Article XIII of the California Constitution"; that a franchise tax return was filed for the year 1935, and the tax indicated thereon paid, following which a claim for refund of the entire amount was filed, based upon the contention that under the provisions of said section 14 of article XIII of the Constitution, the corporation, engaged in business as an insurance agent for the designated eighteen companies doing business in the State of California, was not subject to the tax; that the claim for refund was denied and that plaintiff has not appealed to the State Board of Equalization from the action of the Franchise Tax Commissioner in denying the refund. The findings follow the stipulation. After the entry of a judgment for defendant, a new trial was granted and the matter resubmitted upon the same stipulated facts and reargued. Again judgment was entered for defendant, from which plaintiff corporation appeals.

Subdivision (3) of section 4 of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act (Stats. 1935, ch. 353, p. 1246, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1935 Supp. Act 8488) provides: "with the exception of financial corporations, every corporation doing business within the limits of this State and not expressly exempted from taxation by the provisions of the Constitution of this State or by this act, shall annually pay to the State, for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchises within this State, a tax according to or measured by its net income, to be computed, in the manner hereinafter provided * * *." Political Code section 3664b provides that every insurance company doing business in this state shall pay a designated percentage upon the amount of gross premiums received upon business done in this state and further provides: "This tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, State, county and municipal, upon such companies or their property, except taxes upon their real estate." (Art. XIII, § 14 of the California Const.)

Appellant contends that a tax on an insurance agent for the privilege of doing business is a direct tax on the insurance companies it represents and hence is forbidden by the "in lieu" provision above referred to requiring every insurance company to pay a percentage of its gross premiums as an annual tax. In support of such contention it relies principally on Hughes v. City of Los Angeles, 168 Cal. 764, 145 P. 94, 95. In that case a revenue ordinance in the nature of an occupational tax providing for the payment of a designated license fee "whether the insurer be a corporation, mutual company, or individual," was declared to be in violation of article XIII, § 14 of the Constitution of this state. The court there said: "Under the authority of Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 168 Cal. 762, 145 P. 94, this day decided, no doubt can be entertained but that if this privilege tax were imposed upon the insurance companies themselves it would be invalid. The distinction sought to be drawn in this case is that this particular license fee is not imposed upon the companies but upon the agents of the companies. This is true, but upon the other hand it is equally true that every insurance corporation must act through agents and can act only through agents, and that, therefore, in a direct and immediate sense a tax upon such agents for the right to do business is a tax upon the corporation's right to do business."

Certain tax statutes have been held to tax the mere privilege of being a corporation; that is, the enjoyment of the right to do business (Stats.1929, ch. 13, § 5, p. 20) or, as later declared, the right of exercising a corporate franchise in this state. (Stats. 1931, ch. 1066, § 5, p. 2225; Oliver Cont. Filter Co. v. McColgan, 48 Cal.App.2d 800, 805, 120 P.2d 682).

[1, 2] The character of a tax "must be ascertained by its incidents and from the natural and legal effect of the language employed in the statute." (Ingels v. Riley, 5 Cal.2d 154, 159, 53 P.2d 939, 942, 103 A.L.R. 1.) A privilege tax is not a property tax within the meaning of the constitutional provisions. (Brunton v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 202, 124 P.2d 831.) The tax in question "does not become a property tax simply because it is proportioned in amount to the value of the property used in connection with the privilege which is taxed." (Ingels v. Riley, supra, 5 Cal.2d page 160, 53 P.2d page 942, 103 A.L.R. 1; Carpenter v. Peoples Mut. Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 299, 74 P.2d 508; Camden Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Johnson, 42 Cal.App.2d 528, 109 P.2d 447.) In Consolidated Title Securities Co. v. Hopkins, 1 Cal.2d 414, 419, 35 P.2d 320, 323, the court said: "The gross premiums tax required to be paid by insurance companies, although in lieu of certain taxes upon property, is not, like the public utilities gross receipts tax, by the terms of the constitutional provision itself a tax upon property. Rather, it is a franchise tax exacted for the privilege of doing business in this state * * *."

[3, 4] The Hughes case is not controlling herein. It held that an occupation tax on the insurance agent because he was an agent of an insurance company was invalid. But this tax (franchise tax) is on all corporations doing business in this state "on the privilege of doing business as a corporation." The Hughes case decided that an occupation tax aimed at insurance agents hit insurance companies directly. This holding was necessary because the "in lieu" provision applies to direct taxes on insurance companies, and does not apply to indirect taxes imposed on other persons or corporations and passed on to the insurance company. The privilege of exemption from liability for other taxes is predicated on the theory that a gross premiums tax has been paid. Appellant, of course, pays no gross premiums tax. It follows that unless the franchise tax on Edward Brown & Sons is a direct tax on the insurance companies it represents, appellant must pay the franchise tax.

It is apparent that any effect that the payment of a franchise tax by Edward Brown & Sons may have on the insurance companies it represents is at most indirect. So far as the payment of the tax by appellant is concerned, it has no more effect on the insurance companies than the payment by appellant of automobile or personal property taxes.

[5] The franchise tax act does not single out the business of insurance agents and levy a tax on that business. It does not tax such business at all. It is not an occupational tax such as was involved in the Hughes case. While the tax is imposed only on companies doing business in California, the phrase "doing business" merely describes the group intended to be taxed—the tax is not imposed on the doing of business. If it were, it would be an occupational tax and including only corporations and excluding partnerships and individuals doing business might well render the tax invalid. The tax by express language is imposed on the privilege of doing business as a corporation. It is imposed on the privilege of using the corporate mechanism, with its consequent advantages over other forms of doing business in this state.

In Anglo-Chilean, etc., Corp. v. State of Alabama, 288 U.S. 218, 228, 53 S.Ct. 373, 376, 77 L.Ed. 710, strongly relied upon by appellant, it was held "that the power of the state to withhold from a foreign corporation permission to exercise its franchise to do business therein does not enable it, when granting the privilege, to burden by taxation interstate commerce carried on by such corporation within the state." The court there was dealing with an interference with interstate commerce. The facts of the present case are essentially different. Appellant is a California corporation entitled to the privilege and actually doing business within the state without the payment of tax measured by its net income.

The trial judge, the Hon. C. J. Goodell, rendered a written opinion in which he reviews certain cases bearing upon this question. We are in accord with his understanding and interpretation of those cases as set forth in the following excerpt from that opinion (emphasis being as therein employed unless otherwise indicated):

"In Pacific Co., Ltd., v. Johnson, 212 Cal. 148, at page 154, 298 P. 489, at page 492, affirmed in 285 U.S. 480, 52 S.Ct. 424, 76 L. Ed. 893, the court says: 'A franchise tax is a tax imposed upon a corporation for the right or privilege of being a corporation or of doing business in a corporate capacity. * * ' ( * * and note the similarity of this language to that cited from the Constitution, art. XIII, § 16, subd. 2(a).

"In Memphis Dock & Fwd. Co. v. Fort (Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1936), [170 Tenn. 109], 92 S.W.2d 408, 409, the court enlarges somewhat upon our own Supreme Court's statement just quoted, when it says: 'The [excise] tax is not laid upon a particular corporate business or upon a particular transaction; it is upon the privilege of doing business as a corporation and exercising the corporate powers for the purpose of producing a profit. The source of the profit and the character of business carried on in the corporate name is immaterial. The tax is measured by net earnings that result from whatever business may be done by the corporation in the exercise of powers conferred by the charter. * * * (Citing cases.)'

"In Missouri Athletic Ass'n v. Delk Inv. Corporation (Supreme Court of Missouri, 1929), [323 Mo. 765], 20 S.W.2d 51, 55, the court quotes from an earlier decision of their own ([State v. Pierce Petroleum Corp.], 318 Mo. [1020], 1027, 2 S.W.2d 790, 794), as follows: 'The tax is not a property tax but an excise levied upon the privilege of transacting business in this state as a corporation.' (Citing [State ex rel. Marquette Hotel Inv. Co. v. State Tax Comm.], 282 Mo. 213, 221 S.W. 721; emphasis the court's.)

"The Missouri Court then cites 37 Cyc. 817 and City of Chicago v. Chicago City Railway Co., 245 Ill.App. 473, which case, in turn, refers to Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. [107], 108 [31 S.Ct. 342, 55 L.Ed. 389, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1312], quoting: 'it is a tax upon the doing of business with the advantages which inhere in the peculiarities, of corporate or joint stock organizations' and further quoting: 'The tax is laid upon the privileges which exist in the conducting of a business with the advantages which inhere in the corporate capacity of those taxed. * * * It is this distinctive privilege which is the subject of taxation. * * *'

"In Diamond Match Co. v. State Tax Commission (Court of Appeals, Maryland, 1938), [175 Md. 234], 200 A. 365, 369, appears the following: 'Again, the franchise tax imposed conferred on the corporation no more than the privilege of juristic personality and limited corporate liability * * *.'

"In State v. Clement Nat. Bank (Supreme Court of Vermont, 1911), [84 Vt. 167], 78 A. 944, at 949 [Ann.Cas.1912D, 22] it is said: 'A "franchise tax" is a tax upon the privilege of doing business under corporate organization * * *.'

"See also In re Stevens, 1905, [46 Misc. 623], 95 N.Y.S. 297, at page 313.

"Many other authorities could be cited to the same general effect. * * *

"Carpenter v. Peoples Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 299, 74 P.2d 508, is cited by the plaintiff to the point that 'This tax is a franchise tax exacted for the privilege of conducting an insurance business in the state.' * * * That is true in the case of an insurance company itself because it comes under these very provisions of the Constitution. Corporations other than insurance companies come under the other provisions and as to them all that can be said is that they are taxed for the privilege of doing business, not as an insurance corporation, but simply as a corporation.

"Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Jordan, 168 Cal. 270, 142 P. 839, held that the gross premium tax on insurance companies was in lieu of all taxes including a corporation franchise tax. It does not hold that an incorporated insurance agent has the same immunity.

"City Investments, Ltd., v. Johnson, 6 Cal.2d 150, 56 P.2d 939, and Fore River Shipbuilding Corp. v. Commonwealth, 248 Mass. 137, 142 N.E. 812 (cited by McLaren and Butler in 'California Tax Laws of 1929') hold that a corporate franchise tax is a tax on the right of a corporation to do business in this state. Nothing herein is inconsistent with those cases. * * *

"In Commissioner of Corporations and Taxation v. Bristol County Kennel Club, Inc., [301 Mass. 27], 16 N.E.2d 43 (Supreme Judicial Court of Mass., 1938), it was held that a statute requiring a license fee of a person or corporation to conduct meetings for the racing of horses or dogs and requiring that no other license fee or excise shall be assessed or collected from the licensee by the state or any political subdivision thereof does not exempt a domestic business corporation licensed to conduct dog races from the payment of an excise tax imposed on domestic business corporations.

"At first blush the Massachusetts case might seem to be distinguishable in that the court strictly construed the exemption provision against the taxpayer, whereas our courts have held that the rule of strict construction does not apply to the 'in lieu' provision in question. ([City and County of] San Francisco v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 248, 135 P. 971, 973.)

"However, the rule of liberal construction spoken of in the case last cited only applies 'in favor of the person required to pay taxes in the substituted license form.' Thus it would seem to apply only in favor of the insurance companies who pay the gross premium tax, and not in favor of their agents. If the tax were imposed 'in a direct and immediate sense' (Hughes case) upon the insurance companies, then the tax would be invalid by virtue of the liberal construction given to the 'in lieu' provision. But since the tax in question is not an occupation tax, nor imposed as a condition to entering or remaining in, the insurance business, it is not 'in a direct and immediate sense' upon the insurance companies themselves. As stated by the Massachusetts court (supra), 'but that it was meant to exempt a licensee as well from an excise that has no relation to acts done as licensee, but arises from doing business as a corporation, we cannot believe.'

"The Massachusetts case, supra, [301 Mass. 27, 16 N.E.2d 44], holds that the in lieu provision or exemption 'has no certain or plainly intended application to a corporation excise tax, for an individual as well as a corporation may be granted a dog racing license.' Paraphrasing that, it is clear that plaintiffs may, if they choose, carry on the business of insurance agents individually or as a copartnership foregoing the advantages derived from incorporation and thereby legally escape the payment of the tax in question. In other words, the reasons given in the Massachusetts decision seem to answer the plaintiff's contention herein. There it is said that if a licensee by reason of the exemption provision does not have to pay a corporation tax, 'It would be as reasonable to hold that a * * * licensee * * * is freed from liability to pay a legacy tax. * * * a stock transfer tax * * * a motor vehicle excise tax * * *.' etc."

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action in inverse condemnation by George Bacich against the Board of Control of the State of California and others. From a judgment for defendants entered after sustaining of demurrers to the original complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants entered after sustaining of demurrers to the original complaint without leave to amend. The defendants are the Board of Control of the State of California, California Toll Bridge Authority and the Department of Public Works of the State of California. Each defendant filed a separate demurrer, that of the Authority being general and special, while those of the other two defendants were general only.

The action is one in inverse condemnation brought by plaintiff, a property owner, to recover damages for the decrease in the market value of his property alleged to have been caused by the construction of the San Francisco approaches to the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner of a three-story apartment house, used exclusively for residential purposes, located on the southwesterly side of Sterling Street between Harrison and Bryant Streets; that the defendants Toll Bridge Authority and Board of Public Works, pursuant to statutory authority, constructed the approaches to the bridge; that in so doing these defendants acquired and demolished all residential property except plaintiff's in the general area; that in constructing the approaches these defendants lowered the level of Harrison Street 50 feet below the level of Sterling Street; that the only way to reach plaintiff's property now is from Bryant Street; that in approaching plaintiff's property from Bryant Street it is necessary to pass under one of the approaches to the bridge; that as a result of closing the Harrison Street-Sterling Street intersection the street cars were removed from Sterling Street; that as a result of these acts the value of the plaintiff's property has been reduced from $20,000 to $6,000. The complaint also alleges that within two years after the claim accrued a verified claim for the damages suffered was filed with the Board of Control, which claim was denied October 22, 1936; that duplicate originals of the claim were filed with the Department of Public Works, the Toll Bridge Authority, and the California Highway Commission.

[1] The main question presented on this appeal is whether the complaint alleges any damage for which the state or its agencies are liable. Before answering that question, certain preliminary matters must first be mentioned. In the trial court defendants successfully urged, and on this appeal they contend, that there is no cause of action in this state for damage to, as distinguished from the taking of, property by public agencies for a public use. In this connection it is urged that the eminent domain section of the Constitution (Art. I, § 14), prohibiting the taking or damaging of property without compensation, is not self-executing; that although the section provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been made to, or paid into court for the owner, nevertheless the owner may not sue the state or its agencies when his property has been damaged for the reason that the Legislature has not provided a form of remedy to recover such damage. This identical argument that the constitutional provision required further legislative action to make it effective was presented to, and squarely rejected by, the Supreme Court in Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 123 P.2d 505. The court held in that case that the constitutional provision itself confers the right of action, is self-executing, and constitutes the consent of the state to be sued in such proceedings. The submission of the instant appeal has been held up to await the decision of the Supreme Court in that case. That decision having now become final, the holding therein is conclusive on this court on this point in the present case.

All defendants urge, in support of their general demurrers, that all three of defendants are merely state agencies, and therefore are not the proper defendants; that the state alone is liable for the damage suffered, and is the only proper defendant. After the demurrers had been sustained, the plaintiff requested leave to amend, and formally offered either to make the state a party, or, if the trial court believed the state should be the sole defendant, to substitute the state for the named defendants. The request for leave to amend was denied.

[2-4] So far as defendant State Board of Control is concerned, this contention is sound. The only allegation in the complaint concerning that defendant is that it denied the claim. There is no allegation that it participated in the acts causing the alleged damage or that it is liable therefor. The demurrer of this defendant was properly sustained. But the position taken by the other two defendants is unsound. These defendants are admittedly state agencies, and according to the allegations of the complaint, were acting as such in performing the work causing the damage of which complaint is made. The state can act only through its agencies and, according to the allegations of the complaint, these two defendants were the two agencies through which the state acted. An analysis of the complaint discloses that it contains every allegation necessary to state a cause of action against the state. If a judgment is secured against these defendants it would be paid out of the state treasury. Under such circumstances, although undoubtedly the state is the proper party defendant, it was not error to sue the state through its official agencies. (California Securities Co. v. State, 111 Cal.App. 258, 295 P. 583), and it was error to refuse to permit plaintiff to amend by substituting the state as the real party defendant.

[5, 6] The demurrer of the Toll Bridge Authority urges that the cause of action, if any, alleged in the complaint is barred by §§ 667 and 688 of the Political Code. Section 688 has no reference to this proceeding. By express terms that section only applies to claims predicated "on express contract or for negligence." This is a suit in inverse condemnation based upon a self-executing provision of the Constitution, and such proceeding is predicated neither on express contract nor on negligence. Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal.2d at page 724, 123 P.2d 505. Section 667 requires a person having a claim against the state, the settlement of which is not otherwise provided for by law, to present it to the Board of Control "at least four months before the meeting of the legislature." The complaint, it will be remembered, alleges that a claim was filed as required by this section, but the date it was filed is not alleged. Inferentially, however, it appears that it was not filed until after September 19, 1936, since it appears from a copy of the claim attached to the complaint that it was sworn to on that day. Since legislative sessions open on the first Monday after the first day of January in odd numbered years, a claim filed after September 19, 1936, would not be filed within four months of the convening of the 1937 Legislature in January of that year. Thus, if the section is applicable to such an action, it inferentially appears from the complaint that the claim may have been filed too late. But in his request for leave to amend after demurrers sustained, plaintiff offered to amend by alleging that the work on the approaches was not finished until September 20, 1936, and, hence that he was unable to file his claim within four months of the convening of the 1937 Legislature in January, 1937. Obviously, if the work was not completed within four months of the convening of the next session of the Legislature, the claimant is not required to do the impossible. As long as it is filed within four months of the convening of the Legislature which convenes next at least four months after the work is completed, the claim was filed in time. Under such circumstances, even if the section is applicable to such a proceeding, the trial court abused its discretion in refusing permission to amend as to this issue.

[7-9] The major problem presented in this case is whether the complaint alleges any elements of damage that are compensable under Article I, section 14 of the Constitution. An analysis of the complaint discloses that plaintiff has alleged four elements of damage which he claims are compensable: (1) that because of the lowering of Harrison Street, the Sterling Street-Harrison Street intersection has been closed so that plaintiff's property is now located on a dead-end street, thus making the property less accessible, and interfering with a claimed right of ingress and egress; (2) that because of the lowering of Harrison Street the street cars formerly operating on Sterling Street have been removed; (3) that the only access to the property is from Bryant Street, and in order to reach the property from that direction it is necessary to pass under the bridge approach; (4) that in the immediate vicinity of plaintiff's property all residential property except plaintiff's was acquired and demolished by defendants in constructing the approaches. It seems quite clear that because other property was condemned (item 4), and because plaintiff must pass under the bridge approach (item 3), there being no allegation of impairment of any easement of light and air, plaintiff has no legal cause to complain. Such factors in no way interfere with any property right of plaintiff. The same can be said as to the diversion of the street car line to another street—item 2. It is well settled in this state that a landowner has no property right in the continuation or maintenance of the flow of traffic past his property. The diversion of traffic caused by the improvement impairs no property right of the property owner. Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal.2d at page 736, 123 P.2d 505. Thus, the only element of damage alleged and left for consideration is item 1, supra. The problem here presented is whether depreciation in value caused by closing one end of the street on which plaintiff's property is located, so that the property is now located on a cul-de-sac, is compensable. This depends upon the nature and extent of the legal rights of an abutting property owner in the streets upon which his property abuts. It is now too well settled to require extended discussion that the property owner has a right of access, a right of ingress and egress to and from his property, along the street upon which his property faces. This right of access is an easement, a property right, and any damage to that right is compensable. Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal.2d at page 727, 123 P.2d 505; McCandless v. City of Los Angeles, 214 Cal. 67, 4 P.2d 139; Lane v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 208 Cal. 29, 280 P. 109; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 116 P. 750; Williams v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 592, 89 P. 330; Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 492, 62 P. 829, 80 Am.St.Rep. 147; Brown v. Board of Supervisors, 124 Cal. 274, 57 P. 82; Geurkink v. City of Petaluma, 112 Cal. 306, 44 P. 570; Bigelow v. Ballerino, 111 Cal. 559, 44 P. 307; Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 P. 750, 42 Am.St.Rep. 149; Zobelein Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 6 Cal.App.2d 29, 43 P.2d 818. There can be no doubt, in this state, that, if the street immediately in front of, or immediately adjacent to, the property is narrowed so that access to the property is materially impaired, a property right has been infringed entitling the property owner to compensation. That was one of the problems discussed in Rose v. State of California, supra. (See, also, the other cases above cited.) Whether this right of access, this right of ingress and egress, is impaired by infringements not occurring immediately in front of or adjacent to the property, is a problem on which there is a hopeless diversity of opinion. The solution of this problem turns upon whether the right of access is something more than the mere right to get from the property into the street fronting the property. Can the property owner complain if the public improvement affects his right of access by closing the street in one direction so that access to his property is completely cut off in one direction? California, apparently, has not yet chosen between the two lines of authority, although there are some intimations in Rose v. State of California, supra, implying that the impairment of the right need not occur directly in front of or adjacent to the property. In that case the court found the law of California to be that depreciation to be recoverable must arise from "infringement of some right which the owner of land possesses in connection with his property." 19 Cal.2d at page 739, 123 P.2d at page 520. It was held that the property owner has an easement of access which is a property right, "private easements in the street in front of or adjacent to the lot—distinguished from the public easements therein—which are a part and portion of his property and are the private property of the lot owner as fully as the lot itself." 19 Cal.2d at page 727, 123 P.2d at page 514. The rights of the abutting owner are the rights of access and the right of light and air. The opinion indicates that the right of access is an easement for the purposes of ingress and egress from the owner's property to the abutting street. The court was of the view that the evidence that the plaintiff's property in the Rose case was left on a 14-foot lane for vehicular traffic, too narrow for two vehicles to pass each other, where before the improvement it had been on a main highway, sustained a finding of unreasonable interference with the easement of access. Whether the court merely intended to hold that the right of access was interfered with because the abutting street was too narrow for comfortable vehicular access, or whether the court meant that the plaintiff could recover for the increased difficulty of getting into the main traveled portion of Jackson Street on which his property formerly fronted, is not absolutely clear from the opinion. That the court meant the latter may be indicated by the following language:

"Defendants contend that this court should hold as a matter of law that there was no interference with plaintiffs' easement of access or right of ingress and egress in this case, and also that the evidence does not sustain a finding of such interference. The former contention is based upon the theory that plaintiffs' easement merely entitles them to cross from their own property onto the street or highway on which it abuts. It is also claimed by defendants that whatever circuity of travel is caused thereafter is merely an inconvenience suffered after reaching the street or highway. These contentions cannot be sustained. * * *

"The issues before the trial court in the case at bar were, whether plaintiffs' right of access to Jackson Street was substantially and unreasonably impaired by the construction of the subway, and, if so, the amount of damage suffered as the result of such interference." 19 Cal.2d at pages 728, 729, 123 P.2d at page 514.

The court discussed the legal effect of the closing of a street crossing, although that was not the precise problem involved in that case. It said:

"Relying very strongly upon the cases which have held that the closing of a street crossing by the railroad commission is damnum absque injuria as to nonabutting property owners, defendants maintain that plaintiffs certainly cannot complain because they must travel a narrow side lane to reach the main traveled portion of the street when they could not recover if the street were closed entirely.

"Briefly, we may observe that recovery has been denied in those cases upon the ground that the injury is one suffered in common with the public, is not special or peculiar to the particular property involved, and the difference in damage is one of degree and not of kind depending upon the property owner's proximity to the closed crossing. Compensation has also been refused on the ground that the landowner's easement of access is not in fact impaired, that convenient and reasonable means of ingress and egress is afforded, although not the quickest and closest route to traveled thoroughfares. We have observed also that a growing number of decisions denying recovery for damages to nonabutting owners of property on closed streets are prompted by the economic factors involved. Since every property owner for a great distance therefrom is somewhat inconvenienced by the closing of a street, the question of where to stop awarding damages is not only difficult to ascertain, but the payment of damages in every case of this character would place a great burden upon the public whenever such closings are ordered.

"The cases determining what does and what does not constitute a compensable damage when a street is ordered closed are in considerable confusion, and this decision will not be benefited by a lengthy consideration of the authorities cited by defendants on this proposition. Defendants contend that the case of City of San Mateo v. Railroad Comm., 9 Cal.2d 1, 68 P.2d 713, 718, decides conclusively that the closing of a grade crossing is under the police power and any injury resulting therefrom is damnum absque injuria. The court therein stated that in the absence of facts to the contrary it would assume that none of the plaintiffs' property directly abutted on the area to be closed, and that the private property in question was contiguous to either county or state highways connected by public crossings. The court then held that the nature of abutting owner's right is 'an easement in the street fronting upon his lot, for the purposes of 'ingress and egress,' and concluded that no such right had been taken away in the case before it.

"We are not here called upon to determine whether a property owner may recover damages in a case where his property is situated on a street created into a cul de sac as the result of the closing of the street on either side of his property without interfering with his right of access to the street on which his property abuts, as this is not such a case." 19 Cal.2d at page 731, 123 P.2d at page 516.

[10] It would appear from the foregoing that the court in the Rose case, although expressly refraining in the last paragraph above quoted from passing on the question here involved, intimated that the right of access extends beyond the mere physical right to get into the street in front of the property. This intimation is in accordance with reason, and with the weight of authority elsewhere. This exact problem is the subject of an exhaustive annotation in 49 A.L.R. 330, 351. Cases from many states are there collected and commented upon. At page 351, under the heading "Cul-de-sac," the rule is stated as follows: "The weight of authority supports the proposition that if, by the vacation or closing of a street, access to property from the general system of streets in that direction [is prevented], and the property is left fronting on a cul-de-sac, the owner may recover damages." Cases from Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas and Canada are then cited and discussed as supporting that rule. Later cases are collected in a supplementary annotation in 93 A.L.R. 639, 642. In this annotation at page 642 it is stated: "As indicated in the earlier annotation, generally the owner has been held entitled to damages where, by the vacation or closing of a street, access to his property from the general system of streets in that direction is cut off and the property is left fronting on a cul-de-sac." Cases from the federal court and from Georgia, Kentucky, Nebraska, Oregon, and Pennsylvania are cited in support of the text. See, also, Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Terminal Oil Mill Co. 180 Okl. 496, 71 P.2d 617, a particularly well-reasoned case.

of access is something more than the mere right to get into the street immediately in front of the property; that such right is that of reasonable use of the street fronting the property in either direction to the next intersection; that any material impairment of that right, if it causes damage, is compensable. This rule is predicated on what we consider to be sound considerations. The rule which limits the right to the mere right of access to the street immediately in front of the property is artificial. Obviously, if the street is closed at both ends, the right to get into the street immediately in front of the property is of no practical value. No one denies that where the street is thus completely closed compensation for impairment of the right of access must be paid. Bigelow v. Ballerino, supra. When the street is closed at one end, situations can be imagined where the right to go in the opposite direction would be of no practical value. Thus, where the property is located on a highway with no intersections for several miles, and in one direction lies the city and the other the country, and the highway is closed towards the city, the right to proceed several miles into the country before coming to an intersection would be of little practical benefit to the land. When, by reason of the closing of one end of the street the property becomes situated on a cul-de-sac, so that the property owner is cut off from travel in one direction, he has suffered a damage of the same kind, differing only in degree, from the imagined situation. In our opinion, the better reasoned cases hold that the right of access includes the right to adequate access to the property from either direction. It includes the right of ingress and egress to and from the property in either direction and the use of the street in either direction, to the next intersection.

[12] It is true that there are a respectable number of cases that hold that in a cul-de-sac situation the property owner has not been damaged. Those cases are collected in the two annotations to which reference has been made. Many of them were decided in states where the constitutional or statutory provisions allowed recovery only for the taking of property, no recovery being allowed for the mere damaging of property. Those cases are clearly distinguishable, because the constitutional right of the property owner in this state extends to freedom from damage as well as from a taking.

Some of the other cases announcing the minority rule are predicated upon purely economic grounds—that is that the cost of public improvements would be prohibitive if damages were recoverable in such situations. Those cases argue that, if property owners abutting on the closed street are entitled to compensation, property owners for an indefinite distance in either direction will likewise be entitled to compensation, and the cost of the public improvement will thus become prohibitive. That is not so. The right of the property owner is limited to access and use of the street upon which his property fronts to the next intersection in either direction. Property owners beyond that point have suffered no damage different from that suffered by the general public. As so limited, there can be no basis for the fear that the cost of the improvement will be prohibitive. If there is no material damage, the amount of which is a question of fact, the increased cost will be small. If the damage is large, there is no reason why it should be suffered by the individual. If the property right, as here defined, has been damaged, the Constitution grants the right to damages. If the law is to be changed it should be changed by constitutional amendment and not by judicial mandate.

[13-15] Some of the cases announcing the minority rule state that no property right has been impaired in a cul-de-sac situation because the property owner is only subjected to the same inconvenience to which the public generally is subjected, only to a greater degree. It is true that the public generally has a legal right to pass over public streets, and that that right is impaired by the closing of a street. It is also true that damage to that right by the closing of a street is not compensable. But that right is not a property right. The right of access, as already pointed out, is an easement, and is a property right. If that property right is impaired, and, as a result, the value of property is lessened, the property owner is entitled to compensation. The property owner has suffered a damage peculiar to himself, and vastly different not only in degree but in nature from that suffered by the public generally. That right of access is the right of reasonable access to the street fronting the property, and includes the use of that street in both directions to the next intersection. Of course, the amount of damage, if any, to each property owner within the block, is a question of fact which must be left to the jury to be determined according to the usual rules applied in such cases.

From what has been said, it is clear that the trial court abused its discretion in sustaining the demurrers of the Toll Bridge Authority and the Board of Public Works to the original complaint without leave to amend, and in denying plaintiff's request for leave to amend. The judgment is reversed with instructions to the trial court to grant plaintiff's motion for leave to amend.

JOHN McCLURE ESTATE, Inc., v. JOHNSON, State Treasurer, et al.

Civ. 13655.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 23, 1942.

Under State Constitution, an insurance company doing business within the state was exempt from payment of franchise taxes provided by Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, and hence stock dividends received by corporate taxpayer from the company were not deductible in determining taxpayer's net income for franchise tax purposes, under provision of franchise tax act exempting dividends received from a corporation doing business in the state, and declared from income included in measuring of the tax imposed by the act on the corporation declaring dividends. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8488, § 8(h); Const. art. 13, §§ 14, 16.

2. Taxation 🔑376(1)

Provision of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act allowing deductions of dividends received during income year from corporation doing business in the state and declared from income which was included in measure of tax imposed by the act on the corporation declaring the dividends, applies only to the levy of the tax provided by the act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8488, § 8(h).

3. Taxation 🔑376(1)

Even if gross premiums tax paid by insurance company was merely in lieu of payment of franchise tax and in effect the company was subject to tax imposed by the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, stock dividends received by corporate taxpayer from the company would not be deductible in determining taxpayer's net income for franchise tax purposes, in absence of a showing of what portion of the dividends were declared from premiums, since gross premiums constituted the only measure of the tax imposed by the gross premiums tax act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8488, § 8(h).

4. Constitutional law 🔑229(1), 283
Taxation 🔑37, 42(2)

The provision of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act authorizing deduction of dividends received by taxpayer from corporation doing business in the state, and declared from income included in measure of tax imposed by the act on the corporation declaring the dividends, is not unconstitutional as failing to afford "equal protection of the law", or as being "discriminatory" or amounting to the taking of property without "due process of law", because it does not apply to dividends of insurance companies which are subject to gross premiums tax. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8488, § 8(h).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by John McClure Estate, Incorporated, against Charles G. Johnson, as State Treasurer, etc., Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, etc., and others, to recover amount paid as taxes under protest. From a judgment in favor of the Franchise Tax Commissioner, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

C. W. Bowers, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., H. H. Linney, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Valentine Brookes, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

Appellant is a domestic corporation doing business in the State of California.

Appellant received dividends on stock owned by it in an insurance company doing business in California and paying the insurance tax on gross premiums imposed during the year 1937, the income year in question, by section 14 of article XIII of the California Constitution. The dividends received by appellant were paid by the insurance company in part from gross premium income and in part from investment income. Appellant contended that, in computing its net income for 1937 by which its franchise tax for 1938 was measured, all the dividends received by it from the insurance company were deductible. The franchise tax commissioner, respondent here, refused to allow any of such dividends to be deducted and increased appellant's tax accordingly. After paying the additional tax appellant instituted this action for the recovery thereof. Judgment of the trial court was for respondent and this appeal followed. The appeal, involving the legality of a tax, was taken to the Supreme Court of this state and was transferred by the Supreme Court to this court.

Appellant contends that the provision of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, which permits the deduction of certain dividends in computing net income for franchise tax purposes, applies to dividends received on the stock of insurance companies; and, if not so held to apply, the provision in question is unconstitutional, in that it does not afford equal protection of the law, is discriminatory and amounts to taking property without due process of law.

The provision of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, section 8(h) thereof, read, at the time of the instant tax levy, as follows (Stats.1929, p. 19, as amended; Act 8488, Deering's General Laws): "§ 8. In computing 'net income' the following deductions shall be allowed: * * * (h) Dividends received during the income year from a bank or corporation doing business in this State declared from income which has been included in the measure of the tax imposed by this act upon the bank or corporation declaring the dividends."

The following provisions of the state Constitution were also in effect at the time of the instant levy:

Section 14 of article XIII, reading, so far as here pertinent:

"All companies herein mentioned and their franchises, other than insurance companies and their franchises, shall be taxed in the same manner and at the same rates as mercantile, manufacturing and business corporations and their franchises are taxed pursuant to section 16 of this article; * * *

"Every insurance company or association doing business in this State shall annually pay to the State a tax, assessed by the State Board of Equalization, of two and six-tenths per centum upon the amount of the gross premiums other than gross premiums from ocean marine insurance, received upon its business done in this State, less return premiums and reinsurance in companies or associations authorized to do business in this state; * * * This tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, State, county, and municipal, upon such companies or their property, except taxes upon their real estate; * * *." (Italics added.)

Section 16 of article XIII, the pertinent portion of which reads: "2. The Legislature may provide by law for the taxation of corporations, their franchises, or any other franchises, by any method not prohibited by this Constitution or the Constitution or laws of the United States."

[1] Appellant argues that insurance companies are not exempt from the payment of the franchise tax provided by the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, because neither the act itself nor the Constitution provides for such an exemption; that the Constitution merely provides that the gross premiums tax shall be "in lieu" of the franchise tax. Appellant further urges that the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act and the provision for gross premiums tax must be read and construed together, that the provisions for the two taxes are in pari materia. The foregoing excerpts quoted from the constitutional provisions are clear in meaning, and the legislative intent embodied therein is at once obvious. There is no uncertainty, doubt or ambiguity requiring the application of any doctrine of judicial construction, other than that of giving to words their ordinary meaning. It is clear that under the Constitution and the laws of this state insurance companies do not pay the franchise tax provided for in the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act. It is equally clear from the above quoted constitutional provisions that it is not intended to subject insurance companies to the payment of such a tax. The Constitution provides another method of taxing insurance companies; and the measure of such taxation is distinctly different from that provided for the taxation of corporations by the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act. To say, as in section 14 of article XIII, above, that all companies other than insurance companies shall be taxed at the same rates as business corporations, is no more than to state that insurance companies shall not be taxed at the same rates as other business corporations, insofar as the provision applies to insurance companies. Whether the gross premiums tax is considered as a tax "in lieu" of the franchise tax or otherwise, the necessary conclusion to be derived from the foregoing constitutional provisions is that insurance companies are not subject to the franchise tax provided by the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act. Moreover, it is to be noted that the Constitution does not expressly state that the gross premiums tax shall be in lieu of the franchise tax. The Constitution states that the gross premiums tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes, except taxes on real estate.

[2, 3] It cannot be disputed that section 8(h) of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act applies only to the levy of the tax provided by that act. Since the franchise tax provided by that act is not imposed upon an insurance company it necessarily follows that a dividend declared from income of an insurance company cannot be held to have been declared from income which has been included in the measure of the tax imposed by the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act. Moreover, in the instant case the specific income from which dividends of the insurance company were declared was income derived at least partially from other sources than premiums. Therefore, even if it could be assumed that insurance companies were subject to the franchise tax imposed by the foregoing act, that section 8(h), supra, applied to dividends of insurance companies, and the gross premiums tax paid by the insurance company was merely in lieu of the payment of the franchise tax, it could not be held that the dividends here in question were declared from income which had been included in the measure of the tax imposed, because the gross premiums alone constitute the only measure of the tax imposed upon an insurance company, and it is not shown what portion of the dividends were declared from premiums. In any event, therefore, the dividends in question were not proper deductions to be made in the computation of the tax imposed upon appellant by the provisions of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, under the circumstances here presented.

[4] Appellant's contention as to the unconstitutionality of section 8(h) of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act cannot aid appellant in obtaining a deduction of the dividends in question. As respondent points out, the net result of appellant's argument in this respect, if upheld, would be to preclude deduction of any dividends. It is only by virtue of section 8(h), supra, that any deduction of dividends is allowable in computing the franchise tax. If, therefore, section 8(h) were held unconstitutional there would remain no statutory authority for the deduction of any dividends in computing the tax in question. Moreover, appellant's argument as to the unconstitutionality of section 8(h), as applied to dividends from insurance companies, is unfounded. See: Brushaber v. Union Pac. R. Co., 240 U.S. 1, 36 S.Ct. 236, 60 L.Ed. 493, L.R.A.1917D, 414, Ann.Cas.1917B, 713.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

CONNORS v. CONNORS.

Civ. 12175.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

July 21, 1942.

1. Evidence 🔑288, 291

Evidence of declarations and acts of deceased members of the family was admissible to prove whether deceased was the mother of one claiming to be her child, as was also the evidence of a member of the family as to common reputation in the family on the matter. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11.

2. Evidence 🔑313

In evaluating the weight of evidence of declarations and acts of deceased members of the family on issue whether deceased was mother of one claiming to be her son, the trial judge was not bound to isolate it from its background and consider it as if in a vacuum. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11.

3. Bastards 🔑6

In proceeding by one claiming estate of deceased unmarried woman as her illegitimate child, evidence sustained finding that deceased was mother of claimant.

4. Evidence 🔑313

Declarations of deceased persons concerning family relationship when corroborated by other evidence will support a finding in accordance with the declarations. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11.

5. Bastards 🔑6

In proceeding by one claiming to be the illegitimate son of deceased, in weighing the testimony of certain members of the family the court was entitled to consider that as beneficiaries under the will they were both testifying against their own interest which tended very much to soften the rule as to the weakness of evidence of declarations as to family relationship, or at least to make its application less rigid. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1852, 1870, subds. 4, 11.

6. Bastards 🔑6

Where issue was whether deceased unmarried woman was the mother of one claiming to be her son, testimony of physician attending deceased at death that deceased's hymen was unbroken was subject to contradiction by nonexpert witnesses and was not binding on trial court, since presence or absence of an unbroken hymen was not exclusively the subject of expert testimony.

Proceeding in the estate of Mary Alice Connors, deceased, by Joseph Connors, as guardian, etc., against Thomas I. Connors. From a decree finding that the guardian's ward was the son of the deceased, and ordering the estate distributed to him, the defendant appeals.

John T. McCarthy and J. Bruce Fratis, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

In 1910 the decedent, Mary Alice Connors, was living with her mother, two brothers and two sisters in the mother's home at 207 Hoffman Avenue in San Francisco. She was an unmarried woman in her early thirties employed by the telephone company. On February 28, 1910, she resigned her position "on account of ill health" and disappeared from the family home. She remained absent until some time in August of 1910 when she telephoned to her sister Maud from a hotel at Fourth and Mission Streets in San Francisco to come and help her home with her luggage. She was reinstated in her position with the telephone company on September 1, 1910. During the decedent's absence from home the incompetent Joseph Thomas Murphy was born in Los Angeles. His baptismal certificate introduced into evidence herein recites that he was the son of Francis T. Murphy and Mary A. Holland Murphy, born in St. Vincent's Hospital, Los Angeles, California, on the 29th day of July, 1910.

In 1915 the decedent told the members of her family, then living at 207 Hoffman Avenue with her, that she would like to bring a young boy into the home as a boarder. She arranged with her sister Maud to take charge of the boy for an agreed compensation of fifteen dollars per month. A few weeks later she brought Joseph Thomas Murphy, who then appeared to be five or six years old, to the family home. He slept in a crib in the decedent's room and during the daytime was looked after by the sister Maud. This arrangement continued until 1918, Maud receiving fifteen dollars per month from the decedent for the care of the boy during that period. In 1918 Maud accepted employment outside of the household and the payments of fifteen dollars per month to her from decedent ceased. Decedent and young Murphy continued to live at 207 Hoffman Avenue for several years and then both went to live with decedent's maternal uncle at 743 Baker Street in San Francisco. The boy went to school successively at the Noe Valley Primary School and St. Paul's School in San Francisco and at St. Joseph's College in Mountain View. At St. Paul's decedent paid his tuition and at St. Joseph's it was paid by decedent's uncle, Thomas Madden, with whom they were then living. The records of St. Joseph's College show the names of the boy's parents as Frank Murphy and Mary Holland and Thomas Madden is shown thereon as his uncle.

In 1931 or 1932 young Murphy was compelled by ill health to leave St. Joseph's College and in 1932 he was adjudged insane and committed to Agnews State Hospital. The affidavit of insanity was sworn to by decedent. In the report of the medical examiners she was described as "distant nearest relative," and in the judgment of insanity she and Thomas Madden were described as "relatives".

In 1934, Murphy having in the meantime been discharged from the state hospital, he was again adjudged insane. Decedent again made the affidavit of insanity, and was described both in the certificate of medical examiners and the judgment of insanity as "cousin."

Decedent died in 1940, having never been married, leaving a holographic will which named her brother, Thomas I. Connors, appellant herein, executor and left to him the bulk of her estate. Small amounts were left to her sister Maud, her brother Joseph and to another brother who predeceased her. Joseph Thomas Murphy was not mentioned in the will. Joseph Connors as guardian of Murphy appeared in the probate proceedings alleging that Murphy was the illegitimate son of decedent and praying that the estate be distributed to him as a pretermitted heir. From a decree finding Murphy to be the son of decedent and ordering the estate distributed to him this appeal is taken.

In addition to the facts recited above it was established on the trial that Holland was the family name of collateral relatives of decedent's father living in the eastern part of the United States, none of whom had ever been seen by any of the witnesses, that no persons claiming to be relatives had ever visited Murphy, that decedent frequently referred to Murphy as her nephew, and that she also frequently stated that his mother was a close friend of hers who had died and his father was a railroad company employee.

Against this background of undisputed facts Maud Connors testified that on the evening that decedent brought young Murphy to their home in 1915 she said to decedent that if she was to have the care of the boy she hoped that his relatives would not be bothering her by visiting him, and that decedent after asking her to keep the disclosure secret whispered in her ear: "I am his mother." She further testified that out of respect for her sister's wishes she did not disclose this conversation to anyone until after her sister's death.

Joseph Connors testified in answer to a direct question about the common reputation in the Connors family as to the maternity of Joseph Thomas Murphy:

"My deceased sister, Mary, was known as his mother in the family—as the boy's mother."

On cross-examination he stated that by "common reputation" he meant "common knowledge * * * taking care of the boy, clothing him, looking after his welfare and physical condition * * * paying all his bills and clothing him."

He further testified that he had never heard his sister Mary say that she was the boy's mother and that shortly after the boy was brought into the household he had asked his mother about the boy (the witness was about nineteen years of age at that time) and "she told me not to bother my head about it; in other words, I was told to mind my own business." His mother never told him that Mary was the boy's mother. However, his brother, Frank, and his sister, Christine, both deceased at the time of trial, told him that Mary was young Murphy's mother, and his sister Agnes, also then deceased, "from the way she took care of him—she was closely associated with my sister Mary—from her actions, from the way she spoke; that is she believed my sister Mary—from conversations I had with her—was the mother of the boy."

[1] This evidence of declarations and acts of deceased members of the family was admissible to prove the relationship in issue (§§ 1852 and 1870, subd. 4, Code Civ.Proc.; In re Estate of Flood, 217 Cal. 763, 21 P.2d 579) as was the testimony of Joseph Connors as to common reputation in the family. § 1870, subd. 11, Code Civ. Proc. This is not disputed by appellant, but he argues that as to Maud Connors' testimony it was of a single conversation with the testatrix and that unsupported testimony of a single declaration by a deceased person has been characterized as the weakest of all kinds of evidence. 10 Cal.Jur. 1097 and cases collected in footnote 7. The same argument is directed against the testimony of Joseph Connors as to the declarations of his brother Frank and sister Agnes and the acts and conduct of his sister Agnes. As to his testimony of common reputation in the Connors family appellant points out that on cross-examination it proved to be based on his sister Mary's conduct and the conduct and equivocal declarations of Agnes and on isolated declarations of Frank and Christine; and that neither Mary, Maud, Thomas, Agnes, nor their mother, nor their uncle Thomas Madden, ever declared to Joseph that Thomas Murphy was Mary's son.

[2-5] We may put aside Joseph's testimony as to common reputation, as having no more probative value than the facts on which it was based. There remains as direct evidence of maternity Maud's testimony of the declaration made to her by her sister Mary, and Joseph's testimony of the declarations made to him by his brother Frank and his sister Christine. Granted that this is the "weakest kind of evidence possible," it is nonetheless both at common law and under the express provisions of our code above cited admissible and competent to prove pedigree. And in evaluating its weight the trial judge was not bound to isolate it from its background and consider it as if in a vacuum. This evidence, which uncorroborated might have been regarded as the lifeless bones of an unarticulated skeleton, was given flesh and contour by the other facts in evidence, undisputed and unimpeached. Standing alone Mary's abrupt and unexplained absence from her home from early March to late August, 1910, during which time Joseph Thomas Murphy was born in Los Angeles; the coincidence of his mother's first name and middle initial as shown on his baptismal certificate, "Mary A.", being identical with that of the testatrix' and the surname Holland being familiar in the family as collaterals of the testatrix' father; his introduction into the family home by the testatrix with only the most evasive sort of explanation; and her subsequent conduct in supporting him and keeping him with her in her homes and referring to him variously as nephew, cousin and relative might do no more than raise a strong suspicion of maternity. Standing alone the testimony of Maud as to the isolated declaration of the testatrix in 1915 and of Joseph as to the isolated declarations of Frank and Christine might be held to have slight probative value. But assembled the two fit together as patly as the two parts of a jig-saw puzzle. Each takes form and substance from the other. Not only does the recited evidence as a whole in our opinion amply support the finding of the trial court, but in the absence of contradiction we doubt if it would support a contrary finding. Whatever might be the rule as to the weight to be given to uncorroborated testimony of isolated declarations of deceased persons, when corroborated by other evidence it will support a finding in accordance with the declarations. Harp v. Harp, 136 Cal. 421, 69 P. 28; In re Estate of Williams, 128 Cal. 552, 61 P. 670, 79 Am.St.Rep. 67. In weighing the testimony of Maud and Joseph Connors the court was also entitled to consider that as beneficiaries under the will they were both testifying against their own interest, a fact said in Harp v. Harp, supra [136 Cal. 421, 69 P. 29], to "tend very much to soften the rule" as to the weakness of such testimony, "or at least to make its application less rigid."

The suggestion that it is improbable that the testatrix in 1915 would be likely to make any explanation or confide the fact of maternity to Maud when their mother was the head of the household is met by the testimony of Joseph that "Maud wanted to go to work at that time, and so it would not be necessary for her to go to work my sister agreed to pay her to take care of the boy."

[6] A physician who took care of the testatrix in her last illness testified that in 1939 when he first examined her he found that she had an unbroken hymen and that from his experience it would have been impossible for that reason for her to have given birth to a child in the normal way. On cross-examination he stated that he made no written record of the presence of an unbroken hymen but had a clear recollection of the fact because it made his examination of his patient difficult. Appellant argues that this being expert testimony on a matter of scientific and specialized knowledge is conclusive in the absence of contradiction by other expert testimony. Passing the possibility of a caesarean birth, as to which there was no evidence either way, the witness' opinion was based on his testimony of a physical finding. The presence or absence of an unbroken hymen was not the subject exclusively of expert testimony. It was a fact which could have been observed and testified to by a lay person as well as a physician. Borkheim v. Borkheim, 65 Cal.App. 218, 222, 223 P. 429. Conceding that the opinion of the doctor could not be contradicted by non-expert evidence (a concession not justified in view of the holding of the court in Arais v. Kalensnikoff, 10 Cal.2d 428, 74 P.2d 1043, 115 A.L.R. 163), the premise on which he based it (the presence of a virginal hymen) could be so contradicted. It was contradicted, assuming his expert opinion to be correct and again excluding the possibility of a caesarean birth, by all of the testimony which led the trial court to its finding of maternity.

We conclude that the decree appealed from finds substantial support in the evidence and it is accordingly affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BRAZIL.

Cr. 3592.

District Court of Appeal, Second District. Division 2, California.

July 27, 1942.

1. Kidnapping 🔑5

Evidence that accused exhibited a gun to prosecutrix and ordered her to get into his automobile established that accused used "force" within statute defining kidnapping as forcible taking of a person from one part of a county to another part of the same county. Pen.Code, § 207.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Force".

2. Criminal law 🔑1159(4)

In kidnapping prosecution, prosecutrix' testimony was not required to be disbelieved on ground that it was inherently improbable. Pen.Code, § 207.

3. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)

Where accused did not object to question regarding an arrest until after it was answered, accused "waived" his right to complain of admission of the testimony upon appeal. Pen.Code, § 207.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waive".

4. Witnesses 🔑379(1)

A witness may be impeached by evidence that he has made at another time, inconsistent statements regarding a material issue, conflicting with his testimony at the trial.

5. Witnesses 🔑388(5)

Where accused's wife had testified in support of accused's alibi, questions on cross-examination whether wife had stated that she had not seen accused for days at a time were properly asked to lay a foundation for wife's impeachment. Code Civ.Proc. § 2052; Pen.Code, § 207.

6. Witnesses 🔑391

Where accused's wife had testified in support of accused's alibi, witness' statement that wife had told witness that accused would stay away from home for days at a time at different intervals was admissible for impeachment purposes. Code Civ.Proc. § 2052; Pen.Code, § 207.

7. Criminal law 🔑1036(5), 1044

Where accused neither objected nor moved to strike alleged hearsay testimony, the objectionable feature thereof was "waived" and could not be raised for the first time on appeal.

8. Criminal law 🔑1131(4)

Where no motion for new trial had been made, accused's purported appeal from an order denying new trial was dismissed.

Manuel Ted Brazil was convicted of kidnapping, and he appeals and purportedly appeals from an order denying a motion for new trial.

Affirmed. Purported appeal dismissed.

Gladys Towles Root and Eugene V. McPherson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment of guilty of kidnapping after trial before the court without a jury, defendant appeals. There is also a purported appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The evidence being viewed in the light most favorable to the people (respondent), the essential facts are:

Shortly after 2 a. m., September 29, 1941, the prosecuting witness and a gentleman, now her husband, were seated in a parked car. Defendant flashed a light into the car, told them he was a police officer, and that they were under arrest. After questioning the prosecuting witness' escort, defendant told him to get into his own car and drive away. After some discussion, the prosecuting witness' escort complied with defendant's orders. The prosecuting witness then questioned defendant as to whether he was in fact a policeman, since he was not wearing a uniform, thereupon defendant exhibited a gun and told the prosecutrix to get into his car because he was going to take her to a police station. After they had driven a short distance he stated to the prosecutrix that he would let her go if she "would love him up a little." Thereafter defendant stopped his car and told the prosecutrix to do what he wanted her to do or else he would take her to jail. Defendant then unfastened the zipper on his trousers and exhibited his privates, whereupon the prosecutrix screamed and defendant put his hand over her mouth and stuck a white handkerchief in it. This she removed and screamed again, whereupon defendant put the prosecutrix out of the car and pushed her in front of it where she fell down. Defendant returned to his car and started to drive it toward the prosecutrix. She crawled from in front of the car and fled into a nearby orange grove where she concealed herself until after defendant had driven away.

Defendant urges for reversal of the judgment two propositions which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim.

First: There is no substantial evidence to sustain the finding of the court that defendant used any force in taking the prosecutrix from one place in the county to another place in the same county. (§ 207, Pen.Code.)

[1, 2] This proposition is untenable. There was direct testimony of the prosecuting witness as to each and every fact set forth above. From the prosecuting witness' testimony that, when she questioned defendant's authority to take her to jail, he exhibited a gun to her and ordered her to get into his car, the trial court properly found that defendant used force in taking her from one part of the county to another part of the same county. Likewise there is no merit in defendant's contention that the prosecuting witness' testimony was inherently improbable.

Second: The trial court committed prejudicial error in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence as set forth hereunder:

(a) While defendant was testifying upon cross examination the following occurred:

"Q. And you were not arrested in connection with this case at that time, were you? A. No, I wasn't.

"Mr. Casey: I object to that as being highly prejudicial, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial."

[3] Defendant may not urge error predicated upon the answer to the foregoing question, for the reason that the rule is established in California that where, as in the instant case, the subject matter of a question is objectionable and a party fails to object to the question until after it is answered, he thereby waives his right to complain of the admission of the testimony upon appeal. (People v. Scalamiero, 143 Cal. 343, 345, 76 P. 1098; Wigmore on Evidence, vol. I, 3d Ed. (1940) 323, § 18.)

(b) 1. While defendant's wife, Zillah Brazil, was being cross-examined, this occurred:

"Q. And did you, in words or substance, state to the officer at that time that, 'I have known for some time that my husband has been drinking, and I have been suspecting him of running around.'?

"Mr. Casey: Just a moment. Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and hearsay."

2. "And that you then asked the officer: 'Who was he with?,' and with reference also to this question did you also say, 'He works for the Downey Patrol,' and that sometimes you didn't see him for days at a time?

"Mr. Casey: Just a moment—

"A. I didn't say that.

"Mr. Casey: Just a moment. I am going to object to that and move to strike the answer on the ground that counsel stated it was for the purpose of fixing the date. The question has been answered. She admitted she had a conversation with him on or about that date. Now, the substance of that conversation certainly is not material at this time, purely hearsay. The date has been fixed.

"Mr. Roll: No, not the date of the conversation. It is for the purpose of fixing various dates here. She said there was only one occasion, if the Court please, that she knows about, during this time that he was away from home. Now, she told the officer there were several times he was gone and she didn't know where he was. I think it is very permissible and impeachment along this line.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Mr. Casey: Well, if your Honor please, for the purpose of impeachment and for the purpose of fixing dates, this evidence might be permissible, but for the purpose of prejudicing the rights of the defendant by bringing up other matters, such as the witness has testified to, I don't believe it is proper."

[4, 5] The law is established in this jurisdiction that a witness may be impeached by evidence that he has made at another time inconsistent and contradictory statements regarding a material issue, which statements are in conflict with his testimony at the trial. (People v. Crow, 48 Cal.App.2d 666, 671, 120 P.2d 686.) In the present case the witness, defendant's wife, had testified in support of defendant's alibi that he had been away from home at night only on one occasion during the months of September, October, and November. The foregoing questions were properly asked for the purpose of laying a foundation for the impeachment of the witness pursuant to the provisions of section 2052, Code of Civil Procedure.

(c) During the examination of the witness Jackson the following occurred:

"Q. And did she referring to the witness Zillah Brazil at that time, tell you that her husband had been drinking considerably in the past few weeks and would stay away from home two or three days at a time at different intervals? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Casey: Just a moment. I am going to object to that and move that the answer be stricken as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and hearsay, not made in the presence of the defendant, and highly prejudicial to him.

"Mr. Roll: For impeachment.

"The Court: The motion is denied and the objection overruled."

(d) During the examination of witness Staebler the following took place:

"Q. And directing your attention to that time, did the wife of the defendant in words or substance state to you as follows: 'I have known for some time that my husband has been drinking and I have suspected him of running around. Who was he with?,' and also did she say, 'He works at the Downey Patrol, and sometimes I do not see him for days at a time.'? Did she say that in words or substance to you?

"Mr. Casey: Just a moment, please. We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and as purely hearsay. There is no evidence that the defendant was present at that time.

"The Court: Well, it is not offered for anything more than impeachment purposes as to the particular witness on the stand.

"Mr. Roll: That is correct, your Honor.

"The Court: And we are not trying him for any misconduct, if there was any, other than the matter here charged.

"Mr. Casey: I appreciate that, your Honor. I understand that all of these questions are perhaps more or less to show a chain of events, to identify the dates, but peculiarly enough they carry with them the stigma of some other incident.

"The Court: That is true, but of course there is a rule that where, in the examination of any witness concerning a matter in hand, other matters, even other crimes may be brought in; if the matter in hand is material to the cause on trial, why the mere fact that other crimes may be actually proven is not sufficient to exclude it.

"Mr. Casey: Very well.

"Q. By Mr. Roll: You may answer the question. Did that conversation occur in words or substance? A. The words were not exactly the same, but the substance is correct."

[6] Both of the foregoing rulings were correct, as the testimony tended to impeach the witness Zillah Brazil who had testified that defendant had only on one occasion during the months of September, October, and November been away from home at night.

[7, 8] We need not consider defendant's strictures upon the admission of certain other testimony of the witness Staeb-ler on the ground that it was hearsay testimony, for the rule is established in California that, where, as in the instant case, hearsay evidence is admitted and there is neither an objection to it nor a motion to strike the same, such objectionable feature of the testimony is waived and may not be raised for the first time on appeal. (People v. Guiterez, 126 Cal.App. 526, 530, 14 P.2d 838; People v. Magusin, 120 Cal. App. 115, 117, 7 P.2d 764.) The record in the present case discloses that a motion for a new trial was not made and obviously no action could have been taken with reference thereto. Therefore defendant's purported appeal from an order denying a new trial is dismissed.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

MOORE, P. J., concurred.

Appeal from Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles; Leo Aggeler, Judge.

James W. Grier was convicted of wilfully and unlawfully failing to make contributions required by the Unemployment Insurance Act and of wilfully and unlawfully failing to furnish a report required by such act, and he appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

Leonard Comegys, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., W. Joseph McFarland, Asst. City Atty., and Roger Arnebergh, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICKERS, Judge pro tem.

The defendant was charged under Counts I and II of the complaint with violating section 101.5 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, in that, being a person subject to and liable for the payment of contributions to the Unemployment Fund, he wilfully and unlawfully failed to make such contributions for the second and third quarters of the year 1940. He was also charged under Count III of the complaint with violating section 101(e) of the same act, in that being an employing unit, he wilfully and unlawfully failed and neglected to furnish the Unemployment Reserves Commission with a report required by said commission showing the names, social security numbers and wages paid each person employed by him for the first quarter of the year 1941.

The case was submitted to the trial court, a jury having been waived, upon a stipulation of facts, the substance of which is hereinafter set forth. The defendant was adjudged guilty by the court on each count and sentenced to pay fines with the alternative of imprisonment.

[1] An examination of the stipulation of facts discloses no evidence that the defendant failed to make the contributions alleged to have been due from him as charged in Counts I and II of the complaint or that the Commission required any report from him, as he is charged by Count III of the complaint with having failed and refused to furnish. Since each of these facts must be proved in order to establish a violation of said sections 101(e) and 101.5 respectively, as charged by the respective counts of the complaint, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed as to all of them. However, in view of the importance of the only questions argued by counsel in their briefs, and because such questions will necessarily be presented on a new trial, we will proceed to consider them for the assistance of court and counsel. These questions are: (1) Was the relationship between the defendant and the members of his orchestra that of employer and employee or were they partners or joint adventurers? (2) Was the relationship between the defendant and the establishments for which he and his orchestra played that of employee and employer or was he an independent contractor? Another way of putting the above questions is, was the defendant an employing unit under the Act in question?

Section 101.5 of the Unemployment Insurance Act (Act 8780d, Deering's General Laws) reads as follows:

"It is a misdemeanor for any person to wilfully fail or refuse to make any contributions to the unemployment fund which are due under this act."

Section 101(e) of the same Act reads as follows:

"§ 101. It is a misdemeanor: * * *

"(e) On the part of any employing unit, or any officer or agent of an employing unit, wilfully and unlawfully to fail or neglect to furnish to the commission reports required by it when necessary for the enforcement of this act."

The stipulation of facts is a lengthy one, the substance of which, so far as pertinent to the questions involved, is as follows:

That prior to September of 1939 for some seven years the defendant had been a musician, either playing in orchestras conducted by other persons or leading orchestras under his own organization. That in September, 1939, the defendant assembled an orchestra of twelve musicians, including himself, and one woman singer, which orchestra was known as "Jimmie Grier and His Orchestra." That the understanding and agreement between the defendant and the other members of his orchestra were as follows: (a) that the defendant had a contract with the Music Corporation of America, a booking Agency licensed under the Federation whereby the said Agency agreed to render its services in obtaining engagements for the defendant and his orchestra which he would assemble; (b) that the assembled orchestra agreed to operate under said contract with the Music Corporation of America; (c) that each member thereof would own and supply his own instruments, except piano, and his own uniform, the style to be selected by vote of the orchestra; (d) that the defendant should furnish the music library; (e) that the defendant should contract for engagements and appearances and set the terms thereof; (f) that the compensation paid for engagements and appearances should be handled by the defendant, who would pay out of the proceeds: (1) to each member of the orchestra an amount at least equal to the scale of compensation set by the Federation; that defendant determine and set the amount that any member receive above the said scale; (2) to pay the dues and other charges fixed by the Federation; (3) to pay the amounts set by the Federation for transportation charges; (4) to pay the other normal expenses of the orchestra, as such; (5) that the balance of the money should be retained by the defendant as his compensation for the services he rendered; (g) that the defendant should act as leader of the orchestra and as such should fix the time and place for rehearsals and direct other matters of the kind; (h) that in the event any member was unsatisfactory to defendant, he had the power to discharge such member and to select a new member, provided each new member of the orchestra enter into the organization under the same terms and conditions as the original members. That the orchestra played at many hotels, restaurants, night clubs, and other similar places, playing popular music; that all engagements were secured by the Music Corporation of America under written contract signed by said corporation as representative of the defendant, a duplicate copy of which was received in evidence as Exhibit C; that the Music Corporation of America's representative, upon obtaining the signature to each contract, collected 50 per cent of the contract price, from which it deducted its commission and delivered the balance to the defendant in cash, the balance of the contract price being paid to the defendant at the time of performance; that the defendant deposited none of this money in a bank account but divided the money amongst himself and the other orchestra members, as per the above agreement, this resulting in each member of the orchestra, including the defendant, receiving not less than the scales of compensation and expenses set by the Federation (this part of the stipulation is controverted in Exhibits D, E and F hereinafter referred to, which disclose that on occasions the defendant suffered a financial loss); that from April to December, 1940, there were twenty changes in personnel of the orchestra, occasioned as a result of the voluntary quitting of the members and the filling of such vacancies by such additions as defendant desired.

The stipulation of facts further recites that the establishments at which the orchestra performed did the following things: (a) determined the number of musicians to play; (b) owned and controlled the premises at which the services were performed; (c) designated the specific place for the performance; (d) gave the defendant, as leader of the orchestra, specific directions covering what the establishments required or expected of the leader of the orchestra; (e) prescribed the route and the manner whereby the members of the orchestra reached and left the orchestra stand; (f) gave orders as to the conduct of the orchestra members during intermissions and rest periods; (g) required the orchestra to coordinate and conform to the convenience of the establishment in the service of food and beverages and the schedule of floor shows or other entertainment specially employed in the establishment; (h) limited the time and place of rehearsals on the premises; (i) required the orchestra to rehearse with other artists specially employed by the establishments; (j) required the orchestra to play home-town music not contained in their library; (k) required the leader to act as master of ceremonies, to introduce local celebrities and to take part in activities not included in the rendition of dance music; (1) required the orchestra members to wear a particular uniform; (m) required the orchestra to play certain types of music, such as more or less waltzes, faster or slower pieces, long or short pieces, and control the volume, all as the operator of the establishment might desire. None of the various establishments where defendant and his orchestra played had any authority to: (a) determine or control the amount of compensation defendant paid to each or any member of the orchestra; (b) hire or discharge any member of the orchestra; (c) determine or control the arrangement or instrumentation of any of the musical selections played from defendant's library.

As part of the stipulation of fact, Exhibits D, E and F were received in evidence. They consist of statements showing the various amounts received and disbursed by the appellant for the second, third and fourth quarters of 1940 as a result of the various engagements. An examination of these exhibits discloses that while the various members of the orchestra received fairly constant amounts as a result of each engagement, the amounts received by appellant varied greatly. For the second quarter the members received $6,924.56 and the appellant $2,236.16. For the third quarter the members received $5,732.77 and the appellant nothing—in fact lost $42.46. For the fourth quarter the members received $1,996 and the appellant $1,102.50.

The parties further stipulated that when the defendant filed returns upon forms required by law indicating that he had been an employer during the second and third quarters of the year 1940, he did so under the belief that he was at that time an employing unit as defined in said Act; that defendant did not furnish any reports to the Unemployment Commission during or covering the first quarter of 1941, or any portion thereof, nor did he file with the Commission a written application for termination of coverage; and that the defendant was at all times alleged in the complaint a resident of Los Angeles and that certain of the places referred to in Exhibits D, E and F, where defendant and his orchestra had played, were located in Los Angeles.

The answers to the two questions raised by this appeal are found in certain sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act and in decisions of the courts of this state and those of New York, which state has an Unemployment Insurance Act comparable to ours in so far as the questions before us are concerned. The pertinent portions of Section 6.5 of the Act read as follows: "'Employment,' subject to the other provisions of this act, means service * * * performed for wages or under any contract of hire, written or oral, express or implied." The pertinent portions of Section 9 of the Act define "employer" and "employing unit" as follows: "'Employer' means: (a) Any employing unit, which for some portion of a day, but not necessarily simultaneously, in each of twenty different weeks, whether or not such weeks are or were consecutive, has within the current calendar year or had within the preceding calendar year in employment four or more individuals, irrespective of whether the same individuals are or were employed in each such day; * * * (e) 'Employing unit,' as used in this act, means any individual or type of organization * * * which has * * * in its employ one or more individuals performing services for it within this State. * * * Each individual employed to perform or to assist in performing the work of any individual employed by an employing unit shall be deemed to be employed by such employing unit * * * whether such individual was hired or paid directly by such employing unit or by such individual so employed, providing the employing unit had actual or constructive knowledge of the work."

Section 37 of the Act, after providing for the accrual of the employer's contributions, declares: "Such contributions shall become due and be paid to the commission for the unemployment fund by each employer in accordance with such regulations as the commission may prescribe, and shall not be deducted in whole or in part, from the wages of individuals in his employ."

It will be seen that the legislature has not endeavored to distinguish between an employer and independent contractor, nor between the relation of employer and employee and that of partners or coadventurers. For these distinctions we look to the cases.

[2-4] In the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 1916, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721, the court laid down certain principles for determining whether or not a person was an employee or an independent contractor. These principles have been recognized and quoted with approval by our courts ever since when dealing with a similar problem. In that case the Industrial Accident Commission had found that a certain Mr. Stevens was an employee and therefore entitled to an award under the Compensation Act. The Supreme Court determined that Stevens was an independent contractor and annulled the award. In doing so, the court said (page 810 of 172 Cal., page 723 of 159 P.): "* * * but there could be no employé unless his personal services were rendered to the employer, and since wages are generally paid for personal services, wages or salary are made the criteria of compensations given to injured employés. The word 'servant' is generally synonymous with the word 'employé'." Again (page 811 of 172 Cal., page 723 of 159 P.), "But it is urged * * * that the test of what constitutes independent service lies in the control exercised * * *. It is true that many authorities specify 'control' of the person performing work as a means of differentiating service from independent employment. The test of 'control,' however, means 'complete control.' * * * Labatt, in his work on Master and Servant (2d Ed. § 25), says: 'It is well settled that, where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring the responsibilities, or acquiring the immunities, of a master, with respect to the person controlled.'" Again (page 813 of 172 Cal., page 724 of 159 P.), "It has been said that the true test of a contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, following his employer's desires in the results but not in the means used. 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) 396. But in weighing the control exercised we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger undertaking."

In the case of Brosius v. Orpheum Theater Co., Ltd., 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 61, 60 P.2d 156, 159, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for damages by reason of the defendant's negligence due to a fall while he was performing a comedy cycling act that was one of a number of vaudeville acts on the program. The plaintiff and his partner were engaged by the defendant under a written contract. The defendant had interposed the defense that the plaintiff was an employee of the defendant as defined by section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, St.1933, p. 2613, and that therefore his sole means of redress was by application to the Industrial Accident Commission. The defendant introduced in evidence the contract of employment. Among other things, this contract provided the length of employment, the time, the number of performances, the salary, the right of the defendant to cancel any part of the engagement because of impropriety or suggestive part of the act, if the plaintiff refused to eliminate same when requested; that the plaintiff was to present the act or specialty of himself and partner in their usual customary manner; that the plaintiff was to abide by all reasonable rules and regulations prescribed by the defendant; and that the plaintiff was to be present for rehearsals at the usual time for holding same at the theater. The reviewing court affirmed the judgment, citing cases, particularly Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, and quoted with approval a portion of the language of that case, excerpts of which appear above. The court stated: "The provision requiring plaintiff to be present at rehearsals does not establish complete control. Plaintiff's act being one of several, orderly conduct of the theater would require that all the acts be rehearsed together for the purpose of co-ordinating the entire performance and synchronizing the acts with the music of the orchestra and the work of the employees of the theater. The provisions obligating plaintiff to abide by 'all reasonable rules and regulations' is a requirement which, in view of defendant's business, would naturally be imposed on independent contractors and employees alike."

[5] The case of Winther v. Industrial Accident Comm., 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 131, 60 P.2d 342, 344, was, as the title indicates, another case involving an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. The reviewing court annulled the award. In doing so, it quoted from Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, as to the meaning of the phrase "right of control," as a determining factor in establishing the relationship of employer and employee. The court said: "The test of control in such cases means 'complete control,' or the full and unqualified right to control and direct the details of or the means by which the work is to be accomplished." The court thereupon also approved the language in Labatt on "Master and Servant," which we have quoted earlier in this opinion, and went on to declare, at pages 137 and 138, of 16 Cal.App.2d, at page 345 of 60 P.2d, as follows: "The right of discharge is a fact that undeniably has a bearing on the question of authoritative control. If such right is unlimited so that it may be exercised arbitrarily, it is a fact which obviously points in the direction of that completeness of control which the decisions recognize as 'one of the best tests' of the relationship between individuals in the matter under discussion. * * *"

In the case of Bohanon as Adm'x v. James McClatchy Pub. Co., 1936, 16 Cal. App.2d 188, 60 P.2d 510, 514, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against McClatchy Co. and one Engebrecht for injuries caused by the negligence of the latter who, at the time of the accident, was delivering newspapers for the defendant corporation under a written contract. In affirming the judgment as to Engebrecht, but reversing it as to the publishing company on the ground, that Engebrecht was an independent contractor, the court said: "It may now be regarded as settled in California that the control which has been adopted as the test by which the relationship between two persons is to be measured for the purpose of discovering whether such relationship is that of master and servant is complete or unqualified control. * * * When one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter is permitted to exercise a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose without incurring the responsibilities or acquiring the immunities of a master, with respect to the person controlled." Citing Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, and other cases.

Counsel have cited a number of New York cases involving the relationship between an orchestra leader and the members of his orchestra on the one hand, and the establishment for which they played on the other. One of the latest of such cases in point of time is that of Matter of Miller (Appeal of Amigone), July 1941, 262 App. Div. 385, 29 N.Y.S.2d 15, 17. In that case a night club owner, Amigone, appealed from a decision of the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board that had affirmed a decision of its referee holding that Miller, a member of Royal Worth's orchestra, was an employee of appellant. Worth, during the period in question, was under contract with appellant to furnish an orchestra to play, and which did play, in appellant's night club. Under the facts as stated by the court, the contract provided that Worth furnish an orchestra consisting of twelve men to play at the club between certain hours daily, for a four weeks' period, for $750 per week. The orchestra was not assembled or organized for the purpose of playing at that night club but was a completed unit before the execution of the contract. Worth evidently intended it to be a permanent organization which he expected would rapidly gain recognition. The orchestra included a number of expert musicians whose services were obtained by Worth. Appellant had no supervision over the members and no authority to direct or control their actions, and could not employ or discharge plaintiff. Appellant paid Worth and Worth paid the members of his orchestra. After reviewing the above facts the court said: "From the proof in this record there cannot be the slightest doubt that Worth was an independent contractor and that claimant and the other members of the orchestra were his employees." (Citing cases.) "Although it is apparent from an examination of cases involving the independent contractor relationship that there is no absolute rule for determining whether one is an independent contractor or an employee, and that each case must be determined on its own facts, nevertheless, there are many well recognized and fairly typical indicia of the status of an independent contractor, even though the presence of one or more of such indicia in a case is not necessarily conclusive. It has been held that the test of what constitutes independent service lies in the control exercised, the decisive question being as to who has the right to direct what shall be done, and when and how it shall be done. Practically every contract for work to be done reserves to the employer a certain degree of control, to the end that he may see that the contract is performed according to specifications. The employer may exercise a limited control over the work without rendering the employee a mere servant, for a relation of master and servant is not inferable from a reservation of powers which do not deprive the contractor of his right to do the work according to his own initiative, so long as he does it in accordance with the contract. The control of the work reserved in the employer which effects a master-servant relationship is control of the means and manner of performance of the work as well as of the result; an independent contractor relationship exists where the person doing the work is subject to the will of the employer only as to the result, but not as to the means or manner of accomplishment. Accordingly where an employer may prescribe what shall be done, but not how it shall be done or who shall do it, the person employed is an independent contractor. 27 Am.Jur. Independent Contractors §§ 2, 3, 5, 7; 31 C.J. 473."

In the Miller case, claimant Miller relied on the cases of In re Rogavin, 259 App.Div. 774, 18 N.Y.S.2d 302, and Ajello v. Savarins Management, Inc., 259 App.Div. 949, 19 N.Y.S.2d 886. Our appellant likewise relies upon them. The court in the Miller case distinguished them as follows: "In the Rogavin case (259 App.Div. 774, 18 N.Y.S.2d [302], 303), the contract was executed by one Azpiazu 'individually and as agent for his orchestra', one of whom was the claimant. Under the agreement each member of the orchestra was employed by the restaurant company and it reserved the right to direct and control in many respects the manner in which such members should perform their services. In fact, the contract provided that the restaurant should have 'personal supervision and control of the artists at all times.'

"In the Ajello case the employer secured the services of one Barrett, an orchestra leader, to assemble an orchestra to furnish dance music at its restaurant. Claimant became a member of the orchestra for that special engagement. Barrett was the employer's agent and the contract in that case specifically provided that claimant and the other members should be deemed to be employees of the appellant.

"In the case under consideration Worth executed the contract not as an agent but as a principal. In the instant case all the elements upon which liability was predicated in the Rogavin and Ajello cases are lacking. The facts are entirely dissimilar."

One of the principal cases relied upon by counsel for appellant is that of Steel Pier Amusement Co. v. Unemployment Comp. Commission, September 1941, 127 N.J.L. 154, 21 A.2d 767. Similar questions were involved in that case as in our case with respect to an orchestra leader and the members of his orchestra and the amusement company for which they played. The Supreme Court of New Jersey held that a member of the orchestra was an employee of the amusement company. However, that case is clearly distinguishable from ours both under the facts and under the law. The contracts in question were very short, being quite dissimilar from our contracts, and declared that the orchestra leader was acting as the agent for the members of the orchestra. The court specifically declared that the relationship between the parties had to be determined from the statutory viewpoint alone. The opinion then quoted portions of the Unemployment Act of New Jersey, N.J.S.A. 43:21-1 et seq., which have no comparable counterpart in our Act. It is also of interest that the Supreme Courts of Nebraska and of Wyoming, in passing upon the same questions involving orchestras and in construing statutes identical with that of the State of New Jersey, came to a contrary opinion. These cases are Hill Hotel Co. v. Kinney, 1940, 138 Neb. 760, 295 N.W. 397, and Unemployment Comm. v. Mathews, 1941, 56 Wyo. 479, 111 P.2d 111.

[6] When we apply the statutory law of California and the rules laid down by the courts of this state and of New York, as set forth above, to the facts in our case, we are of the opinion that the relationship of the appellant and the various members of his orchestra was that of employer and employee. The terms of the contract between the appellant and the members of his orchestra clearly established the relationship of employer and employees. The appellant assembled the orchestra, furnished the music library, contracted for the engagements and set the terms thereof, received all the proceeds from such engagements, out of which he was only obligated to pay each member an amount equal to the union scale of wages, and then after paying all expenses retained the balance, if any, for himself. He acted as leader, fixed the time and place for rehearsals and directed other similar matters. He could discharge any member unsatisfactory to him and select any new member, provided such member entered into the organization under the same terms and conditions as the rest. Operating under the contract the appellant secured the engagements through the Music Corporation of America, as his agent. The financial records (Exhs. D, E and F) disclose that the compensation to the members remained more or less constant whereas the appellant at times made a large profit and at others actually suffered a financial loss. It is apparent that the contract created an "employment" under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The obligations of the members were services "performed for wages or under any contract of hire". § 6.5 of the Act. The members were servants, i.e., employees, since they "rendered personal service to the appellant remaining entirely under his control and direction." They were under the complete control of the appellant in so far as the details of or the means by which the work was to be accomplished, and received a fixed salary. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra; Brosius v. Orpheum Theater Co., Ltd., supra; Winther v. Industrial Accident Comm., supra; Bohanon as Adm'x v. James McClatchy Pub. Co., supra. The appellant retained the unlimited right of discharge that could be exercised arbitrarily by him. Winther v. Industrial Accident Comm., supra. The appellant was an "employing unit" under section 9 of the Act since he had "in [his] employ one or more individuals performing services for [him] within this State."

Counsel for appellant has urged that the appellant and the members of his orchestra were partners or joint adventurers. With this we cannot agree. They were not "an association * * * to carry on as co-owners a business for profit". Civil Code, § 2400. They did not share in the profits, except for their wages, did not contribute to the losses, were subject to discharge by appellant at any time, had no voice in the selection of new members or the wages to be received by any of their fellow members above the Union scale nor of the manner in which the appellant carried on his business.

[7] We are also of the opinion that the relationship of the defendant to the establishments for which he and his orchestra played was that of an independent contractor. This relationship is rather clearly disclosed from the form of contract used (Exh. C) and the stipulation of facts. The contract, in addition to the stipulated facts, recites that it is between the attraction Jimmie Grier and his orchestra, and the employer, naming it, fixes a lump sum as the price and is signed "Jimmie Grier by Music Corporation of America, authorized representative." There are other recitals for the benefit of the agent and the Union which do not concern us. The relationship as thus disclosed is undoubtedly that of independent contractor in so far as the appellant and the establishments are concerned, with the members of the orchestra not being employees of the establishments.

The "things done" by the establishments, as set forth in the stipulation, were those which appear reasonable from the nature of their business, and were directed toward the "results" to be accomplished rather than the "means" used therefor. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra. The "results" for the most part were the entertainment and satisfaction of the public, the orchestra being one of the attractions. For this purpose the establishments designated the place of performance, gave directions covering what they expected, prescribed the route to be followed in going to and from the orchestra stand, gave orders re the conduct of members during rest periods, required the orchestra to coordinate and conform to the convenience of the rest of the activities carried on by the establishments, required home-town music to be played and at certain tempos, and required the wearing of particular uniforms. Such "rights" did not in themselves create the relationship of master and servant. (See cases cited below.)

On the other hand the employment contract was for a fixed term with no right of discharge of either the appellant or the members of his orchestra. Winther v. Industrial Accident Comm., supra; In re Earle, May 1941, 262 App.Div. 789, 27 N.Y.S.2d 310. The compensation to appellant was a fixed sum for the engagement with no attempt to interfere with appellant's right to hire and discharge his orchestra's members and to pay them such wages and at such times as he desired. Also the manner in which the musical selections were to be arranged and presented was entirely under appellant's control. It thus appears that while the establishments exercised a certain measure of control for a definite purpose, they did not have "authoritative" or "complete control." Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra; Bohanon as Adm'x v. James McClatchy Pub. Co., supra. The reservation of powers was necessary to enable the establishments "to coordinate the entire performance" and "the requirement to abide by reasonable rules and regulations," in view of their business, would naturally be imposed upon independent contractor and employees alike. Brosius v. Orpheum Theater Co., Ltd., supra. See, also, In re Radio City Corp., Nov. 1941, 262 App.Div. 593, 31 N.Y.S.2d 284.

For the reasons set forth at the beginning of this opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Municipal Court for a new trial.

Elections 🔑171

Where justices for newly created division of District Court of Appeal were appointed to serve until first day of January after next general election, and they sought election to succeed themselves, but did not know the length of terms sought by them because of constitutional provision that justices elected shall so classify themselves by lot that one of them shall go out of office after four years, one after eight years, and one after twelve years, they were entitled to have "for the term prescribed by law" placed on the ballot, rather than the constitutional phrase "to the office for the term expiring January ———," since the constitutional provision dealing with the form of the ballot requires only substantial compliance therewith. Pol.Code § 758b, as added by St.1941, p. 2934, § 2; Const. art. 6, §§ 4a, 26.

In Bank.

Original mandamus proceeding by B. Rey Schauer, Clement L. Shinn, and Parker Wood, as the incumbent presiding justice and associate justices of the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 3, against Paul Peek, as Secretary of State, etc., respondent, to compel the respondent to accept and file the petitioners' respective declarations of candidacy to succeed themselves and to certify their nominations to the proper officers. The respondent demurred generally to the petition.

Peremptory writ of mandamus issued.

Schauer, Ryon & McMahon, of Santa Barbara, for petitioners.

Paul Peek, in pro. per., of Long Beach, and Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Chas. W. Johnson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

By this proceeding in mandamus the petitioners as the incumbent Presiding Justice and Associate Justices of the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division Three, seek to compel the respondent, as Secretary of State, to accept and file their respective declarations of candidacy to succeed themselves and to certify their nominations to the proper officers. Respondent has demurred generally to the petition.

Division Three of the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District was created by the Legislature in 1941 (Stats.1941, ch. 1179, p. 2934, § 2, Pol. Code, § 758b). The Governor thereafter appointed petitioner B. Rey Schauer as Presiding Justice and petitioners Clement L. Shinn and Parker Wood as Associate Justices of such newly created division of the District Court of Appeal. Their appointments were duly confirmed by the commission on qualifications (Const., art. VI, sec. 26) and each has since qualified and is now the commissioned and acting incumbent of the office to which he was so appointed. As such appointees the petitioners hold office until January, 1943, and under the cited constitutional provision it is essential, if they are to succeed themselves in their respective offices, that each "Within thirty days before the sixteenth day of August next preceding the expiration of his term * * * file with the officer charged with the duty of certifying nominations for publication in the official ballot a declaration of candidacy for election to succeed himself." This being done, the constitutional section then provides that "the name of such candidate shall be placed upon the ballot for the ensuing general election in November in substantially the following form:

For .... (title of office)
Shall ....be elected (Name)	Yes
to the office for the term expiring January ———? (year)"	No

Within thirty days before August 16, 1942, each petitioner herein tendered to respondent for filing a declaration of candidacy for election to succeed himself, each requesting that there be placed upon the ballot the following proposition:

"Shall .... be elected to the office for the term prescribed by law?"
(Name)

Respondent has refused to accept petitioners' declarations of candidacy and to certify petitioners' names for publication in the official ballots in the form above set forth, or in any form which does not specify the exact day, month and year upon which the term for which each petitioner proposes to be a candidate shall expire.

The sole issue here presented is whether, in view of the provisions of section 26 of article VI of the Constitution, quoted above, the petitioners are entitled to have "for the term prescribed by law" substituted for the specific date upon which the term for which each is a candidate expires. We entertain no doubt upon the proposition. Under the circumstances disclosed by the petition, it is presently impossible to ascertain the expiration date of the terms for which petitioners are candidates. The statute under which the Third Division of the District Court of Appeal was created (Stats.1941, supra, § 2) makes no provision for the determination of the terms of the justices first appointed thereto. Inasmuch as the Third Division is an additional division created by the Legislature, its initial organization is governed by that portion of section 4a of article VI of the Constitution reading: "Upon the creation of any additional division of the district court of appeal the Governor shall appoint three persons to serve as justices thereof until the first day of January after the next general election. The justices of said division elected at such general election shall so classify themselves by lot that one of them shall go out of office at the end of four years, one of them at the end of eight years, and one of them at the end of twelve years, and entry of such classification shall be made in the minutes of said division, signed by the three justices thereof, and a duplicate thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state."

No authority is conferred by this provision upon any officer to fix the length of each of the three terms prior to the general election to be held this year. That authority is delegated only to the three justices "elected at such general election." Therefore, it is impossible to presently determine which of the three terms, for which petitioners are candidates, expires in four years, which in eight years, and which in twelve years. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to specify upon the ballot the date when the terms for which petitioners are candidates expire. The section does not require that the form be followed exactly as set forth therein, but requires only substantial compliance therewith. The phrase "for the term prescribed by law," here used, is a substantial compliance with the constitutional provision.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue forthwith upon the filing of this decision.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1942.

1. Pardon 🔑1

The administration of parole is an integral part of criminal justice, having as its object the rehabilitation of those convicted of crime and the protection of the community.

2. States 🔑6

The compact between California and Washington concerning return of parolees from one state to another, entered into pursuant to uniform act for out-of-state parolee supervision, was an agreement for co-operative effort and mutual assistance in prevention of crime and in enforcement of criminal laws of each state within contemplation of federal statute authorizing such agreements, and was not violative of constitutional provision prohibiting states from entering into compacts with each other, without consent of the United States. St.1937, p. 469; p. 470, § 3; 18 U.S.C.A. § 420; U.S.C.A.Const. art. 1, § 10, cl. 3.

3. Constitutional law 🔑272

Where parole accepted in Washington by parolee was granted on express condition that Board of Prison Terms and Paroles might at any time cause parolee to be returned to penitentiary to serve sentence, arrest of parolee in California and his return to Washington pursuant to compact between California and Washington executed under uniform act for out-of-state parolee supervision, would not deprive the parolee of his liberty without "due process of law".

7. Extradition 🔑21

The right of extradition created by Federal Constitution is a guaranty of which a state may avail itself to secure return of an offender against its law. U.S.C.A.Const. art. 4, § 2, cl. 2.

8. Extradition 🔑21

The extradition provisions of Federal Constitution and statutes are not for the benefit of the fugitive, and an asylum state may require the Governor to surrender a fugitive on terms less exacting than those imposed by the act of Congress. 18 U.S.C.A. § 662; U.S.C.A.Const. art. 4, § 2, cl. 2.

9. Extradition 🔑21

CARTER, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding in the matter of the application of Joseph Tenner for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the petitioner's release from custody of a chief of police.

Writ discharged and petitioner remanded to custody of chief of police.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The question presented for decision by the petitioner's application for a writ of habeas corpus concerns the constitutionality of the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision. Stats.1937, p. 469; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 5783. He is held by the respondent Chief of Police pursuant to the direction of the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles of the State of Washington as a convict whose parole has been revoked.

It appears that after his conviction of a felony and sentence to serve five years in the Washington State Penitentiary, the petitioner was granted a parole, and, in connection therewith, permission to come to this state. Later, the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles revoked his parole and ordered that he be returned to the penitentiary. Following his arrest upon the order of his board, he filed in the superior court a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon the denial of his petition, he applied to the United States Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. That court denied the writ, Tenner v. Dullea, 314 U.S. 692, 62 S. Ct. 364, 86 L.Ed. 554, but issued its order prohibiting the State of California from removing Tenner, or permitting him to be removed from the state, pending the filing by him of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in this court and a determination of the issues presented by it. In re Tenner, 314 U.S. 585, 62 S.Ct. 409, 86 L.Ed. 473.

The Constitution of the United States provides that, without its consent, no state shall enter into any agreement or compact with another state. Art. I, § 10. Recognizing this constitutional prohibition, in 1934, the Congress of the United States enacted a statute which reads as follows: "The consent of Congress is hereby given to any two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and in the enforcement of their respective criminal laws and policies, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts." 48 Stats. 909, 18 U.S.C.A. § 420.

A majority of the states, including California and Washington, have enacted the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supra. It authorizes the governor to enter into a compact on behalf of the state with any of the United States legally joining therein permitting parolees to reside out of the state in which they have been convicted and sentenced. The compact obligates the receiving state to assume the duties of their visitation and supervision and makes provision for the retaking of parolees in these terms: "That duly accredited officers of a sending State may at all times enter a receiving State and there apprehend and retake any person on probation or parole. For that purpose no formalities will be required other than establishing the authority of the officer and the identity of the person to be retaken. All legal requirements to obtain extradition of fugitives from justice are hereby expressly waived on the part of States party hereto, as to such persons. The decision of the sending State to retake a person on probation or parole shall be conclusive upon and not reviewable within the receiving State. If at the time when a State seeks to retake a probationer or parolee there should be pending against him within the receiving State any criminal charge, or he should be suspected of having committed within such State a criminal offense, he shall not be retaken without the consent of the receiving State until discharged from prosecution or from imprisonment for such offense." § 3.

Concededly the compact authorized by the California statute and that of Washington was ratified by each of these states and has not been renounced.

The petitioner contends that the compact authorized by these statutes is unconstitutional in that it is repugnant to the provisions of article IV, section 2, clause 2 of the United States Constitution and to section 5278 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, 18 U.S.C.A. § 662, providing for the extradition of fugitives from justice. More specifically, the petitioner contends that extradition is the sole means by which an alleged fugitive may be rendered up by one state to another. He also argues that the compact is contrary to the provisions of article I, section 10, clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States providing that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, and, finally, that it deprives the petitioner of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

The respondent takes the position that the legislation under attack does not violate any constitutional provision. On the contrary, he justifies the compact as one expressly authorized by the act of Congress relating to agreements between states (supra). He also argues that the congressional act may be deemed a statute empowering the states to enter into mutual compacts for the interstate transportation of criminals in aid of the enforcement of their penal laws under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. In addition, the respondent contends that the state has the right, under its police powers reserved by the Tenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, to exclude from its borders convicts and fugitives from justice.

[1] The administration of parole is an integral part of criminal justice, having as its object the rehabilitation of those convicted of crime and the protection of the community. Unquestionably such rehabilitation of a parolee may often be facilitated by transferring him to another state, with new surroundings and better opportunities for employment. It is apparent, however, that the success of such out-of-state transfers requires adequate control and intelligent supervision of parolees during the period of their readjustment to civil life. And from the standpoint of the protection of society, there is sound reason for an agreement between states that the authority over parolees should follow them across state lines. The knowledge on the part of the out-of-state parolee that he may summarily be returned to prison for any violation of the rules which he has agreed to obey undoubtedly is an effective check upon any inclination to violate parole.

[2] The compact represents the social policy of both California and Washington in this regard. It is an agreement for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and in the enforcement of the criminal laws of each state within the contemplation of the federal legislation and therefore does not violate the prohibition of the Constitution concerning compacts between states.

[3, 4] Nor does the act of the respondent deprive the petitioner of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. He had his day in court when he was tried and convicted of a felony and sentenced to a maximum term of five years in the Washington State Penitentiary. The parole which he accepted was granted upon the express condition that the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles "may at any time within its discretion and without notice cause the parolee to be returned to the said institution to serve the full maximum sentence or any part thereof." One convicted of crime has the right to reject an offer of parole, but once having elected to accept parole, the parolee is bound by the express terms of his conditional release. In re Peterson, 14 Cal.2d 82, 92 P.2d 890.

[5, 6] The most serious question presented by the petitioner is his contention that article IV, section 2, clause 2, of the United States Constitution providing for the extradition of criminals and the act of Congress carrying that constitutional provision into effect constitute the sole method by which a parolee whose parole has been revoked may be returned to the state in which he was convicted. The Constitution provides:

"A person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime." This provision is not self-executing. (Com. of Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 16 L. Ed. 717; Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U.S. 80, 6 S.Ct. 291, 29 L.Ed. 544; Hyatt v. People of New York, 188 U.S. 691, 23 S.Ct. 456, 47 L.Ed. 657), and Congress, by statute, established the procedure to make it effective.

"Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State or Territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory, charging the person demanded wit hhaving committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate or the State or Territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State or Territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear." Rev. Stats. § 5278, 18 U.S.C.A. § 662. It has been held that a convict whose parole has been revoked is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of this statute, even though he entered the asylum state with the consent of the paroling authorities, and is subject to return to the demanding state by extradition proceedings. In re McBride, 101 Cal.App. 251, 281 P. 651; for cases from other jurisdictions see notes in 78 A.L.R. 419, 8 A.L.R. 903.

The validity of legislation in aid of the act of Congress concerning extradition is now well established (Dennison v. Christian, 196 U.S. 637, 25 S.Ct. 795, 49 L.Ed. 630, affirming 72 Neb. 703, 101 N.W. 1045, 117 Am.St.Rep. 817; Ex parte White, 49 Cal. 433; Kurtz v. State, 22 Fla. 36, 1 Am.St.Rep. 173; Ex parte Ammons, 34 Ohio St. 518; Ex parte Romanes, 1 Utah 23) and it has been held that a state may legislate upon a subject of extradition unprovided for because Congress failed to extend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes to the full limits of constitutional power. Innes v. Tobin, 240 U.S. 127, 36 S.Ct. 290, 60 L.Ed. 562. But all legislation which the courts have heretofore considered had reference to the federal extradition procedure. The interstate compact, however, is not of that character. It provides: "All legal requirements to obtain extradition of fugitives from justice are hereby expressly waived on the part of States party hereto, as to such persons." § 3(3). This can only mean that states which are parties to the compact have established a method to procure the return of parolees from one state to another, which is entirely independent of the extradition procedure. And whether states may mutually agree upon a method of securing the return of a certain class of fugitives other than by way of extradition is a question apparently never before decided by any court.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the states or colonies regulated the return of fugitives by agreement. If no compact existed between the demanding state and the asylum state, an escaped prisoner might remain in the asylum state with impunity. The question then is, did the framers of the Constitution intend to prevent the states from entering into agreements for the return of prisoners, or did they intend only to provide a federal procedure which would not necessarily be an exclusive one.

The Supreme Court of the United States succinctly stated the purpose of the constitutional provision concerning extradition in two early cases. In the first of these, after an exhaustive discussion of its history and purpose, the court said: "* * * it is manifest that the statesmen who framed the Constitution were fully sensible, that from the complex character of the Government, it must fail unless the States mutually supported each other and the General Government; and that nothing would be more likely to disturb its peace, and end in discord, than permitting an offender against the laws of a State, by passing over a mathematical line which divides it from another, to defy its process, and stand ready, under the protection of the State, to repeat the offence as soon as another opportunity offered." Com. of Kentucky v. Dennison, supra [24 How. 100, 16 L.Ed. 717]. "The sole object of the provision of the constitution, and the act of congress to carry it into effect," the court reiterated a short time later, "is to secure the surrender of persons accused of crime, who have fled from the justice of the state whose laws they are charged with violating. * * * No purpose or intention is manifested to afford them any immunity or protection from trial and punishment for any offenses committed in the state from which they flee." Lascelles v. State of Georgia, 148 U.S. 537, 542, 13 S.Ct. 687, 689, 37 L.Ed. 549.

[7-9] Except for section 2 of article IV of the Constitution, there would be no question concerning the right of states to provide, by their joint agreement, for the return of a certain class of fugitives, subject, of course, to the constitutional provision regarding interstate compacts. The right created by article IV, it has been held, is a guarantee of which a state may avail itself to secure the return of an offender against its law. State v. Parrish, 242 Ala. 7, 5 So.2d 828, 832; Ex parte Roberts, 186 Wash. 13, 56 P.2d 703. And since the extradition provision is not for the benefit of the fugitive, an asylum state may require the governor to surrender a fugitive on terms less exacting than those imposed by the act of Congress. State ex rel. Treseder v. Remann, 165 Wash. 92, 4 P.2d 866, 78 A.L.R. 412. As authority to require the return of fugitives originally existed in the states and remains there except as expressly limited by the Constitution, even in the field of federal extradition, the act of Congress is not exclusive of state action which does not come within its express terms. On the contrary, said the Supreme Court of the United States, it must have been intended to leave subjects within the constitutional power and not provided for by that statute subject to the state authority which then controlled them. Innes v. Tobin, supra. Neither the terms of the constitutional provision nor the act of Congress making it effective indicate that the extradition procedure was intended to be exclusive. Indeed, the language of the act of Congress provides that the duty of the asylum state to deliver the fugitive does not arise under federal law until "the Executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice" in a specified manner. And as the Supreme Court of Florida has pointed out: "Neither the act of Congress nor the Constitution of the United States relate in any way to fugitives from justice from one State to another, or makes any provision concerning them until a demand has been made for their delivery. 'The demand is evidently the initial point at which the Constitution and the law begin to operate, and prior to this neither has any application to the case.' Id. While legislation by a State against the Constitution and the law of Congress, impairing the full operation of their provisions, would be nugatory, yet it is competent for a State Legislature to enact laws on the subject at a stage prior to that which the Constitution and Federal Laws have designated as the time at which they take cognizance of it, provided that such enactments are not inconsistent with the end named in the Constitution." Kurtz v. State, supra.

Of course, when a state elects to use the method of federal extradition, and in so doing has made the demand as required by the Constitution and act of Congress, the federal law applies and governs the procedure of return. And any legislation of the asylum state which purports to limit the exercise of this constitutional guarantee to the demanding state, such as requiring greater evidence of guilt to be produced than is required by the federal act is unconstitutional. In re Briscoe, 51 How. Prac., N.Y., 422; Kurtz v. State, supra. If, however, the return of the fugitive may be effected without the necessity of invoking the constitutional guarantee to the demanding state, no question of federal constitutional law is involved.

[10, 11] The existence of an independent method of securing the return of out-of-state parolees does not conflict with nor render ineffectual the federal laws with relation to extradition. The federal method of extradition is always present and may be invoked when necessary to secure the right to return of the fugitive to the demanding state. Also states not party to the interstate compact are free to invoke that procedure to secure the return of fugitive parolees. And if a state has elected to follow the federal procedure and claim the constitutional guarantee, the fugitive of course has the right to insist, on habeas corpus, that the procedure conform to the federal law. Similarly the parolee detained under the interstate compact has the right to complain, by means of habeas corpus, if that law is not complied with by the authorities. But no right exists on the part of the parolee, whose parole has been revoked, to claim that he may only be removed by the method of his choosing. And since the statute applies uniformly to all parolees from states party to the compact, the petitioner may not complain that the statute deprives him of the equal protection of the laws. Caskey Baking Co. v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 313 U.S. 117, 61 S.Ct. 881, 85 L.Ed. 1223; Williams v. State of Arkansas, 217 U.S. 79, 30 S.Ct. 493, 54 L.Ed. 673, 18 Ann.Cas. 865; Field v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 194 U.S. 618, 621, 24 S.Ct. 784, 48 L.Ed. 1142; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 24 S.Ct. 638, 48 L.Ed. 971; Tinsley v. Anderson, 171 U.S. 101, 18 S.Ct. 805, 43 L.Ed. 91; Minneapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U.S. 26, 9 S.Ct. 207, 32 L.Ed. 585; Walston v. Nevin, 128 U.S. 578, 9 S.Ct. 192, 32 L.Ed. 544; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U.S. 27, 5 S.Ct. 357, 28 L.Ed. 923.

For these reasons, the writ is discharged and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the respondent chief of police.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. While the policy embodied in the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision (Stats.1937, p. 469) may be desirable in facilitating the transference from one state to another of violators of parole, I do not believe the legislation can stand in the face of United States Constitution, article IV, section 2, clause 2, and the Congressional Act, 18 U.S.C.A. 662, providing for extradition. It has been uniformly held that the United States Constitution and the act of Congress are paramount in this field and no state statute inconsistent therewith may stand. United States ex rel. McCline v. Meyering, 7

Cir., 75 F.2d 716; Day v. Keim, 4 Cir., 2 F.2d 966; Ex parte Morgan, D.C., 20 F. 298; Ex parte Montgomery, D.C., 244 F. 967, affirmed 246 U.S. 656, 38 S.Ct. 424, 62 L.Ed. 924; Kuney v. State, 88 Fla. 354, 102 So. 547; Fitzpatrick v. Williams, 5 Cir., 46 F.2d 40, 73 A.L.R. 1365; later Florida case, State v. Quigg, 91 Fla. 197, 107 So. 409, 411. Authority for interstate rendition of fugitives by extradition emanates solely from the power delegated to the federal government by the Constitution of the United States. In this state, such proceedings are wholly dependent upon the organic and statutory law just quoted. Legislation as to interstate rendition of fugitives being within the power of Congress, the federal law upon that subject is paramount to state Constitutions and statutes. People v. Meyering, 357 Ill. 166, 191 N.E. 318; Keeton v. Gaiser, 331 Mo. 499, 55 S.W.2d 302; Ex parte Owen, 10 Okl.Cr. 284, 136 P. 197, Ann.Cas.1916A, 522; Ex parte Bergman, 60 Tex.Cr.R. 8, 130 S.W. 174; Ex parte Goodman, 79 Tex.Cr.R. 67, 182 S.W. 1120; Waller v. Jordan, Ariz., 118 P.2d 450; State v. Parrish, 242 Ala. 7, 5 So.2d 828; State v. Grosch, 177 Tenn. 619, 152 S.W.2d 239; In re Sanders, Ohio App., 31 N.E.2d 246; People v. Bell, 372 Ill. 572, 25 N.E.2d 45; Ex parte Roberts, 186 Wash. 13, 56 P.2d 703. That being true the act here in question must fall as it is clearly inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress above-mentioned. It wholly dispenses with all of the requirements therein set forth and permits a person to be taken from one state to another by the officers of the state claiming the person by merely establishing identity and violation of parole by a peace officer of the asylum state. The rule announced in the majority opinion is applicable to cases other than those of paroled convicts. It announces the broad general rule that before a demand for extradition is made by the demanding state, the federal laws with reference to extradition are not operative, and the state may make any regulation it wishes in respect to the matter. In so holding it relies upon a Florida case. Kurtz v. State, 22 Fla. 36, 1 Am.St.Rep. 173. The majority opinion states, quoting from the Kurtz case: "'Neither the act of Congress nor the Constitution of the United States relate in any way to fugitives from justice from one State to another, or makes any provision concerning them until a demand has been made for their delivery. "The demand is evidently the initial point at which the Constitution and the law begin to operate, and prior to this neither has any application to the case." Id. While legislation by a State against the Constitution and the law of Congress, impairing the full operation of their provisions, would be nugatory, yet it is competent for a State Legislature to enact laws on the subject at a stage prior to that which the Constitution and Federal Laws have designated as the time at which they take cognizance of it, provided that such enactments are not inconsistent with the end named in the Constitution.'" (Emphasis added.) If that rule is applied, the federal laws with relation to extradition are completely ignored and rendered wholly ineffective for any purpose. To bring the rule into operation requires only that the governor of the demanding state make no demand, thus no extradition proceedings are initiated. Then the peace officers of that state may go into the asylum state and take the prisoner to their state. Under this practice or procedure extradition as now known would be a thing of the past. It is conceded in the majority opinion that the federal procedure for extradition embraces paroled convicts who breach the terms of their parole. Therefore, the removal of them from this state to another state is in fact extradition but all of the federal law formalities are disregarded. In any event, it cannot be denied that the rule as stated embraces all others charged with crime who are undeniably embraced in the federal extradition laws. To say that before a demand is made no extradition exists, and therefore the federal laws need not be observed, is to permit that to be accomplished indirectly which could not be done directly. The fact is that if the prisoner is taken from the asylum state to the state where he is charged with the crime, he is beyond doubt extradited, and if extradited, the federal law must be followed, and a state law eliminating all of the federal requirements is a clear invasion of the powers of Congress.

Not only is the language quoted from the Kurtz case wholly dictum, but the court there had in mind an entirely different situation. In conformity with the rule that a state may adopt statutes in aid of but not inconsistent with the federal laws, it had in mind state laws that provided for the arrest of fugitives from justice by the officers of the asylum state pending the initiation and completion of extradition proceedings in conformity with the federal laws. It was contemplated that the extradition that followed would be in conformity with the federal law. Such a law is of course not inconsistent with the federal law being merely in aid of it. But where, as here, the complete process of extradition is permitted without following the federal requirements, it cannot be said that the state act is in aid of the federal law.

In my opinion, the California statute in question is in direct conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution and statutes, and is therefore invalid, and the writ of habeas corpus prayed for by petitioner should be granted and petitioner discharged from custody.

PEOPLE v. LAMARR.

Cr. 4433.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 18, 1942.

1. Bigamy 🔑1

Accused was not entitled to acquittal of bigamy because he proved that at time of his second marriage, alleged in information to be the lawful marriage, he was legally married to another and remained such other's husband at time of third and allegedly bigamous marriage, since if at time of third marriage, accused was already validly married to any spouse, he became guilty of "bigamy" on the third marriage. Pen.Code, § 281.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Bigamy".

2. Bigamy 🔑1

If no valid prior marriage is proved, alleged bigamous marriage is in fact a legal marriage, but if any valid prior existing marriage is proved, then status of accused as a married person is established and a subsequent marriage during existence of such status is "bigamous". Pen.Code, § 281.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Bigamous".

3. Bigamy 🔑4

A misnomer in information of spouse, marriage to whom established the status of defendant as a married person, is not necessarily fatal to judgment of conviction of bigamy. Pen.Code, § 281.

4. Bigamy 🔑1

The essential things for pleading and proof to show to establish "bigamy" are the previously established status of defendant as a married person and his additional marriage during continuance of that status. Pen.Code, § 281.

5. Bigamy 🔑5

The name of person with whom, and to some extent the place where and the date when bigamous marriage took place are important to protect defendant against being placed in jeopardy more than once, but the name of person with whom and place where and time when marriage establishing status was consummated are important only to extent that defendant be not prejudiced in preparing his defense on facts tending to establish such status. Pen.Code, § 281.

6. Criminal law 🔑1186(1)

A mistake of law as to what would constitute a technical defense is no ground for reversal of judgment since a "mistake of fact" is where a person understands the facts to be other than they are, whereas a "mistake of law" is where a person knows the facts as they really are but has a mistaken belief as to legal consequences of those facts.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mistake of Fact" and "Mistake of Law".

7. Bigamy 🔑2

Proof of valid existing marriage at time of marriage alleged in information to be the first or status-establishing marriage may or may not constitute a defense to bigamy, since if it existed at time of alleged first marriage but was dissolved before alleged bigamous marriage, it constitutes a defense because then alleged bigamous marriage is in fact valid, but if first marriage continues from time previous to first alleged marriage, through time when alleged bigamous marriage was contracted, then such proof supports conviction. Pen.Code, § 281.

8. Indictment and information 🔑171

The test of "materiality" of a variance is whether indictment or information so fully informs defendant of criminal act with which he is charged that taking into consideration the proof, he is not misled in making his defense or placed in danger of being twice put in jeopardy for same offense. Pen. Code, § 1151.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Material Variance".

9. Bigamy 🔑5

Where accused showed that at time of his second marriage, alleged in information to be the lawful marriage, he was legally married to another and remained such other's husband at time of third and allegedly bigamous marriage, any variance between information and proof was not "material". Pen.Code, §§ 281, 1151.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence L. Kincaid, Judge.

Reginald Raymond Lamarr was convicted of bigamy, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 126 P.2d 678.

Donald Kolts, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Bayard Rhone, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This cause was taken over after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division Three. Upon further examination of the record, we adopt the opinion of Presiding Justice Schauer, with certain omissions and additions, as and for the decision of this court, as follows:

Defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of the crime of bigamy under section 281 of the Penal Code, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The pertinent facts developed at the trial are as follows: On May 24, 1929, defendant married one Wally Meyer Lamarr in San Francisco, California; on March 20, 1935, he married Selma Lamarr in Ventura, California, while his marriage to Wally Meyer Lamarr was still in effect; and on November 23 or 24, 1938, he married Josephine Lamarr at Yuma, Arizona, neither of the two earlier marriages having been theretofore annulled or dissolved by divorce or death of a contracting party. The three wives were present in court and testified at the trial. Section 281 of the Penal Code provides that "Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, except * * * [in certain situations not existing here], is guilty of bigamy."

The amended information, upon which defendant was convicted, alleged "That the said Reginald Raymond Lamarr on or about the 23rd day of November, 1938, * * * did knowingly, willfully and feloniously marry one Josephine Roney, said defendant being then and there the lawful husband of another person, to wit: Mrs. Selma Lamarr, then and there living, the marriage of said defendant and said Mrs. Selma Lamarr not having been anulled or dissolved and said defendant and said Josephine Roney having thereafter cohabited together as husband and wife in the County of Los Angeles, State of California. * * *" It was not until the trial that, by the testimony of defendant and of defendant's witness, Wally Meyer Lamarr, the fact of defendant's marriage to Wally Meyer Lamarr previous to his other two marriages was disclosed. Although some question is raised in the appeal briefs of the parties as to whether the trial court accepted the testimony of defendant and of Wally Meyer Lamarr concerning their marriage to each other, and as to whether the court may have drawn an inference of a divorce between them before defendant contracted his next marriage, to Selma Lamarr, we find no indication in the record as to the relative weight given by the trial court to the testimony of the various witnesses or as to the inferences deducible therefrom, and so proceed on the basis of the facts as set forth above.

[1-5] Defendant contends, chiefly, that he could not be convicted under the allegations of the amended information for the reason that at the time of his marriage to Selma Lamarr, alleged in the information to be the lawful marriage, he was legally married to Wally Meyer Lamarr. This contention cannot be sustained. It is to be noted that defendant makes no claim to having been divorced from Wally Meyer Lamarr at any time, and on the contrary the evidence produced by him established without contradiction that he was still her husband at the time of his third marriage.

We know of no California case in which this point has been squarely decided. It is necessary therefore that we proceed by reason, examining en route such authorities as seem pertinent to ascertain whether they either tend to guide us to or away from the conclusion which reason suggests.

Defendant relies principally upon People v. Spitzer, 1922, 57 Cal.App. 593, 208 P. 181, in which a contention of the defense, as here, was that defendant was the lawful husband of another woman at the time he was married to the wife alleged in the information to be the lawful (or first) wife. In that case the court said, at page 594 of 57 Cal.App., at page 182 of 208 P., "It seems to be the law that, if the first marriage alleged in an information charging the crime of bigamy be shown to have been void because of a previous valid existing marriage, the defendant cannot be convicted thereunder. Commonwealth v. McGrath, 140 Mass. [296] 297, 6 N.E. 515; State v. Sherwood, 68 Vt. 414, 35 A. 352; People v. Mock Yick Gar, 14 Cal.App. 334, 111 P. 1039. As said in Lane v. State, 82 Miss. 555, 34 So. 353: 'The rule is thoroughly settled that one indicted for bigamy must be acquitted on that indictment if he can show that the first marriage alleged in the indictment is void by reason of the existence of a prior lawful marriage, still existing.'" The court also stated in denying a petition for rehearing that "* * * while, as held in the main opinion, the New York marriage to Mary Truell [first marriage], had it been established, would have constituted a technical defense, nevertheless, since it was not proven, defendant must upon this record be deemed guilty as charged." It appears therefore that this case is not authority for the proposition on which defendant relies. No showing was there made that the first marriage alleged in the information was void because of a previous valid existing marriage. Hence, the statements from the opinion therein, quoted above, are dictum and were unnecessary to the decision of the case.

There is a fundamental difference between the proposition that proof of a valid previously contracted and existing marriage is absolutely essential as a basis for guilt of bigamy on subsequently contracting another marriage and the theory that proof of invalidity of the first marriage charged in the information, through establishing a prior existing marriage, requires acquittal. If there was no valid existing marriage at the time of the alleged bigamous marriage obviously the defendant is not guilty of bigamy. Proof of a marriage contracted prior to and valid at the time of that alleged in the information to be the valid or first marriage would destroy the probative value of the alleged first marriage and to that extent would be material. But the gravamen of the offense is the bigamous marriage. If at the time of the alleged bigamous marriage, the defendant was already validly married to any spouse, he obviously became guilty (in fact) of bigamy on the latter marriage. The former proposition involves a question of substantive proof, the latter a question of pleading and procedure. If no valid prior marriage is proved then the alleged bigamous marriage is in fact a legal marriage but if any valid prior existing marriage is proved then the status of the defendant as a married person is established and a subsequent marriage during the existence of that status is bigamous. A misnomer in the information, of the spouse, marriage to whom established the status of the defendant, is not necessarily, in our opinion, fatal to the judgment. It was said in People v. Priestley, 1911, 17 Cal.App. 171, 176, 118 P. 965, 967, that "It is immaterial when or where the first marriage took place if the accused, at the time of the second marriage, had a wife living. * * * 'As the first marriage is not criminal, but its existence a condition which makes the second marriage a crime, it is of itself a fact, and there is no substantial reason why the averment of it should ever have been required except in general terms.'" The essential things for the pleading and proof to show are (1) the previously established status of the defendant as a married person and (2) his additional marriage during perdurance of that status. It is the additional marriage which identifies the particular crime. The name of the person with whom, and to some extent the place where, and the date when, the additional or bigamous marriage took place are important to identify the crime and protect the defendant against being placed in jeopardy more than once for that offense, but the name of the person with whom and the place where and the time when the marriage establishing the status was consummated have no significance in identifying the particular crime and are important only to the extent that the defendant be not misled and prejudiced in preparing his defense on the facts tending to establish such status.

[6] If the people rather than the defendant had produced the evidence of defendant's marriage to Wally Meyer Lamarr, seeking without previous notice to defendant to establish his status as a married person by virtue of his marriage to Wally in San Francisco on May 24, 1929, instead of by virtue of the specifically alleged marriage to Selma in Ventura on March 20, 1935, he perhaps would have some basis for contending that he had been misled in preparing his defense, that the information should have been amended, or at least that he should have had a continuance to enable him to prepare to meet such "surprise" testimony. But here the defendant did not seek any continuance and certainly he was not surprised by facts which he himself adduced. By the information which was filed he was fully and correctly informed of the particular criminal act with which he was charged. His own testimony, voluntarily given, and that of his witness, was as competent to prove his previously contracted married status and its existence at the time of the bigamous marriage as could have been any evidence that the People might have produced. It therefore appears that the defendant has not been misled as to the nature or identity of the criminal charge against him, he has not been taken by surprise by the evidence adduced, and he is not in danger of being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. A mistake of law as to what would constitute a technical defense is no ground for reversal of the judgment. "A 'mistake of fact' is where a person understands the facts to be other than they are; whereas a 'mistake of law' is where a person knows the facts as they really are, but has a mistaken belief as to the legal consequences of those facts." Quoted from O'Brien v. Selskab, 94 N.J.L. 244, 246, 109 A. 517; 40 C.J. 1227, in People v. Kelly, 1939, 35 Cal. App.2d 571, 574, 96 P.2d 372.

It is not to be implied from what we have said that the state could allege as the lawful marriage a defendant's marriage to B and a subsequent bigamous marriage to C; and then upon proof by the defendant, or otherwise, that he had in fact previously married A and that the marriage to B took place during the existence of the marriage to A, thereupon claim a conviction on the charge as laid, on the theory that the B marriage was the bigamous one. On that theory the defendant would be entitled to acquittal on the ground of variance (§ 1151, Pen.Code); there would be a failure of proof; i. e., the identity of the crime would be different. The first marriage (to A), while it continued to exist at the time of the marriage to B, might have been terminated before the marriage to C. In that case the C marriage would be lawful and the B marriage, although bigamous in fact, could not support a conviction on the charge as stated because it was not alleged as the crime. But if, as here, it appeared that the A marriage continued as a valid status not only at the time of the B marriage but also at the time of the C marriage, then the C marriage would be bigamous as charged and would support a conviction. Proof of any valid marriage previous to the alleged bigamous marriage and existing at the time of the latter would establish the married status of the defendant and support the charge that the latter marriage was bigamous. The identity of the crime for that bigamous marriage would obviously be the same regardless of when, where or with whom the valid status-establishing marriage took place.

[7] It is thus apparent that proof of a valid marriage prior to and existing at the time of the marriage alleged in an information to be the first or status-establishing marriage may or may not constitute a defense to the charge. If it existed at the time of the alleged first marriage but was dissolved before the alleged bigamous marriage it constitutes a complete defense because in that case the alleged bigamous marriage is in fact valid. But if the proof shows that the first consummated marriage perdured from a time previous to the first alleged marriage through the time when the alleged bigamous marriage was contracted then that proof supports conviction.

In view of our conclusion that the discussion of the issue in the Spitzer case, supra, is dictum we find it unnecessary to here discuss in detail the authorities cited in the Spitzer decision. Suffice it to say that they presented either distinguishable factual situations or turned on questions of pleading and proof.

[8, 9] If there be any point to defendant's contention it is purely a question of variance between pleading and proof. An immaterial variance should be disregarded. 14 Cal.Jur. 96; People v. Mizer, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 148, 153, 154, 99 P.2d 333. The test of the materiality of a variance is whether the indictment or information so fully and correctly informs the defendant of the criminal act with which he is charged that, taking into consideration the proof which is introduced against him, he is not misled in making his defense, or placed in danger of being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. 14 Cal.Jur. 96; People v. Terrill, 1901, 132 Cal. 497, 499, 500, 64 P. 894; People v. Freeman, 1916, 29 Cal. App. 543, 544, 545, 156 P. 994; People v. Harrington, 1928, 92 Cal.App. 245, 254, 255, 267 P. 942; People v. Thorn, 1934, 138 Cal. App. 714, 733, 734, 33 P.2d 5; People v. Jacobs, 1935, 11 Cal.App.2d 1, 6, 52 P.2d 945; People v. Woodson, 1936, 11 Cal.App. 2d 604, 606, 54 P.2d 33; see, also, People v. Arras, 1891, 89 Cal. 223, 226, 227, 26 P. 766; People v. Evanoff, 1919, 45 Cal.App. 108, 112, 187 P. 54. From what has been said, we regard it as evident that under the test stated in the authorities cited any variance in the instant case was not material.

Appellant calls to our attention the cases of People v. Beevers, 1893, 99 Cal. 286, 33 P. 844; People v. LeDoux, 1909, 155 Cal. 535, 102 P. 517; People v. Bisbee, 1933, 134 Cal.App. 181, 25 P.2d 232; and People v. Kelly, 1939, 32 Cal.App.2d 624, 90 P.2d 605. In only two of these cases, People v. Bisbee and People v. Kelly, were three marriages of a defendant involved. Neither of the other two cases states any principle pertinent to our discussion. In People v. Bisbee defendant claimed as a defense to a charge of bigamy the fact that he had married another woman prior to the marriage alleged in the information to be the lawful one. On denying petition for rehearing after affirming defendant's conviction of bigamy, the court there said, at page 183 of 134 Cal.App., at page 233 of 25 P.2d: "Appellant testified positively that he had been absent from, had not seen nor heard of or from, Marie Shay for about six years before he married Viola Kelly and that he did not know whether she was dead or alive. Under this testimony the second marriage was 'valid until its nullity is adjudged by a competent tribunal.' Section 61, Civ.Code.

"The testimony demonstrates that, of the three marriages proved, he contracted the third one without any dissolution of the second one. In these circumstances neither the trial court nor an appellate court will indulge in strained inferences from inconsistent, indefinite, and improbable testimony that perhaps, after all, appellant was married to some one else when he married the second wife, therefore he should be acquitted of legal wrong in taking the third wife under representation that he was an unmarried man." We perceive nothing in that case (People v. Bisbee) which requires us to make the holding defendant seeks by this appeal. Defendant's second marriage there was found valid, and the decision does not constitute authority for the proposition that had it been found invalid and had the first marriage continued in effect at the time of the third, defendant would have been entitled to an acquittal.

In People v. Kelly, 1939, supra, 32 Cal. App.2d 624, 90 P.2d 605, the judgment of conviction of bigamy and the order denying defendant's motion for new trial were affirmed, where the question of defendant's marriage to another woman prior to the marriage relied upon by the prosecution as the lawful marriage was not raised until the hearing on the motion for a new trial. On a subsequent appeal (People v. Kelly, 1939, 35 Cal.App.2d 571, 96 P.2d 372) an order denying defendant's motion to vacate the judgment of conviction was also affirmed. Defendant, however, contended that his admittedly third marriage, for which he was prosecuted, was not itself bigamous but was rendered valid under the provisions of subdivision one of section 282 of the Penal Code by the fact that he had not heard from his first wife for five years at the time he married his third (see page 574 of the opinion in 35 Cal.App.2d, 96 P. 2d 372). That is not akin to the factual basis in the present appeal.

People v. Burke, 1941, 43 Cal.App.2d 316, 110 P.2d 685, is also a case in which three marriages of defendant were involved. All three were proved by the prosecution and admitted by defendant, who contended, however, that neither number two nor number three was bigamous, by reason of various presumptions asserted by him as to innocence and as to the continuance of life of wife number one beyond the time of his marriage to number two but terminating before that to number three. His conviction was affirmed on appeal and we find nothing in that case to influence us here.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WESTOVER v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

L. A. 18276.

Supreme Court of California.

July 30, 1942.

1. Trial 🔑295(1)

A charge must be read in its entirety, each instruction being considered in connection with the others, and if they harmonize as a whole, and accurately state the law, a reversal may not be had because of verbal inaccuracies or because a separate instruction does not contain all of elements which are to be gathered from the instructions as a whole.

2. Automobiles 🔑279

In action against city for injuries to passenger who was thrown against top of automobile as it crossed dips in street, an instruction dealing in part with negligence of motorist, that city had duty to exercise reasonable care in locating warning signs and if warning was so located as not to be readily discernible or if warning was obliterated, or misleading, then jury should find motorist not negligent was erroneous where there were many other factors which jury might have considered in determining motorist's negligence. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 5619, § 2.

3. Automobiles 🔑282

If motorist was negligent, city could not escape liability for injuries to passenger who was thrown against top of automobile as it crossed dips in street, if jury found that city was negligent and that such negligence was a proximate cause of passenger's injuries. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 5619, § 2.

4. Trial 🔑295(4)

In action against city for injuries to passenger who was thrown against top of automobile as it crossed dips in street, error in instruction that jury should find motorist not negligent if city so maintained warning signs that they were misleading or obliterated was not prejudicial where charge as a whole correctly stated the rights and duties of motorist and the city. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 5619, § 2.

5. Trial 🔑296(3)

In action against city for injuries to passenger who was thrown against top of automobile as it crossed dips in street, instruction that to impose liability jury was required to find that city violated the 1923 Public Liability Act was not erroneous as failing to include all elements essential to city's liability under the act where the act in its entirety was read to the jury in the next succeeding instruction and the act stated all elements indispensable to municipal liability. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 5619, § 2.

6. Appeal and error 🔑883

A city whose counsel stated that he had no objection to giving of pretrial instructions to clarify the law in action for injuries to automobile passenger could not on appeal challenge propriety of giving such instructions.

7. Trial 🔑296(1)

In action against city for injuries to passenger who was thrown against top of automobile as it crossed dips in street, pretrial instructions which stated in general terms the principles of law and illustrated such principles with hypothetical examples were not erroneous when considered with other detailed instructions given at the close of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George A. Dockweiler, Judge.

Action by John A. Westover against the City of Los Angeles for injuries sustained while riding in the back seat of an automobile as result of an alleged dangerous condition in a street. From a judgment for the plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Prior opinion, 120 P.2d 58.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., Frederick von Schrader, Asst. City Atty., and Leonard Husar, Victor P. Spero, Louis A.

Babior, and Albert E. Wheatcroft, Deputies City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas R. Lynch and Irving E. Read, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

The defendant city appeals from a judgment recovered by the plaintiff for injuries sustained by him while riding as a passenger in an automobile. The injuries were alleged to have resulted from the dangerous and defective condition of a public street. The action was brought under the 1923 Public Liability Act (Stats.1923, p. 675, Deering's General Laws, Act 5619) which imposes liability upon cities for damages "resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of public streets * * * where the governing * * * board, officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition * * * and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition or failed and neglected for a reasonable time * * * to take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition." Section 2.

When the accident occurred, between 4:30 and 5 p. m. on June 7, 1937, plaintiff was riding in the center of the rear seat of a 1936 De Soto sedan, which was proceeding in a southerly direction on Gaffey Street where it crosses 20th Street in the city of Los Angeles. Both streets were paved and dry. Extending across Gaffey Street at approximately the north and south curb lines of 20th Street were two drainage gutters or dips in the pavement, from 6 to 8 inches in depth. Plaintiff was injured when thrown against the top of the automobile as it crossed these gutters or dips. The intersection in question was constructed and accepted by the city in 1923. A councilman from this particular district testified that prior to this accident his attention had been called to various complaints about the intersection in question, and that he had reported the matter to the office of the city engineer.

Plaintiff became unconscious after he struck the top of the car as it went through the second dip. He testified that prior to the accident he did not see any sign of the words "Slow—Dip" on the pavement. Other passengers fixed the car's speed at between 15 and 22 miles an hour, and they also did not observe any warning signs painted on the surface of the street. The driver of the car testified that he was proceeding south on the right side of Gaffey Street, that as he approached the intersection he was not conversing with any one but was looking "straight ahead driving the car," and that he did not see any warning sign on the pavement or elsewhere as to the presence of dips in the intersection.

[1-4] Defendant city contends that the trial court committed prejudicial error in certain of the instructions which it gave to the jury. In this connection it should be remembered that the charge to the jury must be read in its entirety, each instruction being considered in connection with the others. If they harmonize as a whole and fairly and accurately state the law, a reversal may not be had because of verbal inaccuracies, or because a separate instruction does not contain all of the elements which are to be gathered from the instructions as a whole. Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 396, 264 P. 237; De La Torre v. Johnson, 203 Cal. 374, 377, 264 P. 485. An examination of the charge given here does not reveal any prejudicial error requiring a reversal of the judgment. Some fifty-one instructions were given at the close of the trial, only two of which are singled out by the city for attack. Instruction No. 14 dealt in part with the negligence of the driver of the car, who is not a party to this action, and it reads as follows: "It was the duty of the defendant to exercise reasonable care and caution in locating its warning signs so as to give reasonable warning to the public regarding a condition existing in its streets. If the warning in this case was so located that it was not readily discernible, or it was so distantly located that its relation to a condition away from it was misleading or that it called attention to only one dip whereas there were two dips, or that said warning was so obliterated by wear and other conditions that it could not be readily seen, or if seen, it was misleading to a person of ordinary prudence regarding a condition some distance ahead so that such person would not know and fully comprehend its meaning, then the court instructs you to find that Albert Small was not guilty of negligence." This instruction was erroneous because there are many other factors which the jury might have taken into consideration in determining whether or not the driver of the car was negligent. Defendant urges that this constitutes prejudicial error because its defense is based upon the theory that the negligence of the driver of the car, Albert Small, was the sole proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

Many other instructions were given, however, which clearly and correctly stated the rights and duties of both the driver of the car and the city. When the charge is read as a whole (and the jury was told that it should be so considered), it is apparent that the jury was properly instructed that its province was to determine from all the evidence whether the negligence of both the driver and the city contributed to the accident or whether the negligence of either was the sole proximate cause thereof. Assuming that the driver of the car was negligent, the defendant city could not escape liability if the jury found, as it did in this case, that defendant was negligent and that this negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. Under these circumstances, the error in the present instruction cannot be held prejudicial.

[6, 7] It is also contended that the city was prejudiced by so-called "pre-trial instructions" given by the court at the commencement of the trial. In response to a suggestion by counsel for plaintiff, the court stated that because of certain unusual features connected with the case, it felt that "clarification of the law in advance of hearing the evidence would be helpful to the jury." The city now contends that it was not proper for the court to instruct the jury on law prior to the trial of the case. In view of the fact that counsel for the city stated "the city * * * has no objection to your honor stating at the present time the law as to the case to be applied by the jury," the city is not now in position to challenge the propriety of giving such instructions. Nor do we find any error in the substance of these instructions. The court stated in general terms certain principles of law for the guidance of the jury, illustrating such principles with hypothetical examples, and inviting counsel to challenge any such examples if they were in disagreement therewith. It was pointed out that if negligence of the city was not established and the negligence of the driver of the car was shown to be the sole proximate cause of the accident "then the city is not responsible." The court further stated that "The city is liable where it violates the provisions of the 1923 Public Liability Act * * * in other words, in order to prove negligence as against the City you have got to prove everything which the Act says must be shown * * *." Other details of this preliminary statement to the jury need not be mentioned. Considered with the great number of detailed instructions given at the close of the case, it served only to guide the jury in the proper discharge of its functions as trier of the facts.

[8, 9] Defendant also contends that the trial court erred in denying its motion for a nonsuit and its motion for a directed verdict. These motions were predicated upon the theory that the sole proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries was the negligence of the driver of the car. Liability may be imposed upon a defendant where his negligence is one of several contributing factors, each of which is a proximate cause of the injury. See Condon v. Ansaldi, 203 Cal. 180, 183, 263 P. 198; Griffith v. Oak Ridge Oil Co., 190 Cal. 389, 392, 212 P. 913; see, also, 19 Cal.Jur. 758. The jury found not only that the defendant city was negligent but that its negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. Since there was ample evidence to support such a determination, the court did not err in denying the motions for a directed verdict and for a nonsuit.

ALTRAMANO et al. v. SWAN et al.

L. A. 17819.

Supreme Court of California.

July 30, 1942.

1. Trusts 🔑371(2)

Allegations that transfers from husband to his wife and daughter were made in trust, that wife and daughter held property in trust for husband, and that the actual equitable and beneficial ownership of the property was in husband, sufficiently pleaded an express trust for husband's benefit.

2. Trusts 🔑371(2)

Under modern rules of pleading, general allegations of ownership are sufficient in pleading existence of a trust.

3. Trusts 🔑81(2)

Although ordinarily a resulting trust arises in favor of person paying purchase price of property transferred to another, a resulting trust does not arise upon the transfer of property from husband to wife without consideration.

4. Trusts 🔑371(2)

To state a cause of action attacking a transfer made by a husband to his wife on theory of a resulting trust, one must allege either that husband intended to create a trust or that he intended that wife should not have the beneficial interest in the property.

5. Trusts 🔑89(1)

In judgment creditors' action to subject to payment of judgment an automobile belonging to judgment debtor's wife and postal certificates belonging to debtor's daughter, on theory that debtor transferred the property to wife and daughter in trust for his benefit, evidence that some of debtor's salary was deposited in savings account of wife who possessed separate property, that husband signed conditional sales contract on purchase of automobile, and that wife's payments thereon were credited to husband by assignee of contract, was insufficient to establish transfers of property in trust.

6. Husband and wife 🔑268(1)

Upon proper pleadings and evidence, a creditor may reach community property, with exception of wife's earnings, to satisfy husband's debts.

7. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)

Where judgment creditors' suit was based upon theory that debtor had transferred property to his wife and daughter in trust for his benefit, reviewing court could not uphold judgment in favor of judgment creditors upon theory that it subjected community property to payment of the judgment, since that would have allowed a recovery upon a cause of action not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Goodwin J. Knight, Judge.

Action by Tony Altramano and others, as judgment creditors, against W. W. Swan, Lillian J. Swan, and Juanita Swan Foreman, to impress the lien of a judgment on certain property as belonging to W. W. Swan, the judgment debtor. Judgment for the plaintiffs and the last two named defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed.

For prior opinion, see 119 P.2d 401.

James B. Fredericks, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frederick M. Kraft, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The appellants, Lillian J. Swan and Juanita Swan Foreman, her daughter, were sued by the judgment creditors of W. W. Swan in an action to subject an Oldsmobile automobile and certain Postal Certificates to the payment of the judgment.

The complaint contains five counts. In the first three of them, the respondents assert that W. W. Swan fraudulently transferred property owned by him to Lillian J. Swan, his wife, and Juanita Swan Foreman, his daughter. In the fourth count, the judgment creditors claim that W. W. Swan transferred the property in controversy to his wife and daughter in trust for his benefit, and that he is the "actual, equitable and beneficial" owner of them. The fifth count claims the right to relief upon a different theory. In making the transfers to his wife and daughter, say the respondents, Swan received no consideration, "and by reason thereof a constructive trust has been created and the actual, equitable and beneficial ownership of said properties is in W. W. Swan."

By way of answer, the appellants deny that W. W. Swan ever owned any interest in the automobile or the Postal Savings Certificates and they assert that they own all the property which is mentioned in the complaint.

W. W. Swan and Lillian J. Swan married in 1909 and have lived together since that time. In 1938, he executed a contract guaranteeing the prize money in a rodeo contest. The judgment against him was rendered the following year in an action upon this contract.

According to the testimony of Swan, he has been steadily employed since 1924 as an investigator. In that year he received a reward of $6,250 and made a gift of the entire amount to his wife. Since his marriage, and particularly in the years from 1936 to 1940, he has given her most of his earnings "to maintain her home, raise her children up, pay her bills, doctor bills, and a lot of other things." At the time he signed the contract upon which the respondents recovered judgment, he had no debts.

In 1936 Mrs. Swan opened a savings account in a Los Angeles bank. Other deposits were subsequently made to her credit and in April, 1940, she withdrew the balance of $2,500 and gave this amount to her daughter. Her explanation of the gift was that she has never made a will, and she gave her daughter the money "to secure her".

The daughter corroborated her mother's testimony concerning the money given to her and said that she purchased Postal Savings Certificates with it. These certificates she placed in Mrs. Swan's safety deposit box.

In addition to the testimony of these witnesses, who were called under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, other evidence was offered in support of the allegations of the complaint. According to the records of the bank, the savings account was opened with the deposit of a check for $500, drawn on another account of Mrs. Swan in the same bank, and $100 in currency. From April, 1936, to February of the following year, $648.50 from the salary checks of Mr. Swan was deposited in it.

The automobile, it appears, was purchased by Mrs. Swan in 1937 upon a conditional sale contract. A representative of the corporation from which it was purchased testified that his company required Mr. Swan, who had an income, to sign the contract although Mrs. Swan signed the purchase order and the car was licensed in her name. An employee of the finance company to which the contract was assigned testified that the bookkeeping code indicated all payments upon it were made by W. W. Swan. On cross-examination, however, he admitted that he had never seen W. W. Swan in the office and "we don't record any identification" of the person who makes a payment on a contract but only the name of the person for whose benefit the payment is made.

Following the denial of the appellants' motion for a nonsuit, they offered evidence tending to show the source of the money which was deposited in the bank account. Mrs. Swan testified that, in 1920, she sold a house at a profit of $2,000. The money to purchase this house and an additional $4,000 was given to her by her brother. She also received $6,250 as a gift from her husband. During these years she often kept money in two or three banks and also, since the time of the bank failures in 1929, in a safety deposit box. She explained that about three days before she opened the savings account in question, she loaned her sister $2,500, and many of the deposits shown to have been made in the account were of money sent by her sister in partial payment of the loan.

Mrs. Swan said that her husband turned over his pay check, averaging $160 per month, to her. That amount was not always sufficient to meet their household expenses, which she always paid in cash. If any of his checks were deposited in the savings account, either she had paid household expenses of an equivalent amount from her separate funds, or his check was used by her to replace money sent to her by her sister, and which had been used to pay household bills. No one but herself had any right to withdraw money from any of her bank accounts.

Concerning the automobile, she said that in 1931 she bought an Auburn which was registered in her own name. In 1937, she bought the Oldsmobile, turning in the Auburn and paying $500 in cash which she took from her safety deposit box. The balance of the purchase price was represented by the conditional sale contract which has been mentioned. Payments on this contract were made by her, either in currency or cashier's checks, with money she kept in her safety deposit box. According to her testimony, no one other than herself has any interest in the automobile.

W. W. Swan testified that he signed the contract at the request of the dealer but he made no payments upon it. He did not know where his wife's bank accounts were carried and he never attempted to exercise any control over them. He knew she had two safety deposit boxes, but he never put anything in either of them, nor had he given her anything to put into them for him; at no time had he given her anything to hold in trust for him. Mrs. Swan does not own or control any property to which he has any legal or equitable title, and he has never claimed any right in property held by her.

At the conclusion of the taking of evidence, the respondents abandoned the first three counts of their complaint, expressly admitting a failure to prove any facts establishing a fraudulent conveyance. But the court found, upon the other counts of the complaint, that Mr. Swan transferred the bank account and automobile to his wife and daughter without consideration and that he acquired these properties in their names. Additional findings are that the transfers involved no change of possession and that the properties have remained in the actual possession and control of W. W. Swan; that the transfers of the bank account and automobile by Mr. Swan to his wife and daughter were made in trust; that the appellants now hold this property in trust, the actual equitable and beneficial ownership being in him; that Mrs. Swan did not acquire the money in the bank account as her sole and separate property; that Mr. Swan contributed unstated sums of money to that account; and that Juanita Swan Foreman did not acquire the $2,500 as a gift.

Upon these findings the court rendered judgment that Mr. Swan is the owner of the Postal Savings Certificates and a 75 per cent interest in the automobile, the respondents being entitled to a lien upon this property for the amount of the judgment.

Attacking this determination, the allegations in count four, say the appellants, that the transfers from W. W. Swan to them "were made in trust" is a mere conclusion of law stating no cause of action. For the same reason they challenge the assertions in the fifth count that no consideration for the transfers passed between W. W. Swan and the appellants and "by reason thereof a constructive trust has been created." And they argue that if this count may be said to allege facts, rather than conclusions, the facts do not state a cause of action, for a married man's transfer of property to his wife or daughter without consideration does not, in itself, give rise to a constructive trust. Finally, the appellants claim, there is no evidence to support the findings of the trial court that any of Mr. Swan's money was deposited in the bank or used to purchase the automobile or that he had any interest in either of them.

The general averment that the legal ownership of the property is in the appellants, and the equitable ownership in W. W. Swan, the respondents maintain, is an allegation of ultimate fact sufficient to state a cause of action in their behalf. They further urge that where title to property is taken in the name of one person and the consideration is paid by another, the one acquiring title holds the same in trust for the person paying the consideration. In any event, the respondents contend, even though a trust may not have been established by the evidence, yet the trial court had the right to rely upon the presumption that all property acquired during the married life of the parties is community property and to disbelieve the testimony offered in behalf of the appellants as to the character of the property. They argue that since some of the money represented by W. W. Swan's salary checks was deposited in the bank account, there was a commingling of funds which justified the trial court in treating all the property as belonging to the community.

In reply, the appellants assert that any discussion of community property law is immaterial, as the complaint does not charge that either the automobile or the money with which the Postal Savings Certificates were purchased was community property, and the court did not find for the respondents upon that ground. But if the respondents now adopt that theory, say the appellants, they are entitled to the benefit of the statutory provision that property acquired by a married woman by an instrument in writing is presumed to be her separate property. Civ.Code, § 164. They also rely upon section 15a of the Bank Act as establishing a presumption that the bank account was Mrs. Swan's separate property. Stats.1909, p. 87, as amended by Stats. 1925, p. 512, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 652.

[1, 2] Considering first the contentions of the appellants relative to the sufficiency of the complaint, the allegation that the transfers from W. W. Swan to his wife and daughter "were made in trust," they now hold the property "in trust" for him and that the "actual, equitable and beneficial ownership" of the property is in him sufficiently pleads an express trust for his benefit. Knapp v. Knapp, 15 Cal.2d 237, 100 P.2d 759. Under modern rules of pleading, general allegations of ownership are sufficient. South San Bernardino, etc., Co. v. San Bernardino Nat. Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 P. 699; Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029.

[3, 4] But the fifth count falls far short of stating a cause of action. A constructive trust does not arise upon the transfer of property from a husband to a wife without consideration. Under section 440 of the Restatement of the Law of Trusts, "Where a transfer of property is made to one person and the purchase price is paid by another, a resulting trust arises in favor of the person by whom the purchase price is paid, except as stated in sections 441, 442, and 444." Section 442 reads: "Where a transfer of property is made to one person and the purchase price is paid by another and the transferee is a wife, child or other natural object of bounty of the person by whom the purchase price is paid, a resulting trust does not arise unless the latter manifests an intention that the transferee should not have the beneficial interest in the property." "The fact that the transferee is a wife, child or other natural object of bounty of the payor is more than merely a circumstance tending to rebut the inference of a resulting trust. It is of itself a circumstance sufficient to raise an inference that a gift was intended, and the burden is upon the payor seeking to enforce a resulting trust to prove that he did not intend to make a gift to the transferee." (Comment b.) California cases supporting this rule include Quinn v. Reilly, 198 Cal. 465, 245 P. 1091; Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 285, 152 P. 913; Lezinsky v. Mason Malt Whiskey Distilling Co., 185 Cal. 240, 196 P. 884; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 P. 321, 66 P. 860; Rhea v. Thomson, 115 Cal.App. 466, 1 P.2d 1091; Daniel v. Sisnero, 109 Cal.App. 8, 292 P. 518; Rossiter v. Schultz, 43 Cal.App. 716, 185 P. 997. To state a cause of action attacking a transfer made by a husband to his wife upon the theory of a resulting trust, one must allege either that he intended to create a trust or that he intended that the wife should not have the beneficial interest in the property. Quinn v. Reilly, supra.

[5] The only evidence tending to prove the allegations of the fourth cause of action is that (1) $648.50 from the salary checks of W. W. Swan was deposited in the savings account of Mrs. Swan, and (2) the conditional sales contract evidencing the agreement to pay the $400 balance on the Oldsmobile was signed by him; and (3) the payments on the conditional sales contract were credited to W. W. Swan by the assignee of the contract. But disregarding the testimony of Mrs. Swan and her witnesses, from which the court might well have concluded that the money in the bank account and the automobile were her separate property, the evidence presented by the respondents does not prove that Mr. Swan owned property which he transferred to his wife and daughter without consideration.

In the first place, he made no transfer to his daughter. But of more importance is the fact that the evidence does not even suggest that he ever had any separate property. On the other hand, the respondents concede that, in 1924, he gave his wife the $6,250 which he received as a reward, and they do not attack her testimony concerning the gifts of money from her brother. So, unquestionably, she acquired a substantial amount of separate property. If some of Mr. Swan's earnings were deposited in the bank account or paid on the automobile, there was no transfer of his money or property; at most, there was a commingling of a small amount of community property with the wife's separate property. Under such circumstances, the court might have found that $648.50 and an undivided interest in the automobile are the community property of Mr. and Mrs. Swan. But there is no evidence whatever to support the findings of transfers by Mr. Swan of his property to his wife in trust for his benefit.

[6, 7] Upon proper pleadings and evidence a creditor may reach the community property, with the exception of the wife's earnings, to satisfy the debts of the husband. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L.R.A. 497, 58 Am.St.Rep. 170; Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308; Lesser v. Pomin, 3 Cal.App.2d 117, 39 P.2d 451; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Drew, 48 Cal. App. 442, 192 P. 105; Civ.Code, § 168. But to uphold the judgment upon the theory that it subjects community property to the payment of the judgment would allow a recovery upon a cause of action not pleaded by the creditors and against which the appellants have not had an opportunity to defend.

The judgment is reversed.

BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

L. A. 18340.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 11, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 10, 1942.

1. Judgment 🔑203

There can be but one judgment in an action no matter how many counts the complaint contains.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1201(1)

Where a judgment is reversed, on retrial the parties have the same right to apply for permission to amend as though the judgment had never been entered and reversed.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1201(1)

After reversal of judgment of dismissal, limited only by any direction contained in the order of reversal, the trial court has the same power over the complaint as if no judgment of dismissal had been entered.

4. Pleading 🔑218(5)

Where trial court enters an order sustaining a demurrer, the trial court, at any time prior to final judgment, may reconsider its ruling on the demurrer and it may do so even though no request to amend has been made.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1195(1), 1201(1)

Determination of appellate court in reversing judgment of dismissal became the "law of the case" and the trial court was bound thereby, but subject only to that limitation, the trial court had complete power to allow amendment to pleadings or reconsider and change its ruling on demurrer at any time before entry of judgment.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Law of the Case".

6. Appeal and error ⚷1201(6)

Where appellate court held that first and second counts of complaint did not state a cause of action, and that trial court did not commit error in refusing to grant leave to plaintiff to amend those counts, but that court erred in sustaining demurrer to third and fourth counts and reversed judgment of dismissal with leave to file an amended complaint, the trial court acted within its jurisdiction in permitting amendment to first and second counts supplying the elements for lack of which such counts had been held to be defective by the appellate court.

7. Appeal and error ⚷1216

Where appellate court held that first and second counts of complaint did not state a cause of action and that trial court did not commit error in refusing to grant leave to plaintiff to amend those counts, but that the third and fourth counts stated a good cause of action and reversed judgment of dismissal with leave to amend, even if trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in permitting amendment to the first and second counts, certiorari would not lie to annul its order permitting amendment.

8. Appeal and error ⚷1216

An order of trial court granting leave to amend while not directly appealable is subject to review on appeal from final judgment, and therefore cannot be reviewed in certiorari proceeding.

9. Certiorari ⚷5(1)

Certiorari will not lie if the effect of the order sought to be annulled can be reviewed and annulled on an appeal from final judgment, even though the order itself is not appealable.

In Bank.

Certiorari proceeding by Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to review an order permitting an amendment of a complaint.

Order affirmed.

PETERS, Justice pro tem.

Petitioner, one of the defendants in an action pending in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, seeks, by this proceeding in certiorari, to annul an order of the superior court permitting the plaintiffs in that action to amend the first two causes of action set forth in their complaint. The facts constituting the background of this proceeding are as follows:

In 1935, Aronson et al. filed an action against petitioner charging that in a series of transactions it had converted certain shares of stock belonging to plaintiffs. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and a judgment of dismissal entered. This judgment was affirmed by this court in October of 1937. Aronson v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 9 Cal.2d 640, 72 P.2d 548. In November of 1936, before the affirmance above referred to, the same plaintiffs instituted another action against the petitioner and others, based upon the same transactions, by the filing of a complaint containing four counts. The bank demurred to this complaint as a whole and as to each count, generally and specially. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and subsequently denied plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend. The demurrer was not sustained as to each count, but as to the complaint as a whole, the order reading that the demurrer of the bank "to amended complaint, sustained without leave to amend." Subsequently, a judgment of dismissal as to the bank was duly entered. Plaintiffs appealed from that judgment to the District Court of Appeal, and, in due course, in January of 1941, the appellate court rendered its decision (Aronson v. Bank of America, 42 Cal.App.2d 710 at page 721, 109 P.2d 1001, at page 1007) reversing the judgment, the order reading: "The judgment of dismissal is therefore reversed with directions to the trial court to grant appellants leave to file an amended complaint if they are so advised."

Upon the return of the cause to the trial court the plaintiffs moved for leave to file amendments to the first and second counts of their complaint. Over the objection of petitioner that the court had no jurisdiction, and that to grant such motion violated the law of the case as set forth in the appellate court opinion, the trial court granted the motion. Petitioner thereupon instituted the present proceeding in certiorari for the purpose of annulling the order granting leave to amend.

The basic question presented is, whether the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in granting permission to plaintiffs to amend the complaint as to the first two counts. The answer to that question turns first, upon ascertaining just what the appellate court decided, and second, upon determining what legal effect the judgment of reversal had upon the power and jurisdiction of the trial court.

An examination of the appellate court decision discloses that the court held that the third and fourth counts set forth in the complaint stated a cause of action against the bank, but that counts one and two did not. In holding that the first two counts did not state a cause of action against the bank, the appellate court predicated its decision on the law stated by the Supreme Court in the prior appeal to the effect that an indispensable element of the cause of action was knowledge on the part of the bank as to what disposition the defaulting administrators intended to make of the converted stock, and the appellate court held that, since these two counts of the complaint (and the amendments contained in the request to amend) contained no such allegation, no cause of action was stated. Speaking of these two counts the appellate court stated (42 Cal.App.2d at page 716, 109 P.2d at page 1005):

"The important factor is knowledge on the part of the bank as to what disposition was to be made of the proceeds received on the transfer and whether any proceeds were to be forthcoming. As to this the complaint is silent and fails to show that the bank in question had any knowledge at the time of the transfers that the administrators intended to apply the stock or the proceeds of the transfer to their own use and benefit or to the benefit of any third party, or that, at the time, the bank was in possession of such facts as to amount to notice of any such plan or purpose.

"Since the transfers complained of in the first and second counts of appellants' complaint occurred before distribution of the estate was decreed and since appellants have failed to charge the predecessor bank with the requisite knowledge of a wrongful purpose on the part of the administrators, those two counts still fall within the rule laid down in Aronson v. Bank of America, supra, and for the reasons there given the said counts fail to state a cause of action against respondent bank."

The court then considered the third and fourth counts of the complaint, and held that those counts stated a good cause of action against the bank. It then stated (42 Cal.App.2d at page 721, 109 P.2d at page 1007):

"It should be mentioned in passing that the complaint is far from a model of pleading and is in no sense concise. It is clear, however, that no attempt has been made to set out more than one cause of action in each count.

"In view of the fact that the allegations of the first and second counts of the complaint reveal a situation wherein no cause of action would lie against respondent bank or its predecessor the trial court did not err in refusing to grant leave to plaintiffs to amend those counts, but for the reasons above given the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the third and fourth counts and in dismissing the action."

The amendments allowed by the trial court to be filed to the first two counts incorporated the very allegations for lack of which these counts were held defective by the appellate court.

[1] It is the theory of petitioner that, after the reversal, the trial court had jurisdiction for the sole purpose, so far as permitting amendments to the pleadings was concerned, to allow the third and fourth counts to be amended, and was without jurisdiction to permit the first two counts to be amended. This contention is predicated on the arguments that petitioner demurred generally to each count separately; that it was entitled to a separate ruling on each count; that the effect of sustaining the demurrer to a single count is the same whether the complaint contains one count or many counts; that the decision of the appellate court holding that the trial court had properly sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, so far as the first two counts are concerned, would have finally disposed of those counts had they been the only counts of the complaint; that the legal effect of the decision is not altered by the fact that the pleading contained additional counts held to be sufficient; that the appellate court order reversing the judgment of dismissal in legal effect amounted to an affirmance of the order sustaining the demurrer as to the first two counts, and a reversal of that order only as to the last two counts. These arguments are all predicated upon a fundamental fallacy. They assume that there can be a piecemeal disposition of the several counts of a complaint. They assume, when there is more than one count in a complaint, and a demurrer is interposed and sustained, and a judgment of dismissal entered, that there are as many separate judgments as there are counts in the complaint. That is not the law. There cannot be a separate judgment as to one count in a complaint containing several counts. On the contrary, there can be but one judgment in an action no matter how many counts the complaint contains. (De Vally v. Kendall de Vally O. Co., Ltd., 220 Cal. 742, 32 P.2d 638; Mather v. Mather, 5 Cal.2d 617, 55 P.2d 1174; Potvin v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, Inc., 130 Cal.App. 510, 20 P.2d 129. In the De Vally case, supra, a demurrer was sustained and a judgment entered dismissing two counts of a four-count complaint. The court held that the judgment was premature, and dismissed the appeal from it, and stated (220 Cal. at page 745, 32 P.2d at page 639): "Although the matter is not mentioned by counsel for either side, it appears that the court should not have given a judgment herein until the final disposition of the entire cause. The law contemplates but one final judgment in a cause. As stated in the case of Nolan v. Smith, 137 Cal. 360, 361, 70 P. 166, quoting from Stockton, etc., Works v. Glen's Falls Ins. Co., 98 Cal. [557], 577, 33 P. 633: 'There can be but one final judgment in an action, and that is one which, in effect, ends the suit in the court in which it was entered, and finally determines the rights of the parties in relation to the matter in controversy.'" This language was approved in the Potvin case, supra, where the court said (130 Cal.App. at page 512, 20 P.2d at page 130): "Since a final judgment in an action contemplates a complete adjudication of the rights of the parties and a final determination of the matter in controversy, it is apparent that the so-called judgment rendered upon the sustaining of a demurrer to one cause of action of a complaint without leave to amend, leaving five other causes of action unimpaired presenting matters to be litigated during a trial of the issues of fact, cannot be regarded as a final determination and disposal of the cause."

[2-4] The only judgment here entered was a judgment of dismissal and that judgment was reversed. What was the legal effect of such reversal? It is well settled that when a judgment is reversed, on retrial the parties have the same right to apply for permission to amend as though the judgment had never been entered and reversed. Ellis v. Witmer, 148 Cal. 528, 83 P. 800; Armstrong v. Adams, 102 Cal. App. 677, 283 P. 871; First Nat. Bank v. Stansbury, 118 Cal.App. 80, 5 P.2d 13. In other words, after the judgment of reversal here, limited only by any direction contained in the order of reversal, the trial court had the same power over the complaint as if no judgment of dismissal had ever been entered. It is the same as if the trial court had entered an order sustaining the demurrer (no judgment of dismissal having been entered) and the plaintiff requested leave to amend. The law is well settled that in such a situation the trial court, at any time prior to final judgment, may reconsider its ruling on the demurrer, and this is so even though no request to amend has been made. See cases collected 21 Cal.Jur. p. 124, § 80; People v. Lucas, 78 Cal.App. 421, 248 P. 691; Frantz v. Mallen, 204 Cal. 159, 267 P. 314; Howe v. Board of Supervisors, 118 Cal.App. 306, 5 P.2d 28.

[5] Of course, what was said in the opinion of the appellate court in reversing the judgment became the law of the case, and the trial court was bound thereby. But, subject only to that limitation, the trial court had complete power to allow amendments to the pleading, or to reconsider and change its ruling on demurrer, at any time before entry of judgment.

Petitioner, in apparent recognition of these principles, urges that the appellate court ruled the first counts did not and could not be amended to state a cause of action, and that such ruling is binding as the law of the case. It urges that the court held that the first two counts were "incurably defective." The appellate court made no such ruling. As is clearly indicated from the quotations, supra, it held that the complaint before it, and the amendments then offered, so far as the first two counts were concerned, did not state a cause of action; that such counts, or the proposed amendments, were defective in that knowledge on the part of the bank was not alleged; that the demurrer was properly sustained to those two counts without leave to amend. The amendments permitted to be filed by the order here sought to be annulled supplied the very elements for lack of which the counts were held to be defective by the appellate court.

[6-9] It follows from what has been said that the trial court acted well within its jurisdiction in permitting the challenged amendments to be filed. Even were this not so, and had the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in permitting the amendments to be filed, certiorari would not lie to annul its order. This is so because the order granting leave to amend, while not directly appealable, is subject to review on appeal from the final judgment. Collins v. Bridge Investment Co., 20 Cal.2d 52, 123 P.2d 436. Certiorari will not lie if the effect of the order sought to be annulled can be reviewed and nullified on an appeal from the final judgment, even though the order itself is not appealable. Hughson v. Superior Court, 120 Cal.App. 658, 8 P.2d 227; Booth v. Superior Court, 81 Cal.App. 709, 254 P. 617; Manoogian v. Superior Court, 48 Cal.App. 609, 192 P. 168; Postal, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal.App. 770, 136 P. 538; Bryant v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.App.2d 556, 61 P. 2d 483. The rule of these cases is sound, and is in no way qualified by Bottoms v. Superior Court, 82 Cal.App. 764, 256 P. 422, or Stanton v. Superior Court, 202 Cal. 478, 261 P. 1001, relied upon by petitioner. In the Bottoms case a petition for hearing was denied, the order reciting that such denial was made "on the sole ground that the question * * * has become moot." 82 Cal.App. at page 778, 256 P. 422. In the Stanton case, supra, there was no proceeding by which the order could be reviewed on appeal. The decision was so explained in Ivory v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.2d 455, at page 460, 85 P.2d 894.

Petitioner argues that the rule is here inapplicable because a review and nullification of the order on appeal from the final judgment would not be a plain, speedy and adequate remedy. It is urged that unless certiorari is permitted it will allow the plaintiffs, as the unsuccessful party to the prior appeal so far as the first two counts are concerned, to return to the trial court, start in all over again, and compel petitioner, as the prevailing party as to those two counts, to submit to a trial and await the final outcome before obtaining redress for the unwarranted reopening of the litigation. If such action is here permitted, says the petitioner, every lawsuit could be perpetual. It is therefore argued that substantial justice requires that relief be afforded by certiorari.

This argument is unsound for several reasons. It is predicated upon an unsound interpretation of the appellate court opinion. Moreover, it would apply in some degree in every case where a trial court erroneously overruled a demurrer and compelled a defendant to proceed to trial. No one would contend that such order could be reviewed on certiorari. Moreover, the argument assumes that it is proper to dispose of some of the counts of the complaint by a final judgment, prior to a trial on the other counts. This would sanction more than one final judgment in the action. As has already been pointed out, there can be but one final judgment regardless of the number of counts in the complaint.

From what has been said, it follows that petitioner must fail in its attempt to annul the order here involved, first, because the trial court had jurisdiction to make the order, and second because, even if it exceeded its jurisdiction, certiorari does not lie to review an order of the nature here involved. For these reasons the order sought to be reviewed is affirmed.

SEEBURG v. EL ROYALE CORPORATION.

Civ. 13352.

District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 3, California.

Aug. 12, 1942.

1. Corporations 🔑442

An option to purchase apartment house from corporation was not void because consent of corporation's stockholders was not obtained, as required by statute for corporation to dispose of all or substantially all of its property. Civ.Code, § 343.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(4)

An option to purchase apartment house was not invalidated by restraining order and temporary injunction restraining optionor from selling such property until time after expiration of option.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18

An "option" to purchase property is not a sale of property, but a sale of right to purchase it or a right acquired by contract to accept or reject a present offer within limited or reasonable time in future.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Option".

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(3)

On acceptance of option to purchase land by optionee, option becomes a sale contract binding on both parties, but new contract is not made.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18

An option to purchase land vests in optionee right or privilege of acquiring interest in land and, when accepted, entitles him to call for specific performance by optionor.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(3)

The right of one having option to purchase land to acquire interest therein, when exercised, relates back to time of giving option, so as to cut off intervening rights acquired with knowledge of option.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(4)

Where one granted option to purchase apartment house did not give optionor written notice of optionee's election to exercise option, nor deposit agreed sum in escrow on account of purchase price, as required by option contract to entitle him to conveyance of property, he had no right to rescind contract and recover amount paid for option because of optionor's temporary inability to convey in consequence of temporary injunction restraining optionor from selling property until time after expiration of option.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by Justus P. Seeburg against the El Royale Corporation to recover an amount paid by plaintiff for an option to purchase an apartment house. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit rendered against him. On the 27th day of March, 1940, the defendant, being then the owner of a certain apartment house, entered into an agreement with plaintiff whereby it granted to him the "sole and exclusive right and option to purchase" that apartment house, for a price and on terms and conditions therein set forth. Plaintiff paid defendant for this option the sum of $5,000, which was not to be a part of the price if the option should be exercised. The option ran to and including April 27, 1940, and in order to exercise it plaintiff was required to give defendant a written notice and deposit $25,000 in escrow on account of the price. Each party was to have thirty days after this was done "to do and perform each and every act on their respective parts to be performed to consummate said sale." On the 2d day of April, 1940, in an action commenced by one Keeler against defendant—to which plaintiff here was not a party—in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, an order to show cause and temporary restraining order were made restraining the defendant "from selling or otherwise disposing of" the apartment house. This restraining order continued in force until, after a hearing on the order to show cause, a temporary injunction of the same purport was issued. This temporary injunction was effective until after the expiration of the above-mentioned period of plaintiff's option, and thereafter, on June 3, 1940, by stipulation of the parties to that action, a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant therein, by which the temporary injunction was dissolved. The plaintiff did not at any time do any of the acts required by the terms of the option for an exercise thereof. He was, however, financially able to do so, and was ready and willing to do so, had it not been for the restraining order and injunction. Before beginning this action he demanded of defendant the return of the sum of $5,000 which he paid for the option, but his demand was not complied with and he now sues to recover that sum.

[1] Plaintiff's action is brought on the theory that the option was or became nugatory, for various reasons, and hence the consideration for his payment of $5,000 failed, and that for that reason he is entitled to rescind and has rescinded the option agreement and may recover what he paid for it. Some claim was made in the injunction suit that the option was void because the consent of defendant's stockholders had not been obtained, as required by section 343 of the Civil Code, where a corporation undertakes to "sell, lease, convey, exchange, transfer or otherwise dispose of all or substantially all of its property and assets." This claim is repeated here by plaintiff. The facts necessary to support it are not alleged in the complaint nor do they otherwise appear in the record, except in a copy of the files in the injunction suit, which was admitted in evidence. Some, at least, of the facts necessary to show failure of the defendant corporation to comply with section 343 were pleaded by Keeler in his complaint in that action and admitted by defendant in its answer thereto. We doubt if this entitles us to consider this point. It was not pleaded as a basis of plaintiff's action, nor does it appear that the issue was tried by consent without a pleading, for the files of the injunction case were placed in evidence for quite a different purpose from that of showing the truth of facts alleged or admitted by the pleadings therein. But if the point is before us it is decided adversely to plaintiff in Bradford v. Sunset Land & Water Company, 1916, 30 Cal.App. 87, 157 P. 20. We must regard the option as entirely valid at the time it was made.

[2] Plaintiff's case, in all its other aspects, is founded on the assumption that the option was in some fashion invalidated by the restraining order and temporary injunction, so that it was of no further force after the order was made. No authority is cited for this assumption, and we think it is not tenable under the circumstances of this case.

[3-6] An option is not a sale of property, but a sale of a right to purchase. Hicks v. Christeson, 1917, 174 Cal. 712, 716, 164 P. 395. "Or, stated in another form, it is a right 'acquired by contract to accept or reject a present offer, within a limited or reasonable time in the future.'" Menzel v. Primm, 1907, 6 Cal.App. 204, 209, 91 P. 754, 756. On acceptance the option becomes a contract of sale binding on both parties. 66 Corpus Juris 505; Smith v. Post, 1914, 167 Cal. 69, 74, 138 P. 705; Rheingans v. Smith, 1911, 161 Cal. 362, 367, 119 P. 494, Ann.Cas.1913B, 1140; Cushing v. Levi, 1931, 117 Cal.App. 94, 104, 3 P.2d 958; Menzel v. Primm, supra. This does not mean, however, that a new contract is in fact made by and at the time of the acceptance. The contract has already been made, as far as the optioner is concerned, but it is subject to conditions which are removed by the acceptance. Were this not so, an option could never be enforced where the optionor died during the period allowed for exercise of the option and before its actual exercise, for dead men can make no contracts. And yet it is held that an option for which a consideration has been given can be enforced in such a case. Mueller v. Nortmann, 1903, 116 Wis. 468, 93 N.W. 538, 96 Am.St.Rep. 997; Rockland-Rockport Lime Co. v. Leary, 1911, 203 N.Y. 469, 97 N.E. 43, L.R.A.1916F, 352, Ann. Cas.1913B, 62. As stated in Smith v. Bangham, 1909, 156 Cal. 359, 365, 104 P. 689, 692, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 522, "* * * the option vests in the grantee the right or privilege of acquiring an interest in the land, and, when accepted, entitles him to call for specific performance. [citing cases.] Such right, when exercised, must necessarily relate back to the time of giving the option (People's St. Ry. Co. v. Spencer, supra [156 Pa. 85, 27 A. 113, 36 Am.St. Rep. 22]), so as to cut off intervening rights acquired with knowledge of the existence of the option."

This is a proper case for the application of the rule just quoted. The plaintiff here was not a party to the injunction suit and his rights could not be affected by any order or injunction made therein. He had a right existing when the injunction suit was filed, which, when exercised, would ripen into a contract of sale. The plaintiff in that action, Keeler, had notice of such right. If plaintiff had exercised his right after the injunction, the contract so arising would have related back to the time of giving the option, and hence would not have been void by reason of the restraining order or the injunction, assuming, but not deciding, that a contract made in violation of such an order or of an injunction is void. If the injunction should be held to prevent the execution of a deed by defendant in performance of the contract, that would not affect the option, as such, and the parties would be in the same situation as in any other case where one party to a contract is prevented, by causes beyond his control, from performing it.

[7] However, even if plaintiff had, before the injunction suit, made a binding contract of purchase and sale, he could not now complain of defendant's inability to make a conveyance without tendering full performance on his part. See Lloyd v. Locke-Paddon Land Company, 1935, 5 Cal. App.2d 211, 42 P.2d 367; also Dennis v. Strassburger, 1891, 89 Cal. 583, 26 P. 1070, where it was held that a vendee of real property who had paid part of the price could not rescind the contract and recover what he had paid, by reason of the vendor's inability to convey a clear title, without tendering the balance of the purchase price and demanding his deed. In Laffey v. Kaufman, 1901, 134 Cal. 391, 66 P. 471, 86 Am.St.Rep. 283, and Walbridge v. Richards, 1931, 212 Cal. 408, 414, 298 P. 971, it was held that even where the contract was oral, but it did not appear that the vendor was objecting to it on that ground, the vendee could not rescind and recover what he had paid without showing that he had paid, or offered to pay, the full consideration and had been met with a refusal or inability to convey.

These principles were applied to the case of an option in Bradford v. Sunset Land, etc., Company, supra, 1916, 30 Cal.App. 87, 90, 157 P. 20, 21, where defendant corporation had executed to plaintiff a document which the court characterized as "an option to purchase the property therein described." It provided for payment of the price by installments on specified dates, the only acts necessary to an exercise of the option by plaintiff being the making of the payments as specified, but contained no agreement by plaintiff to make them. Plaintiff paid part of the price and then sued to recover it, claiming that the option agreement was void because it had not been approved by two-thirds of the stockholders of defendant corporation, as required in certain cases by section 361a of the Civil Code then in force. The court held that section 361a, which by its terms was limited to a sale, transfer or conveyance of the property, did not apply to plaintiff's "mere option to purchase." With this proposition established, it is obvious, although the court did not expressly so declare, that noncompliance with the code section cited would not render the option void, but would merely prevent the defendant there from making a valid conveyance when called upon to do so. The court there said, "Until plaintiff performed or offered to perform the covenants imposed upon him as a precedent condition to the conveyance of the property by defendant, he was in no position to complain of the want of the action on the part of stockholders in giving assent to a sale and conveyance as to which, under the terms of the contract, he had lost all right. * * * [T]he contract * * * was a mere option to purchase, the exercise of which on the part of plaintiff and paying or offering to pay the purchase price in the manner therein specified was necessary in order to place him in a position where he could in any event complain of the failure of stockholders to signify assent." Applying this rule here, it appears that plaintiff has done none of the acts which, by the option contract, were required of him to entitle him to a conveyance of the land by defendant. He has therefore shown no right to rescind on account of defendant's temporary inability to convey.

Plaintiff cites Burks v. Davies, 1890, 85 Cal. 110, 24 P. 613, 614, 20 Am.St.Rep. 213, as opposed to the conclusion just stated. There the plaintiff had paid to the defendant $1,000 under an option to buy land, which sum, had the purchase been completed, would have been a part of the price. It turned out that defendant did not own all the land covered by the option, that plaintiff did not know this fact but defendant did, and that defendant also knew that plaintiff was ignorant of it but failed to inform him. On learning of this defect in defendant's title plaintiff rescinded and was allowed to recover the money he had paid, although he had never tendered further performance on his part. The case is distinguishable on this ground: there the optionor was required to make conveyance at any time within the option period of thirty days, on acceptance of the option, and was therefore, as the court held, "bound to be prepared at all times within the thirty days to convey a good title." That this is the real ground of the decision is declared in Backman v. Park, 1910, 157 Cal. 607, 612, 613, 108 P. 686, 137 Am.St. Rep. 153. Here the plaintiff's option allowed the defendant thirty days after acceptance to comply with the terms of the option; and while the injunction was not actually dissolved until after the option period and also this thirty days had passed, there is nothing to show that this could not have been accomplished sooner, or that, if plaintiff had accepted the option, defendant could not have complied with the agreement within the time limit. Moreover, the remarks of the court in Burks v. Davies, supra, on which plaintiff mainly relies seem inconsistent with this statement of the court in Joyce v. Shafer, 1893, 97 Cal. 335, 338, 32 P. 320, which was quoted and approved in Hanson v. Fox, 1909, 155 Cal. 106, 108, 99 P. 489, 490, 20 L.R.A.,N.S., 338, 132 Am.St.Rep. 72: "One may sell land which he does not own, and yet be able when the time of performance arrives to furnish a good title. In the meantime the purchaser would not be at liberty to disaffirm the contract on the ground that then the vendor was unable to make a good title. It would be incumbent on him to offer to perform, or to show that at the time of performance the vendor could not furnish the title." Burks v. Davies, supra, is also out of line with the following statement of the court in Brimmer v. Salisbury, 1914, 167 Cal. 522, 530, 140 P. 30, 34, made after a review of many decisions on the subject: "This completes the review of our decisions, and, to summarize, they hold, first, that a contract to sell a piece of land by one without title will not be held fraudulent and void by virtue of the mere fact that the vendor had not such title. Deceit, concealment, or false representations upon which a vendee was entitled to rely will of course avoid such a contract * * *." The last sentence just quoted suggests a ground on which the decision in Burks v. Davies, supra, might well have rested, that is, concealment by defendant. This is mentioned in the opinion, but not much stress is laid on it. We do not regard this case as controlling authority here.

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑297

Evidence that when transfer was made transferor had no reason to anticipate liability resulting in judgment upon which plaintiff relied and had ample funds and property to pay all liabilities which could then be reasonably contemplated sustained judgment denying relief on ground that transferor was not insolvent at time of transfer and did not thereby render herself insolvent.

Where party to whom personalty was transferred more than 2½ years before action was filed to set aside prior transfer of the personalty to his transferor as having been made in contemplation of insolvency and in fraud of creditors was not made a party to such action, judgment creditor maintaining such action could not be given a lien upon the transferred property to the extent necessary to cover his judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Action by M. W. Kains against Abbie J. Jones and others to set aside the transfer of certain personal property as having been made in contemplation of insolvency and in fraud of creditors. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Aubrey Devine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dempster McKee, of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to set aside the transfer of certain personal property as having been made in contemplation of insolvency and in fraud of creditors.

The background of the action may be briefly stated as follows: In 1910, a predecessor of the plaintiff leased certain real property in San Diego to one Fulkerson for a term expiring in 1936. A theater was conducted on the premises and after three assignments the lessee's interest came into the hands of G. A. and K. G. Bush. In December, 1930, they assigned the lease to Alice N. Bush as security for a debt they owed her. They were, respectively, the husband and father-in-law of Alice N. Bush who is the mother of Abbie J. Jones, the other defendant in this action.

On October 20, 1934, Alice N. Bush reassigned the lease to G. A. and K. G. Bush. All rentals due under the lease up to that time had been paid in full and a theater enterprise which for many years had been conducted on the premises by G. A. and K. G. Bush was still yielding a very substantial profit. Later, the business became unprofitable and in June, 1936, the landlord recovered a judgment for $5,960 against Fulkerson, G. A. Bush, K. G. Bush and Alice N. Bush, that judgment covering two months' rent and some $4,000 for unpaid taxes.

In the meantime, and in November, 1934, Alice N. Bush transferred without consideration the personal property here in question to Abbie Jean Jones. Thereafter, and in March, 1937, Abbie Jean Jones transferred this personal property to one G. C. Parker.

This action, to set aside the transfer of November, 1934, from Alice N. Bush to Abbie Jean Jones, was filed on October 16, 1939. The court found in all respects in favor of the defendants with the exception that it found that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations. Among other things, the court found that at the time of the transfer Alice N. Bush was not indebted to the landlord under the lease; that she was not then insolvent and did not thereby render herself insolvent; that the transfer was not made in contemplation of insolvency; and that at the time of the transfer she had funds and property sufficient to pay all of the outstanding liabilities which she could with reason contemplate. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment which followed.

One of appellant's main contentions is that the finding to the effect that Alice N. Bush was not indebted under this lease is without support in the evidence and in the law. It is contended that she became liable for future rentals under the lease by accepting a transfer thereof although she did not sign the assignment, and that the judgment obtained against her in the prior action is conclusive in this action although Abbie Jean Jones, the principal defendant here, was not a party to that suit. While a number of interesting legal points are raised in this connection it is unnecessary to consider or decide them because of other findings which are supported by the evidence. Assuming, but not holding, that appellant's contentions in this regard could be upheld the finding here attacked becomes immaterial in view of the other facts found.

[1] The finding that Mrs. Bush did not make the transfer in contemplation of insolvency is supported by the evidence that the payments under the lease were not then in default, that the business being conducted on the leased premises was then yielding the same substantial profit it had long been paying, that the subsequent breach of the lease was caused by events which occurred many months after the transfer in question, and that she then had ample funds and property to pay all of her liabilities which could then be reasonably contemplated. With respect to the latter finding, while the appellant relies upon certain conflicting evidence, competent evidence is in the record which, if believed, discloses that at the time of making these transfers Alice N. Bush possessed other real and personal property of the value of $11,500, after making due allowance for an exemption of $5,000 on account of a homestead filed by her upon one of the real properties.

The evidence supports the court's findings with respect to insolvency and those findings alone are sufficient to support the judgment.

[2] A further consideration is that the evidence shows without conflict that the property, the transfer of which was here sought to be set aside, had been transferred to G. C. Parker more than 2½ years before this action was filed. Parker was not made a party to this action and it is difficult to see how, in his absence, the appellant could have been given a lien upon the transferred property to the extent necessary to cover his prior judgment, as prayed for in the complaint. See Cook v. Huntley, 44 Cal.App.2d 635, 112 P.2d 889.

The judgment is affirmed.

EUSTACE v. DECHTER et al.

Civ. 12976.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.
July 31, 1942.

1. Release 🔑57(1, 2)

Evidence failed to establish that release of all claims against parties who instituted involuntary bankruptcy proceedings against plaintiff in consideration of such parties' dismissing the bankruptcy proceedings was executed by plaintiff because of duress or without consideration, so as to authorize plaintiff to avoid release.

2. Release 🔑21

Where release of claims against parties who instituted involuntary bankruptcy proceedings against plaintiff was executed in consideration of such parties' dismissing the bankruptcy proceedings, evidence that plaintiff accepted benefits accruing through subsequent dismissal of the bankruptcy proceedings and that she made no attempt to rescind release until filing of an action on a claim arising out of the bankruptcy proceedings more than a year thereafter established a failure to comply with statute requiring prompt action, and hence did not authorize avoidance of the release. Civ.Code, § 1691.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1040(2)

Where a release executed by plaintiff would have constituted a complete defense to cause of action attempted to be stated in second count of complaint, sustaining of demurrer to such count without leave to amend, if erroneous, was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

4. Malicious prosecution 🔑55

In order to maintain a malicious prosecution action, plaintiff must allege and affirmatively prove malice and want of probable cause of defendant in instituting the proceeding which was made the basis of the action and that such proceeding has been finally determined in favor of plaintiff.

5. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(5)

Where a person is charged before a competent court having jurisdiction and is found guilty, judgment rendered, unless it is shown to have been obtained by fraud, is conclusive evidence of "probable cause" so as to serve as a defense in malicious prosecution action, even though judgment is reversed on appeal.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Probable Cause".

6. Malicious prosecution 🔑35(2)

Where judgment of Federal District Court finding plaintiff guilty of contempt was reversed because contempt proceeding was ancillary to a bankruptcy proceeding which had been dismissed by mutual consent on compromise of conflicting claims, termination of contempt proceeding so procured did not make it a basis for a malicious prosecution action.

7. Appeal and error 🔑224

Where plaintiff did not attack motion to vacate default of one of defendants in trial court on ground that notice of motion was defective, but joined in a stipulation as to various facts which were presented to trial court on the hearing, objection that notice of the motion was defective would not be considered when presented for first time on appeal. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

8. Appeal and error 🔑707(1)

Where record did not purport to include all of the records on file in the action which were referred to in the notice of motion to vacate default filed by defendant as the basis thereof, and did not certify that it contained all of the evidence which was before trial court, appellate court could not determine whether trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting motion of defendant to vacate default, although motion was not supported by such defendant's affidavit, and although copy of his proposed answer tendered on hearing of motion did not purport to be verified, where trial court, in light of verified answers of other defendants, which answers were included among papers specified in the notice of motion as a basis thereof, might well have concluded that such defendant had a meritorious defense. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

10. Appeal and error ⚷901

The burden was upon plaintiff to establish affirmatively error in trial court's granting motion of one of defendants to vacate default, and appellate court could not indulge presumptions in favor of error and predicate a reversal thereon. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

11. Release ⚷56

A release of all claims against parties who instituted involuntary bankruptcy proceeding against plaintiff which was executed in consideration of such parties' dismissing the bankruptcy proceeding was not a "general release", and hence evidence that plaintiff would not have signed the release had she known then that she had a cause of action against such parties for malicious prosecution was not admissible to avoid bar created by release. Civ.Code, § 1542.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "General Release".

12. Release ⚷30

Where release of claims against parties who instituted involuntary bankruptcy proceedings against plaintiff stated that plaintiff released certain named parties "and any and all other persons heretofore connected with said bankruptcy proceeding", release was operative as a bar to a malicious prosecution action arising out of the bankruptcy proceeding against parties not specifically named in release.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald and Clarence M. Hanson, Judges.

Action by Katie M. Eustace against Raphael Dechter and others for malicious prosecution. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Edmund Gattone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Raphael Dechter, B. L. Hoyt, Owen E. Kupfer, and Irving B. Drachlis, all of Los Angeles, and L. Donald St. Clair, of Redondo Beach, for respondents.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

This action, as well as related litigation arising from the same basic facts, has previously occupied the attention of appellate courts (see Eustace v. Lynch, 9 Cir. (1935), 80 F.2d 652; Eustace v. Dechter (1938), 28 Cal.App.2d 706, 83 P.2d 523; Eustace v. Lynch, (1941), 43 Cal.App.2d 486, 111 P.2d 372). The present appeal is by plaintiff from a judgment for defendants in a malicious prosecution action. The sixth amended complaint was framed in two counts. In the first count plaintiff avers that "defendants * * * maliciously and without probable cause, conspired and agreed among themselves and with each other to institute, and did institute an involuntary petition in bankruptcy against plaintiff, charging plaintiff, among other matters, with being insolvent and a bankrupt * * *." It is not contended that a cause of action is not stated in this count. In Count II plaintiff adopts all the allegations of Count I and in addition thereto sets up allegations to the effect that defendants "maliciously and without probable cause" caused a contempt citation against plaintiff to be issued out of the United States District Court. It is further therein alleged: "That said order to show cause [contempt citation] was served upon the plaintiff and a trial was had thereon September 12, 1934. That plaintiff made a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, for lack of a proper or any complaint or affidavit of facts constituting the alleged contempt was ever served upon plaintiff; that the court denied such motion to dismiss and the cause proceeded to a partial hearing. That upon the conclusion of said hearing, the court found plaintiff guilty of contempt while still being deceived, did enter its order in said bankruptcy proceeding ordering said plaintiff to pay a fine of One Thousand ($1,000) Dollars, to the United States of America, and stand committed to the Orange County jail until fine is paid, and was immediately remanded to custody of the United States Marshal. That a stay of execution was denied plaintiff and that thereupon the United States Marshal took custody and control of the plaintiff and did deprive her of her liberty for the greater part of an entire day and until plaintiff was released on bail. That said order and judgment finding plaintiff guilty of contempt was thereafter appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, and said court did, on the 17th day of December, 1935, reverse said order and judgment referred to above * * *. That said contempt proceeding was finally terminated in plaintiff's favor."

A demurrer to Count II was sustained as to all defendants without leave to amend. A demurrer of one defendant (United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company) was sustained as to Count I and concerning this ruling no complaint is made. The other defendants answered Count I and all of them, in addition to certain denials, pleaded as an affirmative defense that the conflicting claims of the respective parties in the bankruptcy proceedings had been compromised, that such proceedings had been dismissed by mutual consent, and that in consideration of such compromise agreement and dismissal plaintiff had executed a release in the following form:

M. Kupfer, as well as E. A. Lynch, and yourself and any and all other persons heretofore connected with said bankruptcy proceeding from any claim of any kind whatsoever arising out of said bankruptcy proceedings and hereby agree to forbear from any legal proceedings by virtue of anything done by the above named parties in and about said bankruptcy proceedings.

At the trial, on motion of the answering defendants, the court proceeded first, pursuant to the provisions of section 597 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to determine the issues raised by the affirmative defense. That section provides in material part that: "When the answer pleads that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, * * * or sets up any other defense not involving the merits of the plaintiff's cause of action but constituting a bar * * * to the prosecution thereof, the court may, upon the motion of either party, proceed to the trial of such special defense or defenses before the trial of any other issue in the case, and if the decision of the court, or the verdict of the jury upon any special defense so tried * * * is in favor of the defendant pleading the same, judgment for such defendant shall thereupon be entered and no trial of other issues in the action shall be had unless such judgment shall be reversed on appeal or otherwise set aside or vacated; * * *."

[1,2] The execution of the release quoted above was admitted by plaintiff but she sought to escape its effect apparently on the mixed or combined theories that it had been executed by the plaintiff while acting under duress of menace and threats, that it had been executed without consideration and had been rescinded. A jury was impaneled to serve in an advisory capacity on issues of fact which might arise in the equitable proceeding whereby plaintiff endeavored to so avoid the release but at the conclusion of the evidence the court held that the showing was insufficient to warrant submission to the jury and advised a verdict for the defendants.

It is to be noted that the release pleaded in this case is the same release which was pleaded in Eustace v. Lynch (1941), supra, 43 Cal.App.2d 486, 488, 111 P.2d

372. We have compared the evidence adduced at the trial in this case, and the offers of proof, with the offers which were made in the cited case and which are related in the opinion prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice York in that case, and find that there is nothing in the record before us to differentiate it legally from that case. Our record contains nothing materially different and favorable to plaintiff that was not included within the scope of the evidence offered in the Lynch case and in fact the evidence actually adduced here was not as favorable to plaintiff as were the offers of proof there. We do not feel justified, therefore, in reciting again what would be substantially a repetition of the matter printed on pages 488 and 489 of 43 Cal.App.2d, on pages 373 and 374 of 111 P.2d. Suffice it to state that according to the opening statement of counsel for plaintiff she had the draft of the release in her possession for two or three weeks before she signed it. During that period she discussed it with her own counsel and friends, including at least three different reputable members of the bar. It is to be noted that whereas the offer of proof made in the Lynch case was to the effect that the asserted threats, menace, duress and fraud consisted of statements and representations made to the plaintiff and other persons signing the release by defendant Raphael Dechter, it was not claimed at the trial in this case that Mr. Dechter had at any time directly communicated with plaintiff. In this connection counsel for plaintiff stated: "None of the defendants in this case made any of these statements face to face, but they got to Mrs. Eustace just the same and she signed it after three weeks." It appears that the only statements or representations which were communicated to plaintiff were matters related to her by her own counsel concerning discussions had with opposing counsel. It is not disputed that the bankruptcy proceedings were in fact dismissed as a result of the compromise agreement. So far as the claimed rescission of the release is concerned, plaintiff's counsel stated, "There is no rescission other than the bringing of this suit, which the plaintiff considers to be a rescission." The record shows that the release is dated January 29, 1935, that it was signed within three weeks from that date, that the action was filed June 1, 1936, and the date of the trial was June 17, 1940. Manifestly there was an utter failure to comply with the salutary provisions of section 1691 of the Civil Code requiring that a party rescinding an agreement act promptly and restore to the other party everything of value which has been received. We find the ruling of the trial court, that the evidence seeking to avoid the release was insufficient, to be correct.

[3] Since the release would also constitute a complete defense to the cause of action attempted to be stated in Count II it is difficult to perceive how any error in ruling on the demurrer thereto could be prejudicial. We have, however, examined the pleading and note that it alleges that as to the contempt citation, the issuance of and proceedings under which are the basis of that asserted cause of action, a hearing was had and the court found plaintiff guilty of contempt. On appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, that court held (Eustace v. Lynch (1935), supra, 80 F.2d 652, 656): "We are satisfied, notwithstanding some indications in the record to the contrary, that the contempt proceeding was inaugurated, tried, and determined as a civil contempt, and that the imposition of a fine which bore no relation to the injury suffered by the receiver was unauthorized. * * * The appellee has made no appearance and filed no brief. It appears that the bankruptcy proceeding in which this matter originated has been dismissed. The civil contempt proceeding being ancillary to the bankruptcy proceeding also should be dismissed."

tion of the matter, and is tried and found guilty, the judgment rendered, unless it is shown to have been obtained by means of fraud, is conclusive evidence of probable cause for making the charge, even though it is afterwards held to be unauthorized, and reversed on appeal." To the same effect, see Carpenter v. Sibley (1911), 15 Cal.App. 589, 602, 119 P. 391; Black v. Knight (1919), 44 Cal.App. 756, 770, 187 P. 89; Bullock v. Morrison (1931), 118 Cal.App. 112, 114, 4 P.2d 812. There was no showing, or offer to show, in the court below that the conviction of plaintiff was brought about by any extrinsic fraud practiced on the court. The reversal of the judgment of the United States District Court finding plaintiff guilty of contempt was not based on fraud. It further appears from the language of the Circuit Court of Appeals above quoted that the contempt proceeding was ordered dismissed because it was ancillary to the bankruptcy proceeding which as hereinabove stated was dismissed by mutual consent on compromise of the conflicting claims. A termination of the proceeding so procured does not make it a basis for a malicious prosecution action (38 C.J. 443, 444; Paskle v. Williams (1931), 214 Cal. 482, 484, 6 P.2d 505; Jaffe v. Stone (1941), 18 Cal.2d 146, 152, 114 P.2d 335, 135 A.L.R. 775). We are satisfied therefore that no prejudicial error was committed in sustaining the demurrer to Count II.

Plaintiff also contends that the court erred in vacating the default of the defendant Kupfer. It appears, as heretofore mentioned, that the complaint herein was filed on June 1, 1936. The clerk's transcript, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 670 and 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure, contains no copy of the summons or the return of service, but a special bill of exceptions recites that it was stipulated that "service of summons and complaint of the within action was made on defendant, A. M. Kupfer on the 4th day of August 1936 and that return of said service was made on the 18th day of August, 1936. 3. That on the 21st day of August, 1936, * * * said court entered an order vacating and quashing said service of summons against the defendant, A. M. Kupfer. 4. That thereafter service of summons and sixth amended complaint was made on the defendant, A. M. Kupfer on the 26th day of June 1939 and that return of said service was made on the 29th day of June 1939." It is also shown that defendant Kupfer specially appeared and moved to dismiss the action under section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure on the ground that the summons was not served and the return thereon was not made within three years after the commencement of the action. This motion was denied on the ground that "plaintiff had made a sufficient showing that said defendant, A. M. Kupfer had secreted himself to prevent the service of summons upon him and that plaintiff was thereby unable to serve summons upon said defendant within three years from the commencement of the within action." Notice of this ruling was served on the defendant on August 26, 1939, and on September 12, 1939, his default was entered. Three days later, on September 15, defendant filed an application for leave to renew his motion and this application was denied September 20, 1939. On October 13, 1939, defendant Kupfer filed a notice of motion to vacate his default. This notice of motion does not in so many words specify "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect" as a ground for his motion, but it does recite the facts as to the service of summons after three years, the original proceedings instituted by the defendant in endeavoring to cause the service to be quashed, and the further fact that at the time the default was entered defendant's counsel were engaged in the process of taking further proceedings for the renewal of the motion to quash. It is to be noted further that the notice of motion specifies that the motion would be "made upon the within notice of motion and upon the points and authorities attached hereto and upon the proposed answer of defendant filed herewith, and upon all of the papers and records on file in the within action." (Italics added.)

[7] Plaintiff attacks on various grounds the order granting the motion, contending that the notice of motion itself was defective in not specifying with more particularity any of the grounds enumerated in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that the showing in support of the motion was inadequate in that no affidavit of defendant accompanied the notice. While such notice is inartificially drawn it does not appear that on that ground plaintiff objected in the trial court to the hearing. On the contrary it appears that plaintiff joined in a stipulation as to various facts which were presented to the court on the hearing. Under such circumstances we do not believe that such objection should be considered when presented for the first time on appeal.

[8-10] As to the sufficiency of the showing on which the trial court acted we are unable to hold that it abused its discretion, because the record does not purport to include "all of the papers and records on file" in the action which were referred to in the notice of motion as a basis thereof and does not certify that it contains all of the evidence which was before the court. The transcript before us discloses that at the time the notice of motion was filed the records and files of the trial court contained verified answers of defendants other than Kupfer which set out the release, and such release on its face purported to constitute a complete defense for Kupfer as well as such other defendants. The special bill of exceptions, which is incorporated in the Clerk's Transcript, states that defendant Kupfer "submitted a proposed answer in support of his motion * * *; said proposed answer was unverified * * *; a copy * * * is appended hereto. * *" The copy appended, among other defenses sets out the release, but does not purport to be verified. It is to be noted that incongruously another portion of the transcript, certified by the clerk, sets forth the answer of the defendant Kupfer, endorsed as filed October 30, 1939, and shows a verification by Kupfer under date of October 23, 1939, which was three days prior to the date of the hearing on the motion. We are of the opinion that although defendant Kupfer's motion was not supported by his own affidavit, and although the copy of his proposed answer tendered on the hearing of the motion did not purport to be verified, the court, in the light of the verified answers of the other defendants, which answers, as previously observed, were included among the papers specified in the notice of motion as a basis thereof, may well have concluded that he had a good and meritorious defense. In any event the burden is upon plaintiff to affirmatively establish error and under the circumstances recited we cannot indulge presumptions in favor of error and predicate a reversal thereon.

[11] Plaintiff advances the further contention that the court erred in excluding offered testimony to the effect that plaintiff would not have signed the release had she known then that she had a cause of action against defendants for malicious prosecution. In this regard plaintiff relies on section 1542 of the Civil Code, which provides that "A general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, which if known by him must have materially affected his settlement with the debtor." The evidence was properly excluded. It requires only a reading of the release to ascertain that it was not a mere general release but was particularly drawn to cover "any claim of any kind whatsoever arising out of said bankruptcy proceedings." (Italics added.) This language is specific in identifying the particular proceedings, claims arising out of which were exclusively the subjects of release.

[12] A further argument is presented to the effect that the release is non-operative as to the defendants Wagner, Coates, Fairfield, and Gray, in that they are not named therein. A sufficient answer to this contention is found in the language of the release, "the undersigned do hereby agree that they will and do hereby release the Oil Tool Exchange, Inc., * * * and any and all other persons heretofore connected with said bankruptcy proceeding." Unless the defendants were in the category of those "heretofore connected with said bankruptcy proceeding" no cause of action was stated against them and if they were so connected the release constitutes a defense.

No other error complained of is of sufficient moment to warrant consideration. The attempted appeals from the order directing a verdict and from the findings are dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 3, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 1, 1942.

1. Evidence 🔑441(1)

Ordinarily, oral evidence may not be received to vary terms of a written contract, and all prior negotiations must be deemed merged in the agreement as written.

2. Contracts 🔑94(6)

The inducing of execution of a contract by a promise made without any intention of performing it constitutes such fraud in obtaining contract that it may be declared null and void in an equitable action brought for that purpose.

3. Evidence 🔑434(8)

Where execution of contract has been induced by a promise made without any intention of performing it, parol evidence is permitted to show such fraud on theory that it does not change terms of contract, but shows that no binding contract has been legally made.

4. Evidence 🔑434(8)

Parol evidence of fraud to establish invalidity of an instrument is admissible if it tends to establish some independent fact or representation, some fraud in procurement of instrument or breach of confidence concerning its use, but not if it establishes a promise directly at variance with the promise of the writing.

5. Evidence 🔑434(8), 443(2)

Where written contract expressly provided $300 per month for life to divorced wife who refused to consent to a remarriage clause, parol evidence that husband signed agreement in reliance on wife's oral promise not to enforce it in event of remarriage was not admissible because contrary to express provision of contract, even though wife allegedly made oral promise without intending to perform it.

Judgment affirmed.

Dempster McKee, of San Diego, for appellant.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to cancel two contracts on the ground that their execution had been obtained by fraud and to have it declared that both are null and void.

The plaintiff and defendant were married in 1916 and lived in China, where the plaintiff was employed, until 1921. The plaintiff then retired from business and they established their home in San Diego. The plaintiff was then worth a half million dollars, $300,000 of which he had accumulated after the marriage.

In 1923, while the defendant was in Europe with her mother, the plaintiff went to Reno where he brought a divorce proceeding after remaining there for the required time. Shortly before the divorce action was heard both parties and their attorneys met in Reno for the purpose of negotiating a property settlement agreement. They quickly agreed that the plaintiff was to pay to the defendant $300 per month, but the plaintiff strenuously refused to sign a contract drawn by defendant's attorney which provided that such payments should continue for the term of her natural life, and he insisted that this be so changed as to provide for a discontinuance of the payments in case she remarried. She refused to allow this change to be made and on November 1, 1923, an agreement was executed providing that the plaintiff would pay to the defendant $300 on the first day of each and every month thereafter during the term of her natural life. The agreement further provided that within sixty days thereafter the plaintiff would deposit securities of the value of $50,000 with the Guaranty Trust Company of New York as security for the monthly payments to be made to the defendant, and that within that time the parties would execute a trust agreement with that trust company in order to carry out this provision. The next day after that agreement was executed a decree of divorce was entered in which the court approved this agreement. Early in January, 1924, the defendant returned to San Diego and the trust agreement provided for in the other contract was executed. Later that month the plaintiff was married to another woman.

The plaintiff made all of the monthly payments called for by the contract for more than 16 years. In June, 1940, the plaintiff learned that the defendant was about to remarry and started this action, the papers in which were served a few hours before the defendant married another man. The complaint alleges that the defendant, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to enter into these property settlement agreements, promised the plaintiff that she would not remarry, that she further promised that in the event of her subsequent marriage she would cancel the contracts and relieve the plaintiff of the payments provided for therein and would terminate the trust created under the other agreement, and that these promises were made without any intention on her part to perform the same.

At the trial the plaintiff testified that when the proposed property settlement agreement was under discussion in Reno the parties and their attorneys argued for a day and a half, and that "on each and every occasion we would come back to this clause about payment for life"; that he finally threatened to leave Reno if an agreement was not reached that day; that they met again that evening at which time the defendant said: "What is the use of all of this objection? I never intend to get married, anyhow. I shall never remarry. Tom knows, for reasons which I have explained to him so often, that I never will remarry. Therefore the agreement might as well stand as it is"; that he accepted her statement that she would never remarry; that the defendant then said: "Very well; I will give him a letter—If I ever remarry again I will give him a letter to cancel and nullify the agreement"; and that he replied: "That will be quite acceptable to me, because I don't believe she will ever remarry again." He further testified that she promised to give him this letter before the execution of the other agreement establishing the trust; that later, at San Diego, he refused to sign the trust agreement until he received this letter; that Judge Sloane, the defendant's attorney, refused to do anything about getting the letter; and that he then told Judge Sloane that he had made up his mind to execute the agreement because he was sure that the defendant would never marry again and that he was executing the trust agreement "against my best judgment, against the advice of my attorneys, on the strength of the promise of Mrs. Cobbs that she will never remarry again." He then signed the agreement and never received such a letter.

The court found that the defendant, in order to induce the plaintiff to enter into said contracts, orally promised the plaintiff before the execution of the first contract that she would not remarry, that in the event she did so she would cancel both of these agreements and would relieve the plaintiff from the payments called for by the contracts, that she would deliver to the plaintiff a letter to that effect before he executed the trust agreement, and that these promises were made without the intention on her part to perform the same. The court concluded, however, that the defendant is entitled to a continuance of the monthly payments provided for in the contracts and that the plaintiff is not entitled to have either of these contracts cancelled. Judgment was entered accordingly and the plaintiff has appealed.

[1-3] The appellant relies upon a well-established exception to the general rule that oral evidence may not be received to vary the terms of a written contract and that all prior negotiations must be deemed merged in the agreement as written. Under this exception, it has been held that where the execution of a contract has been induced by a promise made without any intention of performing it, this constitutes such fraud in obtaining the contract that it may be declared null and void in an equitable action brought for that purpose. Parol evidence to show fraud is permitted in such cases on the theory that it does not, in fact, change or contradict the terms of the contract but rather shows that no binding contract has been legally made. Appellant cites in this connection Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 137 P. 9; Martin v. Lawrence, 156 Cal. 191, 103 P. 913; Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 P. 394, L.R.A.1918B, 415, Ann.Cas.1918E, 184; Graham v. Los Angeles First National Trust & Sav. Bank, 3 Cal.2d 37, 43 P.2d 543; Boulevard Land Co. v. King, 125 Cal. App. 224, 13 P.2d 864, and a number of other cases. In each of such cases there was involved a promise to do some additional act which was not covered by the terms of the contract, rather than an act which was directly contrary to the terms of the agreement.

[4] A number of cases in this state have pointed out the distinction, with respect to permitting oral proof of a promise without the intent to perform for the purpose of nullifying a written contract, between situations where the thing promised relates to a matter about which the written contract is silent and cases where it relates to matters covered by the contract and therefore resting upon a higher form of evidence than oral testimony. In Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, v. Pendergrass, 4 Cal.2d 258, 48 P.2d 659, 661, the court said: "* * * the promise which it is claimed they relied upon was, as pleaded by them, that the respondent would 'extend' or 'postpone' all payments for the period of one year. This promise is in direct contravention of the unconditional promise contained in the note to pay the money on demand. The question then is: Is such a promise the subject of parol proof for the purpose of establishing fraud as a defense to the action or by way of cancelling the note, assuming, of course, that it can be properly coupled with proof that it was made without any intention of performing it? Our conception of the rule which permits parol evidence of fraud to establish the invalidity of the instrument is that it must tend to establish some independent fact or representation, some fraud in the procurement of the instrument, or some breach of confidence concerning its use, and not a promise directly at variance with the promise of the writing. We find apt language in Towner v. Lucas' Ex'r, 54 Va. [705], 13 Gratt. 705, 716, in which to express our conviction: 'It is reasoning in a circle, to argue that fraud is made out, when it is shown by oral testimony that the obligee contemporaneously with the execution of a bond promised not to enforce it.'"

In W. R. Campbell Co. v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 136 Cal.App. 765, 29 P.2d 910, 912, the court said: "Plaintiff seeks to evade the result of its plain terms by proof of a parol, unperformed agreement which is directly contrary to such clear meaning. It is well settled that a fraudulent representation as to a material matter inducing the execution of an agreement may be shown by parol evidence, even where the written instrument purports to contain the entire agreement between the parties. Hunt v. L. M. Field, Inc., 202 Cal. 701, 703, 262 P. 730. In our opinion, however, a distinction must be made between such a parol promise as the one here, which by its very nature is superseded by the final writing, inconsistent with it, and a promise made with no intention of performing the same, not inconsistent with the writing, but which was the inducing cause thereof."

Similar views are expressed in Lindemann v. Coryell, 59 Cal.App. 788, 212 P. 47, and in Oxnard Theatres, Inc., v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D.C., 24 F.Supp. 44, 47. In the latter case the rule is thus stated: "* * * when the subject of the alleged representation is covered by the agreement in a manner different from that alleged, a party to the agreement cannot avoid the rule which makes the written agreement the unimpeachable memorial of the understanding between the parties and claim the benefit of a contradictory undertaking by averring that it was a promise made without intention to perform, and, therefore, fraudulent." This rule is based upon the sound principle that a party having agreed in writing to do a certain thing may not stultify his written agreement by claiming that, in fact he relied upon the other party's oral promise that the terms of the agreement should not be complied with.

The rule pointed out in the cases last cited is applicable and controlling here. An oral promise to sooner terminate a written agreement to make fixed payments for a specified term, and to cancel such payments on a certain contingency, cannot be other than one relating to the same subject matter and necessarily amounts to an agreement that the terms of the written contract shall not be carried out as therein provided. While parties may well provide for a change in their obligations under changed conditions they should not be allowed to agree both ways at the same time on the same proposition.

[5] Appellant's real contention here is that he was induced to enter into a written agreement to make monthly payments to the respondent so long as she lived by an oral promise on her part that she would not enforce that agreement, but would release him from such payments in the event of her remarriage. The oral promise thus relied on not only related to a matter covered by the written agreement, and was directly contrary to the provisions of that agreement, but it related to the one point which was particularly in dispute between the parties in negotiating the terms of that agreement. The appellant himself testified that the respondent positively refused to change the proposed contract in that regard and that he executed the agreement because she had promised not to enforce the very provision which she refused to change or eliminate. In effect, he claims that he was willing to execute this agreement with its definite and certain provision in this regard because the parties had theretofore specifically agreed to the contrary in respect to those very terms. Under the rule referred to this may not be done, and even under the claim of fraud arising from a promise made without intent to perform oral evidence cannot be thus used to directly contradict the terms of a written instrument.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOULD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff and defendant were married June 30, 1937. They separated January 15, 1942. By an amended complaint filed April 28, 1942, plaintiff sought to have his marriage with defendant annulled upon the ground of fraud, in that, as alleged in said amended complaint, defendant prior to said marriage represented that she was normal physically and capable of bearing children, whereas, it is alleged, defendant at the time of making said representations knew they were false and untrue; that in truth and in fact defendant was then incapable of bearing children and by reason of her physical condition will suffer permanently from such disability. It was alleged that plaintiff believed defendant's representations as to her normal physical condition; that he relied upon them and would not have entered into the marriage if he had known the true facts; that he did not discover the truth until March 17, 1942, when defendant was examined by a physician, and that he has not lived with defendant since such discovery.

Defendant's answer, while admitting that she had knowledge of her physical condition prior to marriage, denied "that she falsely represented her condition to the plaintiff for the purpose of deceiving the plaintiff, or for the purpose of inducing his marriage to defendant."

At the trial, testimony in substance as above stated was given by plaintiff, by a physician in whose opinion defendant would not be capable of bearing children, and by defendant herself, who, called as a witness for plaintiff, stated under oath that prior to her marriage she was told by a physician whom she consulted "that I never would be able to have children"; that before her marriage she discussed with plaintiff the matter of having children; that she did not reveal to him the advice given to her by the physician whom she had theretofore consulted, but "led him to believe that I could have a family," and that she knew at the time she made such statements that they were not true.

No evidence was offered in behalf of defendant and there was no contradiction of testimony presented by plaintiff.

Annulment of the marriage was refused by the trial court. Plaintiff appeals. Respondent has filed no brief herein and in fact has stipulated that the case be "submitted to the court for decision without argument * * * on files and records and appellant's opening brief."

[1, 2] The court may not arbitrarily refuse relief where a case has been properly made out (Polk v. Polk, 50 Cal.App.2d 653, 123 P.2d 550), and it has been held that the court is not authorized to deny a decree of divorce where evidence of the plaintiff, adequately corroborated, establishes the truth of the allegations of the complaint. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 152 Cal. 316, 92 P. 853; Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467.

[3, 4] While misrepresentations or concealments with respect to previous unchaste conduct (Barnes v. Barnes, 110 Cal. 418, 42 P. 904; Wilcox v. Wilcox, 171 Cal. 770, 155 P. 95), or with respect to wealth or social or official station (Marshall v. Marshall, 212 Cal. 736, 300 P. 816, 75 A.L.R. 661), fall short of constituting grounds for annuling a marriage, yet where the fraud is vital to the conjugal relationship, that is, where it goes to the very essence of the marriage relation, the aggrieved party is entitled to have the marriage annulled. Mayer v. Mayer, 207 Cal. 685, 279 P. 783. A woman who accepts the hand of her suitor thereby impliedly assures him of her ability, so far as lies within her knowledge, to bear children. Her concealment of her sterility is a fraud that vitiates the marriage contract (Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87; Hardesty v. Hardesty, 193 Cal. 330, 223 P. 951) and justifies annulment, when the man acts promptly upon his discovery of the fraud. Aufort v. Aufort, 9 Cal.App.2d 310, 49 P.2d 620; Turney v. Avery, 92 N.J.Eq. 473, 113 A. 710. There is neither rule of law, principle of equity nor reason arising from public policy which requires the continuance of a marriage resulting from such a fraud as that of which defendant was guilty.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellant annulling his marriage to respondent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge Assigned.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Manuel S. Pinheiro, deceased, appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action seeking to set aside a deed and a trust agreement made by decedent in favor of defendant.

The property involved, situate in Los Banos, was owned by decedent and his wife prior to January 1, 1937, on which date the wife died and decedent became the sole owner. Shortly after his wife's death decedent moved to Oakland to live with his sister-in-law Guilhermina Pasqual. Immediately after his arrival decedent requested his nephew, Joe Pasqual, to make an appointment with an attorney as he wished to give his property to said sister-in-law. A meeting was arranged in an attorney's office and decedent made a gift of his property to said sister-in-law. Thereafter at decedent's request the property was reconveyed to him. Subsequently, and on July 21, 1937, decedent conveyed a one-half interest in the property to said sister-in-law. Soon thereafter decedent went to live with Mary Soares, the defendant herein, and another sister-in-law in Mill Valley. On September 10, 1937, an action was commenced on behalf of decedent to set aside the conveyance of July 21, 1937, to Mrs. Pasqual. This action was settled on or about February 10, 1938. On February 11, 1938, decedent deeded the property to the defendant. The last mentioned deed contained a provision that the property was to be held under the terms of an agreement of trust executed concurrently. Under the trust agreement the net income was to be paid to decedent during his life with the remainder in fee to defendant subject to a power of appointment in decedent as to one-half of the remainder. The trust agreement recited that the transfer was in consideration of defendant's services as trustee and of care and keep theretofore given decedent. The deed was recorded March 12, 1938, but the trust agreement was not recorded until January 16, 1940, which was subsequent to the death of the decedent. On December 16, 1938, decedent was declared incompetent and defendant was appointed his guardian, she having theretofore, on December 3rd, filed a petition to have him so declared. Decedent died on December 1, 1939. The property involved was shown to have a value of about $10,250.

Appellant contends that the evidence establishes (and that findings to the contrary are not sustained by the evidence) that decedent was a man over 65 years of age, of impaired mentality, unable to speak, read or write English, without business experience, and unable to care for his own property; that a confidential relation existed between decedent and defendant; that in the questioned transaction decedent acted without independent advice; that the attorney who handled the matter was selected by and in fact represented defendant; and that there was no consideration for the transfer. It is appellant's contention that under the foregoing circumstances, even though the impaired mentality does not amount to absolute disqualification, a court of equity should set aside a conveyance.

[1, 2] Respondent does not dispute the rule of law, but contends that it is not applicable here because decedent, at the time of the transfer, was not incompetent to execute the documents, that there was a valuable consideration, and that decedent was independently advised by an attorney of his own choosing, and that in all other issues of fact there was such a conflict in the evidence that the trial court properly refused to apply the rule. Here it should be added that the rule of Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89, 94, and of the other cases cited by the appellant, is not a rule that in all cases where some of these elements are present the trial court must set aside the conveyance. The rule is that when the trial court, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, has found that the circumstances warrant such equitable relief the decree will not be disturbed on appeal. If the facts upon which appellant here relies were all proved by competent and substantial evidence there would be some ground for appellant's attack upon the decree. But such is not the case. Every material fact upon which she relies was disputed by competent and substantial evidence. The appellant does not dispute this, but argues the point as though the appellate court was to determine which of the witnesses should be believed and which party had the preponderance of the evidence.

It is true that evidence offered by appellant tended to prove that the decedent was illiterate, enfeebled in mind and body, unable to read the English language, and unable to manage his property. The testimony of the medical witnesses was that for a short time prior to his death in December, 1939, the deceased was suffering from senility and was unable to think or talk clearly or fluently. Much of the testimony relating to his mental capacity was directed to instances far removed in time from the date of the execution of the documents. The evidence offered by respondent tended to show that the deceased had full knowledge of his property, and business affairs, understood the English language, and was able to carry on a simple conversation in that language. The respondent produced the witness Patricio, a former neighbor of the deceased in Los Banos, and one of the very few disinterested and unbiased witnesses appearing, who testified that he talked with the deceased in June, 1939, when the latter was visiting the witness in Los Banos. When asked what the deceased had told him at that time about this transaction the answer was: "Well, that time he told me that he was glad that he have the ranch out of Mrs. Pasqual and passed it to Mrs. Soares, and he said that his half-share is still in his name and he is going to give it to the ones that takes care of him the last days, and he say because Mrs. Pasqual been treating him rough and Mrs. Soares has been a mother to him." On cross-examination this witness further testified:

"Q. Now Mr. Patricio, when you talked to Mr. Pinheiro after he had transferred the property to Mrs. Soares, he told you that he had transferred half to her, isn't that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that the other half he had in his name, isn't that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that he was going to use that half to give to those that took care of him, isn't that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that is what he told you? A. Yes, but at the same time he told us, told me and my wife that that property that is going to be left to Mrs. Soares because she has been like a mother to him, not because he liked Mrs. Soares, because—Mrs. Pasqual, because mean to the children and in some kind of trouble that he had, but he said Mrs. Soares and the children treated him so nice that he feel like leaving his share, this balance to her, that is the last conversation. Even one time he told me if I want to take that share to take care of him, we take care of him, that he give half that ranch to us, and I said, 'No, we have got five children to take care of, we can't take care of anybody else.'

"Q. In other words, he said he would give you that half to take care of him, is that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Yes. A. But at the same time we say we don't want it, well, he said, 'Mrs. Soares is going to take care of me.'

"Q. Then he said he was going to give her that half, is that right? A. Yes.

"Q. If she takes care of him? A. Yes, if she took care of him like she did."

[3] From this evidence the trial court could have inferred that the deceased had a clear understanding of the legal effect of the documents and that, a year or more after their execution, he expressed satisfaction with the disposition he had made. Upon all the evidence the trial court was justified in finding that none of appellant's attacks upon the documents was sustained by the evidence. And those findings put an end to the case.

[4, 5] The additional point raised by appellant—that the documents were not delivered—finds no support in the record. Both documents were delivered to the grantee by the grantor at the time of execution. The deed was then recorded. The trust agreement was kept in a safe deposit box owned jointly by grantor and grantee. The presumption of delivery arising from possession of the documents is prima facie evidence of delivery and supports the judgment. Ward v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240, 17 P. 193, 7 Am.St.Rep. 151; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 409, 221 P. 191.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of N. S. Dasher, deceased, between Edith Mittendorff and Gertrude A. Dasher, as executrix, etc., wherein Gertrude A. Dasher, as executrix, etc., filed her second and final account and petition for distribution and Edith Mittendorff filed objections to the account. From certain portions of an order settling the second and final account and directing distribution under deceased's will, Edith Mittendorff appeals upon the judgment roll.

Affirmed.

John C. Mead, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This appeal presents a question of construction of the last will and testament of N. S. Dasher. The testator died on June 24, 1937, leaving a will wherein he nominated his wife, Gertrude A. Dasher, respondent herein, and his niece, Edith Mittendorff, appellant in the instant proceeding, as executrices. On July 1, 1937, the last-named executrix executed a renunciation of her right to act, and the wife was appointed executrix on July 28, 1937. An inventory and appraisement was filed on April 15, 1938. On June 17 of the same year Gertrude A. Dasher petitioned the court for a widow's allowance of $250 per month from the date of the testator's death to June 17, 1938, and an order for such allowance was made on July 7. On April 28, 1941, the executrix filed her second and final account and petition for distribution. To this account Edith Mittendorff filed her objections. It is from certain portions of the order settling the second and final account and directing distribution under the will that this appeal is taken.

After making certain bequests in his will, the decedent provided that all of the rest, residue and remainder of his estate be given, devised and bequeathed unto Gertrude A. Dasher, his wife, and Edith Mittendorff, his niece, as trustees, and that the net income received and derived from the trust estate should be turned over to decedent's wife, Gertrude A. Dasher, for her own individual use and benefit during her lifetime.

The trial court found: "That the trust created and provided for under and by the terms of Articles Sixth and Seventh of decedent's said will is a trust for the benefit of the widow of said deceased, and that Gertrude A. Dasher, widow of said deceased, as a life beneficiary of said trust, is entitled to receive and to have paid to her the total income received and realized from decedent's estate during the period of administration, after deducting the moneys expended for taxes and maintenance of the property of said estate."

By its order settling the second and final account and directing distribution under the will, the trial court decreed:

"* * * 5. That Gertrude A. Dasher, as the widow of said N. S. Dasher, deceased, is entitled to receive and to have paid to her the sum of $2,784.48 on account of income received from the estate during the period of administration, and the trustees of the trust fund created and provided for under and by the terms of Articles Sixth and Seventh of the last Will and Testament of the said N. S. Dasher, be and they are hereby instructed to forthwith pay over and distribute to the said Gertrude A. Dasher, out of the trust estate as soon as the same shall have been distributed to them as such Trustees, the said sum of $2784.48.

"6. That pursuant to the terms of the last Will and Testament of the said N. S. Dasher, and by reason of the stipulation hereinabove referred to, and by reason of the findings and order herein made, the entire residue of said estate, whether described herein or not, be and the same is hereby distributed unto Gertrude A. Dasher and Edith Mittendorff as Trustees in Trust for the uses and purposes herein set forth, to-wit:

"(1) Said Trustees shall immediately upon receipt of said fund, forthwith pay over and distribute to Gertrude A. Dasher, widow of said deceased, the sum of $2784.48, on account of the net income received and realized from the estate of the above-named decedent during administration; * * *."

The question therefore presented to us is whether the testator intended, and whether his will provided, that his widow should receive the net income of the estate only from and after the date of distribution to the trustees, on July 31, 1941, or whether she should be entitled to the net income from the estate as of the date of death of the testator on June 24, 1937. It might here be stated that the will further provided that upon the death of the testator's wife the trust estate should be distributed to Edith Mittendorff, or in the event she predeceased the testator's widow, her children should be the beneficiaries of the corpus of the trust.

[1] Appellant first contends that the trial court was without jurisdiction under the terms of the will to make the above-quoted portion of the decree from which this appeal is taken. This claim is predicated upon the ground that the widow had no right to receive payments under the terms of the trust provisions of the will until the trust property was distributed to the trustees, and then only from the date of such distribution. It is urged that the trust provisions of the will here under consideration contain no express directions that the payments are to accrue from the date of the testator's death. It is not contended by either appellant or respondent that the will here under consideration creates an annuity under the provisions of sections 161 and 162 of the Probate Code, because an annuity must consist of a "bequest of certain specified sums periodically." In re Estate of Watson, 32 Cal.App.2d 594, 600, 90 P.2d 349, 351; In re Estate of Marre, 18 Cal.2d 184, 188, 114 P.2d 586.

[2-4] That the testator had no intent that the payments to his widow were to commence as of the date of his death is not exclusively established by the absence of an express direction therefor in the testamentary document. While the intention of the testator is the determining factor (Prob. Code, § 163), that intention is to be gathered from a consideration of the instrument in its entirety. The appeal coming before us, as it does, upon the judgment roll alone, enjoins upon this court the duty to assume that sufficient and competent evidence was introduced at the trial to support each finding, including the one which sets forth that "the trust created and provided for under and by the terms of Articles Sixth and Seventh of decedent's said will is a trust for the benefit of the widow of said deceased." Furthermore, the will itself furnishes mute but convincing evidence that the testator intended to create the trust for the specific purpose of providing maintenance and support for his widow, the beneficiary therein named, for it is to be noted that he made no other bequest to her except that of certain personal effects, such as furniture, silverware, pictures, books, clothing and automobiles; while to the appellant niece, who was to receive the corpus of the trust on the death of the widow, he bequeathed the sum of $5,000. Therefore we are persuaded that respondent's right to the income derived from the trust property has relation to the date of the testator's death, and should commence therewith. In re Estate of Marre, supra, 18 Cal.2d page 188, 114 P.2d 586.

[5] Finally, appellant urges that the court was without power to determine the amount of net income from the trust and to order payment of the same to the widow prior to the distribution to the trustees and before the latter had petitioned therefor. Upon the authority of In re Estate of Marre, supra, 18 Cal.2d page 190, 114 P.2d 586, we hold that after the property was distributed to the trustees payment of the income from the trust should have been made by them to the widow as of the date of the testator's death. That is what the court ordered. The fact that the court determined the amount of said income, and there is no controversy as to the correctness thereof, and ordered the whole of such income paid to the widow, did not operate to the prejudice of appellant, because by the provisions of his will the testator directed that "the entire net income received and derived from the trust estate shall be forthwith turned over to my wife, Gertrude A. Dasher, for her own individual use and benefit, during her lifetime." In other words, the trustees were vested with no discretion whatever as to the amount of the income to be paid to the widow. They were required to pay to her the whole thereof from the date of the testator's death. Manifestly, the decree of the court simply ordered the trustees to do that which they were enjoined to do under the provisions of the will and the requirements of their office. No prejudicial error can be predicated upon that part of the decree.

For the foregoing reasons, that portion of the order settling the second and final account and ordering distribution under the will, made and entered in the above-entitled matter on July 31, 1941, and from which this appeal is taken, is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Dal M. Lemmon, Judge.

George Francis Driscoll was convicted of robbery of the first degree, and from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Robert A. Zarick and A. V. Panattoni, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and J. Q. Brown, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant was charged in two counts of an information with (1) robbery by means of force and fear, and (2) assault with a deadly weapon. Previous to the trial, the last-mentioned count was dismissed. A verdict of guilty of robbery of the first degree was returned by the jury. From the judgment which was accordingly rendered and from the order denying a new trial this appeal was perfected.

Fred Hunt, the prosecuting witness, testified that he and the defendant occupied adjoining cabins in an auto camp in North Sacramento. Hunt was working for a contractor by the name of Dykes, who paid him $20 the day the robbery occurred. Mr. Dykes confirmed that fact. Hunt said that he also had on his person at that time an additional sum of $50. He carried the $70 in greenbacks in his pocket. On the evening of the robbery the defendant had been drinking. When Hunt returned to camp that evening he saw the defendant shooting with a gun at a tin can. The defendant accompanied Hunt to a store where the prosecuting witness bought and paid for some groceries. They returned to the camp and each entered his own cabin. After Hunt had prepared and eaten some ham and eggs, the defendant called to him from outside his cabin. As Mr. Hunt emerged, the defendant, without warning, struck him with his gun and knocked him down. Driscoll then pointed the gun at Hunt and said: "Give me that money you got." The prosecuting witness testified, "There wasn't nothing for me to do but to hand it over to him," which he did. He promptly gave the defendant his roll of greenbacks containing $70. The defendant then commanded him to "head for the river." Hunt obeyed, not daring to refuse for fear of being shot. When he reached a point out of the sight of the defendant, he immediately ran to the home of a friend by the name of Mose and reported the robbery.

As a result of the blow on his head, Hunt received a serious laceration across the bridge of his nose and over his left eye, from which he bled profusely. Two days later he visited Doctor Glenn of Sacramento for treatment of the wounds. The doctor testified that he then treated him for a severe laceration over the left eye and a bruise on the bridge of the nose. His eye was then badly swollen. The doctor said that the wounds were evidently caused by a blow from a blunt weapon such as a gun or a club. Mr. Hunt told the doctor he had been knocked down and robbed. The officers were promptly notified of the crime and the defendant was apprehended and charged with the offense. At the trial the sawed-off rifle, which was used by the defendant in firing at the tin can, and which was identified as the same weapon with which Hunt was struck, was received in evidence. The defendant admitted that he had that gun in his possession in the cabin. The defendant denied that he struck Mr. Hunt with his gun, or that he took any money from him. But he did admit that they had a quarrel that night and that he struck him several times with a club and knocked him down. He said that he struck the prosecuting witness several times with a club in necessary self-defense.

The appellant contends that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence, and that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury one instruction which he offered regarding the right of the jury to consider evidence of a lesser offense of assault included within the charge of robbery.

[1, 2] The verdict and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence. It is true there was no eyewitness to the affair other than the defendant and the prosecuting witness. Their stories are in absolute conflict regarding most of the material circumstances. The defendant denied that he struck Mr. Hunt with the gun or that he robbed him of any money. He admits that he struck him several times with a club and that he knocked him down. Since Mr. Hunt said that he was struck but once with the gun, it is strenuously argued that a scalp wound which he received at or near the temple, together with a bruise over the bridge of the nose and a laceration over the left eye become conclusive evidence that he must have been struck several times, as the defendant says that he was. We are of the opinion that conclusion does not necessarily follow. It does not appear to be improbable that one blow with a gun might inflict all those injuries, including the bruised bridge of the nose, the swollen eye, the cut above the eye and the breaking of the skin near the temple. He might have received the injury near the temple when he struck the ground. Doctor Glenn testified that the injuries which he treated two days after the robbery might have been caused by a blow from a blunt weapon such as a gun or a club. The court and the jury observed the witnesses on the stand and listened to their testimony. No doubt the location of the wounds were pointed out at the trial. The story related by the defendant does not carry conviction with it. The weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses were for the sole determination of the jury. We have no disposition to disturb its conclusions in that regard.

The chief contention of the appellant is that notwithstanding the fact that the second count of the information, charging him with an assault with a deadly weapon, was dismissed, still that crime or a simple assault may be included within the charge of robbery, and he was therefore entitled to have the jury consider the evidence, together with appropriate instructions on that subject, to determine whether he was guilty of a lesser offense of an assault with a deadly weapon, or of a simple assault.

[3] It is true that an assault with a deadly weapon, or even a simple assault, may be included within the charge of robbery. People v. Dahl, 113 Cal.App. 224, 298 P. 59; People v. Foss, 85 Cal.App. 269, 259 P. 123; § 1159, Pen.Code; 8 Cal.Jur. 376, § 409. It necessarily follows that when the evidence warrants it, a defendant is entitled to have the jury instructed that it may properly find him guilty of either of the lesser offenses which may be included within the charge of robbery.

The jury was not only fully and fairly charged with respect to every essential element contained within the crime of robbery, but it was also correctly and elaborately instructed, at the request of the defendant, as to what constitutes an assault with a deadly weapon, and of the absolute right of one who is assailed by another, to use any and all force necessary to repel his assailant and to defend himself. The jury was told that it was not necessary that danger of bodily harm at the hands of one's assailant should be real or actual, but that if the defendant reasonably believed that he was about to be attacked and was in danger of receiving great bodily harm, he had a lawful right to use a club or resort to any other necessary force to defend himself. The principles of law applicable to assaults were fully covered in the instructions which were given to the jury, with specific reference to the defendant's evidence upon which he relies. The jurors were clearly informed that if they were satisfied the defendant, in good faith, struck Fred Hunt with a club and knocked him down, believing that he was about to receive bodily harm, although no danger of such harm actually existed, it was still their duty to "acquit him of the charge of assault * * * upon the ground of necessary self-defense."

The jury was clearly and repeatedly instructed that unless it believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant took the money and personal effects mentioned in the information from the person of the prosecuting witness by means of force or fear, it was bound to find him not guilty.

[4, 5] We are of the opinion the refused instruction is sufficiently covered by the charge which was given to the jury on that subject. Moreover, the refused instruction is misleading. It reads: "You are instructed that the defendant in this case testified that he struck the complaining witness, Fred Hunt, with a club in defense of his person. You are further instructed that in the event you believe such striking to have occurred, but that said striking did not occur as a result of fear engendered in the defendant by the complaining witness, then in that event you are instructed that if you believe no robbery to have occurred, you may find the defendant guilty of assault and battery."

The refused instruction fails to state that the fear on the part of the defendant, which would justify him in striking the prosecuting witness with a club, must have been fear that he was about to receive serious injury at the hands of his assailant. The instruction does not leave for the determination of the jury the question as to whether the defendant acted in necessary self-defense.

[6, 7] The defendant may not complain of the failure to give that instruction, for the prosecution, under no circumstances, asked that the defendant be convicted of a lesser offense. Moreover, the jury and the trial court evidently believed that he did take from the prosecuting witness $70 in cash, by means of force and fear. The evidence supports that conclusion. It has been uniformly held that a defendant may not complain of erroneous instructions or of the refusal to give to the jury instructions where the verdict clearly shows that he was not prejudiced thereby.

[8] It has also been held that when one has been convicted of a higher crime he may not complain of erroneous instructions which were given to the jury upon a lesser offense included within the one of which he was convicted. In 17 Corpus Juris 348, section 3705, 24 C.J.S., Criminal Law, § 1922, it is said in that regard: "It is also generally held that if defendant is acquitted of a lower and convicted of a higher degree of crime, error in instructing as to the former is harmless."

In accordance with the foregoing principle of law, the case of People v. Riley, 65 Cal. 107, 3 P. 413, holds that a defendant who was charged and convicted of the crime of robbery may not complain of erroneous instructions which were given to the jury regarding the lesser offense of larceny, which was contained therein, provided the jury was properly instructed on the subject of robbery. The Riley decision has never been modified in subsequent California authorities. It is a sound declaration of law with respect to that principle.

The case of People v. Foss, supra, upon which the appellant relies, is not in conflict with the Riley case. It is true that case was reversed on account of erroneous instructions regarding a lesser offense which was included within the charge of robbery. But the court distinctly said there was absolutely no evidence in the record in that case showing that the defendant took from the prosecuting witness any money or property. Since there was no evidence to support the charge of robbery, it necessarily followed that error in instructing the jury upon the only offense included therein, which the evidence did support, would result in a reversal. The court said [85 Cal.App. 269, 259 P. 124]: "To constitute the crime of robbery, there must be a felonious taking of personal property (section 211, Pen.Code), but the evidence in this case wholly fails to show any taking. * * * In view of the total lack of evidence as to any taking of personal property, no instructions as to larceny were necessary."

The jury was fully and fairly instructed on every essential element of the crime of robbery and of the lesser offenses included therein. The defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal to give the instruction in question. There appears to have been no miscarriage of justice in this case.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Suit by Georgette Macaulay against Myron M. Booth and others to set aside a trust deed and note, wherein a cross-complaint was filed. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

George F. Sharp, of Oakland, for appellant.

Tom W. Hanrahan, of St. Helena, and Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondents in an action to cancel a deed of trust and promissory note.

In the early part of 1937, C. E. Godon, who was in ill health, moved from Oakland, California, to Calistoga, California, and took residence there at a place known as "Beauty Cove." Godon was suffering from a complication of ailments, including valvular heart disease and decompensation of the heart, involvement of the liver, unquestionably cirrhosis, dropsical condition, lack of proper circulation, shortness of breath, arteriosclerosis, hemiparesis, and aphasia.

On or about May 24, 1937, respondent Dr. Myron M. Booth undertook treatment of Godon, and the relation of physician and patient existed from that date until the death of Godon on January 23, 1938. During this period the attendance of Dr. Booth on Godon was very frequent, amounting to several visits per week, and the treatment was extensive. On January 22, 1938, Godon executed and delivered to respondent Dr. Booth, a promissory note in the amount of $1,312.46, representing the obligation due Dr. Booth by Godon for medical services rendered in treating the latter from May, 1937, to January 22, 1938, which promissory note was secured by a deed of trust upon the premises known as "Beauty Cove," which said deed of trust and a copy of said promissory note were recorded in the office of the County Recorder of Napa County, on January 24, 1938. Appellant Macaulay claims the property known as "Beauty Cove," by virtue of a deed of gift from Godon, dated July 6, 1937, which said deed was recorded by her on February 2, 1938.

Appellant filed suit in the court below upon the grounds that Godon was entirely without understanding at the time of the purported execution of the instruments in question, and that respondent Dr. Booth, as physician for Godon, gained an unfair advantage over the latter in the transaction. Respondents filed an answer, and respondent Booth filed a cross-complaint to establish the validity of the trust deed and note as a valid lien upon said premises.

The trial court rendered judgment in favor of respondents. Among other things, the court found that Charles E. Godon was fully conscious and well aware of the nature and effect of his act, and in full possession of his mental faculties when he executed the said promissory note and deed of trust; that said promissory note and deed of trust were made, executed and delivered to respondent Dr. Booth for a good and valuable consideration, to wit, for medical services, and without any fraud or undue influence on the part of respondent, Dr. Booth.

Appellant states the questions involved upon this appeal as follows:

(1) Can cestuis que trustent, standing in a confidential relationship to a trustor, retain a benefit obtained from trustor, without the latter having had independent advice concerning the same?

(2) Does the evidence sustain the findings?

(3) Do the findings sustain the judgment?

[1] With reference to the first question, the weight of authority seems to be that when a confidential relationship is shown to have existed between a grantor and grantee, proof of independent advice is not indispensable to negative the presumption of undue influence. In re Hill, 13 Cal.App. 2d 326, 57 P.2d 155; Smith v. Lombard, 201 Cal. 518, 524, 258 P. 55; Brown v. Canadian Industrial Alcohol Co., 209 Cal. 596, 599, 289 P. 613, 614.

In Brown v. Canadian Industrial Alcohol Co., supra, the Supreme Court said: "* * where a fiduciary relationship exists between the donor and donee, the absence of independent advice is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether the gift should be avoided because of alleged undue influence or fraud, but its nonexistence alone does not authorize the court to avoid the gift. All utterances to the contrary have been squarely repudiated by this court."

[2] Appellant asserts, correctly, that the relationship of physician and patient is a confidential one, and contends that respondent Dr. Booth, failed to respect the confidential relationship which he bore to his patient Godon. He quotes the following from 20 California Jurisprudence, page 1072: "Within the principles of the law of fraud and deceit, the relationship of physician and patient is one of trust or confidence, and as such gives rise to certain implications in respect of transactions between the parties. 'Once this relationship is shown to exist, all dealings between the parties will be closely scrutinized to ascertain if the confidence of the trusting party has been betrayed or his mind unduly influenced to his prejudice.' * * * In conjunction with circumstances which furnish an opportunity for deception—such as weakness of intellect on the part of the patient, advanced years or the like—the relationship of the parties gives rise to a presumption that the physician practiced a deception or acted unconscientiously; and the burden of proof is cast upon him to show that the patient acted intelligently or with knowledge of the consequences of the transaction."

Appellant concedes that, as stated on the same page of the same authority: "The presumption against the physician is not conclusive; and the transaction will be sustained where the circumstances show that the patient acted voluntarily or with an appreciation of the consequences of his act."

[3, 4] Appellant argues with great earnestness that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment, and quotes many portions of the record to sustain this contention. It is a rule too well established to require the citation of authorities that, before an appellate tribunal is justified in reversing a judgment upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, it must appear from that record that, accepting the full force of the evidence adduced, together with every inference favorable to the prevailing party which may be drawn therefrom, and excluding all evidence in conflict therewith, it still appears that the law precludes such prevailing party from recovering a judgment. The evidence must be construed most strongly against the losing party. Every favorable inference and presumption which may fairly be deduced from the evidence should be resolved in favor of the prevailing party. The prevailing party's evidence must ordinarily be accepted as true, and evidence which is contradictory must be disregarded.

We have studied the record, and believe it may fairly be stated that the following facts appear therein:

That Dr. Booth treated Godon from May 24, 1937, until Godon's death on January 23, 1938; that Godon was suffering from a complication of ailments, and that the treatments he received from Dr. Booth, to a large degree, consisted of relieving him from distress and suffering and affording him comfort while he lived; that Godon realized that his death was approaching and that his financial condition was desperate, and had been such since at least July 6, 1937; that he made an effort to compensate Bernard Hooe, a male nurse, who was attending him, and Dr. Booth, the two men who had relieved his suffering and distress; that even though his financial condition was desperate, and his need for funds acute, Godon, on the 24th day of December, 1937, paid Hooe in full for his services to that date; that during the entire time of treatment by Booth, Godon often expressed his desire to meet his obligation to Booth for medical services; that on January 19, 1938, Godon suggested to Dr. Booth that the note and deed of trust be drawn; that on the 21st day of January, 1938, at the request and suggestion of Godon, Dr. Booth requested attorney Tom Hanrahan to prepare a deed of trust and promissory note in the exact amount of the obligation for medical services; that the note and deed of trust were prepared on January 21, 1938; that on January 22, 1938, Dr. Booth, in a telephone conversation with Godon's attorney, advised the attorney that Godon desired that Dr. Booth be protected on the obligation for medical services rendered; that said attorney informed Dr. Booth that he had no objection to Godon's executing the note and deed of trust; that thereupon Dr. Booth and his attorney went to the property described in the deed of trust; that Dr. Booth notified appellant that he had come to have Godon execute the note and deed of trust; that appellant stated that she had no objection to this and that there was just reason for appellant to have this protection; that Dr. Booth's attorney then explained to appellant the nature and reason for the visit; that Dr. Booth and his said attorney then asked appellant to step into the bedroom with themselves and Godon during the explanation and signing of the documents; that Dr. Booth, appellant and said attorney then entered the bedroom and the attorney read the terms of the note to Godon and explained in detail the terms, nature and effect of the deed of trust; that Godon stated he had been expecting them, and was ready to sign the note and deed of trust; that Godon stated that he understood the terms and effect of the note and deed of trust; that appellant Macaulay then assisted Godon in signing the note and deed of trust; that Godon then signed his mark to the note and deed of trust; that Godon was competent both before and during the execution of the note and deed of trust, and was fully aware of the nature and effect of his acts; that during the time of the execution of the note and deed of trust, no attempt was made by Dr. Booth to exclude appellant from the bedroom, but on the contrary, appellant was requested by Dr. Booth to be present in the room.

There is, of course, much testimony contradictory to the evidence hereinbefore referred to, and we may state that had the trial court decided in favor of appellant, the record would support such finding. Counsel for appellant has, with great skill and plausibility, pointed to certain testimony in the record strongly supporting appellant's contentions. However, we are not here concerned with the matter of weighing conflicts in testimony. The question we have to decide is whether, taking all of the evidence into consideration, together with every inference and presumption favorable to respondents which may fairly be deduced therefrom, and disregarding all evidence in conflict therewith, we must conclude that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment.

[5] Taking the record as a whole, we believe it would be a usurpation of the legitimate function of the trial court for us to say that the presumption of undue influence was not overcome, and that the decision should have been in favor of appellant. While it is true that the law is very jealous of dealings between persons in such confidential relationships as that of physician and patient, and will scrutinize them very searchingly and suspiciously, when they are had in a way that leaves doubt of their integrity and that they were fairly obtained and justly procured, yet it is for the trial court to say, after a consideration of the entire evidence, whether the transaction was fair and honest and the instrument was the voluntary, untrammeled and uninfluenced act of the grantor. It is to be assumed that the learned trial judge in the instant case was entirely satisfied that the presumption of undue influence was overcome, that the transaction was fair and equitable, that Godon was aware of the nature and effect of the transaction and fully competent to execute the note and deed of trust. It may be here stated that no question is raised by appellant as to the reasonableness of the bill of Dr. Booth for which the note and deed of trust were given.

We do not think it necessary unduly to prolong this opinion by discussing the various cases cited in the briefs. The principles herein announced are well established and are supported by numerous decisions. See Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal.App. 450, 97 P. 190; Schurman v. Look, 63 Cal.App. 347, 218 P. 624; Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 405, 95 P. 868; Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 P. 265; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 P. 509; Campbell v. Genshlea, 180 Cal. 213, 180 P. 336.

No other points raised in the briefs require discussion.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment of the court below is amply supported by the record and should be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

July 24, 1942.

Hearing Granted Sept. 21, 1942.

1. Commerce 🔑81

The statutory requirements that foreign corporation, in order to maintain proceedings in state courts on intrastate business, file certified copies of its articles of incorporation with Secretary of State and county clerk of county wherein its principal place of business in state is located are inapplicable to foreign corporations engaged solely in interstate and foreign commerce. Civ. Code, §§ 405, 408.

2. Commerce 🔑41(1), 77, 81

A foreign corporation, importing lumber from Philippine Islands into state and selling it to customers outside state, was engaged solely in "interstate and foreign commerce", and hence entitled to maintain mandamus proceeding to compel cancellation of county tax assessments on lumber in warehouse yard without filing certified copies of its articles of incorporation with Secretary of State and county clerk. Civ.Code, §§ 405, 408.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Interstate and Foreign Commerce".

3. Commerce 🔑41(1), 72, 77

Where milled and finished lumber, imported into state, is not packaged or bundled together, but shipped, unloaded and piled by individual pieces, and portion thereof is thereafter sold by nonresident owner, maintaining no office in state, to customers outside state, lumber remaining in state is not subject to taxation by county in which located, as each individual piece of lumber is "original package." U.S.C.A.Const. art. 1, § 10.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Original Package".

4. Commerce 🔑77

A state or subdivision thereof may not constitutionally levy a tax on a thing imported into country while it retains its character as import and remains importer's property in original form or package in which imported. U.S.C.A.Const. art. 1, § 10.

5. Commerce 🔑41(1), 77

An "original package", as applied to interstate and international commerce, is a package, bundle or aggregation of goods put up in original form, covering or receptacle for transportation and transported as a unit from one state or nation to another, and is identical package delivered by consignor to carrier at initial point of shipment in exact condition in which it was shipped.

6. Commerce 🔑41(1), 72, 77

The fact that portion of interstate or international shipment of goods is sold or offered for sale in state, leaving remainder intact in their original packages, does not render balance subject to state taxation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Proceeding by Dant & Russell, Inc., for a writ of mandate to compel the Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles and others to cancel tax assessments on imported lumber. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Stanton & Stanton and Henry C. Rohr, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of defendant predicated upon the sustaining of a demurrer without leave to amend to an application for a writ of mandate to compel defendants to cancel tax assessments levied upon lumber, petitioner appeals.

The undisputed facts are:

From 1937 to 1940 inclusive petitioner imported shipments of Philippine mahogany from the Philippine Islands into the port of Long Beach. The lumber was milled and finished in the Philippines and then shipped to Long Beach, where it was unloaded from steamships and stored in piles in the yard of a warehouse. The lumber was shipped in individual pieces and not packed nor in any manner bundled together. When unloaded it was stacked in piles, one piece upon another. Each shipment was filed separately and kept to itself. From the piles of lumber thus received portions were sold to customers outside the state of California. When it was sold, petitioner directed its warehousemen to make shipment of the respective pieces of lumber purchased to the purchaser and petitioner paid the cost of loading and freight. Petitioner never maintained an office in California, its principal office being located in Portland, Oregon.

The county of Los Angeles assessed a tax against the lumber of petitioner remaining in the yard at Long Beach on the first Monday of March, 1938, and also a similar assessment was made on the lumber remaining in the yard on the first Monday in March, 1939.

Two questions are presented for determination, which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim.

[1, 2] First: Did petitioner as a foreign corporation, which had not recorded with the secretary of state and county clerk certified copies of its articles of incorporation have the right to maintain the present action?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. It is the law of California that a foreign corporation may not maintain an action or proceeding in any court of this state upon any intrastate business, unless it has filed with the secretary of state a certified copy of its articles of incorporation and also filed a certified copy thereof in the office of the county clerk of the county where its principal place of business in this state is located. (§§ 405, and 408, Civ. Code.)

The foregoing requirements, however, are not applicable to foreign corporations which are engaged solely in interstate and foreign commerce. Under the facts set forth above, which were admitted as true by respondent's demurrer, petitioner was engaged solely in interstate and foreign commerce and, therefore, was entitled to maintain the present proceeding without complying with the requirements of section 405, Civil Code.

[3] Second: Where milled and finished lumber is imported into the state of California and not packaged or bundled together but simply shipped by individual pieces and unloaded and stacked in piles, one piece upon another, and thereafter a portion of said lumber is sold by a nonresident owner who does not maintain an office in the state of California to customers outside of the state of California, is the lumber which remains in the state of California subject to a personal property tax of the county in which it is located?

This question must be answered in the negative and is governed by the following pertinent rules of law:

[4] (1) The law is settled that a state or a subdivision thereof may not constitutionally levy a tax upon a thing during the time it retains its character as an import and remains the property of an importer in a warehouse in the original form or package in which it was imported. (Art. I, § 10, Constitution of the United States; Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L.Ed. 678, 684; F. May & Co. v. New Orleans, 178 U.S. 496, 507, 20 S.Ct. 976, 44 L.Ed. 1165.)

[5] (2) An original package as applied to interstate and international commerce is a package, bundle, or aggregation of goods put up in original form, covering, or receptacle for transportation and as a unit transported from one state or nation to another. It is the identical package delivered by the consignor to the carrier at the initial point of shipment in the exact condition in which it was shipped. (15 Corpus Juris Secundum, (1939), Commerce, § 28, p. 310; Guckenheimer v. Sellers, C.C.S.C., 81 F. 997, 1000.)

The case of Mexican Petroleum Corp. v. City of South Portland, 121 Me. 128, 115 A. 900, 26 A.L.R. 965, cited by respondent and apparently strenuously urged in the trial court, which reaches a contrary conclusion, has been expressly disapproved as the law in this state. (See Philippine Ref. Corp. v. Contra Costa County, 24 Cal.App. 2d 665, 669, 76 P.2d 163.)

[6] (3) The fact that a portion of shipments of goods is sold or offered for sale, leaving the remainder intact in their original packages does not make the balance subject to state taxation. (State v. Board of Assessors, 46 La.Ann. 145, 15 So. 10, 49 Am.St.Rep. 318, 320; Mexican Petroleum Corp. v. Louisiana Tax Commission, 173 La. 604, 138 So. 117, 120; City of Galveston v. Mexican Petroleum Corp., D.C.Tex., 15 F.2d 208.)

Applying the foregoing rules to the facts of the instant case, it is our opinion that the original package was each individual piece of lumber, since the lumber was not bundled or in any manner bound together and was the identical thing delivered by the consignor to the carrier at the initial point of shipment and it so remained at all times here in question. There can be no doubt that, had one piece of lumber alone been shipped, it would have constituted the original package and not been subject to taxation under the facts set forth above. Had two or three or a dozen pieces of lumber been shipped, it is likewise obvious that each individual piece of lumber would have constituted an original package. The fact that there were thousands of individual packages did not change the character of each piece of lumber as an original package. Therefore, under the first rule above stated the county was without authority to levy a tax upon the lumber which remained in the original packages and which had not, under the admitted facts, been mingled with the mass of property of this state.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and allow respondents a reasonable time within which to answer, if they be so advised.

ABROMS v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.

Civ. 13659.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 3, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 1, 1942.

1. Reformation of instruments 🔑26

Where husband and wife purchased single premium policy providing for life annuity to wife, and policy provided that annuitant might elect to receive a life annuity of which husband would not be beneficiary, or a refund annuity in lesser amount of which husband would be beneficiary, and husband and wife surrendered policy requesting refund annuity, and insurer in alleged fraud issued life annuity certificate, husband was a "party aggrieved" within section 3399 and entitled to bring an action to reform the policy to show husband's interest in the certificate. Civ.Code, §§ 3399–3402.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Party Aggrieved".

2. Reformation of instruments 🔑36(3)

An action to reform a contract is in equity and, to state cause of action, pleader must show that because of fraud or mutual mistake, or of mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected, there were omitted from instrument certain material terms. Civ.Code, § 3399.

3. Pleading 🔑214(2)

A demurrer admits all well pleaded allegations of complaint.

4. Appeal and error 🔑917(1)

On appeal from judgment dismissing an action after sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend complaint, it must be assumed that all the facts are as alleged.

5. Reformation of instruments 🔑36(3)

Husband's complaint, alleging that husband and wife had purchased single premium policy providing for life annuity to wife, that policy provided that annuitant might elect to receive a life annuity of which husband would not be beneficiary, or a refund annuity in lesser amount of which husband would be beneficiary, that husband and wife prior to wife's death surrendered policy for refund annuity and insurer fraudulently issued life annuity certificate, and that policy was the community property of husband and wife, stated cause of action for reformation of policy to show husband's beneficial interest in annuity certificate. Civ. Code, § 3399.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Abe Abroms against the New York Life Insurance Company for reformation of a policy. From judgments dismissing the action after a demurrer had been sustained without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed with directions.

Hearing denied; SHENK and EDMONDS, JJ., not participating.

A. Joseph Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve, Mumper & Hughes and Leo E. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from two judgments dismissing an action for reformation of an insurance policy after a demurrer had been sustained to appellant's complaint without leave to amend.

A single premium policy was purchased from respondent by appellant and his wife, Rose Abroms, on June 20, 1932, providing for the payment to Rose of a life annuity of $79.10 per month "commencing on the anniversary of this Policy upon which the Annuitant's age at nearest birthday is 60 years; but, at any time prior to the commencement of such Annuity payments, the Annuitant may, provided the Policy is then in force, elect in writing to receive in lieu thereof either:

"(1) A life Annuity, as shown in Schedule I hereof, or

"(2) A Refund Annuity as shown in Schedule II hereof.

"The Company further agrees to pay to Abraham Abroms, husband of the Annuitant, Beneficiary, in the event of the receipt of due proof of the death of the Annuitant, a Death Benefit as shown in Schedule III hereof, if such death shall occur prior to the due date of the first Annuity payment hereunder; or, if a Refund Annuity has been elected and such death shall occur on or after the due date of the first Annuity payment, the Company agrees to pay to said Beneficiary the Annuity payments, if any, becoming due after the death of Annuitant, as set forth in the provision hereof entitled 'Annuity Payments.'

"The Company, upon surrender of this Policy on the anniversary elected for commencement of Annuity payments hereunder, will issue a Certificate in lieu thereof setting forth the rights and benefits as stated herein.

"This contract is made in consideration of the application therefor and of the payment in advance of the single premium of $10,000.00 representing Ten Premium-Units of $1,000 each . . . This Policy takes effect as of the First day of July Nineteen Hundred and Thirty-two. . . ."

On July 1, 1939, Annuity Certificate No. 82810 was issued by the Company, reading in part as follows:

"Retirement Annuity Policy No. 82810, having been issued by the New York Life Insurance Company on the life of Rose Abroms, the Annuitant, and said Policy having been surrendered to said Company,

"And Dividends on Deposit, in the amount of Two Hundred Thirty-one Dollars and Thirty-six Cents ($231.36) having been applied in accordance with the written request of said Annuitant and the provisions of said Policy to increase the amount of the Annuity payments to the amount hereinafter set forth,

"And this Certificate having been issued in exchange for and in full settlement of said Policy,

"Said Company, in accordance with the request of said Annuitant and the provisions of said Policy, shall pay to said Annuitant, if living, a Life Annuity of Eighty Dollars and Sixty-two Cents ($80.62) payable monthly at the Home Office of said Company in the City and State of New York, as follows:

"The First Annuity payment of Eighty Dollars and Sixty-two Cents shall be made as of the First day of July, in the year Nineteen Hundred and Thirty-nine, and a like amount shall be paid monthly thereafter during the lifetime of said Annuitant. Said Annuity payments shall terminate with the last monthly payment due prior to the death of said Annuitant."

It is alleged in the complaint herein that on July 1, 1939 (the anniversary of the policy on which the age of annuitant Rose Abroms at her nearest birthday was 60 years) said annuitant and her husband, Abraham Abroms, the appellant herein, "went to the office of defendant in the City of Los Angles, County of Los Angeles, State of California, for the purpose of surrendering the aforementioned policy and receiving in lieu thereof a Certificate as described in said policy and which would provide for a refund annuity as shown in Schedule II of said policy whereunder the annuity payments would be payable to Rose Abroms as annuitant until her death, and upon her death there would be payable to the plaintiff as beneficiary the annuity payments becoming due after the death of Rose Abroms as set forth in the provision of said policy entitled 'Annuity Payments'; that the plaintiff and his said wife then and there informed the defendant and its agents and servants that they were desirous of surrendering the aforementioned policy for a Certificate providing for such refund annuity; that the defendant then and there issued to the plaintiff and his said wife a Certificate, copy of which is attached hereto, marked Exhibit 'B,' and by this reference made a part hereof, in lieu of the aforementioned policy and the plaintiff and his said wife then and there surrendered the aforementioned policy to the defendant; that the defendant and its servants and agents at the time of the issuance of said Certificate to the plaintiff and his said wife knew and were well aware of the fact that the plaintiff and his said wife had ordered a Certificate providing for a refund annuity as provided in said policy; that the defendant and its agents and servants nevertheless, at said time, falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiff and his said wife that said Certificate being so issued to the plaintiff and his said wife did in truth and in fact provide for a refund annuity as provided for in said policy wherein Rose Abroms would be the annuitant and the plaintiff the beneficiary; that the plaintiff and his said wife relied upon said representations and accepted said Certificate in full reliance upon said representations, and surrendered the aforementioned policy in full reliance upon said representations; that neither the plaintiff nor his said wife read or examined said Certificate either at the time of its issuance or at any time prior to the death of Rose Abroms because of their reliance upon the representations so made by the defendant and its agents and servants as aforesaid; that the defendant and its agents and servants induced the plaintiff and his said wife to accept said Certificate and to retain the same until after the death of Rose Abroms by means of their false and fraudulent representations aforesaid; that the Certificate issued to plaintiff and his said wife provided for a life annuity as provided for in said policy rather than the refund annuity ordered by plaintiff and his said wife; that the plaintiff and his said wife would not have ordered or accepted a life annuity Certificate and were at the time of the issuance of said Certificate and at all times thereafter until after the death of Rose Abroms, ignorant of the fact that the Certificate which was issued to them provided for a life annuity rather than a refund annuity." (Italics added.)

On May 16, 1941, the annuitant Rose Abroms died and "shortly after the death of said Rose Abroms, the defendant notified and informed the plaintiff that the Certificate which had been issued to them was in truth and in fact a life annuity Certificate rather than a refund annuity Certificate and then and there informed the plaintiff that the defendant would make no further payments under said Certificate or under the aforementioned policy; that the plaintiff first discovered that said Certificate so issued to plaintiff and his said wife as aforesaid provided for a life annuity rather than a refund annuity after the death of Rose Abroms when plaintiff consulted an attorney."

Demand for reformation of the certificate by appellant and refusal by the respondent to either reform or pay appellant any sum or sums of money are also alleged.

To this complaint respondent corporation interposed a general and special demurrer in support of which was submitted a memorandum of points and authorities to the effect (a) No one can maintain an action to reform a deed or other contract unless he has some title or interest therein; (b) Where the policy reserves to the insured the right to change the beneficiary, the interest of the beneficiary prior to the death of insured is a mere expectancy subject to revocation.

Said demurrer was argued and submitted on December 5, 1941, and on December 15, 1941, was sustained by the court without leave to amend; whereupon appellant moved the court for leave to file his first amended complaint, the original of which was attached to the notice of motion. Said motion was heard and denied by the court on December 31 and on January 5 and January 6, 1942, judgments dismissing said action were entered.

The first amended complaint in addition to the facts alleged in the original complaint averred that Rose and Abe Abroms were married in the year 1905 and continuously from that date until the death of Rose on May 16, 1941, said parties were husband and wife and lived together as such; that on July 7, 1941, appellant was appointed administrator of the estate of Rose Abroms, deceased, and that:

"Abe Abroms is suing herein both in his individual capacity in his own right, and as the duly appointed, qualified and acting administrator of the estate of Rose Abroms * * * deceased. * * *

"That the aforementioned policy number 82810 was at the time of its surrender and at the time of the issuance by the defendant of the aforementioned Certificate, the community property of the plaintiff, Abe Abroms, and his wife, Rose Abroms, and the plaintiff, Abe Abroms, had a community interest therein; that the plaintiff * * * at no time consented or agreed to the issuance by the defendant of the Certificate issued by defendant as above alleged * * * other than a Certificate pursuant to the terms of the aforementioned policy and which would provide for a refund annuity wherein Rose Abroms would be the annuitant commencing at her age sixty (60) and Abe Abroms, Individually and in his own right, the beneficiary; that the plaintiff * * * at no time consented to the surrender of the aforementioned policy except upon the condition that there be issued by the defendant in lieu thereof a Certificate providing for such refund annuity."

The questions for determination by this court appear to be: (1) Has appellant such an interest in the annuity certificate as to entitle him to maintain the present action? (2) Does the complaint sufficiently state a cause of action for reformation?

The gist of the instant action is the fraud of respondent corporation in issuing the wrong type of certificate which erroneously failed to name appellant, thus eliminating therefrom a statement of the benefits conferred upon him under the original policy in which he was the named beneficiary. Attention is here called to the statement in the original policy: "The Company, upon surrender of this Policy on the anniversary elected for commencement of Annuity payments hereunder, will issue a Certificate in lieu thereof setting forth the rights and benefits as stated herein." (Italics added.) Had respondent conformed to said provision and the alleged request of appellant and his wife, and had issued the refund annuity certificate, as requested, appellant would then have had a vested interest in the proceeds of the policy and unquestionably would have been the real party in interest in an action to recover the same.

In Cantlay v. Olds & Stoller Inter-Exchange, 119 Cal.App. 605, 7 P.2d 395, parties who were not designated as the named assureds in an automobile liability policy, but who alleged they were intended to have been insured under the policy, brought an action to reform it so as to show them as being insured and for enforcement of the policy as reformed. In affirming the judgment in favor of plaintiffs, the court said (119 Cal.App. page 617, 7 P.2d page 400): "In the instant case, although the policy of insurance is between the Eastman Company as the insured and the insurance company as the insurer, the allegations of the complaint set forth a beneficial interest therein, in favor of the plaintiffs, and they are therefore entitled to maintain this action."

In view of the terms of the original policy and the allegations of the complaint, it is not reasonable to assume that appellant and the annuitant, for the sole purpose of receiving $8.90 per month additionally, would elect to take a life annuity rather than a refund annuity certificate when such election would result in cutting off the right of appellant as beneficiary to receive the benefits which a refund annuity certificate would confer upon him at the death of the annuitant. According to the provision entitled "Annuity Payments" and the provisions of Schedule III shown in the original policy, the amount of the death benefit at the time of annuitant's death amounted to approximately $12,890. Respondent apparently paid annuitant the sum of $80.62 for twenty-three months, or a total of $1,854.26 which deducted from said death benefit left a balance of $11,035.74 remaining in the hands of respondent upon the death of the annuitant. If respondent's agents issued the Annuity Certificate here in question without an explanation to appellant and his wife of its ultimate effect, that act in itself would bring the parties within the provisions of section 3399 of the Civil Code.

The equitable action for reformation is preserved by sections 3399 to 3402, inclusive, of the Civil Code:

Section 3399, supra: "When, through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised, on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention, so far as it can be done without prejudice to rights acquired by third persons, in good faith and for value."

Section 3400, supra: "For the purpose of revising a contract, it must be presumed that all the parties thereto intended to make an equitable and conscientious agreement."

Section. 3401, supra: "In revising a written instrument, the court may inquire what the instrument was intended to mean, and what were intended to be its legal consequences, and is not confined to the inquiry what the language of the instrument was intended to be."

Section 3402, supra: "A contract may be first revised and then specifically enforced."

[1] From what has been said, it is obvious that appellant is a "party aggrieved" under section 3399, supra, especially where the demanded reformation is for the purpose of showing his beneficial interest in the Annuity Certificate according to the terms of the original policy.

Respondent urges that appellant has not alleged facts excusing the alleged failure of himself and his wife to read the Anuity Certificate. Upon this subject, the following excerpt is quoted from the opinion in the case of California Trust Co. v. Cohn, 214 Cal. 619, 627, 7 P.2d 297, 300: "We are inclined to the view therefore, that where the failure to familiarize one's self with the contents of a written contract prior to its execution is traceable solely to carelessness or negligence, reformation as a rule should be denied; but that where such failure, and perhaps negligence, is induced, as alleged and admitted by the demurrer in this case, by the false representations and fraud of the other party to the contract that its provisions are different from those set out, the courts, even in the absence of a fiduciary or confidential relationship between the parties, should reform, and in most cases have reformed, the instrument so as to cause it to speak the true agreement of the parties." (Citing authorities.) See, also, S. E. Slade Lbr. Co. v. National Surety Co., 128 Cal.App. 419, 425, 17 P.2d 775.

[2] An action to reform a contract is in equity, and in order to state a case therein, it is incumbent upon the pleader to show by direct averment that "by reason of fraud practiced by one of the parties, or of the mutual mistake of the parties or of a mistake of one of them, which the other at the time knew or suspected, there were omitted from the instrument certain material terms and conditions. In other words, that the language of the writing failed, for some reason, to express the intention of the parties." Pascoe v. Morrison, 219 Cal. 54, 56, 25 P.2d 9, 10.

In Johnson v. Sun Realty Co., 138 Cal. App. 296, 301, 32 P.2d 393, 395, wherein a demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, it was held: "The complaint [in an action for reformation] is sufficient if it shows, by direct averment, that by reason of fraud practiced by one of the parties the executed agreement is not the actual agreement. Pascoe v. Morrison [219 Cal. 54], 25 P.2d 9. This it does, for it is alleged that respondent falsely represented that the executed agreement was the one agreed upon, that appellant relied upon such misrepresentation and was induced thereby to sign. Cross v. Bouck, 175 Cal. 253, 165 P. 702."

In the late case of Genuser v. Ocean Acc., etc., Corp., 42 Cal.App.2d 673, 109 P. 2d 753, a complaint for reformation of an insurance policy was held sufficient against demurrer where it alleged (a) an intention and agreement of the plaintiff and defendant that an insurance policy cover plaintiff's automobile of a certain year and with a designated serial number, and (b) the issuance, through the mistake of the plaintiff known to the defendant, of a policy covering a car of a different year and with a different number which was not owned by plaintiff and in which he had no insurable interest.

[3, 4] Since the effect of a demurrer is to admit all of the allegations of the complaint which are well pleaded, it must be assumed on appeal from the judgment that all the facts are as alleged. 21 Cal.Jur. 96; Penziner v. West American Finance Co., 133 Cal.App. 578, 24 P.2d 501.

[5] A consideration of the allegations of the complaint having the above rule in mind has persuaded this court that the complaint herein states a cause of action for reformation; that respondent's demurrer thereto should have been overruled, and that appellant should have been permitted to file his first amended complaint.

For the reasons stated, the judgments of dismissal are reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and to permit appellant to file his first amended complaint, if he still desires to do so.

DORAN, J., and WHITE, J., concurred.

PEOPLE v. MORAGO.

Cr. 3617.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 6, 1942.

Criminal law 🔑1069(1)

Where defendant was convicted of felony in November, 1940, but was placed on probation and in March, 1942, probation was revoked and in April, 1942, the judgment of November, 1940, was ordered in full force and effect, and where only argument on appeal was with respect to validity of judgment of November, 1940, from which no appeal had been taken, the appeal was dismissed. Pen.Code, §§ 107, 1239.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Lawrence Pete Morago was convicted of escape from legal custody of an officer and from an order declaring the judgment in full force and effect after the revocation of probation, the defendant appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

Albert Flaxman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal having been by stipulation of the parties submitted for decision, and it appearing from the record that appellant was on November 25, 1940, convicted of a felony, towit, escape from the legal custody of an officer (Pen.Code, § 107) and was sentenced to state prison for the term prescribed by law, and that the execution of his sentence was suspended and probation granted on the same day; and it further appearing that thereafter on the 23rd day of March, 1942, probation was revoked and thereafter, on April 13, 1942, the judgment of November 25, 1940, was ordered in full force and effect, from which order appellant gave notice of appeal on the 17th day of April, 1942; and it further appearing from appellant's brief that no attack is made upon the order of April 13, 1942, and that his only argument is with respect to the validity of the judgment of November 25, 1940, from which no appeal was ever taken;

Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered and adjudged that the motion to dismiss is granted and that the appeal be and it is hereby dismissed. Pen.Code, § 1239; People v. Lewis, 219 Cal. 410, 27 P.2d 73; In re Herbert Collins, 8 Cal.App. 367, 370, 97 P. 188.

1. Guardian and ward 🔑163

Orders in guardianship proceeding approving guardian's account, and which had become final, could not be collaterally attacked in a subsequent probate proceeding, but could only be reviewed in a proper equity case if extrinsic fraud could be established.

2. Guardian and ward 🔑182(4)

In action against decedent's bondsman to recover alleged misappropriations of decedent as guardian, dismissal of the action with prejudice as against decedent's administrator eliminated all equitable features of the action intended to review final orders in guardianship proceeding on ground of extrinsic fraud, and the action became one at law against surety on the contract, and, without decedent as principal or his personal representative, decedent's liability, if any, could not be determined.

Guardian and ward 🔑163

Orders and decrees, in guardianship and probate proceedings, which approved decedent's account as guardian and administrator and which orders had become final, could not be collaterally attacked in an action at law against decedent's bondsman to recover alleged misappropriations of decedent as guardian.

4. Appeal and error 🔑681

In action against decedent's bondsman to recover alleged misappropriations of decedent as guardian, no breach of discretion was shown in refusing plaintiff's request to file amended complaint naming decedent's administrator as defendant, where record showed no notice of any motion to file such pleading and nothing to indicate that such pleading was presented to trial judge at time of such request nor was there anything to indicate a request to bring in additional parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action by F. L. From a judgment for defendant, rendered after sustaining objection to the introduction of evidence by plaintiff on the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, plaintiff appeals.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, in pro. per., for appellant.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll and Burton D. Wood, all of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent rendered on October 20, 1941, after its objection had been sustained to the introduction of any evidence by appellant on the ground that the second amended complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The second amended complaint contained two causes of action.

In the first cause of action it was alleged that Charles T. Chandler was administrator of the estate of Anna Baxter, deceased, from May 8, 1922, to the time of his death in 1935, at which time the estate had not been closed; that defendant had furnished his bond as such administrator; that on June 29, 1922, an inventory was returned in which the assets of the estate were appraised at $31,700.25; that other property of the estate valued at $16,623.25 was in the hands of Chandler which he failed to inventory; that he was indebted to the estate in that amount; that on May 11, 1925, Chandler, as administrator, made his first annual and final account and petition for distribution which did not include assets of the estate in his possession of the value of $17,237.08; that the account came on for hearing on August 16, 1938; that the court found that Chandler had received $32,279.81 belonging to the estate and had disbursed $31,665.98, leaving a balance of $623.83 for distribution. It was further alleged that the $17,237.08 belonging to the estate was concealed from the court and had been wrongfully appropriated by Chandler; that at the time of the commencement of this action (May 11, 1940) R. F. Smith was the administrator of the estate of Chandler; that plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Anna Baxter, deceased, presented a claim for $17,237.08 against the estate of Chandler which was allowed by Smith and approved by the probate court; that the approval thereof by the court was thereafter vacated; that on the 12th day of July, 1940, Smith was removed from his office and Kathleen C. Bach was appointed in his stead.

In the second cause of action it is alleged that on October 5, 1908, Anna Baxter was adjudged to be insane and incompetent; that John R. Baxter was appointed guardian of her person and estate and continued to act as such until his death in 1919, when Charles T. Chandler was appointed in his stead and continued to act as such until her death on March 2, 1922; that thereafter Chandler was appointed administrator of her estate; that defendant furnished his bond; that on June 5, 1922, Chandler filed his third annual and final account as guardian showing he had on hand assets of the estate in the sum of $31,295.25 when in fact he had assets of the value of $46,417.80, thus concealing assets of the value of $15,122.55; that his account was approved and he as guardian was ordered to turn over to himself as administrator the assets of the guardianship estate; that he failed and refused to deliver to himself as administrator assets of the value of $15,122.55 which he appropriated to his own use; that the heirs of Anna Baxter did not discover this misappropriation until June, 1937; that Chandler had rendered his final account in the estate of Anna Baxter, deceased, which had not been settled prior to his death; that on June 11, 1937, plaintiff was appointed administrator of the estate of Anna Baxter, deceased; that on September 10, 1937, R. F. Smith was appointed administrator of the estate of Chandler and filed an amended account showing that Chandler had received assets belonging to Anna Baxter of the value of $17,901.53 more than shown in Chandler's final account; that on August 16, 1938, both accounts came on for hearing and the probate court refused to settle the amended account filed by Smith, but did settle the account for the amount shown in the account filed by Chandler; that an appeal was taken from this order and it was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

A demurrer both general and special, including the plea of the statute of limitations was interposed to both causes of action. It was sustained to the first cause of action without leave to amend and was overruled as to the second cause of action. The minute order on the demurrer was made on January 27, 1941. A formal judgment of dismissal of the first cause of action was filed and entered February 3, 1941. No appeal was taken from this judgment.

On January 3, 1941, and prior to the ruling on the demurrer plaintiff had dismissed the action, with prejudice, against Kathleen C. Bach as administratrix of the estate of Charles T. Chandler, deceased. This left the Royal Indemnity Company, the surety on the bonds, as the sole defendant in the action.

The same questions presented here were before the Supreme Court in Re Estate of Baxter, 15 Cal.2d 166, 99 P.2d 276 (see, also, In re Estate of Baxter, Cal.App., 91 P.2d 962) with the parties here then before that court. The order of the probate court was affirmed. Additional facts appear in that opinion which need not be repeated here.

[1] It seems probable that this action was instituted in accordance with a suggestion contained in the opinion in Re Estate of Baxter, supra. As the orders and decrees in the guardianship proceeding had long since become final they could not be collaterally attacked in the probate proceeding. However they might be reviewed in a proper equity case if extrinsic fraud could be established.

It seems to have been the original intention of plaintiff to bring an equitable action to recover from the estate of Chandler and his bondsman, the money alleged to have been misappropriated belonging to Anna Baxter. While the pleading lacks many appropriate allegations we assume that such was the purpose of the instant action.

[2, 3] When the plaintiff dismissed with prejudice the action against Kathleen C. Bach as the administratrix of the estate of Chandler, deceased, he eliminated the equitable features from the case. It left the Royal Indemnity Company, the surety, as the sole defendant. The action then became one at law against the surety on its contract, without the presence of the principal or his personal representative and without any opportunity to determine, as against the principal, his liability to Estate of Baxter, if any. In this action at law against the surety, the plaintiff had confronting him the orders and decrees in the probate and guardianship proceedings which had long since become final and which could not be collaterally attacked in this action at law. In re Estate of Baxter, supra; In re Estate of Madsen, 31 Cal. App.2d 240, 87 P.2d 903. Those orders and decrees found in effect that Chandler had finally accounted for all of the estate of the incompetent in the guardianship and all of the estate of the deceased in the probate proceedings. Until set aside in a proper proceeding, defendant was entitled to full protection of those decrees. Under this state of the record when this came on for trial on October 17, 1941, the second amended complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and defendant's objection to the introduction of any evidence by plaintiff was properly sustained. The judgment was filed and entered on October 20, 1941.

[4] Plaintiff urges that the trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing to permit him to file a third amended complaint. The record contains an order dated November 14, 1941, denying a request to file such a pleading made on October 17, 1941. There is no notice of any motion to file such a pleading and nothing to indicate that any such pleading was presented to the trial judge at that time. There is nothing to indicate a request to bring in additional parties.

There is a pleading in the record denominated "Third Amended Complaint * * *" marked "Filed Oct. 21, 1941." It names The Royal Indemnity Company and Kathleen C. Bach, administratrix of the Estate of Charles T. Chandler, deceased, as defendants. There is nothing in the record to connect this pleading with the request to amend. After January 3, 1941, Kathleen C. Bach, as administratrix, was not a party to the action. No proceedings were had to again make her a party if it could have been done after the action against her had been dismissed "with prejudice."

Under these circumstances there was no breach of discretion in refusing the request to file a third amended complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action between joint adventurers associated together to promote the development through a corporation of plaintiff's contract rights to a patent, to recover damages sustained by plaintiff because defendants allegedly conspired to prevent plaintiff from deriving profit which he was to receive if certain amount of stock in corporation was sold and corporation profited from use of patented machines, evidence as to damage sustained by plaintiff was too speculative to support judgment for plaintiff. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by J. R. Ramsey against Willard W. Penry and others and W. West Hunt and another to recover for damages for alleged fraud in the attempted sale of stock of a corporation. From an adverse judgment, W. West Hunt and another appeal.

Judgment against appellants reversed.

Whitelaw & Whitelaw and Russell Yeager, all of El Centro, for appellants.

Wirt Francis, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal by W. West Hunt and Harold W. Hunt from a judgment against them and James Ebert for $3,750, in an action for damages for fraud which was alleged to have grown out of an attempt to sell the stock of a corporation. Ebert has not appealed.

George H. Woods was the inventor of a patented tool which had as its purpose the renovation of soil. On June 14, 1938, plaintiff and Woods entered into a contract whereby Woods granted plaintiff the right to purchase these soil renovators and the exclusive right to operate them throughout California except in the county of Ventura. The purchase price was fixed at 40 per cent above cost. Plaintiff obligated himself to order, pay for and accept deliveries of at least five of the soil renovators on or before June 30, 1939.

Plaintiff caused a corporation to be organized named the California Soil Sterilizing Corporation, Woods' Process, which we will call the corporation. He assigned his contract with Woods to this corporation on July 1, 1938.

Under date of July 7, 1938, the Commissioner of Corporations issued a permit for the corporation to sell not more than 37,500 shares of its stock for its par value of $1.00 per share and to pay a licensed broker or agent not to exceed 20 per cent of the selling price. Plaintiff was to receive one share of stock for each share sold for cash, his stock to be placed in escrow with an agreement waiving his right to participate in any distribution of assets of the corporation, "excepting dividends payable according to law," until the subscribers for stock (purchased for cash) should receive the return of the full amount of the purchase price. No certificates were to be delivered and no money paid to the corporation until $15,000, to be received from the sale of stock for cash, had been deposited with an escrow holder. By amendments to the permit the time to conform to its terms was fixed as of January 6, 1940.

Willard W. Penry and Verree A. Mason were licensed brokers doing business under the name of Penry & Mason. By an instrument bearing date June 18, 1938, Penry & Mason was appointed underwriter to distribute 37,500 shares of stock to the general public. There is nothing to indicate that this agency was exclusive or that the corporation could not employ other brokers or agents satisfactory to the Commissioner of Corporations to sell its stock.

James Ebert was a salesman employed by Penry & Mason to whom was delegated the duty of selling the stock. Only 2980 shares were sold. The selling campaign started on August 4, 1938.

W. West Hunt and Harold W. Hunt were brothers doing business in Imperial Valley under the firm name of Hunt Brothers. W. West Hunt subscribed and paid for 500 shares of stock and Harold W. Hunt subscribed and paid for 200 shares and took an option to purchase 4800 additional shares.

The first board of directors of the company was composed of J. R. Ramsey, who was president and acted as general manager, H. E. Trumbell and L. J. Penry. On September 28, 1938, Penry resigned and Harold W. Hunt took his place. As far as we are advised there was no other change in the membership of the board during the time involved here.

Prior to the incorporation of the company a soil renovator had been built and used for experimental purposes. This was destroyed by fire. A second was built which was also burned. A third machine was built by Hunt Brothers which was used for experimental purposes in Imperial Valley, and near Shafter in Kern County. None of the machines were built by Woods and none were ordered by the company from Woods.

Under date of November 15, 1938, Penry & Mason assigned to James Ebert the contract to sell the stock of the company. At that time Hunt Brothers paid Ebert $1,500. He in turn paid Penry & Mason $700 for the assignment, retaining the balance for his own use.

The purchase of the stock-selling contract was made pursuant to the terms of a contract between Ebert and Hunt Brothers, dated November 14, 1938, which contemplated it. In consideration of the payment of the $1,500, Ebert agreed to pay Hunt Brothers a variable percentage of the commissions to become due him for the sale of stock.

The evidence indicates that Hunt Brothers paid Ebert and Woods about $100 per month each as living expenses. We are not able to determine just when these payments were started.

There was little stock sold during the fall of 1938 and thereafter. Ramsey testified that in response to his inquiries, Ebert told him that such sales could not be made until the results of experiments made with the soil renovator in Imperial Valley became apparent; that the value of the renovator could not be determined until the crops planted on land renovated had matured. Ramsey further testified that during the last of February, 1939, Ebert told him there had been no attempt to sell stock for two and one-half months; that Hunt Brothers did not want any stock sold.

Under date of March 20, 1939, Woods and Ebert entered into a contract whereby Ebert was given the right to use the soil renovator in Ventura County. He agreed to purchase one machine from Woods at 40 per cent above the cost of manufacture.

Under date of July 1, 1939, Woods served a written notice of cancellation of the contract of June 14, 1938, because of the failure to purchase five soil renovators before June 30, 1939. A copy of this notice was served on the Commissioner of Corporations.

On November 24, 1939, Woods, Ebert, Harold W. and W. West Hunt entered into a contract concerning the soil renovator. This contract provided for the adjustment of certain outstanding rights to use the soil renovator, and interests in the patent, some of which were created by contracts which we do not find in the record. It provided for the formation of a corporation and the assignment of the patents to it; for division of the interests of the parties so that Woods would have 32½ per cent and each of the other three 22½ per cent, subject to certain small deductions. It was also agreed that a money judgment against Woods be paid and that Woods and Ebert each receive $100 per month. The money to pay the judgment was furnished by Hunt Brothers.

The trial court entered judgment in favor of Penry & Mason, and in favor of plaintiff, and against Ebert and W. West and Harold W. Hunt for $7,500. This judgment was based on findings of conspiracy between Ebert and the two Hunts which damaged plaintiff in destroying the value of his interest in the corporation; that such interest has "been rendered of no value, and plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of Seventy-five Hundred Dollars ($7500.00)" without any other finding of the value of such interest.

A motion for new trial was made. One finding was modified and new findings were made which completely changed the theory of the case. The reasons for this are stated in an opinion filed by the trial judge in which the following appears:

"Damages were allowed at the original trial upon the theory that plaintiff had been deprived of 7,500 shares of stock of the par value of $1.00 a share, and was damaged accordingly under the rule stated in Victor [Oil Co.] v. Drum, 184 Cal. 226, 193 P. 243, and Dicker v. Italo-American Oil Corporation, 119 Cal.App. 451, 6 P.2d 550.

"However, upon further consideration, on the motion for new trial herein, we are of the opinion that plaintiff's damage is more properly measured by his loss of time and money in his efforts to promote the enterprise, which the acts of defendant have cut off. What profits plaintiff might have made are speculative and uncertain. The loss of time and money is both definite and certain, and we have found it to be $3,750.00."

In the new findings is the following:

"That at all times between September 28th, 1938, and July 1, 1939, plaintiff and defendants James Ebert, Harold W. Hunt and W. West Hunt were joint adventurers associated together for the purpose of promoting the development through a corporation of the contract rights to U. S. Patent #2008891 as set out in the contract of June 14, 1938, by and between plaintiff and George H. Woods * * *.

"Plaintiff was damaged to the extent of $3,750.00 for time and money spent in promoting said contract rights to patent #2008891, which contract rights were made valuless to plaintiff by the acts of defendants Hunt Brothers and Ebert heretofore."

This is the first time that the question of a joint adventure was expressly injected into the case. Appellants urge that there are no allegations in the complaint of a joint adventure to support the new findings; that no right to amend was asked or given; that the findings of joint adventure are entirely without the issues made by the pleadings and unsupported by the evidence.

We do not consider it necessary to decide these questions. For the purpose of this opinion we will assume without holding that the complaint states a cause of action; that sufficient ultimate facts were alleged to support the finding of joint adventure; that the evidence supports the finding of joint adventure and conspiracy on the part of Ebert and the two Hunts. We will confine our consideration to the question of damages alleged and proved.

There were no special damages alleged in the complaint. There is only the allegation of general damage in the sum of $100,000.

[1] Evidence concerning the time and money expended in attempting to promote the affairs of the corporation was received over the strenuous objections of appellants. Special damages must be alleged or they cannot be recovered. San Mateo County v. Christen, 22 Cal.App.2d 375, 71 P.2d 88. Money spent in promoting the organization of a corporation to which certain contracts were to be assigned, has been held to constitute special damages that must be specially alleged in an action quite similar in principle to the instant case. Duell v. Sanstrom, 120 Cal.App. 414, 7 P.2d 1087.

[2] Damages for breach of an obligation arising from contract is an amount that will compensate the party aggrieved for all detriment proximately caused thereby. (§ 3300, Civ.Code.) The damages for a wrong not arising from contract should be an amount that will compensate the aggrieved party for all detriment proximately caused thereby. (§ 3333, Civ.Code.) It is also established that speculative damages may not be recovered. Taylor v. Hopper, 207 Cal. 102, 276 P. 990; Houghton v. Lawton, 63 Cal.App. 218, 218 P. 475; McGregor v. Wright, 117 Cal.App. 186, 3 P.2d 624.

In considering the measure of damages applied here we must observe that plaintiff had no agreement with any one for repayment of any money spent by him in organization expenses or promotion of sales of stock in the corporation. Nor was he to be compensated for time spent in those activities by payment of anything for those services. The only way in which plaintiff could have been compensated for those expenditures of time and money was by receiving the stock placed in escrow for him under the permit of the Commissioner of Corporations.

The hope of plaintiff to derive any profit from the venture is dependent on the happening of three major contingencies: (1) The sale of sufficient stock to cash purchasers so that $15,000 in cash could be deposited from such sales with the escrow holder. Before the deposit of such sum in escrow no money could be released to the corporation. (2) The successful operation of the soil renovator. (3) Sufficient contracts with agriculturists for renovation of soil at prices that would return a profit to the corporation.

Plaintiff attempted to show that sufficient stock could have been sold to permit the corporation to withdraw the money from escrow and start its operations. In doing this he testified concerning two prospective purchasers of stock. One was a "steel man" living in Hollywood, and the other was A. M. Presser.

Plaintiff did not know the name, address, or financial resources of this nebulous "steel man" who had been referred to by Hunt and Ebert in a conversation with plaintiff. This evidence is too unsubstantial to indicate that this person was even a fair prospect to whom stock might be sold.

The other prospective purchaser was A. M. Presser who was not called as a witness. Plaintiff testified that he met Presser when he was interested in investing $35,000 or $40,000 in real estate in San Diego; that he took Presser to Imperial Valley to investigate the soil renovator and introduced him to Ebert and the two Hunts; that Presser then forgot the real estate transaction and wanted to purchase the stock of the company instead; that Presser was ready, willing and able to purchase the stock but Ebert and the Hunts did not follow up and make the sale. On cross-examination he testified that he knew nothing of the worth of Presser, his financial ability or the amount of his assets; that he believed Presser had some money of his own and thought he was representing some wealthy man, without being able to give any ground for this belief. There is nothing substantial in this evidence to indicate that Presser was financially able to purchase the stock had he desired to do so.

If Presser in fact really wanted to purchase the stock, and had the means to make the purchase, there is no reason why the sale could not have been made. The Penry & Mason contract was not exclusive. The sale could have been made by the corporation through an agent or broker duly appointed for that purpose. The members of the Board of Directors were plaintiff, Trumbull and Hunt. There is nothing to suggest that Trumbull was not faithful to his trust as director of the corporation. He and plaintiff constituted a majority of the board of directors and they could have authorized the sale through an agent or broker over the objection of Hunt. They did nothing towards making the sale.

There is no substantial evidence in the record to show that the stock of the company could have been sold to Presser or anyone else had Ebert and the Hunts been faithful to the company and tried to sell the stock.

The evidence on the benefits to be derived from the use of the soil renovator is sharply conflicting. No finding was made on this question but had one been made to the effect that it accomplished the purposes for which it was manufactured such a finding would have had evidentiary support.

Plaintiff testified that several farmers wanted to contract for the use of the soil renovator at the price of $25 per acre; that it cost seven or eight dollars an acre to operate the machine. There is nothing to indicate the number of acres of land to be renovated if these offers could have been accepted so the prospective profits cannot be estimated. Further, to enter into these contracts and perform them, it would have been necessary for the company to have had a machine. It had no assets except the Woods contract assigned to it by plaintiff. It could obtain no money with which to acquire a machine except through sale of stock. Thus its ability to enter into and perform these contracts and reap a profit from them depended on its ability to sell its stock. As the evidence fails to show any ability to sell stock there is no showing of any ability to enter into and perform these contracts or profit from them. Thus there is no substantial evidence of any prospective profits from the operations.

[3] It follows that the evidence of any damage suffered by plaintiff from the wrongful acts of appellants, assuming that they were wrongful, is too speculative to support the judgment; that the trial court was correct when he concluded that "what profits plaintiff might have made are speculative and uncertain."

The portion of the judgment against appellants is reversed.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1942.

Hearing Granted Sept. 10, 1942.

1. Gaming 🔑75(1)

Under statute making it an offense for any person to keep or occupy any room or building with papers, apparatus or paraphernalia for purpose of recording bets upon result of any contest of speed of a beast, it is not a necessary element that a bet be recorded. Pen.Code, § 337a, subd. 2.

2. Gaming 🔑75(1)

In order to prove a violation on a particular day of statute making it an offense to occupy room or building with books, papers and paraphernalia for purpose of recording bets upon contest of speed of a beast, it is not necessary to establish that there was a race, or purported race on that day. Pen.Code, § 337a, subd. 2.

3. Gaming 🔑75(1)

Under statute providing that every person who keeps or occupies any room, building, etc., with papers, apparatus or paraphernalia for purpose of recording bets on result of any contest of speed of a beast is punishable by imprisonment, it is the keeping or occupancy of a room or place with papers or paraphernalia for purpose of recording bets that is denounced. ◆ Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; A. A. Scott, Judge.

Joseph Allen was convicted of occupying a storeroom with books, papers and paraphernalia for purpose of recording bets upon horse races, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was charged by information in three counts with violation of section 337a of the Penal Code as follows: Count I, violation of subdivision 2 in that he kept and occupied a storeroom with books, papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording bets upon horse races; Count II, violation of subdivision 3 in that he received and held money bet upon horse races; and Count III, violation of subdivision 4 in that he recorded bets upon horse races. The trial was by the court without a jury and defendant was convicted upon Count I and acquitted upon Counts II and III. His motion for a new trial was denied and judgment was pronounced sentencing him to the county jail for six months; probation was granted and execution of judgment was suspended for three years upon condition that he pay a fine of $200.

Appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment, and that the court erred in its rulings on the admissibility of evidence.

By stipulation the case was submitted upon the transcript of the proceedings at the preliminary hearing. That transcript shows that the only witness was a police officer called by the prosecution, and that the defendant did not testify or call any witnesses on his behalf. When the trial judge asked defendant's counsel, after having read the transcript, whether there was anything further as to Count I, it was stipulated that the defendant "would deny it."

The officer testified that on June 19, 1941, at about 2 p. m., he entered a store which had cigars, cigarettes, stationery and soda water for sale, and in which there was also a newstand and a miniature film business; that he saw the defendant standing on the inside of the cigar counter; that he saw one Cosgrove standing on the outside of the counter opposite defendant next to the cash register; that Cosgrove laid some money on the counter and, as the officer came by him, Cosgrove grabbed a piece of paper from the counter and tore it in half; that at the same time, defendant grabbed two pieces of paper and shoved them into his coat pocket; that the money, $2, was left on the counter; that he placed defendant and Cosgrove under arrest and called his associate officer who was in a car a short distance from the store; that there was an open scratch sheet dated June 19, 1941, on the counter in front of appellant and there were other scratch sheets, on the counter, stapled closed; that there were two blank pads on the counter, one by the cash register and the other farther down, which were similar in shape and size to the papers taken from defendant's pocket and to some of the papers in the groups of papers which were removed from the safe; that he took, as evidence, the two pieces of paper which defendant had put in his pocket, the torn pieces of paper which Cosgrove attempted to destroy, the open scratch sheet, the two one-dollar bills and the two blank pads which were on the counter; that he saw a piece of paper in a locked safe which was in the room and, by means of a hook made from a paper clip, he removed the paper from the safe and then he forced the safe open with a chisel and hammer and removed therefrom $174, a "group" of papers and four "packages" of papers. The articles taken by the officer, except the money from the safe, were received in evidence.

He testified further that he had been a member of the vice-squad of the police department of Los Angeles for four and a half years, had arrested persons charged with bookmaking, had testified in court as to the investigations pursuant to the arrests and was familiar with the manner in which bookmaking was customarily conducted in Los Angeles County; that a scratch sheet contains the names, weather conditions at various race tracks, the post time and distance of horse races, the numbers and names of race horses, the jockeys' names, the track odds, the handicapper's selections and the weight carried by each horse; that the open scratch sheet, which was upon the counter, was such a scratch sheet, was known as the "National Scratch Sheet" and was sold in almost every newstand in Los Angeles; that there was a common practice among bookmakers for recording bets and the two pieces of paper which were taken from defendant's pocket conform with that practice and were commonly known as betting markers; that upon one of such papers there were numbers and words as follows: "714, Testa, to 751, West Acres," and under those numbers and words there were the words "Win" and "Place", and after the word "Win" there was the number "1" and under the word "Place" there was the number "1", and after these was the letter "X", and under all of the numbers and words there was a line under which were the initials "C. J."; that the symbols on that paper mean a two-horse parlay, which is a bet on two horses and if the bet on the first horse is won, the proceeds therefrom are then placed on the second horse and, if that horse wins, the better collects the total amount the second horse pays; that the second paper taken from defendant was in the same form as the other one taken from defendant, except with different numbers and names of horses, and it was also a two-horse parlay; that the names of the horses on the betting markers taken from defendant were on the National Scratch Sheet, dated June 19, 1941, which was open on the counter in front of appellant; that the paper taken from the safe by means of the hook was also a betting marker, bearing a number "711" which indicated the number of the horse, a letter "X" which indicated there was no bet in the win position, and the figure "2" which indicated there was a $2 bet on the horse to "place", or run second, but that the numbers and letters on that marker were not on the open scratch sheet which was upon the counter; that another paper, with the names "Little Ruler" and "Wilderbust" thereon, which was among the papers taken from the safe, was also a betting marker in the same form as those taken from defendant, and the names thereon were on the open scratch sheet; that the piece of paper torn by and taken from Cosgrove, bearing the terms "Mad Crusader" and "Southern Belle," was also a betting marker in the same form as those taken from defendant, and the names thereon were on the open scratch sheet; that in a conversation when Cosgrove and the defendant were present, Cosgrove said, in response to a question by the officer, "Allen is my banker, I owed him $2.00 and that's why I put it (the money) down in front of him," and in response to a question by the officer, concerning the reason he tore the betting marker, Cosgrove said, "I had to tear it up, I had to tear that bet up."; that defendant said that was his (defendant's) place of business and "I run it,"; that the officer asked defendant how the bet happened to get into the safe and he said "That bet you took out of the safe must be something I put in there a long time ago."; that the defendant said he never had a key to the safe, that he had moved there about two years ago and the safe had never been opened; that later the officer asked defendant "* * * how that stuff happened to be in there (the safe) for recent dates," and he said, "A bookmaker leaves this stuff every night," and that he did not know the bookmaker's name; that the officer was there from 2 p. m. until 4:15 p. m., during which time there were several incoming telephone calls, and several persons who called would not give any conversation.

Cosgrove was charged, based upon the circumstances above related, with making a bet on a horse race. He was tried jointly with defendant and was acquitted.

Appellant argues that the conviction cannot be sustained because it was not shown (1) that appellant recorded a bet, (2) that there was a horse race or purported horse race on June 19, 1941, or (3) that the premises were used for the purpose of recording bets.

Subdivision 2 of section 337a of the Penal Code provides that every person, "Who, whether for gain, * * * gratuitously, or otherwise, keeps or occupies, for any period of time whatsoever, any room, * * building, * * * place, * * * or inclosure, of any kind, or any part thereof with * * *, paper or papers, apparatus, * * * or paraphernalia, for the purpose of recording or registering any bet or bets, or any purported bet or bets, * * * upon the result or purported result, of any * * * contest, * * * of skill, speed or power of endurance of * * * beast, * * *" is punishable by imprisonment. It is provided further in said section 337a that, "This section shall apply not only to persons who may commit any of the acts designated in * * * this section, as a business or occupation, but shall also apply to every person * * * who may do in a single instance any one of the acts specified * * *."

[1] It is not a necessary element of the offense denounced in subdivision 2 of said section 337a that a bet be recorded. People v. Manning, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 41, 43, 98 P.2d 748.

[2] In order to prove that said subdivision 2 was violated on a particular day it is not a requirement that it be established there was a race or purported race on that day. People v. Sutherland, 1922, 59 Cal.App. 462, 463, 210 P. 965; People v. Hinkle, 1923, 64 Cal.App. 375, 380, 221 P. 693.

[3] It is the keeping or occupancy of a room or place with paper, papers or paraphernalia for the purpose of recording bets on horse races, among other kinds of contests, that is denounced by subdivision 2 of said section 337a. People v. Manning, supra, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 41, 43, 98 P.2d 748; People v. Hinkle, supra, 1923, 64 Cal. App. 375, 380, 221 P. 693.

[4, 5] Although it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that the place was kept or occupied for the purpose set forth in said subdivision 2 it was not necessary to make this proof by direct evidence. People v. Tuttle, 1938, 27 Cal.App.2d 647, 649, 81 P.2d 571. The purpose in keeping or occupying the place could be determined from the surrounding circumstances shown in evidence. People v. Tepper, 1940, 36 Cal.App.2d 525, 527, 97 P.2d 1002.

The appellant kept and occupied a storeroom. When the officer approached the counter therein, behind which appellant was standing, appellant grabbed two betting markers from the counter and shoved them into his (appellant's) pocket. On the counter, at the place where appellant was standing, there was an open scratch sheet of that date which included the same names of horses as those names on the betting markers which appellant grabbed. Also at that place on the counter there were two one-dollar bills and a blank pad similar in shape and size to the betting markers. A group of papers taken from the locked safe in the room included some papers which were similar in size to the betting markers grabbed by appellant and to the papers in the blank pad on the counter. One of the papers from this group, which was described particularly, was a betting marker and the horse's name thereon was also on the scratch sheet that was on the counter. The paper taken from the safe by means of a hook, before the safe was opened, was a betting marker. In referring to the business defendant said it was his and, "I run it." The safe was in defendant's place of business. In the safe there were betting markers upon which were names of horses corresponding with names of horses on the scratch sheet in front of defendant. He made conflicting statements relative to the opening of the safe. One statement was that he had been there two years and "the safe had never been opened." Another statement was that the bet which was taken out of the safe must be something "I put in there a long time ago." A later statement was (referring to the "stuff" in the safe) "A bookmaker leaves this stuff every night." Several persons who called on the telephone would not give any conversation. Defendant made no response when Cosgrove said, "Allen is my banker, I owed him $2.00 and that's why I put it down in front of him," and "I had to tear that bet up."

In the case of People v. Manning, supra, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 41, at page 43, 98 P.2d 748, at page 749, it was said, "It is not the actual making of the bets, but the occupancy of a room with a book or books, paper or papers, etc., for the purpose of recording such bets, which constitutes the offense denounced by subdivision 2 of section 337a of the Penal Code."

[6] The circumstances were sufficient to warrant the trial court in finding that one of the purposes of defendant in occupying the room was to register bets on horse races. There was direct evidence that appellant, at the time of his arrest, attempted to conceal on his person two papers of the kind and form customarily used in recording bets on horse races. Also there was direct evidence that another paper, known as a scratch sheet, was open on the counter immediately in front of appellant.

In this case, as stated in People v. Hinkle, 1923, 64 Cal.App. 375, at page 380, 221 P. 693, at page 695, (which involved a similar charge, a betting marker and similar proof), "It is hardly to be supposed that one innocently in possession of such a paper would seek to conceal it from the police officers, as defendant did."

In addition to the direct evidence, the circumstantial evidence pointed convincingly to the correctness of the conclusion of the trial court. As above shown, such circumstantial evidence included that relating to the ownership and control of the safe, the groups of papers in it which included betting markers and papers referred to by appellant as "stuff" put there by a bookmaker, the contradictory statements by appellant about opening or not opening the safe, the blank pads similar to the betting markers, and the several incoming telephone calls in which there was no conversation.

[8] The police officer, in the performance of his duties over a period of several years, had become familiar with the papers, books and paraphernalia ordinarily used by bookmakers. He was qualified to testify as to the custom or manner in which bookmakers operated and it was proper to permit the officer to explain the nature and character of the papers taken from appellant and his place of business and to state his opinion with reference to the significance attaching to the letters and figures which appeared thereon. People v. Hinkle, supra, 1923, 64 Cal.App. 375, 379, 221 P. 693.

The testimony of the police officer was not contradicted by the defendant except insofar as the stipulation that defendant "would deny it" may be regarded as a contradiction. It is not clear whether it was intended by the stipulation that defendant would deny all of the testimony of the officer or only a part of it. If it was intended by such stipulation that defendant would deny all of the testimony, including such testimony as that defendant was present, it would indicate, under the circumstances here presented, that the trial court would have been justified in disregarding the whole of his testimony. If it was intended that he would deny only a part of the testimony, that part cannot be ascertained and upon the record thus presented, if such denial relates only to an undesignated part of the testimony, it must be regarded that the testimony of the officer was uncontradicted.

[10] If the circumstances shown in evidence reasonably justify the finding of guilt by the trial court, a reviewing court is not warranted in disturbing the finding even though those circumstances also might be reconciled reasonably with the innocence of defendant. People v. Newland, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 678, 104 P.2d 778.

[11, 12] Appellant asserts that the trial court erred in receiving in evidence a paper referred to as an Ajax Turf Bulletin scratch sheet which was not found in appellant's place of business but was obtained elsewhere. The case was submitted to the trial court, as above stated, upon the transcript of the preliminary hearing. An objection was made at the preliminary hearing to the offer of that bulletin in evidence but such an objection was not made at the trial. "A party cannot on appeal rely on errors * * * whose consequences could have been avoided by timely protest to the trial court, when he remains silent at the trial." People v. Cohen, 1931, 113 Cal.App. 260, 263, 298 P. 114, 115. However, irrespective of such bulletin, there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court and no prejudicial error resulted by reason of such bulletin even if the trial court considered that it was in evidence.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

UNION PAC. R. CO. et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

Civ. 13592.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Aug. 10, 1942.

1. Licenses 🔑11(1)

Where flowing oil wells were drilled from locations within the city of Los Angeles directionally so as to penetrate an oil producing zone at points within adjoining city of Long Beach, the wells were "located" within former city within an ordinance of that city requiring payment of a license fee by persons producing oil from any well located in the city, and hence owners of wells were liable to city for such fee.

> The word "locate" ordinarily has reference to the location of an object upon the surface of the ground and means to designate the site or place of; to define the location or limits of, as by a survey; * * * in passive, to have place or seat.
> See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Locate".

2. Licenses 🔑11(1)

An ordinance requiring payment of a license fee by persons producing oil from any well located in the city must be construed in accordance with intention which is discernible from its terms.

3. Licenses 🔑11(1)

An ordinance requiring payment of a license fee by persons producing oil from any well located in the city could not be construed as being inapplicable to production from wells surfaced within city but drawing oil from points outside city on theory that failure to specifically describe such wells in ordinance manifested an intention to exclude them from its operation.

4. Licenses 🔑11(1)

Under an ordinance requiring payment of a license fee by persons producing oil from any well located in the city, it was not the act of producing oil that was licensed but the business of producing oil from wells located within the city.

5. Licenses 🔑6(2)

An ordinance requiring payment of a license fee by persons producing oil from any well located in the city, when construed as being applicable to flowing oil wells surfaced within the city but drawing oil from points outside the city limits, was not void as in excess of authority which might be delegated by legislature to a municipality and as an attempt by city to exact a license tax for a business operated outside of city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, and another, against the City of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, respecting defendant's right to collect license fees from plaintiffs. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., Frederick von Schrader, Asst. City Atty., Clyde P. Harrell, Jr., Deputy City Atty., and Bourke Jones, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. E. Bennett, Malcolm Davis, and Edward C. Renwick, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHINN, Justice.

This case was tried upon stipulated facts. Plaintiff Union Pacific Railroad Company owns and operates a number of oil wells and plaintiff Las Vegas Land and Water Company owns one well, which is operated for it by its co-plaintiff, drilled from locations within the City of Los Angeles directionally so as to penetrate an oil producing zone at points wholly within the adjoining City of Long Beach. The entire production of the wells comes from this zone and from depths of from 3,000 to 4,000 feet. The casing is so perforated and packed that one of the wells produces from a section of the zone in the City of Long Beach 145 feet at the top and 230 feet at the bottom, measured horizontally from the common boundary line of the two cities; the section of the zone from which the second well produces is located at the top 325 feet and at the bottom 409 feet from the Los Angeles boundary and the third well produces from the same zone as the other two in a section which at the top is 170 feet and at the bottom 320 feet within the boundaries of Long Beach. All three are flowing wells and the oil, while coming from the sections of the structure lying wholly within the City of Long Beach, is produced at the surface within the City of Los Angeles. The wells were drilled at their surface locations because the owners at the time were unable, because of a restrictive ordinance and inability to reach an agreement with the City of Long Beach, to obtain permits from that city for the drilling of wells therein. Plaintiffs therefore obtained permits from the City of Los Angeles for the location, construction, maintenance and operation of oil well derricks for said wells and for the drilling for oil in such surface locations, in compliance with the terms of the Municipal Code and upon payment of the fees pertaining thereto. The principal California offices of both corporations and all of the management activities pertaining to the operation of oil lands are located in the City of Los Angeles. The stipulation of facts contains the following:

"Oil produced by the Union Pacific Railroad Company from its wells in the Wilmington Oil Field is gathered and distributed as follows: The oil from each well flows naturally or is pumped through a pipe line to two 250-barrel capacity gauging tanks. With respect to almost all wells, each well is served by its own group of two gauging tanks. In one case only, several wells are served by the same gauging tank. The oil, after being gauged in the gauging tanks, is pumped through connecting pipe lines to a larger group of 2,000 barrel capacity tanks, known as 'shipping stations,' several of which are located in the Wilmington Oil Field. From the shipping stations the oil is pumped through pipe lines to the receivers and purchasers thereof. The surface equipment incidental to the operation of each of the three wells in question consists of a derrick, two gauging tanks and the pipe line connecting the well and the gauging tanks. All this surface equipment for these three wells is located in the City of Los Angeles. The oil produced by LVL&W Well No. 1 is pumped from its gauging tanks into Shipping Station No. 1, which is located in the City of Los Angeles. The oil produced by U. P. Well No. 20 and U. P. Well No. 47 is pumped from their respective gauging tanks to Shipping Station No. 3, which is located in the City of Los Angeles.

"The gathering system, consisting of gauging tanks, shipping stations, power units and pipe lines owned and operated by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the Wilmington Oil Field for the purpose of gathering the oil produced by its various wells and transporting the same to its purchasers in constructed and operated without regard to the common boundary line of the City of Los Angeles and the City of Long Beach. For instance, U. P. Well No. 96 is located entirely within the City of Long Beach and the gauging tanks for this well are located at a distance of approximately 375 feet therefrom and wholly within the City of Los Angeles. Likewise U. P. Well No. 102 is located wholly within the City of Long Beach and its gauging tanks are located 700 feet distant in the City of Los Angeles.

"All oil produced by wells owned and operated by Union Pacific Railroad Company in that portion of the City of Long Beach north of the Cerritos Channel, consisting of 27 wells, is pumped from the various gauging tanks of the said respective wells to Shipping Station No. 3, which is located in the City of Los Angeles. All oil from wells owned and operated by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in that portion of the City of Long Beach lying south of the Cerritos Channel, comprising 32 wells, is pumped from the various gauging tanks of the said respective wells to Shipping Station No. 5, which is located within the City of Los Angeles. All oil produced by Las Vegas Land and Water Company and Union Pacific Railroad Company in the Wilmington Oil Field is delivered to the purchasers thereof from shipping stations located in the City of Los Angeles."

The city is attempting to collect from plaintiffs license fees for engaging in the business of producing oil, measured in part by the production from said three wells, under certain provisions of the Municipal Code which provide that no person shall engage in any business required to be licensed under the ordinance without first obtaining a license authorizing them to engage in the licensed business and that "the fees required to be paid for each of the several businesses licensed under the provisions of this ordinance are prescribed in the following sections." Section 21.124 reads: "For every person producing oil from any well located in the City of Los Angeles, the sum of $2.00 per quarter for each such well producing four hundred (400) barrels or less of oil per quarter, plus ½¢ per barrel of oil produced by each such well in excess of four hundred (400) barrels per quarter."

The judgment of the trial court declares that said section 21.124 "is inapplicable to oil wells drilled from surface locations in the City of Los Angeles in a directional manner so as to, and which, do produce oil from oil-bearing sands or zones which are penetrated by such wells at locations without the boundaries of the City of Los Angeles, and that accordingly

"1. The plaintiff, Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, is not required and shall not be required to pay to the defendant, City of Los Angeles, the license fees provided for in said Section 21.124 with respect to each of those two certain oil wells owned by the said plaintiff known as 'Union Pacific Well No. 20' and 'Union Pacific Well No. 47', or with respect to oil produced or which shall in the future be produced from each of said two oil wells, or for the privilege of producing oil therefrom, each of which wells was drilled from a surface location in the City of Los Angeles in a directional manner so as to and which do penetrate and produce oil from oil-bearing sands or zones located in the City of Long Beach.

"2. The plaintiff, Las Vegas Land and Water Company, a corporation, is not required and shall not be required to pay to the defendant, City of Los Angeles, the license fees provided for in said Section 21.124 with respect to that certain oil well owned by said plaintiff known as 'Las Vegas Land and Water Company Well No. 1', or with respect to oil produced or which shall in the future be produced from said oil well, or for the privilege of producing oil therefrom, which said well was drilled from a surface location in the City of Los Angeles in a directional manner so as to, and which does, penetrate and produce oil from oil-bearing sands or zones located in the City of Long Beach."

[1] Whether these declarations are correct is the first question in the case and this raises the inquiry whether the license fee required by ordinance to be paid for the business in which plaintiffs are severally engaged applies to plaintiffs so far as these three wells are concerned as persons "producing oil from any well located in the City of Los Angeles." Union Pacific Railroad Company owns and operates 59 wells located and producing oil entirely within the adjoining City of Long Beach and 86 wells located and producing oil entirely within the City of Los Angeles, that is to say, the entire bore of each of these wells is so located. The city charges no business license fee measured by the production from the 59 wells located in Long Beach but does charge said plaintiff, computed as provided in the ordinance, for the 86 wells located in the City of Los Angeles. The Municipal Code does not recognize as a special class wells drilled from locations within the city but bottomed and produced from areas outside of the city boundaries. The question therefore is whether within the meaning of the ordinance such wells are located within the city. We think they are. Certainly they are not located outside of the city. They are within the city just as a telephone line would be or an interurban railway, highway or pipe line would be which extended through a portion of the city and into surrounding territory. In ordinary affairs it would be quite customary, we think, to speak of the point where a bore for an oil well was started, from which the work of drilling was carried on, from which the well was operated, and where production came to the surface as the point where the well was located. The word ordinarily has reference to the location of an object upon the surface of the ground. Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, defines the word "locate," in the sense here intended, "To designate the site or place of; to define the location or limits of, as by a survey; * * * in passive, to have place or seat."

[2, 3] The ordinance must be construed in accordance with the intention which is discernible from its terms. Plaintiffs contend that if it had been intended in computing the license fee to include production from wells surfaced within the city and drawing oil from points outside of the city, such wells would have been specifically described and that therefore it appears to have been the intention to exclude such wells from the operation of the ordinance. We think a contrary view is more reasonable. Considering the purpose of the ordinance, no good reason exists why such wells should have been excluded, with the resulting discrimination in favor of operators of wells like those of plaintiffs. The more reasonable view would seem to be that there was no intention to exclude such directionally drilled wells. Such wells are not uncommon and the fact that no special provision was made for them would indicate that they were considered as wells located at the several points upon the surface from which they were drilled and would necessarily have to produce.

[4] It must be borne in mind that it is not the act of producing oil that is licensed but it is the business of producing oil from wells located within the city. Los Angeles Brewing Co. v. Los Angeles, 1935, 8 Cal. App.2d 379, 48 P.2d 65; McAdams Oil Co. v. Los Angeles, 1939, 32 Cal.App.2d 359, 89 P.2d 729; Barker Bros., Inc., v. Los Angeles, 1938, 10 Cal.2d 603, 609, 76 P.2d 97; Utilities Natural Gas Co. v. State, 1938, Tex.Civ.App., 118 S.W.2d 927. Certainly the business of the plaintiffs of producing oil is carried on in the City of Los Angeles and a part of it consists of the operation of the wells in question; the production only furnishes a basis for measuring the tax on the privilege of carrying on the business.

It is pointed out by the city that oil is "produced" when it is captured and brought to the surface and not until then (see Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County, 1909, 155 Cal. 140, 144, 99 P. 483, 20 L.R. A.,N.S., 211, quoted by the Supreme Court in County of Ventura v. Barry, 1929, 207 Cal. 189, 192, 277 P. 333; Stone v. City of Los Angeles, 1931, 114 Cal.App. 192, 202, 299 P. 838; Callahan v. Martin, 1935, 3 Cal.2d 110, 117, 43 P.2d 788, 101 A.L.R. 871. But we regard the determinative fact to be that the oil from plaintiffs' wells is produced from wells located within the city.

We entertain no doubt that so far as the three wells are concerned plaintiffs are engaged in the business of producing oil from wells located within the City of Los Angeles and that it matters not that the oil itself originates in a section of a zone outside of the city.

[5] It is also contended by respondent, although this point was not decided by the trial court, that a construction of the ordinance making it applicable to these wells which draw oil from outside the city limits would render it void as being in excess of the authority which may be delegated by the legislature to a municipality. The argument assumes that the city by the ordinance is attempting to exact a license tax for a business operated outside of the City of Los Angeles, and it is contended that it has no power to do this. Plaintiffs' business, including the operation of the wells in question, is within the city. Although the product to which the business relates originates outside of the city, it comes into possession of plaintiffs from the wells at the surface. It seems to us that plaintiffs are in the same position as any merchant is who pays a license fee for the privilege of carrying on business in the city and whose business consists in part of handling merchandise which originates at points outside of the city. The receipt of merchandise purchased outside of the city would not be the conduct of business outside of the city, and from the fact that the oil originates from plaintiffs' wells in the territory of Long Beach it does not follow that as to those wells plaintiffs are engaged in business outside of Los Angeles city.

The facts of the instant case are not at all comparable to those in Matter of Application of Smith, 1917, 33 Cal.App. 161, 164 P. 618, relied upon by plaintiffs, in which the court held void an ordinance of the city of Tropico which attempted to exact license fees for the privilege of operating a motor bus through the city of Tropico as an incident to the business of transporting passengers between the cities of Bakersfield and Los Angeles. Even if it were conceded that as to the three wells in question plaintiffs are also engaged in business in the City of Long Beach, their contention is fully answered by the decision in California F. S. Co. v. Santa Monica, 1929, 206 Cal. 714, 275 P. 948.

The judgment is reversed.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 27, 1942.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑1000(5)

In taxpayer's action to enjoin execution of contracts for installation of parking meters or to enjoin their performance on ground that another meter manufacturer was the lowest responsible and reliable bidder, trial court properly found that parts to be furnished and the services to be rendered by the successful bidders and by the unsuccessful bidder varied so much that there was no sufficient basis furnished upon which to prepare the bid.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑241

The term "lowest responsible bidder" as used in city charters with respect to competitive bidding means the lowest bidder whose offer best responds in quality, fitness and capacity to the particular requirements of the proposed work, and that where by the use of such term the council has been invested with discretionary power as to which is the lowest responsible bidder having regard to the quality and adaptability of the article to the particular requirements of its use, such discretion will not be interfered with in the absence of direct averment and proof of fraud.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Lowest Responsible Bidder".

3. Municipal corporations 🔑241

The phrase "lowest bidder" as used in municipal charters with respect to competitive bidding means that in determining whether a bid is the lowest among several others there may be cases where the quality and ability of the thing offered may be considered.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Lowest Bidder".

4. Municipal corporations 🔑241

Where city invited bid for not less than 1,000 parking meters from each bidder and failed to specify that the award might be divided between two or more bidders, each receiving less than the total number, and the awards were so divided between two rival bidders, the result was the same as though there had been no advertisement for a bid.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑236

The nature of parking meters is such that it is impossible to draw specifications to permit any competitive bidding because each meter is covered by a patent and specifications particularly describing one meter would necessarily exclude others.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑236

An exception to the rule requiring letting of contracts by municipalities to lowest responsible bidder is where it is undesirable or impossible to advertise for bids for particular work.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑236

Where evidence failed to show that parking meters had been developed to the point where there was any reasonable basis of comparison between those which operate satisfactorily, advertising for bids by city was not necessary.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑993(2)

Where contracts had already been executed by city they could not be enjoined in taxpayer's action.

9. Injunction 🔑22

An act already performed cannot be prevented by injunction.

10. Evidence 🔑25(2)

The court would judicially notice that meters in plain view had already been installed by a city.

11. Municipal corporations 🔑993(2)

In taxpayer's suit to enjoin execution of contracts for installation of parking meters or to enjoin their performance, injunction would be denied where contracts had been executed and installed and meters would soon be paid for out of earnings.

12. Appeal and error 🔑882(5)

Plaintiff could not complain on appeal of ruling sustaining a demurrer to his third cause of action where court had given him five days in which to amend and no amendment had been attempted.

13. Municipal corporations 🔑1000(5)

Demurrer to third cause of action in taxpayer's suit to enjoin city from executing or performing contracts for installation of parking meters was properly sustained where no facts were alleged showing fraud but only innuendos and legal conclusions were relied on by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by A. E. Hodgeman, etc., against the City of San Diego and others to enjoin the execution of contracts between the City of San Diego and Duncan Meter Corporation and the Karpark Corporation for the installation of parking meters in the City of San Diego, or to enjoin their performance. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles B. Provence and William J. Adams, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Jacob Weinberger, City Atty., and Morey S. Levenson and William H. Macomber, Deputies City Atty., all of San Diego, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment refusing to enjoin the execution of contracts between the City of San Diego and the Duncan Meter Corporation and the Karpark Corporation for the installation of parking meters in the city of San Diego, or, if the contracts had been executed, to enjoin their performance.

The Duncan Meter Corporation is the manufacturer of the Miller Multiple Coin parking meter which is manually operated. The Karpark Corporation is the manufacturer of the Karpark parking meter which is a multiple coin automatic meter. Both companies also manufacture single coin meters. The individual defendants are officers of the city of San Diego.

Plaintiff is a resident and taxpayer of the city of San Diego and the local agent of the Dual Parking Meter Company, the manufacturer of the Dual parking meter which is a multiple coin automatic meter. It also made a single coin meter.

In 1940, the Board of Harbor Commissioners of San Diego had eighty parking meters of different makes installed along the harbor front. In 1941, the city council decided to install parking meters on some of the downtown streets.

Section 94 of the city charter provides in part as follows:

"CONTRACTS. In the construction, reconstruction, or repair of public buildings, streets, utilities and other public works, and in furnishing any supplies, materials, equipment or contractural services for the same, or for other use by the City, when the expenditure therefor shall exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, the same shall be done by written contract, except as otherwise provided in this Charter, and the Council on the recommendation of the Manager or the head of the Department in charge, if not under the Manager's Jurisdiction, shall let the same to the lowest responsible and reliable bidder, not less than ten days after advertising for six consecutive days in a newspaper of a general circulation in the City for sealed proposals for the work contemplated. * * * All contracts entered into in violation of this Section shall be void and shall not be enforceable against said City; * * *."

Specifications for bidders were prepared and a notice of the time and place of receiving bids was published. The specifications were most general in form and designedly so to permit all manufacturers of various types of parking meters to submit bids. The original specifications described only single coin meters. An addendum was prepared calling for bids on multiple coin meters, that is, those operated by both pennies and nickels. This addendum was submitted to all bidders.

Bids were requested on not less than one thousand meters and were to be on the basis of what was in effect an option to purchase rather than an immediate purchase. The meters were to be installed and operated over a period of six months with the right in the city to cancel the contract and require the removal of all meters within a specified time thereafter. The meters were to be paid for out of the revenue derived from their operation rather than from the general revenues of the city. Multiple coin meters were finally selected and installed so we need give no further attention to bids submitted for single coin meters.

Each bidder submitted a sample parking meter which, while not installed on the street, was inspected and operated by city officers. The operation of two makes were found to be unsatisfactory and they were not considered. One of these meters was supposed to be an infringement on the patent of another manufacturer. No point is made of the rejection of the bids to furnish the two unsatisfactory meters.

A committee was selected to investigate and report on the operation of the meters. A majority of this committee recommended the installation of the Dual Automatic Parking Meter. The city manager also recommended the installation of that meter.

The members of the city counsel made further investigation themselves both by inspection and operation of the meters and by consulting others whom they believed qualified to advise them on the problem of the best and most durable meter.

One councilman testified that a man in whom he had confidence as an expert on the mechanism of clocks (all the parking meters were operated with such a mechanical device) after investigation advised him as follows: "And he particularly called my attention to the fact that the Dual, the gears in the Dual clock works were simply stamped out of thin*k* brass, and he said he felt the Dual meter—I believe I am reporting his statement to me correctly—he said that the Dual meter, in his opinion, was a beautiful looking meter and was designed to sell, rather than wear."

The members of the city council were divided on the question of installing manual or automatic meters. After considerable discussion and investigation in which the city manager took part it was decided to divide the contract equally between the manual and the automatic meters. All the councilmen but one voted in favor of this decision. The city manager made no objection to it and concurred in the final awards made.

This decision left the Duncan Meter Corporation, manufacturer of the Miller Multiple Coin parking meter, as the sole bidder offering a manually operated meter after the elimination of the two unsatisfactory meters. It left the meter of the Dual Parking Meter Corporation, represented by plaintiff, and the product of the Karpark Corporation as contestants for the award of the contract for automatic meters.

Contracts were entered into for 500 Miller Multiple Coin parking meters at $61 each, plus 25 free meters with an installation charge on the free meters of $2.50 each; and 500 Karpark meters at $54, plus 25 free meters with an installation charge on the free meters of $2 each. Each contract provided for free servicing of the meters for six months and for furnishing supplies and other services without charge.

The Dual Parking Meter Company offered to supply 1,000 parking meters at $53.50 each, with no free meters, but with a servicing charge of $3 per year per meter.

Plaintiff maintains that the bid of the Dual Parking Meter Company was the lowest and that it was the "lowest responsible and reliable bidder"; that under the provisions of the Charter the Council of San Diego was required to award the contract to it; that the awards to the other corporations were illegal and void acts.

If we regard the price bid as the only measure of which company was "the lowest responsible and reliable bidder" this argument lacks convincing force. The price of $54 per meter which the Karpark Corporation was to receive included six months free servicing of the meters. The bid of the Dual Meter Corporation was $53.50 for each meter with a $3 charge for servicing for one year. If the charge for servicing each meter for six months would be one-half of that sum, it would make the comparable price of the Dual Parking Meter $55 each or $1 higher than the Karpark. Another element enters into the contract price of that meter. There were 25 free meters to be installed at $2 each. The average price of the 525 Karpark meters would be about $51.52 each with six months free servicing which is substantially less than the price bid for the Dual meter.

It is true that the cost of the Dual Parking meter was considerably less than that of the Miller meter. The two meters are not comparable as they operate on different principles, the one being automatic and the other being manually operated. The evidence failed to give the trial judge, and fails to give us, any basis on which to compare the values of these two varieties of meters other than that both seemed to operate satisfactorily in the tests made.

[1] The trial court found, and we think correctly so, that the parts to be furnished and the services to be rendered by the successful bidders, and by the Dual Parking Meter Company, varied so much that there was no sufficient basis furnished upon which to compare the bids.

[2, 3] If price alone, together with the value of the free parts and service, determined which company was "the lowest responsible and reliable bidder" we would have no trouble in concluding that plaintiff had failed to maintain the burden of proving that the bid of the Dual Parking Meter Company was the lowest. It was higher than the bid of the Karpark Corporation. The proper construction to be given to the phrase in question was thus set forth in West v. City of Oakland, 30 Cal. App. 556, 159 P. 202, 204:

"It is the contention of the appellant that these two sections of the city charter of Oakland are to be read and construed together, and that, when so construed, the term 'lowest responsible bidder,' as used in the body of section 130 thereof, and which has reference specially to the construction and equipment of public buildings, is to be held to mean only that the lowest responsible bidder shall be the lowest bidder who has not been delinquent or unfaithful in any former contract with the city, and that otherwise, in every case of contracts awarded by competitive bidding, the council must either award the contract to the lowest bidder or must reject all bids.

"We are of the opinion, however, that this is altogether too narrow and binding a construction to place upon these provisions of the Oakland city charter. There are many occasions in the experiences of municipal government when the quality of the thing to be supplied in the course of the public service depends upon conditions which differentiate bidders, and require the exercise of a sound discretion on the part of city officials in determining whether the wares or device which each individual bidder offers in the form of his own exclusive design are such as will meet the particular requirements of the intended work. In order to cover such cases it is quite usual in the provisions of city charters to find such terms as 'lowest and best bidder,' or as 'lowest responsible bidder,' and the like; and these phrases have been given by the courts a particular meaning, in which it must be presumed they are used by the framers of city charters, in the absence of other limiting clauses. The term 'lowest responsible bidder' has been held to mean the lowest bidder whose offer best responds in quality, fitness, and capacity to the particular requirements of the proposed work, and that where, by the use of these terms, the council has been invested with discretionary power as to which is the lowest responsible bidder, having regard to the quality and adaptability of the material or article to the particular requirements of its use, such discretion will not be interfered with by the courts, in the absence of direct averments and proof of fraud. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 811, p. 1223, and cases cited. And even when in statutes and charters the term 'lowest bidder' only is employed, the courts have held that, in determining whether a bid is the lowest among several others, there may be cases where the quality and ability of the thing offered—in other words, its adaptability to the purpose for which it is required—may be considered. Clapton v. Taylor, 49 Mo.App. 117; Cleveland Fire Alarm Co. v. [Board of] Metropolitan Fire Com'rs, 55 Barb., N.Y., 288. In fact, it is conceded by counsel for the appellant that if, under a fair and liberal construction of this charter, the city council had discretion, in awarding the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, to consider the quality of the respective devices upon which the several bids were predicated, such discretion, honestly exercised, will not be interfered with. We think it evident that the city charter of Oakland is to be given such a construction * * *."

[4] It seems to be true that as the city of San Diego invited bids for not less than 1,000 parking meters from each bidder and failed to specify that the award might be divided between two or more bidders, each receiving less than the total number, and since the awards were so divided between two rival bidders, the result was the same as though there had been no advertisement for bids.

The trial court found in effect: That it could not be found with any degree of mathematical certainty which bid of the three corporations was most favorable to the purchaser, or which bidder's guarantee clause was most favorable, that this is a matter as to which no exact comparison is possible, but one purely of individual opinion; that which corporation was the lowest responsible bidder "was and is a matter depending in part upon an exercise of discretion confided to the City Council * * *."

"That it is not true that the construction and use of parking meters has been standardized to the degree that they are commodities which can be furnished by competitive bidding.

"That it is true that parking meters vary widely in kind, quality, appearance, and manner of operation; that it is true that the guarantee and service arrangements which parking meter companies are willing to enter into vary greatly in many respects wherein the purchaser's advantage is concerned; that it is true that it is impossible to designate in advance, definite specifications which do not operate to exclude equally responsible and reliable bidders whose meters do not, and cannot in the nature of things, conform to those specifications; that it is true that the best interests of the City of San Diego in obtaining the soundest and most economical meters, require that specifications be left so flexible, and the discretion of the Council of said City of San Diego so broad, that Section 94 of the Charter of said City does not and cannot have practical application, or any application at all."

[5] The trial court's conclusion that the nature of parking meters was such that it was impossible to draw specifications to permit any competitive bidding, must of necessity be true, because each meter was covered by a patent, and specifications particularly and exactly describing one meter would necessarily exclude others. The trial court also concluded that there was a discretion in the city council to determine the type of meter, both in physical appearance and mechanical operation, best adapted to the needs of the city; that an attempt at competitive bidding would work an incongruity, would not affect the final result and would produce no advantage; that the city council exercised its discretion reasonably in selecting parking meters; that section 94 of the city charter did not apply to the purchase of such meters.

[6] In Los Angeles Dredging Co. v. City of Long Beach, 210 Cal. 348, 291 P. 839, 842, 71 A.L.R. 161, the Supreme Court said:

"The charter of the City of Long Beach lays down the general requirement that all contracts, except as otherwise provided in the charter or by general law, must be made by the city manager with the lowest responsible bidder. In the instant case, the contracts were made without the letting of bids. This fact renders them void unless they come within some exception to the rule set forth above. There are two well-recognized exceptions which are, we think, applicable to this situation.

"The first exception is founded on the fact that sometimes it is undesirable or impossible to advertise for bids for particular work. In such cases the statutory requirement is deemed not to apply. In 2 Dillon, Municipal Corporations, 1199, § 802, the law is thus stated: 'It has been held that where competitive proposals work an incongruity and are unavailing as affecting the final result, or where they do not produce any advantage * * * or it is practically impossible to obtain what is required and observe such forms, a statute requiring competitive bidding does not apply.' Our courts have approved this doctrine. Los Angeles Gas & E. Corp. v. [City of] Los Angeles, 188 Cal. 307, 205 P. 125; Miller v. Boyle, 43 Cal.App. 39, 184 P. 421."

[7] The foregoing rule should be applied here. The evidence fails to show that parking meters have been developed to the point where there is any reasonable basis of comparison between those which operate satisfactorily. If the specifications had been drawn strictly there could have been no competitive bidding because but one meter could have been described and there could have been but one bidder under them. Under such circumstances advertising for bids was unnecessary. Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 P. 189; Los Angeles G. & E. Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 188 Cal. 307, 205 P. 125. There being no chance of real competitive bidding, to require it would work an incongruity.

There is no showing of any fraud, connivance or unfairness in the transaction. There is no indication that the councilmen did not act in perfect good faith and that the interests of the city were not well served in the action taken. Further, it is probable that if all the meters installed under the contracts are not now paid for, they will be before the judgment in this case can become final.

[8-11] It is perfectly clear that the execution of the contracts sought to be enjoined cannot be prohibited now. They were executed on July 10, 1941, and on August 26, 1941, respectively. An act already performed cannot be prevented by injunction. All of the meters have been installed. They are in plain view and we may take judicial notice of that fact. Varcoe v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 181 P. 223. Perhaps they have been, or soon will be, fully paid for out of revenue produced by them. When paid for title has or will be vested in the city. It would hardly seem reasonable to expect a court of equity to enjoin the performance of a contract that undoubtedly will be fully performed before the case can be retried, should the present judgment be reversed.

[12] Plaintiff urges error in the ruling sustaining a demurrer to his third cause of action. Five days were given in which to amend. No amendment was attempted.

[13] That cause of action was an unsuccessful attempt, by innuendo and legal conclusion, to hint at fraud and undue influence in awarding the two contracts. No single ultimate fact was alleged upon which fraud or unfair dealings could have been predicated.

Had there been any fraud in the matter of awarding the contracts, proper allegations should have appeared in the pleadings. Plaintiff was given time in which to amend if he knew of any such facts that could have been alleged. He failed to amend. There was no error in the order sustaining the demurrer and no inference of improper action on the part of any councilman may be drawn under these circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William J. Palmer, Judge.

Action by Marguerite Madeleine Mayo against Interment Properties, Incorporated, and others, for an injunction, declaratory relief, and removal of the directors of defendant. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Baldwin Robertson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earle M. Daniels, Julius V. Patrosso, Clayton L. Howland, and Everett V. Prindle, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

The instant action was brought by Marguerite Madeleine Mayo, a minority stockholder, for an injunction for declaratory relief and for the removal of directors of respondent Interment Properties, Inc., pursuant to subdivision 3, section 310 of the Civil Code.

From a judgment rendered against her, she prosecutes this appeal upon the grounds:

(1) A resigned director cannot vote upon the choice of his successor;

(2) The affirmative vote of one of two remaining directors does not constitute a majority;

(3) "Inasmuch as an interested officer and director may not himself vote that corporate funds be paid to him, the acts of his substituted director, chosen by him to fill his own vacancy, for the purpose of voting on such resolution, are likewise void."

The following brief resume is taken from the findings of fact of the trial judge:

Interment Properties, Inc., a California corporation, was organized September 12, 1938, and is engaged in the cemetery business deriving its principal income from the sale of cemetery lots by Roosevelt Memorial Park Association. The total authorized capital of said corporation is 2,500 shares of stock issued August 5, 1940. Appellant is the owner of 1,218.75 shares, and the remainder of the issued and outstanding shares of stock is owned by Fred A. Ballin, Jr., Clayton L. Howland, Everett V. Prindle, Aileen Brown and Iola G. Orton. Between July 12, 1939, and February 4, 1941, the directors of the corporation were Fred A. Ballin, Jr., Everett V. Prindle and Luther T. Mayo. Luther T. Mayo did not own any stock and the articles of incorporation provided that no person should be qualified to act as a director unless he was a stockholder of the said corporation. On and prior to February 4, 1941, the officers of the corporation were Everett V. Prindle, president, Fred A. Ballin, Jr., secretary, and Luther T. Mayo, vice-president.

Respondent Prindle is an attorney associated in the practice of law with respondent Howland under the name and style of Howland & Prindle, and on or prior to February 4, 1941, respondents Ballin and Orton were or had been clients and personal friends of respondent Prindle.

On January 28, 1941, at a meeting of the board of directors of respondent corporation, respondent Prindle presented an itemized statement of legal services rendered by him and respondent Howland on behalf of the said corporation amounting to the sum of $5,700, and stated to the board of directors that, in view of the long period of time covered thereby, the matter of fees should be definitely settled; that he was not insistent that the statement be accepted in the amount rendered and that he would abide by whatever determination the board might reach with reference to the amount and the method of payment. At that meeting the bill for attorneys' fees was considered and discussed but no vote was taken thereon, Luther T. Mayo refusing to discuss either the amount or manner of payment of said bill. The special meeting of January 28, 1941, was called for the express purpose of considering the payment of attorneys' fees and due and legal notice thereof was given, as required by law and the by-laws of the corporation. Thereafter, on January 31, 1941, respondent Prindle, as president of the corporation, called a special meeting of the board to be held on February 4, 1941, for the stated purpose of considering the matter of payment of attorneys' fees and other business. At said meeting there were present: Everett V. Prindle, Fred A. Ballin, Jr., Luther T. Mayo and Iola G. Orton, the last named having been requested to be present by Everett V. Prindle. Thereupon respondent Ballin resigned as secretary, respondent Prindle resigned as president, and said Ballin was elected president by the board. Respondent Prindle submitted his written resignation as a director to take effect upon the election and qualification of his successor; said resignation was accepted to take effect as stated, whereupon upon motion of said Ballin, seconded by said Prindle, the respondent Iola G. Orton was nominated to fill the vacancy on the board to be created by the resignation of respondent Prindle. No further nominations were made and upon being put to a vote the nomination of said Orton received the affirmative votes of Ballin and Prindle but Luther T. Mayo refused to vote thereon. Thereafter, at said directors' meeting, respondent Ballin nominated respondent Orton as secretary of the corporation, which nomination was duly seconded by said Orton and upon being put to a vote the said nomination received the affirmative votes of Ballin and Orton and Luther T. Mayo refused to vote thereon. After such elections, the said directors and respondent Prindle proceeded to discuss the matter of the bill for attorneys' fees for services rendered to and on behalf of the corporation. Following such discussion and upon motion duly made and seconded, and upon the affirmative votes of Fred A. Ballin, Jr., and Iola G. Orton, and the negative vote of Luther T. Mayo, a resolution was adopted approving the bill for attorneys' fees rendered to said corporation in the sum of $5,200, with the express provision that the manner of payment of said bill be left to the further discussion and approval of the board of directors. Thereafter, by the unanimous vote of all of the directors, Ballin, Orton and Mayo, a resolution was adopted authorizing the opening of a bank account for said corporation Interment Properties, Inc., in the American Branch of the California Bank, by the terms of which resolution it was further provided that funds on deposit therein might be withdrawn upon checks signed by said Ballin, as president, or Luther T. Mayo, as vice-president, and Iola G. Orton, as secretary. Notice of the adoption of said resolution was thereafter delivered to the said bank.

The court further found that none of the acts as above set forth was unlawful, or that said Prindle, Ballin and Orton, or any of them, unlawfully planned, schemed or conspired among themselves to do or perform said acts or any of them; that it is not true that the said resolution approving the bill for attorneys' fees in the sum of $5,200 "is or was unlawful, illegal, fraudulent or void in whole or in part. That the defendant, Iola G. Orton, is a stockholder of Interment Properties, Inc., owning and holding 101.5625 shares of the issued and outstanding capital stock thereof, and as such was on the 4th day of February, 1941, and ever since has been qualified to act as a director of said corporation, and that at all times since her election as a director of said corporation on the 4th day of February, 1941, said Iola G. Orton has been and now is a duly elected, qualified and acting director of Interment Properties, Inc., and * * * the duly elected, qualified and acting Secretary of said corporation."

The court also found that neither Ballin nor Orton in approving said bill or in any vote cast or action taken by them as directors at said meeting held on February 4, 1941, or at any time, acted under the domination or control of respondent Prindle, or as his agents, or dummies, but that they exercised their own independent judgment and honest discretion.

The prayer of the complaint herein sought a judgment decreeing (1) that respondent Orton is not a director or officer of the corporation; that respondents Prindle, Ballin and Orton be removed as directors and officers thereof and be barred from re-election for a period of seven years; (2) that the purported resolution dated February 4, 1941, approving the attorneys' bill be declared void and that respondents be restrained from paying any moneys of the corporation by reason of or under the authority of said resolution; (3) that said corporation is not indebted to respondents Prindle or Howland & Prindle by reason of any contractual obligation, and that the trial court upon proof adjudge and determine what sums, if any, said corporation owes to said respondents.

As hereinbefore stated, the trial court entered its judgment denying the relief sought by appellant in her complaint.

Section 4, article III of the By-laws of respondent corporation follows verbatim the wording of a portion of section 306 of the Civil Code, to-wit: "The shareholders may elect a director or directors at any time to fill any vacancy or vacancies not filled by the directors. If the board of directors accept the resignation of a director tendered to take effect at a future time, the board or the shareholders shall have power to elect a successor to take office when the resignation is to become effective."

Appellant argues that while a "board may, prior to the actual occurrence of a vacancy, elect a successor, the member of the board whose resignation or expiration of office creates the vacancy cannot vote upon his successor * * * only those members of the board who will be in office upon the occurrence of the vacancy can vote to fill the vacancy."

[1] In discussing section 306 of the Civil Code, it is said in 6A Cal.Jur., 1064, section 590: "The statute now in terms contemplates resignations by directors, and that they may be made effective at a future date. The right to resign is not cut off by provisions that the term shall continue until appointment of a successor. The board of directors has power to accept the resignation of a director, and to elect his successor at the same meeting, but a director who has tendered his resignation to take effect upon acceptance does not cease to be a director until acceptance of his resignation, and may therefore participate in a meeting and fill out a quorum. Seal of Gold Min. Co. v. Slater, 161 Cal. 621, 120 P. 15."

Appellant relies upon a number of decisions announcing the rule that a public board or officer may not appoint one to a public office to fill a vacancy which will not occur until after the expiration of the term of office of the appointing board or officer. Typical of these is the case of People v. Ward, 107 Cal. 236, 40 P. 538, which involved an attempt by a board of supervisors, whose term of office was about to expire, to appoint one to the office of district attorney to fill a vacancy which would not occur until after the expiration of the supervisors' terms of office.

The method of filling vacancies in the boards of directors of private corporations is controlled by the provisions of section 306 of the Civil Code, above referred to, which authorizes the board of directors in office to appoint a director to fill a vacancy which will occur when a resignation tendered to take effect at a future time becomes effective.

[2] Under the rule laid down by said section, respondent Prindle was qualified to act as a director of the corporation until the election and qualification of his successor. As a result, respondent Orton was elected a director by the affirmative votes of two directors, viz: Ballin and Prindle, a majority of the board of directors which was composed of three members.

Having been duly elected to the board of directors by a majority of the membership thereof, it was incumbent upon respondent Orton, a stockholder of record, to use her own discretion in casting her vote approving the payment of attorneys' fees owing to respondent Prindle and his associate. As heretofore noted, the trial court found that neither respondent Ballin nor respondent Orton in approving said bill for attorneys' fees acted under the domination or control of respondent Prindle, or as his agents, or dummies, but that they exercised their own independent judgment and honest discretion. This finding is supported by evidence produced at the trial.

For the reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑627(2)

A party desiring to move to dismiss appeal for failure to file transcript within prescribed time should first file motion in trial court to terminate proceedings to obtain transcript, and where no such motion was filed and affidavits show that trial court granted reporter until date after filing of motion to dismiss appeal for completion of transcript, such motion should be denied. Code Civ.Proc. § 953a; Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 1, § 1, and rule 6, § 1.

2. Appeal and error 🔑237(1)

A contention that trial court's orders extending reporter's time to prepare transcript on appeal were not made in accordance with statutory provisions should be presented to trial court on motion to terminate proceedings to obtain transcript in order to be available on appeal. Code Civ.Proc. § 953a.

3. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)

It is appellant's duty to take necessary steps to secure filing of transcript on appeal, and for want of diligence therein, trial court may terminate proceedings to obtain transcript. Code Civ.Proc. § 953a.

4. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)

While giving of notice to prepare transcript on appeal within time provided by statute is "mandatory", statutory provisions as to time for filing transcript are "directory". Code Civ.Proc. §§ 953a, 953c.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Directory Statute" and "Mandatory Statute".

5. Appeal and error 🔑985

The determination of question whether due diligence was exercised in preparation and filing of transcript on appeal rests largely in trial court's discretion, and appellate court will not interfere, unless it appears that trial court abused its discretion. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 953a, 953c.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James M. Allen, Judge.

Proceeding between E. A. Kinkle and the Fruit Growers Supply Company and others. From an order of the superior court, the corporation and others appeal. On respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal.

Motion denied.

Huston, Huston & Huston and Daniel Dennis, all of Sacramento, and J. Everett Barr, of Yreka, for respondent.

SCHOTTKY, Justice pro tem.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that appellant has failed to perfect its appeal, that no transcript on appeal has been filed as required by law, and that appellant has not prosecuted its appeal with any diligence whatsoever.

[1] The admitted facts are that notice of appeal was filed on December 12, 1941; notice to prepare transcript was served and filed on December 12, 1941; order requiring reporter to transcribe report of trial was signed, served and filed on December 22, 1941; that satisfactory financial arrangements were made with the reporter by appellant; that on January 12, 1942, the reporter filed an affidavit stating that because of the pressure of other matters, he could not complete the transcript within the required time, and the court made an order extending the reporter's time for preparing the transcript to March 16, 1942; that on March 14, 1942, a similar affidavit was filed by the reporter, and the court made a further order extending the reporter's time to prepare the transcript to May 16, 1942; that on May 15, 1942, a similar affidavit was filed by the reporter, and the court made still another order extending the reporter's time to August 10, 1942; that none of said affidavits or orders was served upon respondent or his attorneys; that no motion to terminate proceedings to obtain the transcript was filed in the trial court.

We believe that under the rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, the motion to dismiss should be denied. In section 1 of rule 1, it is stated: "If the transcript for use on appeal is prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure and a notice is filed by the appellant requesting a transcript under said section, the time for filing the transcript of the record on appeal shall not begin to run until such transcript is approved and certified as required by law, or until the proceeding to obtain the same has been terminated in the court below by dismissal or otherwise."

In section 1 of rule VI it is provided: "On motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file the transcript within the prescribed time, there shall be presented the certificate of the clerk of the court below, certifying the names of the attorneys of the respective parties, the nature of the action and the relief demanded by the complaint, the amount and character of the judgment or order appealed from, the fact and date of the filing of the notice of appeal, the fact and date of filing request to the clerk to prepare a transcript, the fact and date of the settlement and filing of the bill of exceptions or the certification of the transcript prepared under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, if any, and the fact and date of the entry of order of termination, if any, by the trial court of any proceeding for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or transcript. It shall be incumbent on the party moving to dismiss to show by such certificate or by affidavit that no proceeding for a bill of exceptions or transcript under section 953a is pending in the trial court, and if no such proceeding was ever instituted that the time to institute the same has expired."

It seems clear that said rules contemplate that a party who desires to move to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that the transcript has not been filed within the prescribed time should first file in the trial court a motion to terminate the proceedings to obtain a transcript. Engstrom v. Atkins, 102 Cal.App. 393, 283 P. 79. No such motion was filed in the instant case and it appears from the affidavits that the trial court signed orders granting the reporter until August 10, 1942, in which to complete the preparation of the transcript.

[2] Respondent contends that the orders were not made in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. But these are matters which should be presented to the trial court upon a motion to terminate proceedings. However, we are constrained to state that there appears to have been undue delay on the part of the reporter in this case, and that trial courts should, in fairness to litigants, insist that court reporters give priority to the work of the Superior Court and not delay the preparation of transcripts on appeal in order to perform other work not connected with the work of the Superior Court. Litigants in appeals should not be compelled to wait upon the convenience of court reporters, and court reporters should bear in mind that their first duty is to report the cases of the Superior Court and that this duty includes the preparation of transcripts on appeal.

[3-5] It is the duty of an appellant, as the moving party, to take the necessary steps to secure the filing of the transcript, and for want of diligence therein it is within the power of the trial court to terminate the proceedings; and while the giving of the notice to prepare the transcript within the time provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure is mandatory (Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 71, 165 P. 13), the provisions thereof and of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, as to the time for filing the transcript, are directory. Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 P. 1023, 1026; Mason v. Straube, 68 Cal.App. 302, 228 P. 872; Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 781, 164 P. 800; Benson v. Olender, 74 Cal.App. 273, 240 P. 61. The determination of the question of whether or not there has been due diligence in the preparation and filing of the transcript is one resting largely in the discretion of the trial court, and an appellate court will not interfere unless it appears that the trial court in its action has abused its discretion. Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 P. 831.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

1. Nuisance 🔑84

In actions to restrain continued operation of an alleged gambling establishment as a nuisance, allegations and proof with respect to the kind of people congregating on the premises and as to disorderly actions on their part were essential to confer jurisdiction upon the court of equity and to support an injunction.

2. Nuisance 🔑84

Complaints, to restrain defendants from continuing the operation of alleged gambling establishments as a nuisance, were sufficient.

3. Nuisance 🔑80

Where the people showed that an alleged gambling game was being conducted at "Bridgo" parlors but produced no evidence as to the type of people frequenting the parlors, or that there was disorder in the operation of the games, operation of the parlors was not restrainable as a "nuisance".

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Actions by the People against I. E. Robbin and others against H. S. Robbin and others, against Gordon D. Saderup, against Frank Matsushita, and against William Harrah and others to enjoin as nuisances the operation of certain places where gambling games were allegedly carried on. From adverse judgments, the defendants appeal.

Judgments reversed.

Jerry Giesler, Ward Sullivan, and Jerome J. Mayo, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Lewis Drucker, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Judge.

These are actions to enjoin as nuisances the operation of certain places in which it is alleged that gambling games are carried on. All of these were places in what is known as the Venice Amusement Zone. The seven cases were tried together and have been consolidated on this appeal. In so far as material here, the cases are exactly similar and practically identical in all respects. For convenience, they will be discussed as if they were one case.

It is alleged that the defendants, with the knowledge of the owners of the property, have been operating, conducting and maintaining a certain gambling game on the described premises; that this gambling game is conducted in a manner which is described in detail; that the maintenance and operation of this gambling game "does now and will in the future constitute the keeping of a gambling house, a public nuisance, injurious to the health of the People of the State of California, for the reason that it tends to and does in fact debauch and corrupt the public morals, encourage idle and dissolute habits, draws together great numbers of disorderly persons, disturbs the public peace, brings together idle persons and cultivates dissolute habits between them, creates traffic hazards, and is thereby injurious to health, indecent and offensive to the senses and impairs the free enjoyment of life;" and that the maintenance and operation of said gambling game and public nuisance directly affects the entire community surrounding the city of Los Angeles and numerous other communities in Los Angeles County.

The prayer is that the court determine that the maintenance and operation of said gambling game on these premises constitutes a public nuisance, and that the defendants and their agents be forever enjoined and restrained from maintaining or operating said gambling game on said premises. The court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and, among other things, found that the game as described in the complaint is a gambling game; that the defendants and their agents threaten to and will continue the operation of said gambling game on said premises unless restrained from so doing; that the maintenance and operation of said gambling game has in the past and will in the future constitute the keeping of a gambling house, a public nuisance; and that the maintenance and operation of said gambling game and gambling house is and will be injurious to the health, public welfare and morals of the People of this state. The judgments order the issuance of injunctions against the operation of such a gambling house on said premises. These appeals followed.

The game here in question is called "bridgo." It seems apparent that it was designed to get around the legal objections to the game of "tango," as pointed out in the case of People v. Babdaty, 139 Cal.App. Supp. 791, 30 P.2d 634. It differs from that game in that here a so-called "skill" game and a so-called "free" game were played alternately. It is freely admitted that the "free" game is dependent upon chance but it is contended that it is not a lottery, as defined in the case just cited, since no charge is made and persons are permitted to play without regard to whether or not they participate in the "skill" game, for which a charge is made. It is argued that the paid game is not a lottery since it depends entirely upon the skill of the player, unaffected by the actions of other players, and that it is not a gambling game under any other statute of this state. The briefs are largely devoted to a discussion of whether or not the operation of these games constitutes a gambling game under any of the laws of this state. While the design of this game for the purpose in view and appellant's arguments in support of its innocent nature are extremely ingenious, although perhaps not entirely convincing, we are forced to conclude that the question of whether or not this is a gambling game is not controlling here.

Assuming, without holding, that this is a gambling game the question remains whether the operation thereof on these premises may be enjoined on the showing here made. In People v. Lim, 18 Cal.2d 872, 118 P.2d 472, 477, the Supreme Court held, in effect, that equitable jurisdiction in such matters must be conferred by the Legislature and should not be assumed by the courts; that the basis for such jurisdiction must be found in the statutes and not by reference to the common-law definitions of a public nuisance; and that in order to confer jurisdiction in such an action, where it is claimed that a particular activity constitutes a nuisance as defined by our statutes, "sufficient facts must be alleged so that the court may conclude that nuisance exists within the provisions of the statute." In that case, involving an attempt to restrain the operation of a gambling establishment it was alleged that this gambling house "draws together great numbers of disorderly persons, disturbs the public peace, brings together idle persons and cultivates dissolute habits among them, creates traffic and fire hazards, and is thereby injurious to health, indecent and offensive to the senses and impairs the free enjoyment of life and property." While it was held that in order to be within the jurisdiction of an equitable proceeding for injunction the act in question must constitute a nuisance within the definition of our statute, it was further held that this allegation was sufficient for that purpose as against a demurrer.

[1] As we view that decision, it holds that the remedy of injunction may not be employed on the mere showing that a gambling game is being conducted on the premises in question, and that further allegations with respect to the kind of people who congregate there and as to disorderly and disturbing actions on their part are essential in order to bring the matter within the statutory definition of a nuisance and to confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity. It necessarily follows that if such matters must be alleged they must also be proved in order to support an injunction issued in such an action.

[2, 3] In the case before us, the allegations of the complaint in this regard are similar to and in almost the exact language of those involved in the case of People v. Lim, supra, and the complaint was, therefore, sufficient. However, at the trial, on the objection of the People, all evidence was excluded as to the type of person who frequented these places and the attorney for the People stated he was making no contention that people of ill repute visited or frequented them. These cases were entirely tried and these appeals are largely, if not entirely, presented on the theory that all that was necessary was to show that a gambling game was being conducted on these premises. In his brief the attorney general concedes "that no evidence was produced by the plaintiffs as to the type of people who frequented the 'bridgo' parlors or that there was disorder in the operation of the games." We are compelled to hold, therefore, that there was a complete failure of proof upon a material and essential matter, in the absence of which the issuance of an injunction cannot be sustained. The instant case is precisely similar in principle to the case of Monterey Club v. Superior Court, 48 Cal.App.2d 131, 119 P.2d 349, where it was held that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in issuing a temporary injunction under such circumstances.

The judgment in each of these cases is reversed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑113(2)

2. Appeal and error 🔑113(2)

A party aggrieved by a judgment or order must take his appeal from such judgment or order if an appeal therefrom is authorized by statute and not from a subsequent order refusing to set aside such judgment or order.

3. Appeal and error 🔑113(2)

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Ernest D. Wagner, Judge.

Suit by Home Owners' Loan Corporation against Charles W. Engelbertson and others to foreclose a mortgage wherein plaintiff obtained a judgment of foreclosure. From an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, defendants appeal.

Dismissed.

C. W. Engelbertson, of Santa Barbara, for appellants.

Warner Edmonds, Jr., of Santa Barbara, and Ewell D. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

Defendants' notice of appeal recites that they appeal "from the order and decree of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Santa Barbara, therein made and entered on the 13th day of March, 1941, in Book 63 of Minutes of the Superior Court at page 182, given in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants above named, to-wit: Denying motion of defendants to vacate and set aside judgment and decree docketed and entered on the 1st day of February, 1940, and from the whole thereof."

The clerk's transcript constitutes the sole record before us on this appeal, and none of the documents set forth therein bears endorsement showing the date of entry of any of such documents or whether any of them was ever actually entered. Furthermore such record does not purport to show any "order * * * made * * * on the 13th day of March, 1941, * * * denying motion of defendants to vacate and set aside judgment and decree docketed and entered on the 1st day of February, 1940, * * *." We do, however, find in the record an order entitled "Order Denying Motion to Set Aside Judgment," and reading in material part as follows:

"The motion of defendants, * * * to set aside judgment, * * * having been regularly heard on the 10th day of March, 1941, * * * and the matter having been fully argued and the Court having been duly advised and having duly considered the same, it is hereby ordered that said motion to set aside judgment be and the same is hereby denied.

"The Clerk of the above-entitled Court is hereby directed to enter this order.

"Dated: March 10th, 1941.

"Ernest D. Wagner
"Judge of the Superior Court."

Endorsed:
"Filed: March 10, 1941.

"J. E. Lewis, Clerk.
"By C. E. James, Deputy Clerk."

We assume in favor of an intelligible record for appellants, that, in spite of the three-day discrepancy in dates between the "order * * * made * * * on the 13th day of March, 1941," to which defendants refer in their notice of appeal, and the above order dated and filed on March 10, 1941, it is from such order of March 10 that defendants intend to appeal.

Defendants' notice of motion to set aside judgment recites that "* * * defendants will move said Court for its order to set aside and vacate the alleged judgments and decrees entered herein in above entitled cause.

"That said motion will be made on the following grounds, to-wit:

"1. That said judgments and each of them, are void.

"2. That the Court had no jurisdiction to render said judgments and decrees.

"3. Inconsistency between Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law and the Decrees. * * *"

Attached to said notice of motion, but appearing nowhere else in the record, is a copy of an untitled document dated January 17, 1940, and purporting to have been signed by "Ernest D. Wagner, Acting Judge." The character and efficacy of this instrument are problematical but apparently it was intended as a memorandum opinion for the guidance of counsel in preparing the formal decision and judgment. However, in view of our conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed, it is immaterial for the purposes of this decision whether such writing was intended to be, or in substance constitutes, a mere memorandum opinion or a formal judgment. There are also in the record formal findings of fact and conclusions of law, dated January 31, 1940, and a "Decree of Foreclosure" (apparently in customary form) dated January 31, 1940. We assume that it is to the untitled "memorandum opinion" and the decree of foreclosure that defendants refer by their use of the words "judgments and decrees" in the plural, in their notice of motion. In the absence of more significant identification in the record we assume that the decree of foreclosure dated January 31, 1940, is the "judgment and decree" to which defendants refer in their notice of appeal as "docketed and entered on the 1st day of February, 1940."

[1, 2] It has long been settled that if the grounds upon which a party seeks to have a judgment vacated existed before the entry of the judgment and upon a proper record would have been reviewable on an appeal from the judgment, an appeal will not lie from an order denying the motion. (Mantel v. Mantel, (1902) 135 Cal. 315, 67 P. 758; Lawson v. Guild, (1932), 215 Cal. 378, 381, 10 P.2d 459; In re Estate of Richards, (1941) 17 Cal.2d 259, 267, 109 P.2d 923; Nagelmann v. McIntyre, (1938) 27 Cal.App.2d 621, 622, 81 P.2d 466; Barker v. Ackers, (1938) 29 Cal.App.2d 162, 176, 84 P.2d 264; In re Estate of Murphy, (1942) 50 Cal.App.2d 440, 123 P.2d 129; Mather v. Mather, (1942) — Cal.App.2d —, 124 P.2d 625. The party aggrieved by a judgment or order must take his appeal from such judgment or order itself, if an appeal therefrom is authorized by statute, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside. (2 Cal.Jur. 166; Nuckolls v. Bank of California, (1937) 10 Cal.2d 266, 270, 74 P.2d 264, 114 A.L.R. 708; Reynolds v. Reynolds, (1923) 191 Cal. 435, 437, 216 P. 619.)

[3] From the record before us, as summarized above, there appears no reason why defendants could not have appealed from the judgment itself rather than from the order refusing to set it aside. The grounds upon which defendants sought to have the judgment set aside, as recited in their notice of motion, obviously existed before the entry of the judgment and would have been reviewable on an appeal from the judgment.

We conclude therefore that an appeal does not lie from the "order and decree

* * * Denying motion of defendants to vacate and set aside judgment and decree * * *" herein, and that it is our duty to dismiss the attempted appeal therefrom (see Bessinger v. Grotz, (1942) 52 Cal.App. 2d ——, 126 P.2d 355).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge.

Action for fraud by Douglas G. Shearer and wife against Charles E. Cooper. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Jerry Geisler, of Los Angeles, Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll, J. G. Driscoll, Jr., and John M. Cranston, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Gang & Kopp, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment against Charles E. Cooper awarding plaintiffs damages in the sum of $19,650 for fraud in the sale of 550 acres of land in what was originally known as the Monserate Rancho in the Bonsall District in San Diego County.

Cooper purchased the Monserate Rancho from the Huntington Land and Improvement Company early in 1932. He received various maps and drawings from that company upon some of which various characters and areas of the soils were described. His use of reproductions from some of these maps in the sale of the land to plaintiffs, as well as oral and written representations made by him and by David H. Backus, his agent, form the basis of the fraudulent representations charged to him.

Before attempting a summary of the facts of the case we should dispose of one contention made by Cooper.

The case was originally tried before the Hon. Frank J. Macomber, who died after the conclusion of the trial and before the findings and conclusions were signed. The court reporter also died and only the portions of the record that had been transcribed during the trial were available at the second trial.

The deposition of Douglas G. Shearer had been taken and an attorney who had participated in the former trial testified at considerable length concerning Shearer's testimony at that trial, which, according to the testimony of this witness, varied materially from his evidence at the second trial. The deposition also was used to impeach Shearer.

Counsel for Cooper have stressed these conflicts and the impeaching evidence at considerable length in their briefs. These arguments may have been and probably were properly urged in the trial court as they went to the credibility of Shearer as a witness and the weight to be given his testimony.

[1-3] A trial judge may accept part of the testimony of a witness as true and reject other portions of it. He is the judge of the weight and sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. If he accepted substantial evidence supporting the findings and judgment as true and rejected other evidence conflicting with it, the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment is closed as far as the appellate court is concerned unless we may conclude that the evidence is inherently improbable or that the witnesses are so untruthful as to be unworthy of belief. After studying the record and searching the many exhibits we cannot reach either conclusion in this case. We, therefore, will confine our statement of facts to a summary of the evidence supporting the findings and judgment and will disregard evidence sharply conflicting with it except insofar as that evidence may be necessary to understand certain arguments made by Cooper.

Douglas G. Shearer and Ann Cunningham Shearer are husband and wife. Mr. Shearer conducted the negotiations for the purchase of the property. Mrs. Shearer was a necessary party plaintiff because she was one of the purchasers. Where practicable we will refer to Douglas G. Shearer as the plaintiff, and to Charles E. Cooper as the defendant.

Early in 1934, and prior thereto, plaintiff desired to acquire income ranch property upon which he could live after he had retired from his employment as chief recording engineer of one of the large moving picture producing companies. Prior to March, 1934, he had inspected several ranch properties in various parts of California, none of which proved satisfactory. Some of them were shown to him by Backus.

Early in 1934, Backus contacted defendant who desired to sell about 1,250 acres of the Monserate Rancho which he had renamed the "Rancho San Luis Rey." Backus received a letter from defendant and a map which purported to show the property to be sold and the various characters of soils on it which were indicated in different colors. On the bottom of this map, opposite colored crayon markings which corresponded to the colors on the map, the following legend appears:

"ESTIMATES
ALFALFA NOW IN — 160 ac
ALFALFA LAND — 300
CULTIVATABLE LAND—260
PASTURE LAND — 260
PIPE LINES NOW IN PIPE LINES PROPOSED TREES AND BRUSH — 270
WATERWAYS AND LAKE"

The Monserate Rancho was an old Spanish Grant which had not been surveyed by the United States. Its boundaries were not marked on the ground and very apparently were not known to defendant. But one old survey stake was found on the land subsequently sold to Mr. and Mrs. Shearer. It was located at a point marked "M3" on plaintiffs' exhibit 2 (the colored map above referred to) and is about a quarter of a mile west of the easterly boundary line of the property sold to the Shearers.

Backus contacted Shearer shortly after March 10, 1934, showed him a letter from Cooper describing the property and the colored map and had several conferences with him in reference to a prospective sale. The two went to defendant's home on the property about May 13, 1934, where they interviewed Cooper who showed them over a portion of the property. Cooper drove them across the San Luis Rey River over a dirt road and plaintiff observed two wooden culverts in this road as it crossed the river. Defendant told him that since the construction of the Henshaw Dam on the upper reaches of the river a number of years before, the danger of the river flooding during rainy seasons had been removed; that occasionally during heavy rains the culverts would be washed out and the road thereby closed for a few days at a time; that the culverts could be hauled back in place and reset; that other than this inconvenience there was no danger from flood waters.

Defendant took plaintiff to a point an undisclosed distance east of point "M3" and told him that the east boundary of the property was easterly from where they stood. He pointed to some pine trees on a hill about a mile southwesterly from them and said those pine trees marked the southeast corner of the property. This was subsequently found to be an error as the pine trees were not on the property owned by Cooper. The southeast corner of the property was one-quarter of a mile east of the southeast corner of the forty-acre tract on which the pine trees stood.

Defendant drove plaintiff southerly over a dirt road and passed two alfalfa fields which we will designate as the north alfalfa field and the south alfalfa field. Shearer described the growing alfalfa as "lush." The two fields were separated by what we will call the Keys Canyon Wash. It descended in a northwesterly direction from the hills or mountains lying to the east, and flowed into the San Luis Rey River. The wash was then dry and defendant assured plaintiff that it was never more than a little creek, was not dangerous, was free from floods and could do no damage to the land. Defendant also pointed out a pumping plant and well from which water was conveyed through a pipe line to irrigate the two alfalfa fields. Natural monuments were pointed out by defendant as on the exterior boundaries of the 1,250 acre tract.

A short time afterwards Backus took Mrs. Shearer to the property. She discovered an old eight-room adobe dwelling on high ground east of the San Luis Rey River and near the southern boundary of the 1,250 acres of land. The house interested her. She was unwilling to purchase any part of the property unless she could acquire this building.

Negotiatoins for the sale continued over a period of two years. Many conferences were held between plaintiff and Backus and some with defendant. Plaintiff explained that he would not be interested in the property unless it would return a net income to him. He inquired carefully about the number of tons of alfalfa produced annually, its selling price, the cost of production and the power bills for the operation of the pumping plant. He obtained these figures from defendant and no complaint is made of their accuracy. He was positively informed both in writing and verbally that there were 160 acres of growing alfalfa in the two fields.

Plaintiff testified that he made seven or eight trips to the property and went over portions of it each time. Some of defendant's witnesses placed the number of these inspections as high as twenty-two. He flew over the property and caused aeroplane photographs to be made. These show most of the 1,250 acres, as well as property to the north on which stood the home and race track of defendant. Plaintiff examined these photographs through an instrument that brought the topography of the ground into relief to some extent. Light streaks which proved to be sand appear in both alfalfa fields. They are quite apparent in the photograph of the south field. Plaintiff cut these pictures up and pasted them together so that he had two continuous pictures of the land. He gave one to defendant.

Various propositions were made to plaintiff for the sale to him of parts of the 1,250 acres and a long term lease on parts of the balance. One proposition was for the sale of 430 acres which was shown within the purple crayon lines drawn on a colored reproduction of the colored portions of plaintiffs' exhibit 2. The acreage within the purple lines included both alfalfa fields and a sizable tract of land designated as (potential) alfalfa land lying west of the north alfalfa field and northwesterly of the south alfalfa field and the Keys Canyon Wash.

The original map could not be produced so Backus drew purple lines on plaintiffs' exhibit 38 which he said corresponded to the purple lines on the similar map furnished him by defendant which he gave to plaintiff. After the sale was completed this map was returned to Backus who believed he had given it to defendant.

This offer to sell the 430 acres did not include the adobe house and was not acceptable and the parties finally agreed to the addition of 120 acres (which included the adobe) lying north of the south boundary line of the 1,250 acres and joining the 430 acres on the west, making a total of 550 acres. This offer was finally accepted and the property sold to plaintiffs for $61,500, payable, $15,000 in cash and the balance evidenced by a promissory note secured by a deed of trust.

The property actually purchased by plaintiffs is shown on plaintiffs' exhibit 16 which is a colored map identical in coloring with plaintiffs' exhibit 38 and plaintiffs' exhibit 2. There is an unexplained difference in the boundaries of the 430 acres which are drawn on plaintiffs' exhibit 38 in purple, and on plaintiffs' exhibit 16 in pencil. The 40 acre tract containing the pine trees which defendant had pointed out as the southeast corner of his property was not included within the purple crayon lines on plaintiffs' exhibit 38 but was included within the pencil lines on plaintiffs' exhibit 16. The inclusion of this 40 acres in the 430 acres actually sold would necessarily move the purple line bounding the 430 acres on the west an undetermined distance to the east. The property actually purchased by plaintiffs did not include the (potential) alfalfa land we have mentioned lying west of the north alfalfa field and northwest of Keys Canyon Wash. Neither did it include a little over six acres of the south alfalfa field.

Shearer testified that at a conference during the negotiations leading up to the sale of the 550 acres, Cooper represented the acreage and values of the various classes of lands as follows: Alfalfa land planted, 160 acres at $250 per acre; potential alfalfa land, about 95 acres at $100 per acre; cultivatable land, about 150 acres at $50 per acre; pasture land, about 100 acres at $25 per acre; other land, between 40 and 50 acres, at from $5 to $10 per acre.

A contract dated March 10, 1936, for sale of the land was submitted to plaintiff, and by him to his business adviser. This contained detailed descriptions of the property, principally by fractional sections, township and range. Plaintiff told his business adviser and Backus that he knew nothing of legal descriptions and wanted to be sure that the land described was the property which had been shown him and which he had decided to purchase. To meet this situation, and before the contract was executed, the following provision was inserted: "(Above descriptions to be checked against map and title descriptions, and corrected accordingly)." The property was conveyed to plaintiffs on March 24, 1936.

Defendant agreed to take care of the alfalfa fields for half of the crop, which he did in 1936.

In the late spring or early summer of 1936, plaintiff attempted, without success, to locate the exterior boundaries of the property.

After plaintiff acquired title to the property he commenced a scientific investigation of the various characters of soils and climatic conditions. He purchased four thousand orange trees which he expected to plant on about 50 acres of the land shown on plaintiffs' exhibit 2 as "cultivatable land" lying east of the north alfalfa field. When this "cultivatable land" was cleared it was found to be far short of the area shown on plaintiffs' exhibit 2. He was able to plant only about twelve or thirteen acres. A considerable part of the balance of the supposed "cultivatable land" rose sharply up the side of a rocky mountain and was unfit for cultivation, there being only about thirty acres of cultivatable land east of the two alfalfa fields. Plaintiff made this discovery after the middle of July, 1937.

Rain fell in October of 1936 in a sufficient amount so that water ran down Keys Canyon Wash flowing from side to side in the channel which was obstructed with growths of brush and weeds. Plaintiff had workmen clean it out and straighten it for a distance of about 6,000 feet. Cooper told plaintiff that he hoped plaintiff would do more farming and less cleaning; that cleaning the channel "wasn't necessary"; that "the river wouldn't ever bother me."

There were heavy rains early in 1937. Plaintiff testified that "starting around February things began to happen. * * * Well, the Keys River ran heavily and jumped the cleared channel in several spots and went down over the south alfalfa field, depositing heavy layers of sand over large areas of it, as well as eroding barrancas in the west part of the field where the edge of the alfalfa drops off to the level of the San Luis Rey River bed." The extreme width of the Keys Canyon Wash flood was about 1,500 feet. A witness testified that it would be economically unsound to attempt to clear away the great amount of sand which had been deposited over a considerable area of the south alfalfa field. Some damage was done to the north alfalfa field by the flood waters from this wash.

The San Luis Rey River also flooded badly. It was about 600 feet wide at the road crossing we have mentioned. That crossing was not usable for a number of months and water ran in the Keys Canyon Wash until into June, 1937. The floods did very considerable damage to plaintiffs' property. Both the San Luis Rey River and Keys Canyon Wash reached flood stages in the three succeeding years.

Plaintiff had started building his residence on the property before the floods of 1937. He testified concerning that flood: "Well, believing that the flood then was possibly once in a lifetime, I continued building the house. * * *"

Defendant had his property surveyed in the summer of 1937. In August of that year the surveyor, Weeks, established the west and north lines of the property sold to plaintiffs. The west line of the 430-acre tract just cleared the west edge of the north alfalfa field and ran well into the south alfalfa field. The boundaries did not correspond with those plaintiff had been led to believe were the boundaries of his land.

Plaintiff testified that this was his first knowledge of the actual boundaries of the property he had purchased. He then realized for the first time that the representations made to him concerning the land, the areas of the various qualities of soil, and the boundaries of the tract were untrue. He wrote a letter to Cooper in September of 1937 complaining of these discrepancies and asked for some adjustment. Negotiations concerning a settlement of these differences were continued until into December, 1937, when Mr. and Mrs. Shearer gave notice of rescission of the purchase because of fraud and misrepresentation. While the original complaint is not in the record it was probably filed the last of January, 1938. It sought a rescission or damages in case rescission could not be had.

The findings followed plaintiffs' pleadings and were supported by the evidence. The trial court found fraud and misrepresentations which plaintiffs believed and upon which they relied. The findings of the most material false representations may be summarized as follows:

That the land sold contained 160 acres of planted alfalfa, ninety-five acres of potential alfalfa land, 150 acres of other cultivatable land, and 145 acres of pasture and waste land. (The actual acreages conveyed were found to be, 123 acres of planted alfalfa, fifteen acres of potential alfalfa land and 102 acres of other cultivatable land. While the computation was not made, this would leave 310 acres of pasture and waste land instead of between 140 and 150 acres of this land as represented.)

That since the erection of the Henshaw Dam (several years prior to 1932) the San Luis Rey River did not flow heavily and did not flood; that the Keys Canyon Wash was never more than a little creek and could not overflow and damage the land. (Both streams overflowed and caused serious damage after Cooper purchased the property in 1932. Maps furnished Cooper by the Huntington Land and Improvement Company showed that both streams have caused serious damage prior to that year.)

That the property could be reached over the road, already mentioned, leading from the paved highway, except for periods of a few days during heavy rains. (The evidence shows the river could be crossed during the rainy season only on large bridges; that this road was impassable for months at a time.)

That the property was readily accessible over a road from the south which crossed Keys Canyon Wash. (This was untrue, plaintiffs built their residence north of that wash. During one storm Mrs. Shearer and their son were marooned there. Plaintiff had to drop food and supplies to them from an aeroplane.)

That the well, pump, motor, and pipe lines on the property cost $27,000. (Their actual cost was found to be less than $15,000. The evidence shows the cost to have been about $11,329.84.)

[4] Our study of the record leaves us with the impression that Cooper did not know the boundaries of his own land when he pointed them out to Shearer. This is rather evident from the fact that he pointed to the pine trees as the southeast corner of his property when he did not even own the property on which they were standing and had to buy that property from another in order to consummate the sale to plaintiffs. This lack of knowledge of the east boundary indicated that he believed it to be west of its actual location. This belief, perhaps, might have led him into certain misrepresentations concerning some of the areas of the various kinds of soil. While this might bear on the question of a deliberate and intentional misrepresentation on his part, it cannot relieve him from the legal results of these misrepresentations if they were relied upon by the purchasers and they were actually deceived and damaged thereby.

[5, 6] A seller should inform himself correctly concerning the boundaries of land he is attempting to sell before he makes representations concerning their location. De Bairos v. Barlin, 46 Cal.App. 665, 190 P. 188. Misrepresentation of the character of the soil of the land sold, even when made without actual knowledge of their falsity, may constitute actionable fraud. As was said in Gammon v. Ealey & Thompson, 97 Cal.App. 452, 275 P. 1005, 1009:

"Even if appellants did not know that the Connetto land contained alkali in such excessive quantities as to render the land unfit for agricultural purposes, yet, if they represented to Gammon that the Connetto land contained alkali in such small quantities that the same would not injure or damage crops growing thereon, when, in fact, the alkali existed in such excessive quantities as to render the land unfit for the growing of crops thereon, such representations would have constituted fraud. Subdivision 2, § 1572, Civ.Code; McMahon et al. v. Grimes et al. [206 Cal. 526], 275 P. 440."

[7] Cooper had in his possession means of ascertaining that his representations concerning the flooding from the San Luis Rey River and the Keys Canyon Wash were untrue. The maps delivered to him when he purchased the property showed that floods from both streams had caused serious damage. Another damaging flood occurred after he bought the property. Negligence, carelessness and forgetfulness cannot relieve a person from responsibility for the results of his misrepresentations although when he made them he may not have been conscious of violating any obligation he owed to another. 26 Cal. Juris. pp. 745, 749, and cases cited; 6 Ten-Year Supp. pp. 41, 42, and cases cited.

While not admitting fraud, and arguing there was no actual fraud in the transaction, defendant does not seriously contend that the evidence fails to support the findings on that question. He seeks to escape liability for the reason that plaintiff made a thorough investigation of the land before he bought it and did not rely upon anything he was told but upon what he discovered and actually learned for himself; that prior to the purchase plaintiff knew that at least one material representation made to him was false so that he could rely on no representation made by Cooper.

No question is raised as to the amount of damages awarded nor the measure of damages applied.

Defendant points out that the evidence shows Shearer to be a business man of skill and experience in his own profession, well educated, a clear thinker and possessed of keen powers of observation and a remarkably retentive memory. A study of his testimony bears out these observations.

Defendant's arguments center around four phases of the case. They are, first, the frequent inspections of the property made by Shearer and his study of the aeroplane photographs taken under his direction; second, lines drawn by Shearer on the composite air photograph of the property which correspond closely to the boundaries of the property actually purchased; third, a discovery by Shearer that the two alfalfa fields had an area of 128 acres instead of 160 acres as represented; fourth, a purported reduction in the purchase price because of the discovered shortage in the acreage of the two alfalfa fields.

Before considering these questions in detail it should be remarked that, prior to the purchase, Shearer evidenced a rather surprising simplicity and unawareness and childlike faith in the absolute truth of the representations made to him by others. Had the trial court found that his investigations disclosed the true facts and that he relied upon them rather than on the misrepresentations of Cooper, those findings would have had ample evidentiary support. On the other hand, Cooper stands in the embarrassing position of having made certain untrue representations when he had in his possession evidence of their falsity. If he did not actually know they were untrue he could have ascertained the true facts with slight effort and in a short time. Other representations were made that were contrary to his own experience while he was the owner of the property. Under such circumstances, forgetfulness or carelessness on his part is no excuse for him.

Defendant argues that Shearer was given every opportunity to make all of the examinations of the property he desired; that he went over it many times; that he studied the photographs carefully; that these photographs showed sand streaks and sand deposits on both alfalfa fields indicating they had been flooded; that the steep, broken and rocky nature of much of the land rendering it unfit for cultivation was clearly evident from these photographs; that from this investigation Shearer must have known the character of the land and could not have been misled by any misrepresentations made by Cooper.

[8] The evidence shows that plaintiff came to California in June, 1925; that thereafter he worked for moving picture companies. There is nothing to show that he had any knowledge of farms, farming operations or soils. He testified in effect that his various inspections of the property did not reveal to him the past evidence of damage by floods or danger of future floods because he knew nothing of conditions governing those happenings and because he knew nothing of soils; that while the photographs disclosed much steep, broken and rocky ground he had not been able to locate any boundaries and therefore the pictures did not disclose how much of that character of land was a part of the property he was purchasing. The trial court accepted this evidence as true and it supports the finding based upon it.

It is also pointed out that defendant joined with plaintiff in replacing the two culverts in the road crossing the San Luis Rey River with a small bridge about twenty feet long having a clearance of six or seven feet. Further stress is laid on the fact that plaintiff had the Keys Canyon Wash cleaned out and straightened. From this it is argued that Shearer did not believe and rely on Cooper's statements concerning the small flow of the two streams.

No such deduction need be drawn from such evidence. Plaintiff testified that defendant told him that the two wooden culverts were washed out during rainy seasons so that the road was closed for several days at a time; that he wanted a permanent crossing so he decided to construct a small bridge. This rather supports the contention of plaintiff that he believed the statement of defendant that the flow of the San Luis Rey River was small. Otherwise he would not have designed so small a bridge. It was completely destroyed in the 1937 flood. There is evidence that the flow of the river at that point was 13,000 second feet during the 1932 flood which occurred after defendant had purchased the property. Nor can we attach any great importance to plaintiff's cleaning and straightening the Keys Canyon Wash. Brush and weeds will choke a channel and prevent the flow of water. Cleaning and straightening the wash was an act of common prudence. It was not necessarily evidence of fear of flood.

The lines now appearing on the composite photograph taken from the aeroplane furnish the strongest ground for the argument that plaintiff knew the boundaries of the property, the rugged nature of much of it and that he was not buying all of the south alfalfa field. These lines correspond very closely to the actual boundaries of the land purchased. However, plaintiff explained lines on this photograph to the apparent satisfaction of the trial court.

Plaintiff testified that the aerial photographs were taken in the summer of 1934; that they were assembled into one picture late in 1935 when squares were originally drawn on it; that the scale for the lines drawn on the picture was furnished by Cooper; that if this scale was not correct the computations would prove erroneous. Plaintiff testified concerning the original lines: "I took the 40-acre squares, being based on the figure Mr. Cooper gave me, and I drew some supposedly 40-acre squares over the defendant's exhibit B. Insofar as those squares were concerned, they were dependent on the information I got from Mr. Cooper. When that information so given me, as being in error in some way—When the results therefrom were disputed by Mr. Cooper, then the squares no longer became of any significance." As Cooper disputed the results of plaintiff's computations, plaintiff concluded the scale was wrong and the lines on the photographs meant nothing.

Plaintiff testified that the original lines were erased and the present lines were drawn at a later date after the purchase, just when does not definitely appear. Plaintiff testified that in June, 1937, he established a base for measuring the areas of the alfalfa fields; that he first learned the correct boundary lines during the Weeks survey. The inference may not be unreasonable that the present lines were drawn on the picture during the summer of 1937. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff on this issue and we cannot disturb that finding here.

[9] After the photographs were assembled, and prior to 1936, plaintiff attempted to determine the acreage in the alfalfa fields by means of a planimeter and asked Cooper for the dimensions of any object appearing on the picture as a base for his calculations. Defendant gave him the purported measurements of the oval appearing inside his race course. Using these measurements, plaintiff computed the total acreage of the two alfalfa fields at 128 acres. He communicated this information to Backus who gave it to defendant. Backus reported to plaintiff, in effect, that defendant said plaintiff was "all wet" and his computations were "cock-eyed." The assurance that there were 160 acres planted in alfalfa was repeated. Plaintiff testified that with these statements made to him he concluded that the measurements of the "base" were wrong and that his computations were valueless as a result; that he accepted and believed the representations that there were 160 acres planted to alfalfa. The trial court accepted this explanation as true. Ordinarily a defendant cannot lull a plaintiff into security and then maintain that he should have realized that a fraud was being committed upon him. Curtis v. Title Guar., etc., Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 612, 40 P.2d 562, 42 P.2d 323. What was said in Neff v. Engler, 205 Cal. 484, 271 P. 744, 746, is applicable here:

"In Bishop on Noncontract Law, sec. 330, it is said: That plaintiff is too credulous is not generally a defense. 'The test of the representation is its actual effect on the particular mind, whether it is a strong and circumspect mind, or one weak and too relying.' (See, also, Bigelow on Frauds, 524.) 'Every contracting party has an absolute right to rely on the express statement of an existing fact, the truth of which is known to the opposite party and unknown to him, as the basis of a mutual agreement; and he is under no obligation to investigate and verify statements to the truth of which the other party to the contract, with full means of knowledge, has deliberately pledged his faith.' (Mead v. Bunn, 32 N.Y. 275.) * * * [Citing cases.]"

[10] Defendant urges that plaintiff received a reduction in the purchase price of the land because of the discovery of the shortage in the acreage of the two alfalfa fields. There is evidence to that effect in the record but this contention overlooks the positive testimony of plaintiff that no such reduction in price was made for that reason. Thus we have a sharp conflict in the evidence which was resolved in favor of plaintiff by the trial judge. We cannot reverse a judgment because of conflicts in the evidence.

Finally, defendant argues that, since plaintiff discovered at least one material representation made by defendant was false, this placed him on notice so that he could not rely on any representation made to him. This argument is based on some of those representations already considered, principally on the acreage of the two alfalfa fields. As the trial court found that plaintiff did not learn of the falsity of these representations until after he had purchased the property, this argument must fail. As there is evidence supporting this finding it is conclusive here.

It may be true that defendant was merely mistaken in some, or perhaps all, of his representations to plaintiff and that he did not deliberately intend to wilfully deceive. However, the representations were positively made as to material facts. Plaintiff believed those representations and acted on them to his injury. The true rule governing cases of this kind is set forth in McMahon v. Grimes, 206 Cal. 526, 275 P. 440, 443, as follows:

"Conceding that Mrs. Grimes honestly thought her statements as to the character of the land were true, she was not justified in making them to the plaintiffs, in order to induce the latter to purchase the land through her, for the reason that she had not, and could not have had, any competent information that they were true.

Had she made an examination of the land for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of its alluvial soil, and the presence or absence of hardpan and clay thereon, she would have discovered its true character, and as such an examination would have revealed the presence of hardpan and clay, and but a thin layer of alluvial soil, she could not have thereafter truthfully made said statements relative to the character of said soil. If she made such statements without this information, or some other of equal merit, then she was guilty of fraud even if she believed they were true. As was said in Muller v. Palmer, supra [144 Cal. 305, 77 P. 954], quoting from the early case of Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. [503], 504, 68 Am.Dec. 274, 'But it is equally true that "whether a party thus misrepresenting a material fact knew it to be false or made the assertion without knowing whether it were true or false, is wholly immaterial." If a party asserts that as true which he does not know to be true, it is a false representation. If he intends simply to state his belief upon information, then he should state it in that precise form, so as to apprise the other party of the true grounds upon which his statement is made. A party will always be held to make good his statement in the form in which he makes it. If he states a thing as true in general terms without qualification, then he is presumed to do so upon his own knowledge or at his own peril, and must make good his assertion.'"

The judgment is affirmed.

In re DE SANTI'S ESTATE.

PARDINI et al. v. GIANNINI et al.

Civ. 12024.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
July 31, 1942.

1. Wills 🔑736, 832

Where all of estate was disposed of by will, no provision was made for payment of debts or expenses and there was no designation of any particular portion of estate to be appropriated for payment thereof, debts and expenses were payable from residuary estate, as against contention that debts and expenses were payable from property specifically bequeathed to persons not related by blood to decedent. Probate Code, §§ 750, 752.

2. Wills 🔑812

Under statute providing that unless different intention is expressed in will, abatement takes place in any class only as between legacies of that class, even if statute applies to payment of debts of the estate and expenses of administration, preference to relatives, as to payment of debts and expenses, takes place only as between legatees of the same class, and does not require that debts of decedent and expenses of administration should be paid from property specifically bequeathed to persons not related by blood to decedent who by residuary clause disposed of remainder of property to blood relatives. Probate Code, § 752.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Lorenzo De Santi, deceased. From an order settling the final account of Mario Giannini as executor, etc., of the will of Lorenzo De Santi, deceased, and directing the debts of decedent and the expenses of administration to be paid from property specifically devised to persons not related by blood to decedent, and that no part thereof should be paid from property disposed of to blood relatives by the residuary clause of the will, Livio Pardini and others appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

Goscoe O. Farley and Arthur J. Manasse, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

R. L. Husted, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order settling the final account of the executor of the will of Lorenzo De Santi, deceased, and involves the validity of that portion of the order directing the debts of the decedent and expenses of administration to be paid from the property specifically devised and bequeathed to persons not related by blood to the decedent, and that no part thereof be paid from the property disposed of to blood relatives by the residuary clause of the will.

The will was holographic, and written in Italian. Translated, the pertinent parts thereof are as follows: "Article 2nd I give to Livio and Carolina Pardini my four lots No. 2, 3, 4 and 5 with my house and furniture which will be found on said lots in Block 5332. Article 3rd I give to Rinaldo and Emilia Bianchi my nephew and niece, my four lots No. 15, 16, 17 and 18 in Block 5332 all of which said lots will be found in my name on the register of the assessor of San Francisco, California. Article 4th All of the rest of my property I give in equal parts to my heirs according to the laws of succession of the State of California." Livio and Carolina Pardini, the appellants herein, and Rinaldo Bianchi are not related by blood to the decedent. The latter is the husband of Emilia Bianchi, the decedent's niece. The heirs of the decedent were his three daughters, namely Erminia Giorgi, Ida Lombardi, and Jennie Pellinacci, to whom the residue of the estate was bequeathed. The estate was appraised at $21,193.76; the specific devise to appellants, consisting of decedent's home and furniture, was valued at $3,050; the specific devise to Rinaldo Bianchi was valued at $300, and to Emilia Bianchi, $300. Hence a residue of $17,543.76 remained in the estate prior to the payment of debts and expenses of administration; and the debts and expenses of administration amounted to $2,463.61. The probate court's order was: "* * * that the sum of $2,463.61, the total disbursements and expenses in said estate, as set forth in said account, be and the same is hereby made charge above against the bequests and legacies of those devisees and legatees not related by blood to said decedent, namely: Livio Pardini, Carolina Pardini and Rinaldo Bianchi, and that no part of said sum be chargeable against the bequests and legacies to Emilia Bianchi, Erminia Giorgi, Ida Lombardi and/or Egizia Pellinacci, also known as Jennie Pellinacci, the kindred of said decedent." The foregoing order is not sustainable.

[1] Section 750 of the Probate Code provides: "If the testator makes provision by his will, or designates the estate to be appropriated, for the payment of his debts, the expenses of administration, or family allowance, they must be paid according to such provision or out of the estate thus appropriated, so far as the same is sufficient. If insufficient, that portion of the estate not disposed of by the will, if any, must be appropriated for that purpose; and if that is not sufficient, the property given to residuary legatees and devisees, and thereafter all other property devised and bequeathed is liable for the same, in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises and legacies, but specific devises and legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate." (Italics ours.) Here all the estate was disposed of by will; no provision is made for the payments of debts or expenses, nor is there any designation of any particular portion of the estate to be appropriated for the payment of them. Therefore the provision that the property given to residuary legatees and devisees is liable next in order for the payment of debts and expenses of administration, is applicable to the present situation, and as appellants contend clearly requires that the debts and expenses shall be paid from the residuary estate. Furthermore, as will be noted, section 750 contains this provision: "* * * but specific devises and legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate"; and in Re Estate of Bacigalupi, 105 Cal.App. 578, 288 P. 122, 123, in construing section 1359 of the Civil Code, the predecessor of section 750 of the Probate Code, it was specifically held that property bequeathed to residuary legatees must be resorted to for the payment of expenses of administration before any resort is made to property specifically devised or bequeathed, in the absence of a contrary intention on the part of the testator. In so holding the court said: "However, the practice has been uniform from the adoption of these various Code sections that specific devises or legacies shall be exonerated from the payment of debts of the deceased, funeral expenses and expenses of administration if, in the absence of other provision in the will for that purpose, sufficient property is bequeathed to a residuary legatee; that is to say, the accepted rule is that the order in which the property of the estate is to be resorted to for the payment of debts of the deceased as prescribed in section 1359 has been the accepted and approved order in reference to the payment of funeral expenses, allowance to the family, and expenses of administration. Recent authorities in harmony with this practice are [In re] Estate of Babb, 200 Cal. 252, 252 P. 1039, 1042, and [In re] Estate of Daly, 202 Cal. 284, 260 P. 296. In [Re] Estate of Babb, the Supreme Court at page 260 of 200 Cal., 252 P. 1039, said: 'Property bequeathed to a residuary legatee must be resorted to for the payment of the debts of the deceased, funeral expenses, and expenses of administration, prior to any resort being made to property specifically devised or bequeathed. Civ.Code, § 1359; Code Civ.Proc., § 1563.' In that case, as here, the special devise of the life estate to appellants was specific, whereas the bequest to the residuary legatees was general within the definition of section 1357 of the Civil Code. In the Estate of Daly [supra], at page 288 of 202 Cal., 260 P. 296, 298, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the rule that a specific legacy is exempt from the payment of expenses of administration 'if there be other sufficient estate to satisfy them, and it was the intention of the testator that the specific legacy be not so charged.'" Certainly no contrary intention is here expressed in the will; and it is quite obvious that the only reason the testator could have had in making a will at all was to make the specific devises to persons who would not otherwise have participated in his estate had he left no will; and after making such provision for them he left the major part of his estate to his heirs "according to the laws of succession of the State of California."

Respondents concede that section 750 is controlling where all parties taking under a will are kindred of the testator or all are non-kindred; but they contend that where as here a portion of them are kindred and a portion non-kindred, section 752 governs and if so that the provisions thereof require that all debts and expenses of administration shall be charged first to the legacies of non-kindred, before resort may be had to any of the estates bequeathed to kindred. There is no merit in the contention. Section 752 as it read at the time the will was executed, and upon which respondents rely, was as follows: "Unless a different intention is expressed in the will, abatement takes place in any class only as between legacies of that class, and legacies to a spouse or to kindred are chargeable only after legacies to persons not related to the testator." (Italics ours.) Assuming, as respondents contend, that the provisions of said section 752 apply to the payment of the debts of the estate or expenses of administration, as well as to abatement of legacies, it is clear that the plan of abatement provided for herein takes place with a preference to kindred only as between the legacies of the same class, as those classes are listed in section 161 of the Probate Code, namely, specific, demonstrative, annuity, residuary, and general. In other words, if certain of the residuary legatees were related to the testator and others not, debts and expenses would be charged first against the interest of the residuary legatees who were not related, and not until such legacies were consumed in the discharge of debts and expenses would the residuary interest of kindred be charged. If the residue was insufficient and it was necessary to go into general and specific legacies, within those classes non-kindred would be charged first.

[2] The foregoing view finds support in the decisions rendered in Re Estate of Wever, 12 Cal.App.2d 237, 55 P.2d 279, and Estate of Apple, 66 Cal. 432, 6 P. 7. While the precise questions presented in those cases were not the same as the one here involved, the language used therein in interpreting the Code sections now under consideration and their predecessors is pertinent to the situation here presented, and doubtless sustains appellants' contention that as to the payment of debts and expenses preference to relatives takes place only as between legatees of the same class. For instance, in Re Estate of Wever [12 Cal.App.2d 237, 55 P.2d 281], the court said: "Reading the sections as a whole, the reasonable interpretation is this: Section 750 makes all property of the estate liable for debts, expenses of administration, and family allowance, with the single exception of property covered by specific devises and legacies under certain conditions. The order in which the property is to be resorted to for that purpose is clearly defined, and no devise or legacy is exempt except as noted. * * * The reasonable interpretation of this section [752] is that abatement takes place equally between all legatees of a certain class and cannot apply to one only of one class and one of another. The 'class' mentioned in this section is any one of the five kinds of legacies stated and defined 'according to their nature' in section 161 of the Probate Code. * * * The obvious intention of the sections is that, 'unless a different intention is expressed in the will,' legacies to spouse and kindred shall be preferred over other legacies of the same class when the property is insufficient to pay all such legacies in full, but that all property of the estate shall be liable for the debts, expenses of administration, and family allowance, with the single exception of the specific legacies and devises mentioned in section 750." In the Estate of Apple, [66 Cal. 432, 6 P. 13], in referring to former section 1361 of the Civil Code, which with section 1362 was the predecessor of section 752 of the Probate Code, it was said: "* * * legacies to husband, widow, or kindred of any class are chargeable for debts only after legacies to persons not related to the testator. To this extent, and to this extent only, are legacies to husband, widow, or kindred given a preference over legacies of the same class to strangers." (All italics ours.) The decision in the Wever case will show that the court there refrained from deciding the related question of the apportionment as between the various legatees of the liability for debts, expenses and family allowances because the parties stipulated that such question was not involved in that proceeding. However, the language used in both decisions, in our opinion, may be taken as supporting the contention of appellants.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that the provisions of section 750 alone are here controlling, and that accordingly the property bequeathed to the residuary legatees is liable for the payment of the debts of the decedent and the expenses of administration. The order appealed from is therefore reversed, with directions to revise and reenter the same in accordance with the views herein expressed.

MARTIN v. McLAIN et al.

Civ. 2684.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 12, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 10, 1942.

1. Mortgages 🔑38(1)

In action based on theory that note and assignment of contract for purchase of land constituted an equitable mortgage upon land, which plaintiff was entitled to foreclose, evidence sustained finding that the note and assignment were executed by defendant as accommodation to plaintiff for purpose of increasing plaintiff's credit standing and to enable plaintiff to obtain credit for conduct of defendants' business and justified denial of relief.

2. Payment 🔑65(3)

There is a presumption that an obligation delivered up to a debtor has been paid. Code Civ.Proc. § 1963, subds. 9, 13.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)

In action on an open book account, the weight to be given conflicting evidence was matter entirely for trial court, even though the weight of the evidence might appear to appellate court to be otherwise.

4. Account, action on 🔑22

In action on open book account, evidence sustained finding that defendant had fully paid and satisfied all legitimate charges against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; William L. Bradshaw, Judge.

Action on an open book account and to foreclose a claimed equitable mortgage by Guy S. Martin against Victor C. McLain and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Brittan & Mack, Donald G. Kendall, and Kendall & Howell, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Henry E. Schmidt, of Bakersfield, and Carlton H. Casjens, of Bell, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an action to recover on an open book account and to foreclose a claimed equitable mortgage alleged to have been given to secure the payment of a promissory note. Plaintiff and appellant was a resident of the state of Illinois for more than 25 years and was such resident at the time this action was commenced. Since 1918 he maintained an office in the State of Missouri wherein he conducted a business of writing insurance and surety bonds and financing contractors. The appellant first met the respondent Victor C. McLain, a contractor, in 1924, and entered into a course of business with him whereby appellant furnished McLain performance bonds and financed him on construction jobs over a period of years extending to and including the year 1934. The respondents Victor C. McLain and L. M. McLain, his present wife, were residents of Illinois from 1924 until 1935. They moved to California in December, 1935, and made their permanent home at Wasco, on the real property (160 acres) the subject of this action. The defendant Maud F. McLain was the former wife of the respondent Victor C. McLain. They were divorced in 1923. The action against her was subsequently dismissed. L. M. McLain was married to Victor C. McLain in 1923. They lived together as husband and wife from said date until the commencement of this action. Victor C. McLain and Maud F. McLain entered into a contract to purchase the land here in question from Arthur and Addie Thresher on March 30, 1922. Maud F. McLain quitclaimed her interest to Victor C. McLain February 21, 1924. Victor C. McLain, on April 7, 1932, conveyed and quitclaimed all his interest in the land to L. M. McLain. The title to the land was finally acquired by L. M. McLain by deed from Louise A. Simms and Vinton D. Simms on January 29, 1935.

From 1924 until April, 1930, the respondent Victor C. McLain operated a construction business under the name of Midwest Engineering Company, a corporation. He was president, L. M. McLain was vice president and E. O. Erickson was secretary-treasurer. The Midwest Engineering Company encountered financial difficulties in April, 1930, and the corporation was abandoned at that time. Victor C. McLain continued business in his own name. In 1925 appellant began to finance some road construction jobs for McLain. This relationship developed into a running account between the parties. Appellant took assignments of moneys due respondents on the respective jobs. He advanced funds to and on behalf of respondents and charged a substantial rate of interest for such advancements. Appellant's record of account extending from July 5, 1924, to May 1, 1937, shows substantial receipts and disbursements and indicates that on May 1, 1937, a balance was due appellant in the sum of $45,047.30.

Appellant's record shows that on May 29, 1929, the Midwest Engineering Company was indebted to him for approximately $12,550.50. He testified that money was needed to finish a road construction job known as the Pinckneyville job, and that he wrote a letter to Mr. McLain on that date, in which he stated:

"Have just had a talk with Mr. Locatel at the bank and while he has not definitely agreed to take care of us, I believe he will see us through on this Pinckneyville job. It might be well for you to make me an assignment of estimates on the job and also of your California land, which I believe we had up with him once before and he knows something about it.

"If you will get these to me right away, I will make all necessary arrangements down there. Am inclosing note, which I thought perhaps would be best to make for $25000.00 and an assignment of estimates."

On May 31, 1929, Mr. McLain wrote to appellant, returning the promissory note for $25,000 signed by himself individually and the Midwest Engineering Company, together with an assignment of the real estate contract dated March 30, 1922, between himself, his then wife, and Arthur and Addie Thresher, and the original contract of purchase. The letter returning these documents reads in part as follows:

"I am handing you herewith the return of the note, $25000.00, you sent me for signing together with a memorandum on 2 sheets, one for each of us to be signed by us, so as to leave the track behind us of just what we were doing. One of them you may return to me after it is signed.

"I am also handing you the signed statement of assignment, which you forwarded, for your use.

"I am also handing you the contract for deed on the California property, together with an assignment of interests, to be attached to it or remain folded with it as I am handing it to you, whichever way the needs of the occasion may require with you.

"I will expect to hear from you very shortly upon your report and returns of the matter."

The memorandum included in the documents forwarded with the foregoing letter is as follows:

"State of Illinois }
"County of Jefferson } ss.

"This mutual contract entered into this 31st day of May, A. D. 1929, by and between Guy S. Martin and Victor C. McLain, WITNESSETH: That on May 29, 1929, dated at St. Louis, Missouri, Victor C. McLain makes to the said Martin his promissory note for Twenty-five Thousand Dollars ($25000.00) due in 90 days, bearing interest from date at six per cent (6%) per annum.

"It is hereby mutually agreed between the parties in the said note that the note is made for a fixed sum of money not yet advanced and shall be valid only hereafter for such an amount as shall from time to time be advanced by the said Guy S. Martin, or his principals to the said Victor C. McLain." (Italics ours.)

In April of 1930, the Midwest Engineering Company was in bad financial condition. Mr. McLain executed a bill of sale from the Midwest Engineering Company to George E. Hoffman of all of the remaining equipment of the company for a recited consideration of Seventeen Thousand Dollars ($17,000). The purpose of this bill of sale is disputed. Appellant contends that it was given to prevent the creditors of the engineering company from taking the remaining assets of the company, that it was made but never delivered to Hoffman and that the machinery and equipment covered by the bill of sale was never received by him and that the consideration recited in it was never paid. Guy S. Martin was a stockholder in the Hoffman Construction Company. Respondent Victor C. McLain contends that the bill of sale was executed and that the remaining machinery in the possession of the Midwest Engineering Company was turned over to appellant Guy S. Martin through George Hoffman in satisfaction and payment of all outstanding obligations of himself and the engineering company to appellant.

The record indicates that after the failure of the Midwest Engineering Company, Mr. McLain continued the construction business in his own name and continued to deal with appellant. In April, 1930, one Kirby Smith, who was attorney for McLain and the Midwest Engineering Company, wrote the following letter to Martin:

"McLain tells me that he and you have arrived at an understanding whereby you are to finance him on a certain sub-contract of State Highway making in Missouri. He is very desirous of putting up to you everything he has got for collateral and executing a contract to you for your protection to the last pound that he can pull and the last dollar he can raise. He has asked me to draft a contract and other papers covering this matter and be prepared to deliver to you as quickly as possible when he has secured the contract. He tells me further that he is expecting this contract will be made during the present week.

"In years past through the very friendly relationship of yourself and McLain, I have drawn a number of papers which were executed for your protection. All of them have been lived up to at this time insofar as I know and all of the understandings already entered into have been worked out.

"Now it occurs to me that upon the making and delivery of this new contract all of the old scraps and threads should be picked up and you and he start with a clean slate. To do this I wish you would at once go to your papers and take therefrom every note, mortgage, contract, or other papers which had to do with your past relations and mail them to me. I will treat them as an escrow placed in my hands by you to be held and deposited or whatever may be your order or wish * * *"

Upon receipt of this letter the appellant forwarded to Smith the documents requested which included one demand note dated May 29, 1929, for $25,000 signed by Midwest Engineering Company and by V. C. McLain, also an assignment of the real estate in California, which assignment was dated May 29, 1929. Smith acknowledged the receipt of the documents and stated: "When I wrote you to forward me these papers I expected that these notes would show such credits as had been made or if some of them were paid for then which ones were paid, and then would be able from that to determine exactly how much McLain owed you yet * * *."

Appellant replied in part as follows: "As you surmise, the only record I have of the amount Mac owes me is a ledger account, which shows a balance due at this date of $40,951.52, including interest to date * * *."

Considerable correspondence between Kirby Smith and appellant ensued. On February 15, 1935, Kirby Smith died. Appellant thereafter demanded the assignment of the California land to him and also demanded payment of the $25,000 note. On April 29, 1936, he filed a complaint alleging the execution of the promissory note in the sum of $25,000 by Mr. McLain and that it was secured by the assignment of the real estate contract above mentioned; that it was given as security for "moneys advanced" and to be advanced; that the note has never been paid and is still due and owing; that demand has been made to have the property transferred to his name as security for the promissory note; that the moneys advanced by appellant to Mr. McLain were used in whole or in part in the purchase of the property; that Mr. McLain transferred the real property to his wife L. M. McLain for the express purpose of defeating appellant's rights. Appellant then prayed that the property be declared to be held in trust by L. M. McLain for and on behalf of appellant as security for the loan; and that respondents be ordered to execute a deed of trust in that amount upon the property. The contract of purchase between Arthur and Addie Thresher and Victor and Maud McLain was attached as an exhibit. It contained the following conditional assignment:

"State of Illinois }
"County of Jefferson } ss.

"For value received I hereby assign and transfer the within real estate contract for deed to Guy S. Martin, conditioned also that it shall stand as collateral for the payment by me of a certain promissory note for Twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00) made to the said Guy S. Martin dated at St. Louis, Missouri, May 29, 1929, due in ninety (90) days.

"Victor C. McLain."

No claim was made in the original complaint for any balance due upon an open book account. An amended complaint was filed claiming that the above mentioned assignment constituted an equitable mortgage upon the property described and in addition to the allegations in the original complaint claimed that there was a balance of $45,047.30 due and owing from Victor C. McLain and alleging that appellant has a lien on the respondents' real property described in the original complaint, and that they be enjoined and restrained from asserting any interest in and to that land adverse to that of the appellant.

The respondents answered the complaint. Victor C. McLain admitted the execution of the assignment and the promissory note but denied that the note or assignment was given to the appellant for moneys advanced to the respondent; claimed that title to the property was conveyed to L. M. McLain by grant deed for a valid consideration; alleged that the promissory note was fully paid, satisfied and settled about April 7, 1930, when at the instance and request of the appellant Mr. McLain caused to be transferred certain construction equipment and other property to G. R. Hoffman and the appellant in full satisfaction and payment of any and all indebtedness to appellant. Other special defenses such as lack of consideration, statute of limitations, laches, and community property interests of Mrs. McLain, were alleged and the trial court found in accordance with those defenses. It found that Victor C. McLain and Maud F. McLain entered into the contract to purchase the land as alleged; that Victor C. McLain, in the state of Illinois, executed the promissory note for $25,000 on May 29, 1929, and executed the assignment of the real estate contract to appellant; that there was no money consideration or other thing of value given for the execution and delivery of the instruments; that the respondent Mr. McLain did not agree to pay any past obligation as a consideration for the note or assignment; that he did not advance nor agree to advance any money on the note or assignment; that he did not agree to pay any future debts or obligations of the Midwest Engineering Company or of Victor C. McLain; that he did not part with anything of value or make any agreement to part with anything of value in consideration for the execution of the note or the assignment; that the note and assignment were executed as an accommodation to the appellant for the purpose of increasing his credit standing and/or to enable him to obtain finances; that appellant had not advanced, prior to the execution of the note, any money which was to be secured by the execution of the note and assignment; that he did not agree to make any advances of any money or thing of value in the future and that he did not advance to the respondents or extend or advance on behalf of them from the 29th day of May, 1929, to and including September, 1934, the sum of $45,047.30, or any other sum whatsoever; that during the month of May, 1930, the appellant returned and delivered the promissory note and purported assignment to Mr. McLain and cancelled them; that subsequent to the return of the promissory note and purported assignment Mr. McLain retained possession of them and that appellant is now endeavoring to falsely and fraudulently convert them to his own use contrary to representations made by him at the time they were executed and deposited with him; that by the execution of the assignment Mr. McLain did not intend to give and did not give to the appellant an equitable mortgage; that L. M. McLain is the owner of the property and that appellant has no right, title or interest in it; that at no time did appellant advance any sum of money to respondents for the purpose of paying any of the purchase price of the property either in whole or in part; that the transfer of Victor C. McLain's interest in the property to L. M. McLain was for a valuable consideration; that she had no knowledge, actual or constructive, of any claimed interest of appellant in or to the property; that at no time did he inform her that he had or claimed any interest in the contract of purchase or the land until she was served with a copy of the complaint; that by his acts and declarations he deliberately, knowingly and intentionally induced her to establish herself in and alter her position to her own disadvantage with respect to the matter declared upon; that subsequent to her obtaining an assignment to the contract of sale and the land described therein and prior to the filing of the action, she expended money and erected and constructed improvements on the land; that she believed at all times that he had no interest in the contract nor the land in the contract described; and that plaintiff has been guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in bringing the action.

The court then found that at all times subsequent to May, 1929, up to and including December 4, 1934, the respondents and each of them were residents and citizens of the state of Illinois; that the appellant now is and at all times mentioned was a citizen and resident of the state of Missouri and that at no time was he a citizen of the state of California; that the respondents never were residents or citizens of the state of Missouri; and that the residence of the respondents was at all times known to the appellant since the date of the note and assignment and that Victor C. McLain, throughout his residence in the state of Illinois, visited the appellant from time to time at St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, in his place of business there. The court found that the cause of action was barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California. By its judgment it denied any relief to appellant.

[1] Appellant first contends that because respondent Mr. McLain gave the promissory note and the assignment of the contract for the purchase of the land to appellant and appellant later made advances to McLain upon it, the note and assignment constituted an equitable mortgage upon the land which he was entitled to have foreclosed. The execution of the instruments is admitted. Appellant never recorded the assignment; never credited respondents' account with the amount of the note; the books did not reflect any transaction respecting it; no payments were ever credited on the note; and the note and assignment, together with other notes and mortgages all totaling $91,765.64, were returned to Smith, the attorney, for reasons expressed in the letter above mentioned. Smith is now deceased. Each party claims that his testimony, as to the true facts, would be most valuable to him. The trial court had before it the system and method previously used by appellant in securing notes and mortgages for the purpose of inducing the bank to make loans to appellant. From those transactions it readily appears that appellant did not intend to apply the proceeds to any indebtedness of respondent McLain but merely adopted this method and system for the purpose of deceiving the bank or creditors of McLain. A brief summary of these transactions convinces us that the mortgage and assignment here involved were to be used only for the purpose as found by the court. Victor C. McLain testified that on previous occasions and from time to time the Midwest Engineering Company had executed promissory notes and other evidences of indebtedness and delivered them to the appellant for the purpose of aiding and assisting the appellant in obtaining from other sources the necessary and proper credit to conduct respondents' business and that the $25,000 note and assignment on the California land were for that purpose only. The evidence shows that on April 14, 1926, the Midwest Engineering Company executed in favor of Martin a chattel mortgage in the sum of $25,000 on certain machinery to secure a note in that sum. Martin testified that this note was never paid. No action was taken on it by him. No claim is now being made for it. This was one of the notes and mortgages returned to attorney Smith with the assignment and note here in issue. There was another note dated "1/13/30" for $25,000 enclosed, also one note dated February 15, 1929, for $16,765.64, and one chattel mortgage dated February 15, 1929, for $16,765.64. No claim is being made for any sums due under them. The note and chattel mortgage dated April 14, 1926, was mailed to Martin with this instruction:

"We enclose herewith our ninety-day note for $25,000 and are attaching a chattel mortgage for like amount, the plan, as per our conversation, being for you to use this note and chattel mortgage in securing a loan for us of $12,000 * * *."

[2] The evidence further discloses that on August 1, 1927, Mr. McLain once before assigned his interest in the California real estate here involved to Martin for some reason which is not apparent from the record. This assignment was unrecorded. At the same time he executed a bill of sale to appellant of a great quantity of machinery owned by the Midwest Engineering Company. There is no record of this transaction on the books of appellant. He testified that he did not recall the transaction. This rather indicates that as far back as 1926, the appellant was obtaining instruments from the Midwest Engineering Company for the purpose of obtaining money from his banker and that the execution of that bill of sale and assignment of the California land dated August 1, 1927, was to increase the financial credit of Martin. Martin claims that those instruments were given to protect Midwest Engineering Company from its creditors; that "Mr. Smith suggested that in order to keep Mr. McLain going. Mr. Smith was always working to keep McLain's credit up. I didn't record it. There wasn't any consideration. I didn't give him any credit on the books." Under date of February 15, 1929, in a letter to Martin enclosing the note and chattel mortgage for $16,765.64, is found this statement by the secretary-treasurer of the Midwest Engineering Company: "Am enclosing herewith note for $16,765.64, dated today, 7%, and due in six months, together with chattel mortgage, signed and acknowledged before justice of peace. I arrived at the amount by adding an even $8,000.00 to the amount of your last statement to us. As I explained to you, Mac wants you to have this for your protection, if necessary, by someone pushing us too hard to raise money on * * *" At that time the record indicates that the Midwest Engineering Company owed only $8,765.67 to the appellant. The evidence clearly shows in that transaction that an inflation of $8,000 was concocted and planned by the parties; that the inflation was apparently for the purpose of presenting the chattel mortgage and note to a banking institution either directly or in a financial statement for the purpose of obtaining credit. Appellant now claims that the personal property represented in that chattel mortgage was in fact only worth $1,600. The trial court had the right to believe from the evidence that the mortgage and assignment here involved were but a similar spasm of executing instruments requested by the appellant for similar purposes. As further evidence that Martin had cancelled the $25,000 note and returned the security therefor, we find that on December 20, 1933, several years after the assignment of the real estate contract was returned to attorney Smith, Martin wrote to Mr. McLain and said: "I would appreciate it, Mac, if you will assign your sales contract to me, not only as additional security for what you owe me, but primarily in order to keep your other creditors from tying it up. * * *" The claimed unpaid note and assignment here involved were found in the possession of the maker. There is a presumption that an obligation delivered up to a debtor has been paid. § 1963, Code Civ.Proc., subds. 9 and 13. The portion of the judgment denying appellant relief in respect to the note and claimed equitable mortgage is fully supported by the evidence.

[3] Appellant next contends that in view of the fact that he introduced a detailed account, checks and vouchers supporting and showing that respondent Mr. McLain was indebted to him, that McLain's denial of such indebtedness and other evidence offered in support of his testimony was not sufficient to support the finding that respondent McLain was not indebted to him. If appellant's record of account is true and correct, as testified to by him, the trial court, in the absence of any defense thereto, might have been fully justified in awarding judgment in appellant's favor against Mr. McLain upon the open book account. This, however, is not the question before us. The trial court found in all particulars in favor of respondent Mr. McLain on this issue. The question is whether there is any substantial evidence supporting the finding of the trial court. The weight to be given that testimony is a matter entirely for the trial court, even though the weight of evidence may appear to us to be otherwise. Chichester v. Seymour, 28 Cal.App.2d 696, 83 P.2d 301; Bennett v. Chandler, 52 Cal.App.2d —, 126 P.2d 173.

In the light of this rule, we will review some of the evidence on that subject. On April 19, 1930, Martin wrote attorney Smith that McLain then owed him $40,951.42 on his ledger account. It was at about this time that the Midwest Engineering Company encountered financial difficulties and the corporation was abandoned.

Mr. McLain testified that in April, 1930, he went to Martin's office and that Martin and he agreed that upon any settlement of his account and of the account of the Midwest Engineering Company, he would turn over all of his equipment to Martin; that the equipment was "worth a lot more than his account * * * that there was other accounts to be taken care of yet and I explained to him some of those accounts I was going to take care of myself with assignment of balance of payments, unfinished payments on paving jobs." He then testified that Martin told him his account was "nine thousand one hundred and some dollars" but to place it at seventeen thousand dollars which would take care of his claim and more claims that he felt would have to be paid by him; that he gave a bill of sale of his machinery (in which the consideration was fixed at $17,000) to the Hoffman Construction Company, of which Martin was a stockholder, at Martin's request and for Martin's benefit; that he did not owe Hoffman Construction Company any money at any time.

There is some dispute in the evidence as to the amount of machinery that was turned over to Hoffman Construction Company. In the record is a list prepared by Hoffman Construction Company, of certain machinery and fixtures. This list is headed "C. E. Hoffman Construction Co., Lincoln, Illinois. List of Equipment taken over by us from the Midwest Engineering Company for Guy S. Martin, also disposition thereof:" On September 22, 1930, the Hoffman Construction Company was negotiating with attorney Smith about the price it should receive for the McLain equipment. It would therefore appear from this testimony that McLain intended the assignment of the machinery to operate as a satisfaction of all present and future obligations of McLain and the Midwest Engineering Company. If the trial court believed this testimony its finding in this respect cannot be disturbed.

[4] The items of account themselves are open to question. In the group of checks offered in evidence, consisting of 221, only 14 are made payable to Victor C. McLain. These 14 checks aggregate the sum of $3,116. Some of the remaining charges against the McLain account consisted of about 39 checks which were issued by Martin direct to the Tower Grove Bank. They totaled $15,827.86. Respondents argue that as far as the record discloses, these checks may have been issued by Martin to cover his personal indebtedness existing between himself and the Tower Grove Bank or that he may have issued these checks and obtained cash thereon for his own personal use. The witness Martin was indefinite in reference to the proof in respect to these items. On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. Can you tell from the ledger sheets of any advances made? A. I might be able to do that. I wouldn't know where the advances went to.

"Q. Your ledger sheets are recapitulation, that wouldn't show it? A. No."

While the evidence is not entirely satisfactory and convincing that the respondent McLain has fully paid and satisfied all legitimate and legal charges against him, it cannot be said that there is no evidence to support the finding of the court on that subject. In view of this determination, it will not become necessary to decide the other defenses raised by the answer.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NEST.

Cr. 1891.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

July 31, 1942.

1. Statutes ⚿206

A statute should be construed if reasonably possible so as to give force and effect to every expression used.

2. Statutes ⚿181(2), 188

Words in a statute should be given their ordinary meaning and receive a sensible construction in accord with commonly understood meaning thereof unless a different meaning is clearly intended or indicated. Civ.Code, § 13.

3. Statutes ⚿184

Although intention of legislature must be ascertained from words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious design of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such language. Civ. Code, § 13.

4. Master and servant ⚿78

The legislature in enacting the Unemployment Insurance Act did not intend to put a premium on idleness nor to discourage unemployed persons from making early and earnest attempts to reestablish themselves economically to avoid becoming or continuing to be charges on society. Gen.Laws 1937 and Supps.1939, 1941, Act 8780d.

5. Master and servant ⚿78

The word "service", within provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act defining employment, must be given its common meaning, and means the occupation, condition or status of a servant, the performance of labor for benefit of another or at another's command. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Service".

6. Master and servant ⚿78

Under provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act that an individual shall be deemed unemployed in any week during which he performs no "services" and with respect to which no wages are payable to him, the word "services" does not include activities of one who is self-employed. Gen. Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, § 9.2.

7. Master and servant ⚿84

An accused who on leaving regular employment opened clothing business which he supervised but which was financially unsuccessful from the beginning remained "unemployed" after opening the business within the Unemployment Insurance Act and could not be convicted of withholding "material facts" for purpose of obtaining benefits of the act, because of his failure to disclose his activities in connection with the business. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5; Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 9.2, 101(a).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Material Fact" and "Unemployed".

8. Master and servant ⚿84

Evidence was insufficient to establish falsity of statements contained in certificate executed by defendant when he received weekly unemployment insurance check, that he was able to work, available for work and had not refused offer for suitable work, and therefore was insufficient to sustain conviction for making false statement and knowingly failing to disclose material facts for purpose of obtaining benefits under the act. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, §§ 56(b), 57 (c), 101(a).

Appeal from Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles; James H. Pope, Judge.

George John Nest was convicted of making false statement and representation and knowingly failing to disclose material fact for purpose of obtaining and increasing benefit and payment to him under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and he appeals.

Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Adolph H. Levy, of Washington, D. C., and Maurice Levy, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., W. Jos. McFarland, Asst. City Atty., and John L. Bland, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen. (John J. Dailey, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Maurice P. McCaffrey, of Sacramento, Leonard M. Friedman, of Sacramento, of counsel), amici curiae.

VICKERS, Judge pro tem.

Defendant appeals from the judgment after conviction of violation of section 101 (a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act (Act 8780d, Deering's General Laws Supp. 1939). The complaint follows the language of the statute and charges in substance that defendant did wilfully and unlawfully make a false statement and representation, and knowingly fail to disclose a material fact for the purpose of obtaining and increasing a benefit and payment to him, under the Act in question, in that he certified that he was totally unemployed and partially unemployed and had reported any and all earnings to the Employment Commission for the week ending October 25, 1941.

There was little conflict in the evidence presented. It appears that the defendant left his regular employment in July of 1941, at which time he was receiving a salary of $6,000 per year. He thereafter made many attempts to secure new employment. On October 3, 1941, he opened a clothing business in Inglewood, with his wife and one employee doing the work. The defendant apparently supervised the business and spent from one to five hours each day and most of each evening at the store helping with the trade when necessary. Defendant intended to continue this business permanently but it was financially unsuccessful from the beginning and on December 31, 1941, he closed it, having lost about $1,200 in the venture. Defendant testified that during all of this time he continued his search for work elsewhere, that his presence at the store was not necessary for the running of the business, that he was physically able to work, that he did not refuse an offer of suitable work, and that he truthfully reported all wages that were payable to him for the weeks for which he filed for unemployment insurance benefits. Defendant's testimony was corroborated to a considerable extent and the People introduced no evidence in rebuttal thereof.

The People introduced in evidence an $18 check drawn on the Department of Employment in favor of the defendant, and cashed by him, and the certificate executed by him as a basis for such payment. This certificate in so far as it is of interest to us reads as follows: "I certify that during the week for which I am now filing a continued claim for unemployment insurance (week ending October 25, 1941) I was unemployed, able to work and available for work, and hereby register for work with the California Department of Employment; I did not refuse an offer of suitable work, and I have truthfully reported below all wages that were or are payable to me for the week I am now filing." The defendant reported no wages payable.

The defendant urges that there is no evidence to support any of the implied findings of the court, to wit: That he "wilfully" made a false statement or representation; that any "statement" or "representation" was false; that he failed to disclose a "material fact" for the purpose of obtaining any payment to him. If defendant is correct in such contention, the conviction must be reversed because all of the alleged unlawful acts charged will then be without evidentiary support. The false statements and representations, if any, are contained in the certificate executed by defendant, when he received his weekly check, wherein he declared that he was unemployed, able to work, available for work, had not refused an offer for suitable work and had truthfully reported all wages payable to him for the week in question (none). The implied finding that the defendant failed to disclose a "material fact" depends for support upon the defendant's part-time self-employment at a financial loss being such a "material fact" as would, if disclosed to the California Unemployment Commission, have justified that body in finding that he was not totally or partially unemployed during the period in question.

[1-3] The answers to the legal questions raised by this appeal are found in the interpretation of those sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act (Deering's General Laws 1937 and Supps.1939, 1941, Act 8780d) that apply thereto. In interpreting these sections we are guided by the rules laid down by our Supreme Court in the recent case of County of Los Angeles v. Frisbie, Feb. 1942, 19 Cal.2d 634, 122 P.2d 526. This was a case involving the interpretation of certain sections of the Welfare and Institutions Code and is somewhat comparable to our case since it likewise interpreted remedial statutes. The learned Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the court, said (page 641 of 19 Cal.2d, page 530 of 122 P.2d): "A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give force and effect to every expression used by the legislature. (Citing Brainard v. Brainard, 17 Cal.App.2d 520, 62 P.2d 403.) Excepting when clearly otherwise intended or indicated, words in a statute should be given their ordinary meaning and receive a sensible construction in accord with the commonly understood meaning thereof. (Citing Universal Pictures Corp. v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.App.2d 490, 50 P.2d 500.) Section 13 of the Civil Code provides: 'Words and phrases are construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language; * * *.'" Again, at page 639 of 19 Cal.2d, at page 529 of 122 P.2d, the Supreme Court said: "While the intention of the legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious design of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such language. (Citing In re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 612, 234 P. 883.) Hence, in construing a remedial statute, like a law concerning the rendition of charitable aid to indigents and recovery therefor, reason must have its just proportion, * * *."

[4] In applying the above rules to the sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act involved herein we are of the opinion that the while it was the intention of the legislature to protect the fund created under the act from chiselers, it was not its intention to put a premium on idleness, nor to discourage citizens out of employment from making early and earnest attempts to reestablish themselves economically to avoid becoming or continuing to be charges on society.

[5] The only sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act which have been referred to by counsel and whose interpretation we believe affects the questions raised by this appeal are sections 6.5, 9.2, 56(b) and 57(c). Section 6.5 reads: "'Employment,' subject to the other provisions of this act, means service * * * performed for wages or under any contract of hire * * *." The word "service", not being defined in the act, must be given its common meaning, unless the context requires otherwise, which it does not. Merriam-Webster's New International Dictionary defines "service" as, "The occupation, condition, or status of a servant.—Performance of labor for the benefit of another, or at another's command;—hired helper;—duty done or required." Certainly these definitions do not embrace the activities of the defendant in assisting part time in the running of his own clothing establishment. In addition, the defendant's services were not performed for "wages" nor did he receive any compensation therefor. Likewise he was not under "any contract of hire," express or implied.

[6] Section 9.2 of the Act reads as follows: "An individual shall be deemed 'unemployed' in any week during which he performs no services and with respect to which no wages are payable to him, or in any week of less than full-time work if the wages payable to him with respect to such week are less than his weekly benefit amount." This section does not aid the prosecution because in our opinion the word "services" is used in the same sense as in section 6.5 and does not include defendant's activities as so self-employed. Further, the evidence discloses that no "wages" or compensation were "payable to him."

[7] We are therefore of the opinion that during the period in question the defendant was in a class "deemed unemployed" by the Unemployment Insurance Act, and that his self-employment activities did not remove him from such class. Therefore such activities did not constitute a "material fact" the nondisclosure of which constituted a violation of section 101 (a) of the Act, under which the defendant was convicted.

The false statements and representations, other than "unemployment", relied on by the respondent are, as stated above, refusal to accept an offer of suitable work, being able to work and being available for work. The necessity for these statements and representations being truthfully made are set out in sections 56(b) and 57(c) of the Act.

[8] Section 56(b) of the Act reads: "An individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment, and no such benefit shall be payable to him under any of the following conditions: * * *

"(b) If without good cause he has refused to accept suitable employment when offered to him, or failed to apply for suitable employment when notified by the district public employment office." The People made no effort to prove such "refusal" or "failure" and the defendant's testimony was to the contrary.

Section 57(c) reads: "An unemployed individual shall be eligible to receive benefits with respect to any week only if the commission finds that: * * *

"(c) He is able to work and available for work."

Again the People made no effort to prove that defendant was not "able to work" (or that the Commission so found), and the defendant's testimony was to the contrary. However, the Attorney General as amicus curiae strongly urges that the evidence establishes that defendant was not "available for work." With this we cannot agree. The only evidence in the record on the subject other than the defendant's part-time activities was his own testimony, which was somewhat corroborated, to the effect that during all that time (while self-employed) he continued his search for work elsewhere, that his presence at the store was not necessary, that he was physically able to work, that he registered for work with the California Department of Employment, and that he did not refuse an offer of suitable work. In the face of such testimony we find there was no substantial evidence to support the trial court's implied finding that the defendant was not "available for work" during the period in question.

It thus appears that there was no evidential or legal support for any of the implied findings of the court. The judgment is therefore unsupported by any findings and must be and is hereby reversed. The cause is remanded to the Municipal Court for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. VANDERPOOL et al.

Cr. 4376.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 21, 1942.

1. Conspiracy ⚷51

The first penal paragraph of conspiracy section of Penal Code providing for punishment of conspiracy "to commit any felony or to commit any act injurious to public health or public morals, etc., * * * to the same extent as in this code provided for the punishment of the said felony or act, respectively", by virtue of inclusion of the phrase "in this code", is referable only to conspiracies to commit felonies and acts, punishment for the commission of which is prescribed by some provision of the Penal Code. Pen.Code, § 182, subds. 1, 5.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "In This Code".

2. Criminal law ⚷93

Superior court is without jurisdiction over the subject matter of an indictment charging a conspiracy to commit an offense injurious to public morals punishable under the Penal Code, since such conspiracy is a misdemeanor subject to provisions of first penal paragraph of conspiracy statute. Pen. Code, § 182, subds. 1, 5.

3. Criminal law ⚷93

A conspiracy to commit an offense which is not a crime against public morals or, if it is such, is not made punishable under some provision of the Penal Code, is punishable under the second penal paragraph of section of Penal Code relating to conspiracy, and hence is either a felony or a misdemeanor within the jurisdiction of the superior court. Pen.Code, § 182, subds. 1, 5.

4. Pawnbrokers and money lenders ⚷1

The purpose of legislation regulating the operations of persons procuring or making small loans is to protect the public from lenders who would otherwise take advantage of the needy. Gen.Laws 1939 Supp., Act 7700.

5. Criminal law ⚷1208(1)

Penal Code provision for the punishment of misdemeanors generally, except in cases where a different "punishment" is prescribed, uses the quoted word as meaning punishment, such as a fine or imprisonment imposed upon the offender by the state, and does not include a civil penalty redounding to the benefit of an individual, such as a forfeiture of interest. Pen.Code, § 19.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Punishment".

6. Criminal law ⚷93

A conspiracy to violate the Small Loan Act prohibiting the lending of money at excessive rates of interest or conducting a loan business without a license was a conspiracy to commit "acts injurious to public morals", the punishment for which is prescribed by the Penal Code within the meaning of the first penal paragraph of the conspiracy statute, and hence superior court had no jurisdiction of prosecution for such conspiracy. Penal Code, § 19; § 182, subds. 1, 5; Gen.Laws 1939 Supp., Act 7700, § 20.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Acts Injurious to Public Morals".

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge Assigned.

H. F. Vanderpool and others were convicted of a conspiracy to violate provisions of California Small Loan Act, Gen. Laws 1939 Supp., Act 7700, and, from judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial, they appeal.

Judgment reversed with direction.

For prior opinion, see 114 P.2d 608.

John B. Ehlen, of San Francisco, and Melvin V. Wood, of Oakland, for appellants.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The appellants, who were convicted of a conspiracy to violate the provisions of the Small Loan Act, Stats.1939, ch. 1045, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1939 Supp., Act 7700, attack the judgment upon the principal ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction to try them for that offense. They also urge that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. Their appeal is taken from an order denying them a new trial as well as from the judgment.

In the first count of the indictment returned by the Grand Jury, it was alleged that they conspired to charge a greater rate of interest than the Small Loan Act, supra, allows, and to require borrowers to purchase merchandise in connection with loans made to them. Eleven overt acts were specified in this count. By the second count, the indictment asserted that they had engaged in the business of making loans in an amount less than $300 without obtaining a permit from the Commissioner of Corporations so to do.

A demurrer to each count of the indictment upon the ground, among others, that it charged them with misdemeanors over which the superior court had no jurisdiction was overruled. After a trial, each of the appellants was found guilty and a motion for a new trial was denied. The appellant Vanderpool was thereupon sentenced to serve one year in the county jail upon each of the counts, the sentences to run concurrently; the appellants Clancy and Allen were each fined $500 upon each count of the indictment and, in default of payment, were ordered to be confined in the county jail at the rate of one day for each $10 of the fine.

Section 182 of the Penal Code provides in part as follows: "If two or more persons conspire: 1. To commit any crime; * * * 5. To commit any act injurious to the public health, to public morals, or to pervert or obstruct justice, or the due administration of the laws. They are punishable as follows: When they conspire to commit any felony, or to commit any act injurious to the public health, or to public morals, or tending to pervert or obstruct justice, or the due administration of the laws, they shall be punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as in this code provided for the punishment of the commission of the said felony or act, respectively.

"When they conspire to do any of the other acts described in this section they shall be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, and cases of such conspiracy may be prosecuted and tried in the superior court of any county in which any overt act tending to effect such conspiracy shall be done." The superior court held that the acts alleged in each count of the indictment constitute a conspiracy defined by subdivision one and punishable under the second penal paragraph of this section.

The appellants argue that the conspiracy charged against them is one defined by subdivision five of the statute, and that as the Small Loan Act, supra, makes a violation of its provisions a misdemeanor, the superior court had no jurisdiction to render judgment against them. They also assert that the offenses for which they were indicted are acts injurious to public morals; that they tend to pervert or obstruct justice and the administration of the laws, and therefore they are punishable only as misdemeanors in accordance with the first penal paragraph of section 182. The attorney general takes the position that violations of the Small Loan Act, supra, are neither offenses against public morals nor acts tending to obstruct justice and the due administration of the laws within the meaning of subdivision five. But assuming that they are such offenses, he says, the first penal paragraph of section 182 applies only to an act made punishable by some provision of the Penal Code. The offenses of which the appellants were convicted, according to the attorney general, are made crimes, not by any provision of the Penal Code, but by the Small Loan Act, supra, a general statute. Under this reasoning, a conspiracy to violate the Small Loan Act, supra, falls within subdivision one of section 182 of the Penal Code and is punishable under the second penal paragraph, which confers upon the superior court jurisdiction to try the offense.

[1-3] The various provisions of the conspiracy statute were considered in Doble v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 556, 241 P. 852, and this court held that, by virtue of the designation and inclusion of the phrase "in this code," the first penal paragraph is referable to conspiracies to commit felonies and acts injurious to public morals only when the punishment for the commission of such felonies or acts is prescribed by some provision of the Penal Code. Under all other circumstances, said the court, the second penal paragraph controls. The question, then, is whether either the act of loaning money at excessive rates of interest or conducting a loan business without a license, each of which is made a misdemeanor by the Small Loan Act, supra, is an offense injurious to public morals punishable under the Penal Code. If it is such an offense, a conspiracy to commit it is a misdemeanor under the first penal paragraph of section 182, and the superior court was without jurisdiction over the subject matter of the indictment returned against the appellants. On the other hand, if the offense is not a crime against public morals, or being such, if it is not made punishable under some provision of the Penal Code, then a conspiracy to commit it is punishable under the second penal paragraph of section 182 as either a felony or a misdemeanor and is one within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

[4] The purpose of legislation regulating the operations of persons procuring or making small loans is to protect the public from lenders who would otherwise take advantage of the needy. It is a matter of public knowledge that the activities of unconscionable lenders operating in this field have created a social problem with serious consequences. See In re Fuller, 15 Cal.2d 425, 102 P.2d 321. The Small Loan Act, supra, of California is substantially the same as legislation which has been enacted in more than thirty states. It denounces, as criminal, the act of lending money at more than a prescribed rate of interest, and also, of conducting the business of making small loans without a license so to do. Considering the field of such legislation and the evils against which it is aimed, the offenses defined by it as misdemeanors may properly be said to be injurious to public morals.

Similar crimes have been so defined and classified by the Legislature of this state. The Penal Code specifies a number of offenses which are classified under Title IX of Part I, as: "Crimes Against the Person and Against Public Decency and Good Morals." Included within that title is section 338, which provides that: "Every person who carries on the business of a pawnbroker, by receiving goods in pledge for loans at any rate of interest above the rate of ten per cent per annum, except by authority of a license, is guilty of a misdemeanor." In People v. Van, 30 Cal.App.2d 663, 87 P.2d 57, it was held that a conspiracy to operate a lottery constituted a misdemeanor punishable under the first penal paragraph of section 182 of the Penal Code. The court reasoned that the substantive offense of conducting a lottery is made a misdemeanor by section 320 of the Penal Code, which the Legislature classified as one of the "Crimes Against the Person and Against Public Decency and Good Morals." There can be no doubt that, under the doctrine of the Van case, a conspiracy to violate section 338 of the Penal Code is a misdemeanor punishable under the first penal paragraph of section 182. A conspiracy to violate the Small Loan Act, supra, should be similarly classified insofar as its punishment is concerned.

But to sustain the contention of the appellants, the court must hold not only that the offenses with which they are charged are acts injurious to public morals, but also that the punishment for them is prescribed by the Penal Code.

Section 20 of the Small Loan Act, supra, reads: "Any person * * * who shall violate or participate in the violation of any of the provisions of this act, or any of the rules, orders and regulations of the commissioner, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Any contract of loan in the making or collection of which any violation of this act shall have been committed, shall be void as to interest and charges, and neither the lender nor the broker shall have any right to collect or receive any interest or charges whatsoever." The statute does not specify the punishment to be imposed upon one who has been convicted of a misdemeanor because of the violation of its requirements. However, section 19 of the Penal Code provides: "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by any law of this state, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both."

[5, 6] The attorney general contends that the latter section has no application because section 20 of the Small Loan Act, supra, fixes a "different punishment" for its violation by prescribing a forfeiture of the right of a lender to any interest or charges payable in connection with the prohibited transaction. But if section 19 of the Penal Code is not applicable, the Small Loan Act, supra, has created a crime which is defined as a misdemeanor but with no penalty for its commission. Such a result is contrary to the fundamental rules of statutory construction. Furthermore, the term "different punishment," as used in the Penal Code section, was clearly intended to mean punishment, such as a fine or imprisonment, imposed upon the offender by the state. A forfeiture of interest is a civil penalty redounding to the benefit of the borrower and not to the state. For these reasons, any act defined as a misdemeanor by the Small Loan Act, supra, is punishable by the Penal Code within the meaning of the first penal paragraph of the conspiracy statute.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the superior court to dismiss the indictment.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1942.

1. Attorney and client 🔑52

In disbarment proceeding, amendment of order to show cause to conform to proof was proper.

2. Attorney and client 🔑53(2)

Evidence sustained findings that attorney, who allegedly converted client's money and failed to prosecute an action instituted for client, was guilty of acts involving moral turpitude and dishonesty within meaning of the State Bar Act and the commission of a misdemeanor within meaning of the State Bar Act, warranting disbarment. St.1939, pp. 357, 359, §§ 6106, 6128(b).

Proceeding by James F. Gaffney, petitioner, against the State Bar of California, respondent, to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California that the petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law.

Petitioner disbarred.

Archibald M. Mull, Jr., Peter Mannino, Johnson & Curtright, P. H. Johnson, and C. K. Curtright, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

W. Eugene Craven, of Merced, and William A. Sitton, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar that petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law.

By a notice to show cause issued in June, 1940, and later amended to conform to proof, petitioner was charged with the commission of acts involving moral turpitude and with the violation of his oath and duty as an attorney. Hearings were had before a local administrative committee of the State Bar at which the complaining client, his wife and others testified. Petitioner, who was represented by counsel, testified in his defense and called several character witnesses, all of whom testified to his prior good reputation for truth, honesty and integrity. The committee found that the petitioner had made false and fraudulent representations for the purpose of deceiving J. I. Lowthian, his client; that by reason of such false representations he had received and improperly converted to his own use $1,050 of the client's money; and that for the purpose of concealing his misconduct he had failed to prosecute an action instituted on behalf of Lowthian. The committee concluded therefrom that petitioner was guilty of acts involving moral turpitude and dishonesty within the meaning of section 6106, State Bar Act, St.1939, p. 357, and of the commission of a misdemeanor within the meaning of section 6128, subdivision b, of said act. Two members of the committee recommended that petitioner be disbarred while the third member recommended suspension for three years. The Board of Governors adopted the committee's findings and has recommended that petitioner be disbarred, two members dissenting.

Lowthian, as the complaining witness, testified that on May 2, 1935, he called at petitioner's office to ascertain whether he had a cause of action for slander based on certain statements made to and about him by a Mrs. Williams, proprietress of a hospital where his stepdaughter was confined as a maternity case. Petitioner, after hearing the circumstances, informed Lowthian that he had a good case and agreed to take it on a 40 per cent contingent fee basis, nothing being said about costs. On the following day petitioner suggested that a detective be employed at $50 a day for the purpose of obtaining additional evidence. A check for $50, covering one day's detective work, was given to petitioner. On May 6, 1935, Lowthian called at petitioner's office to get a progress report and was told by petitioner that it would be well to hire the detective for a few additional days, whereupon petitioner was given a check for $100 to cover additional detective service. Approximately two weeks later, petitioner came to Lowthian's home and stated that the first check was a little blurred and that in attempting to "make it better" he had "made it worse" and had therefore brought it back for Lowthian to make out another. Petitioner then stated that it would be necessary to put up a $500 bond and that a cash bond would result in quicker action. Lowthian accordingly gave petitioner a check for $550—$500 to be used as a cash bond and $50 to replace the first "blurred" check for the detective's service. A few days later, petitioner represented to Lowthian that the woman detective he had hired was working on the case. Early in June, 1935, petitioner represented that a few additional days of detective work were essential, whereupon Lowthian gave him a check for $150 to cover the same. Two days later, a similar representation and request by petitioner brought forth another check for $150 from Lowthian. Thus, between May 3 and June 7, 1935, petitioner, according to Lowthian's testimony, had collected from him $450 for detective services and $500 for a cash bond.

During the last six months of the year 1935, Lowthian called at petitioner's office every few days to express his anxiety for a court hearing of his case. Some time in September petitioner told Lowthian that the judge was on vacation and that he did not want the case to come up until that particular judge returned. Later in the same month, petitioner, in response to Lowthian's inquiry, represented that it was difficult to get the case on the calendar and that it would not be heard until the end of October.

Early in December, 1935, petitioner advised Lowthian that it also would be well to sue the hospital and that a bond of $150 was essential. Upon Lowthian's reply that he was short of money, petitioner offered to advance $50 thereof, whereupon Lowthian gave him a check for $100 to be used as a cash bond in the proposed hospital case. Thereafter many conversations were had between attorney and client as to the condition of the case, petitioner repeatedly advancing varying excuses for delaying the action.

When Lowthian first employed petitioner early in May, 1935, the slander action was to be based on a statement made by Mrs. Williams to Lowthian, within the hearing of others, in which she called him a "scoundrel" who had never paid his bills. Petitioner prepared a complaint based thereon, but in June, before it was filed and after petitioner already had received $950 from Lowthian for the purposes above mentioned, petitioner was informed that a second statement had been made by Mrs. Williams of and concerning Lowthian in which she had indicated that he was the father of his stepdaughter's child. Petitioner testified that he then believed that the relationship was that of father and daughter rather than stepfather and stepdaughter. Upon learning of the second statement by Mrs. Williams, petitioner destroyed the complaint originally drafted and prepared a second one, in two counts, based upon the two statements. The complaint so prepared by petitioner in June, 1935, was not filed by him, however, until April 30, 1936, just prior to the running of the statute of limitations. The summons was not served until August 18, 1938, and then only after Lowthian had called upon the district attorney and the latter had telephoned to petitioner and informed him of such fact. Lowthian went from the district attorney's office to petitioner's office and stated that he desired to talk with the woman detective. Petitioner then referred to the detective as a man, and said that he had died.

A demurrer to the slander complaint was filed in August, 1938. No hearing was had thereon, petitioner conceding a weakness in the complaint and agreeing to prepare an amended complaint. Petitioner prepared such amended complaint, but it was never signed, served or filed, and the action is still pending.

The foregoing narrative is taken principally from the testimony of Lowthian, the client. He was corroborated in all essential particulars by the testimony of his wife who was present at several of the meetings with petitioner. In opposition to their showing, petitioner testified that the $500 delivered to him on May 20, 1935, was not to be deposited as a cash bond but was to be held by him as security for the bond required to be filed in the action, and that all other moneys ($550) delivered to him were in payment of fees and costs. He stated that he had taken the case on a 40 per cent contingent fee contract but was to receive $500 as a "retainer," which sum was to be later deducted from his percentage in the event his share upon recovery exceeded that amount. Lowthian, he stated, also was to advance all costs. It would appear unusual that the terms of such a contract were not reduced to writing. Petitioner denied that he had discussed with Lowthian the hiring of a detective, and admitted that none was ever employed. He further denied suggesting the filing of an action against the hospital. In an effort to explain his delay in filing the complaint for a period of approximately ten months, petitioner testified that his client entertained some doubt as to the defendant's financial condition and her ability to respond in damages. Such explanation hardly comports with the admitted money advancement made by Lowthian prior to filing of the complaint. A litigant in the financial position of Lowthian and entertaining serious doubt as to his adversary's financial status would hardly be inclined to make a preliminary advancement or expenditure of $1,050, as was here done, and then request delaying prosecution. Also without compelling force is petitioner's explanation that he withheld service of summons in the slander action until August, 1938, more than two years after filing of the complaint, because he believed from Lowthian's conduct that the latter did not desire to have the action prosecuted until the statute of limitations had run against any criminal charge that possibly might be filed against him (Lowthian) growing out of his stepdaughter's condition. It is difficult to believe that service of summons was delayed for approximately two years in order to prevent any criminal charge being filed against Lowthian when the matter which underlay the slander suit, and which would have constituted the basis for any such criminal charge, had been fully publicized in the newspapers upon the filing of the complaint for slander more than two years earlier. It is questionable, too, that Lowthian fearing a criminal prosecution, as stated by petitioner, would have invited the same by filing a civil complaint which might have had the effect of exposing any criminal responsibility on his part. Moreover, accepting petitioner's explanation, it is difficult to justify his conduct in preparing and filing a slander complaint on behalf of Lowthian based on statements which, if true, as petitioner now indicates he suspected might have been so, would constitute a complete defense to such slander action. Petitioner admits that at no time did he discuss with his client that he entertained a suspicion of the client's criminal responsibility.

As to the $500 delivered to him for the bond in the latter part of May, 1935, petitioner testified that he placed the money, as security for such bond, in an envelope which he kept in his safe from May, 1935, until a few days after March 27, 1940, the date of the preliminary hearing in this disciplinary proceeding, at which time, he stated, he deposited it in a trust account with a bank in order to be in a position to draw a check thereon if required. In rebuttal, it was shown by the bank records that a deposit was made by petitioner on May 31, 1940, of $518, made up of $20 in cash and a check drawn on another bank in the sum of $498.

[1-3] Other discrepancies and weaknesses appear throughout petitioner's testimony. His excuses and explanations for his misconduct are not convincing. Contrary to his contention, petitioner was not deprived of any right in making his defense. Every opportunity was extended to him to present any defense he might have to the charges. He was present in person and was represented by counsel. The amendment of the order to show cause to conform to proof was proper. Woodard v. State Bar, 16 Cal.2d 755, 757, 108 P.2d 407. Examination of the record satisfies us that the preponderance of substantial evidence supports the findings as made by the local committee and adopted by the Board of Governors. Petitioner has not met the burden of showing that the findings and the conclusions based thereon are erroneous or unlawful. Ring v. State Bar, 218 Cal. 747, 751, 24 P.2d 821; Aydelotte v. State Bar, 209 Cal. 737, 740, 290 P. 41; Propp v. State Bar, 20 Cal.2d 387, 125 P.2d 825.

It is ordered that petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law, effective thirty days after the filing of this order.

COBER et al. v. CONNOLLY et al.

Sac. 5415.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 21, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1942.

1. Bills and notes 🔑120

Where note secured by trust deed contained only the unqualified general promise of makers to pay, to three designated payees or orders, a stated amount, the note created a joint right in favor of the three payees. Civ.Code, § 1431.

2. Payment 🔑8(1)

The statute providing for extinguishment of an obligation by performance in a particular manner directed by a creditor or any one of two or more joint creditors, even though benefit of such performance is not received by creditor, is directed to the manner of transmission and not to payment of something other than originally bargained for by the parties to the agreement. Civ. Code § 1476.

3. Payment 🔑5
Trusts 🔑33

If one of two or more joint creditors accepts payment of the obligation, he holds the proceeds as a "trustee" or "agent" for them and is directly accountable to them as such; but, so far as the debtor is concerned, the co-obligee is more than an agent and is the owner of the obligation.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent" and "Trustee".

4. Accord and satisfaction 🔑3(3)
Payment 🔑5
Release 🔑4

Since each of several joint obligees is interested in the entire claim, he has the power to discharge the entire claim, either by release or by accord and satisfaction, and so payment or other performance of the whole obligation to one obligee discharges it.

5. Release 🔑4

A discharge of the promisor by an obligee in fraud of a co-obligee is inoperative to discharge the promisor's duty to the extent of the co-obligee's interest in the performance, if the promisor gives no value, or knows, or has reason to know, of the fraud.

6. Mortgages 🔑298(2)

Under statute providing that an obligation in favor of several persons is extinguished by performance rendered to any of them, where co-payee of note secured by trust deed ordered supplies and services from a maker with understanding that they should be credited on note, maker's performance discharged co-payee's individual right against maker, and where other co-payees did not claim that maker had not given value, or that maker had had knowledge of their co-payee's failure to account, such performance discharged debt as to all obligees, it being immaterial that much of the supplies went to others than co-payee, that co-payee made gifts thereof, or that note had not been surrendered. Civ.Code, § 1475.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; Donald Geary, Judge Assigned.

Action by Benjamin A. Cober and others against P. Connolly and others to quiet title to realty which has been conveyed in trust by plaintiff as security for a promissory note, and to compel a reconveyance thereof by the trustee. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 121 P.2d 55.

Preston & Gibson, of Ukiah, for appellants.

Hale McCowen, of Ukiah, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

In an action to quiet title and to require a reconveyance of real property, judgment was rendered for the respondents when they proved that they had rendered services and delivered merchandise to one of the payees of a promissory note under an agreement that the value of the services and merchandise should be credited upon the note. The appellants, one of whom is also a payee of the note and the other the trustee named in the deed of trust securing it, contend that the makers of a promissory note providing for payment in cash may not extinguish the obligation by the performance of such an agreement with one of several joint payees.

The respondents Cober, husband and wife, executed their promissory note in the sum of $850, in favor of Keith C. Eversole, W. D. L. Held, and the appellant Connolly. As security for its payment, they conveyed certain real property to the appellant Mendocino County Title Company, as trustee. The payees of the note were named as the beneficiaries of the deed of trust. Later, Eversole agreed to accept from the respondents job printing, the publication of legal notices, hotel cards, and newspaper subscriptions, as ordered by him, in payment of the obligation.

During the next five years Cober furnished to Eversole, upon his order, printing and advertising to the value of $1,255. About $290 of that amount represented goods delivered to Eversole; the remainder of the charges was for printing delivered to other persons. Cober also paid $25 or $30 in cash. The respondents did not tell Connolly of this arrangement and he had no notice of it. Eversole did not account to Connolly and is now insolvent.

The respondents subsequently demanded a reconveyance of the property from the appellant corporation. Upon the latter's refusal to comply with their demand, they commenced the present action, alleging that the promissory note had been paid in full. By their answer, the appellants denied payment of the note by the respondents and prayed for judgment against the Cobers for the full amount of the principal sum with accrued interest. The trial court found that the respondents had paid the note in full, and gave judgment as demanded by them.

According to the appellants, although section 1475 of the Civil Code provides that payment to one of two or more payees extinguishes the obligation, the basis for the statutory rule is founded upon principles of agency. Since one co-payee acts as an agent for the other payees, payment to him is payment to all. But, argue the appellants, where the obligation calls for payment in cash, an agent may not accept payment in goods or services without the consent of his principal. Similarly, they assert, one co-payee may not extinguish an obligation as to his co-payees by accepting, without their consent, a performance in a manner not bargained for by them. The appellants further contend that even if performance can be made by delivering goods and furnishing services to one of the co-payees, the respondents should not be credited with merchandise supplied to one not a party to the note. They also rely upon the rule that where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third person, which caused a loss, the one who enabled the latter to perform that act must bear the loss.

In reply, the respondents assert that the question presented by the appeal does not depend upon section 1475 of the Civil Code, but rather upon section 1476 of that code, which provides: "If a creditor, or any one of two or more joint creditors, at any time directs the debtor to perform his obligation in a particular manner, the obligation is extinguished by performance in that manner, even though the creditor does not receive the benefit of such performance." Measuring the judgment by the standards found in that section, they say, Eversole, one of three joint creditors, directed Cober to perform in a particular way and Cober did so. And even though Eversole did not directly receive all of such performance, under the terms of the section, the obligation is extinguished. The respondents agree that a joint creditor in accepting performance is acting in the capacity of an agent, but they contend that since the other joint creditors selected Eversole as a business associate and invested him with the authority of an agent, thereby enabling him to act in a manner which has resulted in a loss, the appellants cannot recover from them.

Objecting to the respondents' construction of section 1476, the appellants maintain that this section does not permit a debtor to pay something other than the exact consideration called for in the obligation, but allows the obligation to be extinguished only after the debtor has followed the directions of the creditor as to how the consideration called for in the obligation shall be transmitted to the creditor. Section 1476, they say, codifies the common law rule that the risk of employing a manner of transmitting payment is on the debtor, unless one of the creditors directs a particular method to be used, in which case the risk of transmission shifts to the creditor. Thus, if a creditor directs the money to be sent in the ordinary course of the mail, and the debtor mails the money but the payment is lost in transit, the obligation is satisfied "even though the creditor does not receive the benefit of such performance."

[1] A right created in favor of several persons is presumed to be joint, and not several, and this presumption can be overcome only by express words to the contrary. Civ.Code, § 1431; Brady v. Reynolds, 13 Cal. 31. The note in the present action contains only the unqualified general promise of the respondents "to pay to Keith C. Eversole, W. D. L. Held and P. Connolly, or order" a stated amount. A note in this form creates a joint right in favor of the three payees. Lasky v. Lissik, 140 Misc. 826, 251 N.Y.S. 753.

[2] Section 1476 was enacted in 1872, but has never been construed by an appellate court of this state. The wording of the section is identical with that of section 702 of the Field Draft of the Civil Code of New York enacted in 1865. The Code Commissioners of New York, in their ninth and final report, said of the provision: "Thus, if the creditor directs money to be sent to him by mail, it is at his risk Graves v. American Exch. Bank, 17 N.Y. [205] 207; Eyles v. Ellis, 4 Bing. 112." In a preliminary draft of the same code prepared by the code commissioners in 1862 and submitted for examination prior to revision, the section read: "Payment is complete, and the debt extinguished, upon the debtor's making payment in the manner directed by the creditor, even though the thing paid should never reach the creditor." The code commissioners based the wording of this section on the two cases cited in the annotation to the final draft of 1865. From this legislative history, it is apparent that the statute was directed to the manner of transmission and not to the payment of something other than originally bargained for by the parties to the agreement.

[3-5] Section 1475 is, however, determinative of this appeal. "An obligation in favor of several persons is extinguished by performance rendered to any of them * * *." Applied in Bailes v. Keck, 200 Cal. 697, 254 P. 573, 51 A.L.R. 930; Hoover v. Wolfe, 167 Cal. 337, 139 P. 794; Delano v. Jacoby, 96 Cal. 275, 31 P. 290, 31 Am. St.Rep. 201; Wright v. Mix, 76 Cal. 465, 18 P. 645; Barnes v. Osgood, 103 Cal.App. 730, 284 P. 975. None of the California cases construing this section was decided upon facts such as those before the court in the present action, and it is true, as contended by the appellants, that when one of two or more joint creditors accepts payment of the obligation, he holds the proceeds as a trustee or agent for them and is directly accountable to them as such. But so far as the debtor is concerned, the co-obligee is more than a mere agent; he is the owner of the obligation. "Since each of several joint obligees is interested in the entire claim, he has the power to discharge the entire claim either by release or by accord and satisfaction, and so a payment or other performance of the whole obligation to one obligee discharges it; and a tender to one is legally a tender to all." 2 Williston on Contracts, Rev. Ed. 1938, § 343, p. 1014 (and see cases there cited in footnotes 2, 3 and 4). Section 130 of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts provides: "Except as the rules of this Section are qualified by section 131 * * * a discharge by a joint obligee of his individual right operates as a discharge of the joint right of all." Section 131 reads: "* * * A discharge of the promisor by an obligee in fraud of a co-obligee is inoperative to discharge the promisor's duty to the extent of the co-obligee's interest in the performance, if the promisor gives no value or knows, or has reason to know of the fraud."

[6] The appellants do not claim that the Cobers did not give value, or that they had any knowledge concerning Eversole's failure to account to the other payees of the note. The fact that much of the printed matter went to others than Eversole, or that Eversole made gifts of many subscriptions of Cober's newspaper, is immaterial, as all such services and supplies were ordered by Eversole with the understanding that they should be credited by him on the note. The performance of the services and the furnishing of the supplies effectually discharged Eversole's individual right against the respondents, and, under the general rule, also discharged the debt as to all of the obligees. The fact that the note was not surrendered to the maker is immaterial. Wheeler v. Bull, 131 Cal. 421, 425, 63 P. 732.

The judgment is affirmed.

WENNERHOLM et al. v. STANFORD UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MEDICINE et al.

S. F. 16648.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 19, 1942.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1942.

1. Druggists 🔑10

Complaint, alleging blindness induced by taking of the drug dinitrophenol in reliance on published representations which defendants, engaged in the manufacture, distribution, and sale of the drug, knew or should have known were false, stated a cause of action for "fraud".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fraud".

2. Druggists 🔑10

A complaint, seeking recovery for blindness induced by taking of the drug dinitrophenol in reliance on defendants' false representations, was not inadequate to state a cause of action for fraud because of failure specifically to allege that representations were made with intent to deceive plaintiff, where it could be inferred from the facts alleged that such representations were made with the intent to induce the public to purchase the drug.

3. Fraud 🔑50

One who intends to defraud the public or a particular class of persons is deemed to have intended to defraud every individual in the class who is actually misled.

4. Pleading 🔑252(1)

If any verified pleading contains an allegation that renders a complaint vulnerable, the defect cannot be cured simply by omitting such allegation, without any explanation, in a later pleading.

5. Druggists 🔑10

In actions for blindness induced by taking of the drug dinitrophenol, allegation in fifth amended complaint that drug was taken in reliance on false representations of defendants engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of the drug, was a sufficient showing of "reliance" on defendants' allegedly false representations, notwithstanding allegation in prior pleading that the drug was prescribed by plaintiff's physician.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Reliance".

6. Fraud 🔑20

In actions for fraud, where a defendant's representations were a substantial factor inducing plaintiff to act, even though he also relied in part on the advice of others, "reliance" is sufficiently shown, since it is not required that the defendant's representations be the sole cause of the damage.

7. Druggists 🔑10

One who manufactures and sells a drug dangerous to health, knowing it to be dangerous, should be held liable for damage resulting from the taking thereof where both physician prescribing such drug and patient relied upon the representations made concerning the drug.

8. Limitation of actions 🔑127(2)

Unless amended complaint sets forth an entirely different cause of action from the original complaint, the amended complaint for the purposes of the statute of limitations must be deemed filed as of the date of the original complaint.

9. Limitation of actions 🔑127(2)

Where it is sought to amend complaint after the statute of limitations has run, amended complaint will be deemed filed as of the date of original complaint so long as recovery is sought in each complaint upon same general set of facts, and a mere change in legal theory will not subject amended complaint to bar of statute of limitations.

10. Limitation of actions 🔑127(14)

Where the only substantial difference between factual situations stated in original complaint seeking recovery for blindness induced by taking of drug dinitrophenol, and that stated in fifth amended complaint filed after the statute of limitations had run, was that the former charged that representations relied on were negligently made, while latter charged that representations were made with knowledge of their falsity, amended complaint seeking recovery on the theory of fraud did not state an entirely "different cause of action" so as to render it barred by limitations.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Different Cause of Action".

11. Constitutional law ⚷111

Whether appellate court could consider question of whether denial of leave to amend constituted an abuse of discretion in the absence of a special request by plaintiff for leave to amend was a question of "procedure", and hence there were no "vested rights" which would be impaired by a change in the applicable rule of law with respect thereto.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Procedure" and "Vested Right".

Pleading ⚷225(2)

Where complaint was sufficient as against general demurrer, trial court abused its discretion in sustaining demurrer without leave to amend, even though there was no request for leave, and even though complaint may have been subject to special demurrer because of ambiguities therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Sylvain J. Lazarus, Judge.

Action by Cecilia Wennerholm and another, husband and wife, against Stanford University School of Medicine, a corporation, and others, for loss of eyesight of named plaintiff as the result of taking a drug falsely represented by defendants to be harmless, and for consequential damages to the husband. From judgment for defendants, entered following the sustaining of demurrers to plaintiffs' fifth amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment reversed.

For prior opinion, see 113 P.2d 736.

Vincent W. Hallinan, Emmett R. Burns, and Carey Van Fleet, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Hester W. Webb, James D. Adams, John J. Healy, Jr., Cooley, Crowley & Supple, Charles V. Barfield, Hadsell, Sweet, Ingalls & Lamb, and McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment entered in favor of defendants after an order sustaining defendants' demurrers to the fifth amended complaint without leave to amend. Plaintiffs' original and first four amended complaints charged the defendants with negligence. In these complaints it was alleged that the plaintiff, Cecilia Wennerholm, consulted her family physician in regard to her obesity and that he prescribed dinitrophenol for her on a written prescription which was filled by a pharmacy. While under the care of her physician, plaintiff took the drug, which was manufactured by one of the defendants. As a result thereof, it was alleged, she lost her sight. Plaintiffs charged that the defendants published statements in medical journals and elsewhere that dinitrophenol was harmless; that these statements were read and relied upon by plaintiff and her physician; that defendants knew or should have known of the dangerous character of the drug but negligently failed to disclose that fact; and that, by reason of the negligence, fault and want of care of defendants, plaintiff suffered the loss of sight of both her eyes.

The fifth amended complaint charges the defendants with fraud. It is alleged, in substance, that the defendants are in the business of manufacturing, distributing, selling and dispensing drugs and medicines for human use; that by means of articles in newspapers, medical journals, pamphlets and circulars disseminated to the public, these defendants falsely represented that the drug would relieve obesity, was harmless and could be taken internally by human beings, and that defendants knew that the drug was inherently dangerous to human life and liable to cause blindness. It is further alleged that defendants manufactured, sold and dispensed the drug throughout the state; that the plaintiff Cecilia Wennerholm read, believed and relied on the false representations; and that, in reliance thereon, she purchased and took the drug internally. The plaintiff husband, J. V. Wennerholm, also seeks recovery for moneys expended and indebtedness incurred by reason of his wife's injuries. General and special demurrers to the fifth amended complaint were sustained without leave to amend. No request was made for leave to amend and judgment was entered for defendants.

[1-3] Although somewhat inartistically framed, the fifth amended complaint states a cause of action for fraud. Defendants contend it lacks an essential element of a cause of action because it does not specifically allege that the false representations were made with an intent to deceive plaintiff, citing Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 166 P. 808; Vandervort v. Farmers, etc., Nat. Bank, 7 Cal.2d 28, 59 P.2d 1028. The intent to deceive sufficiently appears, however, by the facts alleged, from which it may be inferred that the alleged false statements were made with the intention of inducing the public to purchase the drug. One who intends to defraud the public, or a particular class of persons, is deemed to have intended to defraud every individual in the class who is actually misled. Civ. Code, § 1711; Gill v. Johnson, 125 Cal.App. 296, 13 P.2d 857, 14 P.2d 1017.

[4-7] Defendants also argue that the allegation in the earlier complaints that the drug had been taken on prescription of a physician, which was omitted from the fifth amended complaint, must be read into the latter complaint. If this allegation is read into the complaint, defendants urge, it shows conclusively that plaintiff did not act in reliance upon the representations of defendants. If any verified pleading contains an allegation which renders a complaint vulnerable, the defect cannot be cured simply by omitting the allegation, without explanation, in a later pleading. See Williamson v. Joyce, 137 Cal. 151, 69 P. 980. If, however, the allegation that plaintiff took the drug on advice of her physician be read into the fifth amended complaint, it sufficiently alleges reliance by plaintiff upon defendants' representations. In actions for fraud it is not required that a defendant's representations be the sole cause of the damage. If they are a substantial factor in inducing the plaintiff to act, even though he also relies in part upon the advice of others, reliance is sufficiently shown. See Elliott v. Federated Fruit & Veg. Growers, 108 Cal.App. 412, 291 P. 681; Jones v. Elliott, 111 Wash. 138, 189 P. 1007; Prosser, Torts, p. 746; 23 Am.Jur. 946. In this case there was no allegation in the earlier complaints that plaintiff relied solely upon the advice of her physician; in fact, it is alleged in the second amended complaint that "plaintiff and her said physician believed and accepted the recommendations of defendants * * * and relied upon the same and the said physician in reliance thereon, prescribed for plaintiff, and the said plaintiff in reliance thereon and upon the advice of her physician, formed upon such recommendation of the defendants, used said dinitrophenol." In the fifth amended complaint it is alleged that plaintiff "relying upon * * * the aforesaid representations of said defendants, and not otherwise, purchased and took internally" the said drug. Accepting this statement as qualified by the allegations with respect to the physician in the earlier complaints, it sufficiently alleges that plaintiff relied, at least in substantial part, on the representations of defendants. The mere fact that a physician prescribed the drug does not establish, as a matter of law, a lack of reliance on the part of the plaintiff which would absolve the defendants from liability. No cases have been cited to us which support the proposition advanced by defendants that in circumstances such as those alleged here a prescribing physician must accept sole responsibility for the treatment which he chooses for his patients. It seems to us a more reasonable view that one who manufactures and sells a drug dangerous to life and health, knowing it to be dangerous, should be liable where, as here alleged, both physician and patient rely upon the representations made concerning the drug.

[8-10] The ground of general demurrer principally urged by the defendants is that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. This contention is based on the theory that the fifth amended complaint charging fraud states a new and different cause of action from that for negligence stated in the original complaint. Unless the amended complaint sets forth an entirely different cause of action from the original, however, the amended complaint, for the purposes of the statute of limitations, must be deemed filed as of the date of the original complaint. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 P. 705, 84 Am.St.Rep. 53; Work v. County Nat. Bank, etc., Co., 4 Cal.2d 532, 51 P.2d 90; Jones v. Wilton, 10 Cal.2d 493, 75 P.2d 593; Day v. Western Loan & Bldg. Co., 42 Cal.App.2d 226, 108 P.2d 702; 16 Cal.Jur. 547; 34 Am.Jur. 211. The modern rule, where amendment is sought after the statute of limitations has run, is that the amended complaint will be deemed filed as of the date of the original complaint so long as recovery is sought in each complaint upon the same general set of facts. See Frost v. Witter, supra; Stockwell v. McAlvay, 10 Cal.2d 368, 375, 74 P.2d 504; Day v. Western Loan & Bldg. Co., supra; Clark, Code Pleading, p. 514. A mere change in legal theory will not subject the amended complaint to the bar of the statute of limitations. See Wells v. Lloyd, 6 Cal.2d 70, 56 P.2d 517; United States v. Memphis Cotton Oil Co., 288 U.S. 62, 67, 53 S.Ct. 278, 77 L.Ed. 619. In the present case the only substantial difference between the factual situations set forth in the original and the fifth amended complaint is that the former charged that the representations were negligently made while the latter charges that they were made with knowledge of their falsity. Despite the change in legal theory from an action for negligence to one for fraud, it cannot be said that an entirely different cause of action is stated. Therefore the latter complaint is not barred by the statute of limitations. Any contrary intimations contained in the cases of Spellacy v. Young, 44 Cal.App. 174, 186 P. 368, and Lambert v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 100, 67 P. 6, relied upon by defendants, are inconsistent with the theory of the more recent cases cited above and should not be followed. It must be held, therefore, that the trial court improperly sustained the general demurrers to plaintiff's fifth amended complaint.

Various grounds of special demurrer also were advanced before the trial court. Defendants contend, relying upon such cases as Haddad v. McDowell, 213 Cal. 690, 3 P.2d 550, that plaintiffs' failure to request leave to amend requires that this court affirm the judgment of the trial court if any of the grounds of special demurrer are well taken. Where a complaint is sufficient against a general demurrer, however, and any uncertainties or ambiguities in the pleading can be corrected by amendment, it is apparent that denial of leave to amend results in a disposition of the cause upon technical grounds alone. The plaintiff who has stated a cause of action in such a case is denied a trial on the merits of his action if any of the grounds of special demurrer are well taken, despite the fact that the deficiencies can be corrected. It has been held, under such circumstances, that denial of leave to amend constitutes an abuse of discretion even though it be conceded that the trial court had authority to sustain the special demurrer because of defects in the form of the pleading. Guilliams v. Hollywood Hospital, 18 Cal.2d 97, 104, 114 P.2d 1; Olivera v. Grace, 19 Cal.2d 570, 579, 122 P.2d 564; and cases cited therein.

It is true that the Haddad case, supra, and others (see Aalwyn v. Cobe, 168 Cal. 165, 142 P. 79; Consolidated R. & P. Co. v. Scarborough, 216 Cal. 698, 706, 16 P.2d 268; Fitzpatrick v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 7 Cal.2d 230, 60 P.2d 276; California Trust Co. v. Gustason, 15 Cal.2d 268, 101 P.2d 74), followed a judicially established rule of procedure which precluded an appellate court from considering whether denial of leave to amend constituted an abuse of discretion unless there was a special request by the plaintiff for leave to amend. This rule was eliminated as to future actions by the Legislature in 1939. Section 472c of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was added in that year, provides: "When any court makes an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend the question as to whether or not such court abused its discretion in making such an order is open on appeal even though no request to amend such pleading was made; provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any pending action or proceeding." If this section were applicable to the present action, it would be necessary for us to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in denying leave to amend, since it is clear that plaintiffs could so amend their complaint as to state a proper cause of action. Cf. Guilliams v. Hollywood Hospital, supra, 18 Cal.2d page 104, 114 P.2d 1. But this cause was pending at the time the statute became effective, and thus it is one of a limited group to which the old rule can still be applied because of the express proviso of the statute.

[11, 12] We are convinced, however, that under the circumstances now existing, the rule in the Haddad case should be rejected as to cases pending when Code of Civil Procedure, section 472c was enacted. The provision that this section should not apply to pending proceedings was intended, we think, to avoid any problem of retroactive application rather than to codify an existing rule as to pending cases. The problem is one of procedure and there are no vested rights which would be impaired by a change in the applicable rule of law. Furthermore, since the rule of the Haddad case was judicial in its origin, there is no impropriety in our conclusion that it should no longer be followed. The fact that the Legislature saw fit to exclude pending cases from the operation of the statute does not prevent this court from modifying its rule so as to secure uniformity in procedure. We therefore hold that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to sustain the demurrer without leave to amend. We do not decide, however, that the complaint was not subject to special demurrer, and the trial court may in its discretion require the clarification of uncertainties or ambiguities in the complaint. Guilliams v. Hollywood Hospital, supra, 18 Cal.2d page 104, 114 P.2d 1.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. J. Goodell, Judge.

Action by Monroe L. Moss against Emily M. Moss seeking a declaration that a contract executed by plaintiff and defendant and modification thereof were illegal, void, and against public policy. From a judgment for defendant after trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Livingston & Livingston, of San Francisco, and Allen H. Barr, of Berkeley, for appellant.

Manson & Allan, Dudley F. Miller, and Letitia R. Farber, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action against his former wife for declaratory relief seeking a determination of his obligations under a property settlement agreement executed in 1928 and a modification thereof executed in 1932. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered for defendant.

[1] The following allegations of the complaint must be regarded as true for the purposes of this appeal. Plaintiff and defendant, who were married in 1919, separated from one another on or about December 24, 1927. At that time, plaintiff alleges, it was agreed that defendant would obtain the divorce, and that "in consideration of such divorce and for no other consideration whatsoever, [plaintiff] would enter into a property settlement agreement with defendant to settle and determine their respective property rights and to provide for defendant's support and maintenance until she should remarry." In conformity with this plan, plaintiff and defendant entered into a separation agreement on March 21, 1928, by which, among other things, plaintiff was to pay to the defendant, Emily M. Moss, the sum of $250 per month during the period of her natural life until her remarriage. Thereafter the defendant wife brought an action for divorce, which plaintiff did not contest. An interlocutory judgment was entered on March 31, 1928, and a final judgment was entered on April 18, 1929. No reference was made to the separation agreement in either of the decrees. The modification of the agreement, made in October, 1932, reduced the monthly payments to $200 per month, but it provided that plaintiff's failure to meet any payment would result in a reinstatement of the original sum of $250 per month. Plaintiff alleged that an actual controversy exists between the parties as to his duties under these agreements. A judgment was sought declaring that the contract and modification thereof are void as against public policy and that he has no obligations or duties thereunder.

[2, 3] The law is settled that where a property settlement between husband and wife is entered into, conditioned upon an agreement to procure a divorce, the contract is against public policy and is invalid for that reason. Brown v. Brown, 8 Cal.App.2d 364, 47 P.2d 352; Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 P. 907, 50 L.R.A. 548; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 P. 488, 23 L.R.A.,N.S., 880, 134 Am.St.Rep. 107; see Restatement, Contracts, § 586; 6 Williston, Contracts, Rev.Ed.1938, § 1743, p. 4933. Under the allegations of the complaint, which are admitted by defendant's demurrer, the sole consideration for the property settlement here involved was an agreement by the defendant wife to procure a divorce. Since the case arises on demurrer, there is no need upon this appeal to consider whether it ultimately might be found that this agreement could be sustained because not actually promotive of divorce but merely incidental thereto. Cf. Howard v. Adams, 16 Cal.2d 253, 105 P.2d 971, 130 A.L.R. 1003; Cookinham v. Cookinham, 219 Cal. 723, 28 P.2d 1045; Queen v. Queen, 44 Cal.App.2d 475, 483, 112 P.2d 755. Assuming the property settlement agreement to be invalid, the question is whether plaintiff is entitled to a declaration to that effect.

[4-6] We are of the opinion that the allegations are sufficient to state a cause of action under the statute, Code Civ.Proc. § 1060, and would have justified the trial court in granting a declaratory judgment. Pacific States Corp. v. Pan-American Bank, 213 Cal. 58, 63, 1 P.2d 4, 981; Oldham v. Moodie, 94 Cal.App. 88, 89, 270 P. 688; Andrews v. W. K. Company, 35 Cal. App.2d 41, 45, 94 P.2d 605. Declaratory relief, however, may be refused in the discretion of the trial court if it appears that the determination is not necessary or proper at the time and under all the circumstances. Code of Civ.Proc. § 1061. Where facts appear from the face of the complaint which would justify a trial court in concluding that its determination is not necessary or proper, it has been held that the court may sustain a general demurrer to the complaint for declaratory relief. Communist Party v. Peek, 20 Cal. 2d 536, 127 P.2d 889; City of Alturas v. Gloster, 16 Cal.2d 46, 104 P.2d 810; Stenzel v. Kronick, 102 Cal.App. 507, 283 P. 93; Rapaport v. Forer, 20 Cal.App.2d 271, 66 P.2d 1242; A. Hamburger & Sons v. Kice, 129 Cal.App. 68, 18 P.2d 115. Plaintiff urges that the discretion of the court in refusing to grant the relief sought should not be exercised in ruling upon a general demurrer, but only after sufficient facts are before the court to justify the entry of such a judgment on the merits. See Miller v. Currie, 208 Wis. 199, 242 N. W. 570; Bruckman v. Bruckman Co., 60 Ohio App. 361, 21 N.E.2d 481; Anderson, Declaratory Judgments (1940), p. 271. It is true that an order sustaining a general demurrer to a complaint for declaratory relief does not indicate to the appellate court whether the trial court concluded that relief was inappropriate or that there was failure to state a cause of action. While it might be better practice for the trial court to overrule the demurrer and exercise its discretion in denying declaratory relief by some other procedure, as, for example, upon a motion to dismiss (cf. Cutting v. Bryan, 206 Cal. 254, 274 P. 326), the fact that it did so in ruling upon the general demurrer cannot be held reversible error in view of the decided cases in this state.

[7-10] Since we have held that this complaint was sufficient to authorize a declaration of plaintiff's obligations under the contract, we must now consider whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying declaratory relief under the circumstances here presented. Plaintiff urges that the trial court abused its discretion and that there is no basis upon which its determination can be sustained. It is not necessary for us to consider each of the various grounds advanced by defendant in support of the trial court's conclusion. The fact that plaintiff was a party to the unlawful bargain of equal fault with defendant and is therefore in pari delicto, is a consideration which could properly have been considered by the trial court as a sufficient reason for declining to grant declaratory relief. It is contended by plaintiff that such an action is not strictly an action in equity and, therefore, that the doctrine of in pari delicto should not be applied. It is also contended that the defense of in pari delicto has no application where the plaintiff is merely seeking to relieve himself from the executory portion of an illegal agreement, citing Wassermann v. Sloss, 117 Cal. 425, 49 P. 566, 38 L.R.A. 176, 59 Am.St.Rep. 209, and National Stone Tile Corp. v. Voorheis, 93 Cal.App. 738, 270 P. 286. It is true that declaratory relief is not strictly legal or equitable, but is suis generis in nature (Gore v. Bingaman, 20 Cal.2d 118, 120, 124 P.2d 17; see Borchard, Declaratory Judgments (2d ed. 1941), pp. 238, 248, 399, 439) and that in pari delicto is not ordinarily applied to the executory portions of an illegal agreement. Cases supra, and see 3 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed. 1941, sec. 940, pp. 728-733. Assuming, however, as contended by plaintiff, that the doctrine of in pari delicto should not be treated as an absolute bar to this action, it is nevertheless an element which the trial court in its discretion could consider in deciding whether or not to grant declaratory relief under the circumstances presented here. Cf. Borchard, supra, pp. 239-240, 304-305. It cannot be said, therefore, that the trial court abused its discretion, and we find no error in its conclusion that declaratory relief was not proper under the facts of this case.

It is contended that the complaint also alleges facts stating a cause of action for cancellation of the agreement. The defendant, however, specified the statute of limitations as one of the grounds of her demurrer, and although there is no section of the code that expressly limits the time within which an action must be brought for cancellation of an instrument because of its illegality, section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." It appears from the face of the complaint that this action was brought more than ten years after the separation agreement was made and more than five years after the modification thereof; thus it is obvious that if section 343 is applicable to an action for cancellation for illegality, plaintiff is precluded thereby.

[11, 12] It is well settled in California that, as stated in Piller v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 52 Cal. 42, 44, "the four years' limitation of sec. 343 applies to all suits in equity not strictly of concurrent cognizance in law and equity." See, also, Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., 185 Cal. 534, 545, 197 P. 799. This section has been considered applicable, for example, to actions based upon express and constructive trusts (Scott v. Symons, 191 Cal. 441, 456, 216 P. 604; Wrightson v. Dougherty, 5 Cal.2d 257, 264, 54 P.2d 13), to actions for an accounting (McArthur v. Blaisdell, 159 Cal. 604, 115 P. 52; West v. Russell, 74 Cal. 544, 16 P. 392), to an action in the nature of a creditor's bill against holders of watered stock (Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., supra), to an action to set aside deeds made under undue influence (Trubody v. Trubody, 137 Cal. 172, 174, 69 P. 968), and to a proceeding under section 708 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside a satisfaction and revive a judgment after an execution and sale made thereunder had been found void. Merguire v. O'Donnell, 139 Cal. 6, 9, 72 P. 337, 96 Am.St.Rep. 91. In Hynes v. M. J. & M. M. Consolidated, 168 Cal. 651, 144 P. 144, it was held that the section barred a suit in equity to vacate a judgment for lack of due service of process. It has been held, also, that section 343 bars an action to recover money illegally paid by a city official brought on the theory that the defendant was an involuntary trustee. City of Petaluma v. Hickey, 90 Cal.App. 616, 266 P. 613. This court has indicated, although without expressly so stating, that a lapse of time beyond the period of the statute would prevent relief in an action to cancel void bonds. Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 705, 706, 227 P. 723; Sechrist v. Rialto Irrigation Dist., 129 Cal. 640, 645, 646, 62 P. 261. Further, as the court said in Bogart v. George K. Porter Co., 193 Cal. 197, 201, 223 P. 959, 961, 31 A.L.R. 1045: "The Legislature has * * * specified the limitations applicable to a wide variety of actions, and then, to rebut the possible inference that actions not therein specifically described are to be regarded as exempt from limitations, it has specified a 4-year limitation upon 'an action for relief not hereinbefore provided for' (section 343); and where it has intended that an action shall be exempt from limitations it has said so in clear and unmistakable language. Code Civ.Proc., § 348; Civ.Code, § 309." Although plaintiff contends that laches and lapse of time cannot be defenses in an action to cancel an instrument void because contrary to public policy, citing Colby v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 160 Cal. 632, 117 P. 913, 35 L.R.A.,N.S., 813, Ann.Cas.1913A, 515, the equitable factors considered in that decision may not be used as a means of avoiding the express mandate of the statute of limitations. We must hold, therefore, that if plaintiff had a cause of action for cancellation, it is now barred by section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action under section 526b of the Code of Civil Procedure by the Sacramento Municipal Utility District against the Pacific Gas and Electric Company to recover attorney's fees expended by the plaintiff in an action brought by the defendant to enjoin the issuance of bonds for the purpose of acquiring electrical works. From a judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

CARTER, Justice.

Defendant, a California corporation engaged in the operation of electric works and the distribution and sale of electric energy as a public utility within the plaintiff Sacramento Municipal Utility District, appeals from a judgment of the Superior Court of Sacramento County rendered against it in favor of plaintiff for attorney's fees incurred by plaintiff in the defense of an action in the United States District Court and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and in opposing the issuance of a writ of certiorari by the United States Supreme Court, which action was prosecuted by defendant to restrain plaintiff from issuing, selling and delivering its bonds voted for the purpose of financing the acquisition and construction of a competing system for the supply of electric energy to the inhabitants of plaintiff district. The instant action was commenced pursuant to the provisions of section 526b of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On November 6, 1934, the electorate of plaintiff, a municipal utility district of this state organized under the Municipal Utility District Act of 1921, Stats.1921, p. 245, as amended, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 6393, authorized the issuance of $12,000,000 in bonds for the acquisition and construction of works for the supply of electric energy to the inhabitants thereof. On January 2, 1935, pursuant to section 16 of said act, plaintiff commenced a proceeding in rem in the Superior Court of Sacramento County to determine the validity of those bonds. Defendant appeared in that proceeding and contested the validity of said bonds on the ground that the taxation by the district of defendant's property situated within said district to pay the bonds would constitute a taking of its property without due process of law. It was ultimately determined by this court on appeal in that proceeding that the bonds were valid, and it was also determined that the ground of invalidity above mentioned advanced by defendant therein could not be properly considered in that proceeding. Sacramento M. U. Dist. v. All Parties, etc., 6 Cal.2d 197, 57 P.2d 506.

Thereafter defendant commenced an action in the United States District Court against plaintiff seeking to have enjoined the issuance and sale of said bonds, attacking their validity upon the ground above mentioned. No temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction was ever issued and the District Court refused to grant a permanent injunction. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Sacramento M. Utility Dist., 17 F.Supp. 685. That judgment was affirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals on defendant's appeal. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Sacramento M. Utility District, 9 Cir., 92 F.2d 365. Defendant's petition to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of certiorari was denied on February 14, 1938. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Sacramento M. Utility Dist., 303 U.S. 640, 58 S.Ct. 610, 82 L.Ed. 1100. The judgment in the instant action, here appealed from, establishes plaintiff's claim for attorney's fees incurred by it in its successful defense of the action in its course through the various federal courts.

That judgment is based upon the right of action created by section 526b of the Code of Civil Procedure which reads:

"Every person or corporation bringing, instigating, exciting or abetting, any suit to obtain an injunction, restraining or enjoining the issuance, sale, offering for sale, or delivery, of bonds, or other securities, or the expenditure of the proceeds of the sale of such bonds or other securities, of any city, city and county, town, county or other district organized under the laws of this state, or any other political subdivision of this state, proposed to be issued, sold, offered for sale or delivered by such city, city and county, town, county, district or other political subdivision, for the purpose of acquiring, constructing, completing, improving or extending water works, electric works, gas works or other public utility works or property, shall, if the injunction sought is finally denied, and if such person or corporation owns, controls, or is operating or interested in, a public utility business of the same nature as that for which such bonds or other securities are proposed to be issued, sold, offered for sale, or delivered, be liable to the defendant for all costs, damages and necessary expenses resulting to such defendant by reason of the filing of such suit."

It is not questioned that plaintiff's claim for attorney's fees upon which the judgment is based comes within the terms of that section, defendant's sole contention being that said section is unconstitutional as it impairs its right to resort to the federal courts for redress and invades a field belonging to the exclusive jurisdiction of those courts (U.S.Const., art. VI, par. 2; art. III, § 2); that it is a general law without uniform operation, is a denial of equal protection of the laws, and a grant of special privileges. U.S.Const., Fourteenth Amendment; Cal.Const., art. I, §§ 11, 21; art. IV, § 25.

[1, 2] It is not questioned that as a general rule the jurisdiction of federal courts over cases within the field of their jurisdiction cannot be enlarged, diminished or impaired by state statutes or regulations; and a person may not be deprived of his right to resort to the federal courts by state legislation. United States Const., art. VI, par. 2; art. III, § 2; Home Insurance Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 22 L.Ed. 365; Harrison v. St. Louis & San Francisco R. R., 232 U.S. 318, 34 S.Ct. 333, 58 L.Ed. 621, L.R.A.1915F, 1187; Cowles v. Mercer County, 7 Wall. 118, 19 L.Ed. 86; Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U.S. 529, 13 S.Ct. 695, 37 L.Ed. 546; Com. of Pennsylvania v. Williams, 294 U.S. 176, 55 S.Ct. 380, 79 L.Ed. 841, 96 A.L.R. 1166; Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226, 43 S.Ct. 79, 67 L.Ed. 226, 24 A.L.R. 1077; Blake v. McClung, 172 U.S. 239, 19 S.Ct. 165, 43 L.Ed. 432; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U.S. 186, 7 S.Ct. 931, 30 L.Ed. 915. Nor is it doubted that the matter of costs in federal courts is controlled exclusively by United States statutes or rules of the federal courts where such statutes or rules exist. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Larabee, 234 U.S. 459, 34 S.Ct. 979, 58 L.Ed. 1398; Tullock v. Mulvane, 184 U.S. 497, 22 S.Ct. 372, 46 L.Ed. 657.

[3] However, we believe it is clear that section 526b does not deprive plaintiff of access to the federal courts or impair or restrict the jurisdiction of those courts. That section creates a liability for attorney's fees in the type of actions specified therein regardless of whether the action in which the fees are incurred is in the state or federal courts. No attempt is made to keep parties out of the federal courts by singling out those courts alone as the forum in which the liability for the attorney's fees is incurred, while imposing no liability when the action is prosecuted in a state court. It is only in the event the one upon whom the fee is imposed is unsuccessful in his action that he becomes responsible for the fee. Thus his position is no different than any other litigant. If he chooses to litigate the question, he runs the risk of being required to reimburse his opponent for the latter's expenses. The obligation is an independent one created by statute which in no wise purports to regulate or limit the jurisdiction of the federal courts. If the allowance of fees were confined to actions in state courts, the inequitable result would follow that a penalty would be imposed upon a resort to those courts, and an inducement created to seek relief in the federal courts. The substantive right created by the state Legislature in enacting section 526b should not be made dependent upon the court in which the action is prosecuted. In the case of People of Sioux County v. National Surety Co., 276 U.S. 238, 243, 48 S.Ct. 239, 241, 72 L.Ed. 547, which involved a state statute creating a right to attorney's fees in an action on a surety bond, the court said:

"Disregarding mere matters of form it is clear that it is the policy of the state to allow plaintiffs to recover an attorney's fee in certain cases, and it has made that policy effective by making the allowance of the fee mandatory on its courts in those cases. It would be at least anomalous if this policy could be thwarted and the right so plainly given destroyed by removal of the cause to the federal courts." (Emphasis added.)

It must be remembered that the right created by the statute in question is an independent one. It is not dissimilar, with respect to the contention that there is interference with the jurisdiction of the federal court, from a state statute of limitation. No one would doubt that such statute would apply to an action which reached the federal court by reason of diversity of citizenship. It would not be considered as impairing the right of access to that court.

Defendant relies upon such cases as Harrison v. St. Louis & San Francisco R. R., supra, which involve statutes declaring forfeited a permit issued to a foreign corporation to transact business in the state when it commences an action in or has one transferred to the federal court. See cases collected 21 A.L.R. 188. Those cases are manifestly distinguishable from the case at bar inasmuch as a direct penalty is established by the statutes involved therein which singles out and attaches only to the right of access to the federal courts. In the instant case the statute is equally applicable to all courts, and defendant is not prevented from having its constitutional rights protected in the federal courts. It is merely obligated to pay the expenses incurred by its opponent in defending such a suit when it is unsuccessful; that is, when an invasion of its constitutional rights was incorrectly assumed by it as the basis for its action whether instituted in the state or federal courts.

[4] It must be kept in mind that, generally speaking, the policy of the Supreme Court of the United States is to look with disfavor upon attempted restrictions on the legislative authority and policy of a state. See Palmer v. Com. of Massachusetts, 308 U.S. 79, 60 S.Ct. 34, 84 L.Ed. 93; Railroad Comm. v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 61 S.Ct. 643, 85 L.Ed. 971. And except as to matters controlled by the United States Constitution and statutes the federal courts apply state law in matters of substance. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188, 114 A.L.R. 1487. The state policy creating the substantive right to counsel fees declared by section 526b should not, in conformity with those rules, be lightly brushed aside as imposing restrictions on the jurisdiction of the federal courts, merely because the right arises upon unsuccessful action being taken in either the federal or state courts. If every time there is some connection between a state created substantive right and an action in the federal courts it would be determined that there was unlawful interference with the jurisdiction of those courts or the right of access thereto, there would be little left of such rights and anomalous results would follow.

[5, 6] Another phase of this same question is manifested in the rule that, as to matters of costs in actions in the federal courts, the United States statutes when they cover the subject are controlling, and may not be regulated by state statutes which result in penalizing the free access to the federal courts in proper cases. In that connection defendant refers to the federal statutes on the subject of fees and costs in actions in the federal courts. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 571, 572. Assuming that the subject of costs is wholly covered by the federal statutes, it does not follow that section 526b is a regulation or provision for costs contrary to those statutes. The essence of the matter is, as we have seen, that that section creates an independent substantive right, and implies no attempt to regulate the practice and procedure in relation to costs in the federal courts. This is brought out in the case of People of Sioux County v. National Surety Co., supra, involving a state statute authorizing the recovery of attorney's fees by a successful plaintiff in an action on a surety bond. The action on the bond was in the federal court. The statute provided that the fees were to be allowed and taxed as costs; that is, the fees were to be allowed by the court hearing the action, rather than in an independent action. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court of the United States held the statute providing for counsel fees to be valid and enforceable, stating at page 241 of 276 U.S., at page 240 of 48 S.Ct., 72 L.Ed. 547:

"In striking down so much of the judgment as allowed an attorney's fee the court below was persuaded that section 7811, which provides for an attorney's fee, authorized it only as costs to be taxed in the state court. As costs in the federal courts are regulated exclusively by R.S. §§ 823 and 824 (28 U.S.C.A. §§ 571, 572), the court concluded that other costs, authorized only by a state statute, could not be included in the judgment. See United States v. Sanborn, 135 U.S. 271, 282, 10 S.Ct. 812, 34 L.Ed. 112; The Baltimore, 8 Wall. 377, 388 et seq., 19 L.Ed. 463. Compare Ex parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300, 314–319, 40 S.Ct. 543, 64 L.Ed. 919.

"Both in an earlier case, Globe Indemnity Co. v. Sulpho-Saline Bath Co., [8 Cir.], 299 F. 219, certiorari denied 266 U.S. 606, 45 S.Ct. 92, 69 L.Ed. 464 (see, also, Spring Garden Insurance Co. v. Amusement Syndicate Co., [8 Cir.], 178 F. 519, [102 C.C.A. 29]), and in a later case, Business Men's Assurance Co. v. Campbell, 8 Cir., 18 F.2d 223, the same court applied the Nebraska statute allowing the recovery of attorneys' fees in suits upon insurance policies. When it was argued that no other costs can be taxed in a court of the United States than those authorized by federal statute, the Circuit Court of Appeals said in the latter case ([18 F.2d] page 224) that the objection 'applies only to ordinary costs, and not to allowances for attorney's services provided by state statutes.' * * *

"That the statute directs the allowance, which is made to plaintiff, to be added to the judgment as costs are added does not make it costs in the ordinary sense of the traditional, arbitrary and small fees of court officers, attorneys' docket fees and the like, allowed to counsel by R.S. §§ 823, 824.

"The present allowance, since it is not costs in the ordinary sense, is not within the field of costs legislation covered by R.S. §§ 823, 824. That the particular mode of enforcing the right provided by the state statute—i. e., by taxing the allowance as costs—is not available to the federal courts under R.S. §§ 823, 824, does not preclude the recovery. Since the right exists the federal courts may follow their own appropriate procedure for its enforcement by including the amount of the fee in the judgment." (Emphasis added.)

The distinction between ordinary costs and the counsel fees involved in the action in the case at bar is emphasized in the case of Henkel v. Chicago, etc., Ry., 284 U.S. 444, 52 S.Ct. 223, 76 L.Ed. 386, involving a state statute authorizing the taxing as costs of fees for expert witnesses, the court deciding naturally that such fees were ordinary costs and therefore controlled by the United States statutes where the action was in the federal court. The case of People of Sioux County v. National Surety Co., supra, was distinguished on that ground, but the rule there stated was approved.

Defendant refers to cases holding that in actions on injunction bonds in the federal courts attorney's fees should not be allowed even though the state law permitted such recovery. Bein v. Heath, 12 How. 168, 13 L.Ed. 939; Tullock v. Mulvane, supra. It is doubtful that those cases are still the law since the decision in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, supra, in spite of the holding to the contrary in Travelers Mut. Casualty Co. v. Skeer, D.C., 24 F.Supp. 805, but in any event they are clearly distinguishable. They involved bonds given in federal court actions, and naturally the terms thereof would be controlled by the federal law. Such bonds related exclusively to matters involved in the actions pending in the federal courts and were given in the light of and pursuant to the laws and conditions pertaining to those particular actions. There was no statute creating an independent cause of action in any of those cases. Nor do we believe that the case of Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Larabee, supra, relied upon by defendant, is controlling. There a state statute authorized attorney's fees to defendant in a mandamus proceeding. The state court allowed such fees for services rendered in a writ of error proceedings in the United States Supreme Court taken from the decision of the state court. Although the Supreme Court in determining that the fees could not be properly allowed, discussed the proposition that to allow them would deprive a person of access to the federal courts, the allowance was treated entirely as a part of ordinary costs throughout, and the thought was repeatedly expressed that a state statute could not control the procedure of a federal court with reference to such costs. The later case of People of Sioux County v. National Surety Co., supra, recognized the distinction between counsel fees and ordinary costs which, as above seen, was also later recognized in Henkel v. Chicago, etc., Ry., supra. Numerous more recent federal court decisions have recognized the distinction. See Orlando Candy Co. v. New Hampshire Fire Ins. Co., D.C., 51 F.2d 392; Associated Mfrs. Corporation v. De Jong, 8 Cir., 64 F.2d 64; Business Men's Assur. Co. v. Campbell, 8 Cir., 18 F.2d 223; Benash v. Business Men's Assur. Co., 8 Cir., 25 F.2d 423; Missouri State L. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 290 U.S. 199, 54 S.Ct. 133, 78 L.Ed. 267.

[7-10] The contention that the section in question lacks uniformity, grants special privileges and denies equal protection of the laws, is also without merit. None of those constitutional principles is violated if the classification of persons or things affected by the legislation is not arbitrary and is based upon some difference in the classes having a substantial relation to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. San Bernardino County v. Way, 18 Cal.2d 647, 117 P.2d 354; Powers Farms v. Consolidated Irr. Dist., 19 Cal.2d 123, 119 P.2d 717. A law to be general in its scope need not include all classes of individuals in the state. Nor is a classification void because it does not embrace within it every other class which might be included. Heron v. Riley, 209 Cal. 507, 289 P. 160; Powers Farms v. Consolidated Irr. Dist., supra. Wide discretion is vested in the Legislature in making the classification and every presumption is in favor of the validity of the statute; the decision of the Legislature as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification will not be overthrown by the courts unless it is palpably arbitrary and beyond rational doubt erroneous. In re Weisberg, 215 Cal. 624, 12 P.2d 446; Rainey v. Michel, 6 Cal. 2d 259, 57 P.2d 932, 105 A.L.R. 148; Gillum v. Johnson, 7 Cal.2d 744, 62 P.2d 1037, 63 P.2d 810, 108 A.L.R. 595; Natural Milk, etc., Ass'n v. City and County of San Francisco, 20 Cal.2d 101, 124 P.2d 25. A distinction in legislation is not arbitrary if any set of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it.

[11] Applying those rules to section 526b, it cannot be said that the classification provided by the Legislature was palpably wrong and had no reasonable basis. When a municipality or public agency such as plaintiff in the case at bar engages in the business of producing and distributing electricity it necessarily comes into competition with any private utility distributing electricity in the same area; that competition may be partially or even totally destructive to the private utility's business. The private utility is without legal redress based upon constitutional guaranties for the results of such competition; its constitutional rights have not been thereby invaded. Puget Sound, etc., Co. v. City of Seattle, 291 U.S. 619, 54 S.Ct. 542, 78 L.Ed. 1025. Nevertheless, the Legislature might reasonably have assumed that by reason of the threat to its business by such competition it would be naturally driven by a compelling motive, different and greater than other persons, to prosecute, with less scrutinizing of the merits thereof, litigation to hamper and interfere with the development and operation of a public utility by a public agency, and thus either delay or forestall the day when its business would be wholly or partially destroyed by such threatened competition. It would be especially tempted to prosecute such litigation, and the Legislature in order to protect the public agency in engaging in a pursuit which it had deemed necessary to the public welfare, might reasonably have required, as it did, that a private utility with such a probable motive should reimburse the public treasuries for expenses incurred in unjustifiable litigation prosecuted by the utility. It is no answer to these circumstances to assert that private utilities do not prosecute actions of this character more frequently than others, inasmuch as the Legislature's determination that because of the motive involved the probabilities that they would prosecute more of such actions is binding upon this court where it has some reasonable basis for such determination. The section establishes as a prerequisite to the recovery of those expenses that the private utility be unsuccessful, thus indicating that its action was without legal foundation. It is not prevented from obtaining access to the court; if its action is meritorious it need not bear the expenses of the defendant. This basis for classification particularly removes any doubt that it is proper, in including only private utilities and such of those as operate within the area embraced by the public agency. But it is obvious that it also applies to the claimed discrimination between different kinds of litigation between plaintiff and the defendant in the actions contemplated by the section, and between actions enjoining the issuance and sale of bonds and other actions inasmuch as the issuance and sale of such bonds is usually a fundamental initial step in the acquisition and operation of utilities by a public agency. In connection with the allowance of attorney's fees to the public agency if the private utility is unsuccessful, but not to the latter if it is successful, the statement in Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. v. Cade, 233 U.S. 642, 650, 34 S.Ct. 678, 681, 58 L.Ed. 1135, is pertinent:

> "If the classification is otherwise reasonable, the mere fact that attorney's fees are allowed to successful plaintiffs only, and not to successful defendants, does not render the statute repugnant to the 'equal protection' clause. This is not a discrimination between different citizens or classes of citizens since members of any and every class may either sue or be sued. Actor and reus differ in their respective attitudes towards a litigation; the former has the burden of seeking the proper jurisdiction and bringing the proper parties before it, as well as the burden of proof upon the main issues; and these differences may be made the basis of distinctive treatment respecting the allowance of an attorneys' fee as a part of the costs."

It is of interest to observe that the courts have practically uniformly held constitutional statutes requiring that insurance companies, under varying circumstances, pay attorney's fees in successful actions to recover from them claims they have refused to pay, although plaintiff need not pay their fees if unsuccessful, the necessity of bringing the action being vexatious. Farmers', etc., Ins. Co. v. Dobney, 189 U.S. 301, 23 S.Ct. 565, 47 L.Ed. 821; People of Sioux County v. National Surety Co., supra; cases collected 90 A.L.R. 530; 11 A.L.R. 884. Defendant urges that those cases are distinguishable on the ground that the theory upon which they are based is that the statute providing for attorney's fees becomes part of the insurance contract, while no contract is involved in the instant case. They also may be predicated on the proposition that insurance companies are inclined to litigate claims without having a meritorious defense. As we have pointed out hereinabove, we cannot say that the Legislature was not justified in concluding that private utilities, under the conditions and circumstances specified in section 526b, and in light of the motive generated by the threat of competition, would be inclined to prosecute unmeritorious litigation by means of the particular actions contemplated by that section. Even if those cases do proceed on a contractual theory, that is, that when the company writes the policy it assumes the obligation imposed by the statute, that is no basis for a distinction, because, if the law was invalid as violating the equal privileges and protection clauses, it would be none the less invalid by requiring in effect that insurance policies and no other contracts should provide for attorney's fees. They could not be compelled to embody in their policy a provision for attorney's fees if the requirement was discriminatory.

Defendant relies particularly upon the case of Black v. Hilliker, 130 Cal. 190, 62 P. 481, as announcing that it is against public policy that an unsuccessful plaintiff shall be mulcted in damages by reason of his failure to obtain judgment. But here the Legislature has declared the policy under the specified circumstances that attorney's fees be allowed and under that policy the plaintiff is not being "mulct" in damages. Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 265, 88 P. 982, 17 L.R.A.,N.S., 909, 119 Am.St.Rep. 193, 11 Ann.Cas. 712, and Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U.S. 150, 17 S.Ct. 255, 41 L.Ed. 666, invalidating statutes allowing attorney's fees to certain creditors or against certain debtors, are cited by defendant. But suffice it to say that no basis for a proper classification existed in those cases as does in the case at bar. It was said in Engebretsen v. Gay, 158 Cal. 30, 32, 109 P. 880, 881, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 1062, Ann.Cas.1912A, 690, concerning the Builders' Supply case:

"There is, however, nothing in the opinion in Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Ellis, supra [165 U.S. 150, 17 S.Ct. 255, 41 L.Ed. 666], or in our own Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, supra [150 Cal. 265, 88 P. 982, 17 L.R.A.,N.S., 909, 119 Am.St.Rep. 193, 11 Ann.Cas. 712], to suggest that attorneys' fees may not be allowed a successful plaintiff in certain classes of cases, even though no such allowance be made to the defendant in the event that he prevails. The right to classify in this respect, as long as the classification is 'based upon some difference bearing a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is attempted,' was conceded by the opinion in Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Ellis, supra [165 U.S. 150, 17 S.Ct. 255, 41 L.Ed. 666] (see Atchison, etc., R. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U.S. 96, 19 S.Ct. 609, 43 L.Ed. 909), and is recognized by all the authorities."

No useful purpose may be served by an analysis of all the cases relied upon by defendant. Cases considering the particular constitutional guarantees here in question must each be determined upon its particular circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ⇨832(4)

Contention that Supreme Court erroneously determined appeal on the basis of affidavits filed in support of motion for new trial was not sustained, where affidavits referred to were embraced in the portion of transcript stipulated to be a full, true and fair transcript of the papers, considered "on the hearing at the trial" of the cause, and facts contained in such affidavits were discussed in briefs of both parties without any suggestion that Supreme Court could not consider them because contained in affidavits on motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

Petition denied.

Prior opinion, 127 P.2d 917.

Cryer & Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., and Robert J. Stahl and Edward J. Olstyn, Deputy City Attys., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

By petition for rehearing in this cause respondents contend that "this court has erred in determining this appeal upon the strength of statements and opinions expressed in affidavits filed in support of a motion for a new trial", contrary to the rule announced by this court in Lucci v. United Credit and Collection Company, 220 Cal. 492, 31 P.2d 369. This contention cannot be sustained for the reason that on the last page of the transcript the following stipulation appears: "We hereby stipulate the foregoing (pages 22 to 77, inclusive) to be a full, true and fair transcript of the papers, and all of the papers, used or considered on the hearing at the trial of the within cause (in addition to the record contained in the clerk's transcript of the judgment roll herein)." The affidavits referred to in the opinion of this court are embraced within the pages contained in the record referred to in the above-mentioned stipulation, and the facts contained in such affidavits were discussed in the briefs of both parties without any suggestion that such facts could not be considered by this court because they were contained in affidavits on motion for a new trial.

Other contentions made in respondents' petition for a rehearing are disposed of in the opinion of this court.

Respondents' petition for a rehearing is denied.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. RILEY, State Controller, et al.

L. A. 18249.

Supreme Court of California.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Sept. 2, 1942.

1. Statutes ⇨205

A statute must be construed as a whole.

2. Paupers ⇨39(1)

The provision of section 1554 of the Welfare and Institutions Code that for each needy child the amount granted by federal government for such child shall be deducted from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 and two-thirds of remaining sums shall be paid to county by state treasurer as reimbursement, includes not only the $22.50 mentioned in the first paragraph of section 1511, but such additional sums as the county may pay from its own funds as authorized by the second paragraph of section 1511, except that the state shall not pay more than $15 per month. St. 1937, p. 1072, § 1553; St.1939, pp. 2842, 2846, 2847, §§ 1510, 1511, 1554, 1555(a), 1556.

3. Paupers ⇨52(2)
States ⇨193

The obligation of the state to reimburse counties for aid furnished by the counties to needy children is imposed by statute and hence counties are not given permission to sue the state for reimbursement for such aid, by statute providing that any person who has a claim on express contract against the state is authorized to bring suit against the state on such claim. Pol.Code, § 688.

4. States ⚿191(1)

Statutes authorizing persons to sue the state, being in derogation of sovereignty, are strictly construed.

5. Mandamus ⚿3(6)

Since county was without legal remedy to enforce its claim against the state for reimbursement for aid furnished to needy children, county could resort to remedy of mandamus to compel state officials to perform duties enjoined on them by law with reference to reimbursement.

6. States ⚿197

An action merely to compel a state officer to perform a duty expressly enjoined on him by law is not a "suit against the state" within meaning of statute requiring presentation of a claim against the state to the Board of Control as a prerequisite to the institution of suit against the state. Pol. Code, § 688.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Suit Against the State".

7. Mandamus ⚿13

The statute requiring the presentation of a claim against the state to the Board of Control as a prerequisite to the institution of suit against the state, had no application to mandamus proceeding by county against state officials to compel reimbursement of the county for aid furnished by county to needy children, since the proceeding was not a "suit against the state". Pol.Code, § 688.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and T. A. Westphal, Jr., and Lawrence S. Fletcher, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondents.

CURTIS, Justice.

This proceeding was instituted to compel by writ of mandate certain state officials in charge of the finances of the state, respondents herein, (a) to recalculate the credits to which, it is contended by petitioner, the County of Los Angeles is entitled to have credited to its account "upon each and every report of aid to needy children presented to the Respondents herein by said County of Los Angeles since September 13, 1939, and which said reports have been audited and allowed by the State Department of Social Welfare and the State Controller as proper cases of child aid; and that Respondents in the making of said recalculation shall first deduct from the total of all aid given in each individual case by the combined contribution of the state, the county and the federal government, the amount of aid granted in the particular case by the federal government, and shall then divide the remainder into thirds and shall allow to the County of Los Angeles as a credit to apply against the advances made to said county, pursuant to the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 1555 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1939, p. 2846, two-thirds of said remainder unless said two-thirds shall exceed the sum of $15, in which event the credit given to the County of Los Angeles shall be $15 and no more, and that Respondents having made said recalculation as aforesaid shall thereupon forthwith allow to the County of Los Angeles as a credit to apply against the advances made to said county, pursuant to the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 1555 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, the difference between the sums so recalculated as hereinbefore provided, and the sums which said Respondents have heretofore allowed to said county as a credit against said advances by the calculations which the Respondents have heretofore made; (b) That they hereafter calculate the credits to which the County of Los Angeles is entitled upon each and every report of aid to needy children presented to the Respondents herein, pursuant to the provisions of section 1556 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1939, p. 2847, by utilizing the formula of calculation hereinbefore described in subdivision (a) of this prayer."

The money provided for the support and aid of dependent or needy children in this state is derived from three different sources: the federal government, the state, and the county. That portion of said money derived from the federal government is provided in section 403 of the Social Security Act approved August 14, 1935, 49 U.S.Stats. p. 627, as amended in 1939, 53 U.S.Stats., p. 1380, 42 U.S.C.A. § 603. This section as amended in 1939, effective January 1, 1940, provides that the federal government will pay for each needy child who is the only child in one family, a sum equal to one-half of the aid granted, not to exceed, however, nine dollars for each calendar month; for each needy child in one family beyond the first child, one-half of the aid granted to each said subsequent child, not to exceed, however, the sum of six dollars for each calendar month.

In our discussion of the questions herein involved we will consider only the case where there is but one needy child in a family. The case of a subsequent child or children would be governed by the same rule, but, of course, the amounts to be paid by the federal government would be proportionately less, or two-thirds of that paid the first needy child in a family.

The support of needy children in this state by the state and several counties is governed by the provisions of the Welfare and Institutions Code (Stats. of 1937, p. 1005, Chap. 369), as amended in 1939 (Stats. of 1939, pp. 1574, 2840, Chaps. 302, 1037). It is agreed by each of the parties, however, that the proper solution of the problem before us involves the correct construction of section 1554 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, St. 1939, p. 2846. Respondents, however, suggest that this section must be construed in connection with other sections of said code, and particularly in connection with sections 1510, 1511, 1553 thereof, St.1939, p. 2842, St.1937, p. 1072. In line with this suggestion we will set forth the applicable provisions of these four sections with the purpose of construing section 1554 in the light of the other three sections.

By section 1510 "there is * * * provided * * * for the support and maintenance of needy children and to each county maintaining such needy children, aid not in excess of" fifteen dollars per month for each such needy child residing in said county.

By section 1511, as amended, it is provided: "For each needy child * * * there shall be paid the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents per month, or so much thereof as is necessary for the adequate care of the child. The State shall pay 66⅔ per cent and the county shall pay 33⅓ per cent of the aid furnished for the adequate care of any needy child who has a county residence, but the State shall not pay more than fifteen dollars per month for any needy child who has such county residence.

"Any county may pay from its own funds additional sums for the care of any needy child, and the State and county may pay such aid as is needed for the adequate care of the family from other State or county funds."

Section 1553 provides, in part, as follows: "During such time as grants in aid are made available by the United States Government for aid to dependent children in this State, and accepted by this State, the State Treasurer, shall, from the sums so granted, pay to each county (a) an amount which shall be used exclusively as aid to dependent children, equal to that proportion specified by the United States Government in so granting or making the sums available, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any child for any month as exceeds the maximum fixed by the United States Government in granting or making such sums available * * *."

Section 1554, as amended, insofar as it relates to the question before us, reads as follows: "From the sums appropriated in section 1510 of this code, the State Treasurer shall pay to the county, for each child to whom aid is given under the provisions of this chapter, an amount not to exceed the amount appropriated for each child in section 1510 of this code. The amount to be paid by the State Treasurer for any needy child shall be computed as follows:

"(a) For each child who has residence in the State as defined by section 1525 and residence in the county as defined by section 1526 of this code, the amount granted by the United States Government and paid by the State Treasurer under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 1553 for such child shall be deducted from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 of this code, and two-thirds of the remaining sums shall be paid to the county by the State Treasurer. In no event shall this amount exceed the amount appropriated for a needy child by subdivision (a) of section 1510 of this code."

Taking up the first sentence of section 1554, we find it refers to section 1510 in the following language: "From the sums appropriated in section 1510 of this code, the State Treasurer shall pay to the county, for each [needy] child to whom aid is given under the provisions of this chapter, an amount not to exceed the amount appropriated for each child in section 1510 of this code." By section 1510 there is provided out of money in the state treasury for the support of and maintenance of three separate classes of needy children, not in excess of the several amounts stated therein. We are concerned only with the first class, that is, those children whose residence in the state and county entitle them to support both from the state and the county. For this class of needy children the maximum amount provided by section 1510 is fifteen dollars per month. Accordingly, the first sentence of section 1554 quoted above authorizes the payment by the state to the county for each such needy child a sum not exceeding fifteen dollars per month. Section 1554 then provides for the method of computing the amount to be paid by the state treasurer for any such needy child as follows: For each such needy child whose residence entitles it to receive both state and county aid "the amount granted by the United States Government and paid by the State Treasurer under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 1553 for such child shall be deducted from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 of this code, and two-thirds of the remaining sums shall be paid to the county" not exceeding the sum of fifteen dollars per month. In all cases in which there is any dispute between the county and state involved in this proceeding, this maximum amount of nine dollars federal money is conceded to be the proper amount to "be deducted from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 of this code." The problem, therefore, before us is narrowed down to the determination of "the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 of this code," from which amount the nine dollars federal money is deducted, and two-thirds of the remaining sum shall be paid to the county by the state treasurer, not exceeding the sum of fifteen dollars per month.

The state contends that the total amount granted for the child is the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, as specified in the first paragraph of section 1511, while the county contends that in addition to the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, there is included the further sum which "any county may pay from its own funds additional sums for the care of any needy child," provided that the state in no event shall pay more than fifteen dollars per month for such support.

Let us first consider the contention of the state. If the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents is the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511, then by deducting from this amount the nine dollars federal money, there would remain thirteen dollars and fifty cents, two-thirds of which would be nine dollars or the state's proportion, the county paying the remaining one-third or four dollars and fifty cents. Under this construction of the section the state would never be called upon to pay more than nine dollars for the support of such needy child. If this is the correct construction of the section, why did the legislature provide therein that "the state shall not pay more than fifteen dollars per month for any needy child who has such county residence"? If the maximum amount that the state is required to pay is only nine dollars per month, what was the object of stating that it should never exceed fifteen dollars per month? Furthermore, what purpose would there be in appropriating fifteen dollars per month for the support of a needy child in one section of this code, and in another limiting the amount that may be expended for that purpose to nine dollars per month? The only explanation the state makes to this unusual condition is that the federal aid is not granted to needy children cared for in private institutions, and aid for such children falls entirely on the state and county, and when the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, the maximum amount granted for aid to needy children, is given to children cared for in private institutions, said sum is divided between the state and county on the basis of two-thirds or fifteen dollars to be borne by the state and one-third or seven dollars and fifty cents to be borne by the county. Section 1554, which, it is agreed by each party to this action, determines and fixes the maximum amounts to be paid by the state and county, respectively, for aid of needy children, requires that from the total amount of aid granted there shall be deducted the amount granted by the United States Government, and after specifying the several amounts which the state and county shall contribute, it expressly provides that in no event shall the amount paid by the county exceed the sum of fifteen dollars per month, provided for by section 1510. Returning to section 1511, from the discussion of which we digressed to make the above reference to section 1554, there is the same limitation upon the amount the state may contribute in section 1511, as just noted in section 1554, that is, a maximum amount of fifteen dollars per month.

It appears, therefore, that the legislature expressly appropriates the sum of fifteen dollars per month in section 1510 for aid rendered to needy children possessing the required state and county residence; and just as positively in sections 1511 and 1554 limits such aid to the maximum amount of fifteen dollars per month for each such child. In the face of the positive provisions of these sections the state contends that the said sum of fifteen dollars per month can only be paid for aid rendered to that limited class of needy children maintained in private institutions and for whose support the federal government does not participate. We are unable to agree with this contention, as such a construction of these sections of the code seems unreasonable and not sustained by the various express provisions thereof set forth above.

[1, 2] The county, on the other hand, contends that the words "from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511," as found in section 1554, include not only the twenty-two dollars and fifty cents mentioned in the first paragraph of section 1511, but such additional sums as the county may pay from its own funds for the support of a needy child as authorized in the second paragraph of said section, provided that "the state shall not pay more than fifteen dollars per month for any needy child." When construing section 1511 as a whole, as it is our duty to do, we think the position of the county must be sustained. As stated before, if we take the amount of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents as "the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511," the state can never be called upon to pay more than nine dollars per month. If the state can be called upon to pay only nine dollars per month, as provided in the first sentence of the first paragraph of this section, why the necessity in the second sentence of this paragraph of placing a limitation of fifteen dollars per month on the state's share of this expense? This maximum amount of fifteen dollars which the state is authorized to pay can only arise when the cost of maintenance exceeds the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, and the requirement thereof that the state should not pay more than fifteen dollars per month for the support of a needy child is inconsistent with the construction which the state places upon the preceding provision fixing the maximum amount the state is required to pay at nine dollars per month. Such a construction, which fixes said maximum amount at nine dollars, would be inconsistent with the provisions of section 1510, by the terms of which the state has appropriated fifteen dollars per month for the support of needy children having the proper state and county residence.

Another consideration which not only supports the conclusion just stated, but which renders such conclusion practically conclusive is the exact wording of section 1554. It will be noted that this section expressly states that the amount granted by the United States Government is first to be deducted from "the total amount granted * * * pursuant to section 1511 of this code." There is no dispute but that by the first paragraph of section 1511 the state and county are granted authority to contribute toward said support the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, mentioned in the first paragraph of said section. It is equally clear that by the second paragraph of said section the county is given authority to pay from its own funds additional sums for the care of any needy child. So far as we are informed this is the only law of this state which authorizes a county to contribute to the support of such a needy child. Therefore, these "additional sums" are granted by the county pursuant to section 1511; so that not only the sum of twenty-two dollars and fifty cents provided for in the first paragraph of said section is granted pursuant to section 1511, but the additional sums provided for in the second paragraph of said section which a county may pay from its own funds also are granted pursuant to section 1511. These two amounts must be combined for the purpose of determining the "total amount granted * * * pursuant to section 1511," and this total amount less the nine dollars contributed by the United States Government must be paid by the state and county in the proportion set forth in section 1554 provided the county shall not pay more than fifteen dollars per month for the support of such needy child. In our opinion the words fixing "the total amount granted * * * pursuant to section 1511" can be given no other construction. We are, therefore, of the conclusion that by following the construction contended for by the county we obtain the correct formula to determine the respective amounts which the state and county must pay for aid rendered to such needy children.

It is argued that the total amount contributed by the county under section 1511 cannot be included in the computation contemplated by section 1554 for the reason that section 1511 designates appropriations made by a county "from its own funds." If the total amount of such appropriations were included in the base the county would be reimbursed by the state to the extent of ⅔ and the appropriation could not therefore be said to be out of its own funds. Section 1554, however, in fixing the proportion that state and county shall ultimately bear and in providing the base figure, i. e., total amount under 1511, necessarily contemplates that the county is to be reimbursed to the extent authorized by section 1554 for amounts that it has advanced out of its own funds.

The present proceeding, as we have seen, is one in mandamus to compel the respondents, officers of the state, to recalculate the credits to which petitioner alleges the County of Los Angeles is entitled, upon certain reports of aid to needy children, and thereupon to allow the County of Los Angeles a credit equal to the difference between the sums so recalculated and those previously calculated by respondents, and that the respondents hereafter calculate the credits to which petitioner contends the county is entitled upon like reports which may in the future be made by the petitioner to respondents, by using the county formula hereinbefore referred to. It is the contention of respondents that the present proceeding in mandate will not lie for the reason that the obligation of the state to pay the county for the maintenance of needy children under the provisions of the Welfare and Institutions Code is in the nature of a contract, that under the provisions of section 688 of the Political Code the county is given the right to sue the state upon said contract, and that the petitioner is barred from maintaining this action to recover the sums claimed to be due prior to the filing of this action by its failure to present any claim for said sums to the State Board of Control, as required by section 688 of the Political Code.

By reference to section 688 it will be seen that it is provided therein, among other things, that any person having a claim on an express contract must present the claim to the State Board of Control, and on its disallowance by the Board of Control the person is given authority to bring suit against the state on such claim. It is conceded that the petitioner has not presented any claim to the Board of Control for any money claimed to be due it from the state on account of aid furnished to needy children as set forth in its petition herein.

In support of their contention just stated, respondents rely upon the case of County of San Luis Obispo v. Gage, 139 Cal. 398, 73 P. 174. That action was instituted by the County of San Luis Obispo against the State Board of Examiners to obtain a writ of mandate compelling the board to allow and approve certain claims in favor of the county against the state for money alleged to have been expended by the county for the maintenance of orphans, half-orphans, and abandoned children, residents of the county, under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of date March 25, 1880. Stats. 1880, p. 13. It was held in that action that a claim against the state for the maintenance of orphans, half-orphans, etc., under said act is a claim resting upon contract within the meaning of the act of 1893 (Stats.1893, p. 57), and no action could be maintained on said claim unless it was presented to the Board of Examiners (the predecessor of the present Board of Control), as provided in said act. From this statement of that case respondents contend that the petitioner had an adequate remedy at law for the recovery of any amounts due it and therefore mandamus will not lie to compel the respondents to perform the duties which the petitioner alleges they are required by law to perform.

[3-7] The act of 1893 permitted any person who had a claim on contract or for negligence against the state to bring suit thereon against the state. The authority to sue the state is now found in section 688 of the Political Code which provides that "Any person who has * * * a claim on express contract or for negligence against the State * * * is hereby authorized * * * to bring suit against the State on such claim." (Italics ours.) It will be noted that under the present statute the right to sue the state on a contract is limited to express contracts. The obligation of the state to reimburse counties for aid furnished by the latter to needy children is imposed by statute. Statutes authorizing persons to sue the state being in derogation of sovereignty are strictly construed. 23 Cal.Jur. 578; Miller v. Pillsbury, 164 Cal. 199, 128 P. 327, Ann.Cas.1914B, 886; State of California v. Royal Consolidated Mining Co., 187 Cal. 343, 202 P. 133. It follows therefore that petitioner is not given permission by section 688 of the Political Code to bring suit on its present claim against the state. Accordingly, it is without legal remedy to enforce its claim. It may therefore resort to this statutory remedy of mandamus to compel the respondents as officials of the state to perform the duties enjoined upon them by law. The rule is well established in this state that where the action is one simply to compel an officer to perform a duty expressly enjoined upon him by law, it may not be considered a suit against the state. 23 Cal.Jur. 583; Board of Directors v. Nye, 8 Cal.App. 527, 97 P. 208; Kingsbury v. Nye, 9 Cal.App. 574, 99 P. 985; U'Ren v. State Board of Control, 31 Cal.App. 6, 159 P. 615. As the present action is not one against the state, the provision of section 688 of the Political Code, requiring the presentation of a claim to the Board of Control as a prerequisite to the institution of suit, has no application to actions of this character. The action was properly commenced and petitioner has the legal right to maintain the same.

For the reasons stated above, we are of the opinion that the writ prayed for herein should issue. It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue out of this court directed to the respondents as prayed for by petitioner.

GIBSON, C. J., and SHENK, CARTER, and TRAYNOR, JJ., concurred.

EDMONDS, Justice (dissenting).

Although I agree with the mathematical result reached in the opinion of my associates, I cannot concur in their construction of the applicable sections of the Welfare and Institutions Code.

By section 1510, there is provided, out of money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each county maintaining needy children aid not in excess of $15 per month. The next section fixes the amount of the total aid at $22.50 per month "or so much thereof as is necessary for the adequate care of the child," of which the state shall pay two-thirds and the county one-third, the maximum liability of the state being $15 per month. But under this section "any county may pay from its own funds additional sums for the care of any needy child."

Although before 1937 the state had reimbursed the counties for part of the amount expended by them in the care of needy children, the present plan for supporting these persons was adopted in 1937 when the Welfare and Institutions Code was enacted. Unquestionably, in fixing the amount to be appropriated, the legislature took into consideration the then and present policy of the federal government, for section 1553 provides that "During such time as grants in aid are made available by the United States Government" the state treasurer shall pay to each county the specified amount "which shall be used exclusively as aid to dependent children." And the next section carries the amount of the federal aid into the formula by which the state's proportion of the total cost shall be determined. First, the amount of federal aid "shall be deducted from the total amount granted for the child pursuant to section 1511 * * * and two-thirds of the remaining sums (not in excess of $15 per month) shall be paid to the county by the State Treasurer."

Under these provisions, as I read them, the aid for dependent children is made up of money appropriated by the federal government, the state, and the county in specified amounts, and, insofar as aid over a total of $22.50 per month is concerned, in determining the amount which the county shall contribute, it is necessary to determine how much of that excess it has paid "from its own funds." Under the construction adopted by my associates, in the event that the county paid a total of $36 per month "for the adequate care of the child" or $13.50 more than the basic amount of $22.50, in making its settlement the state would first deduct the federal aid of $9 per month at the present rate. But as two-thirds of the remainder, $27, amounts to more than $15, the state's proportion would be limited to that amount. The result would be that the county had added $13.50 to the $22.50 base aid but eventually only had to pay $12 of that amount.

A more logical construction, it seems to me is to say that the federal aid is never a part of the county's "own funds," but that it is a component part of the total aid given to the dependent child. On this basis, and using the same example, the county, with the knowledge that it will receive $9 of federal aid for each dependent child, decides that it will use that amount and $4.50 of its own funds to make up $36 for "adequate care." The state would pay to the county the $9 of federal aid and its own proportion of $15. The balance, or $12, represents the county's proportion of $7.50 of the basic aid of $22.50, plus the additional $4.50 which it has paid "from its own funds." This construction harmonizes the language found in each pertinent section of the code.

But if the obligation of the state to reimburse counties for aid furnished by the latter is an implied contract, then the writ should require the respondents to recalculate the petitioner's accounts for the period of two years prior to the commencement of this proceeding. Code Civ.Proc. § 339.

The nature of the right asserted in a mandamus proceeding determines which statutory provision, in regard to limitation of actions, applies. Dillon v. Board of Pension Com'rs, 18 Cal.2d 427, 116 P.2d 37, 136 A.L.R. 800.

Habeas corpus proceeding to secure custody of Louis H. J. Case, a minor.

Writ discharged.

William Bronsten, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jack W. Walling and C. E. Christopher, both of Alhambra, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This matter came on for hearing upon the writ of habeas corpus issued on the 6th of August, 1942.

From the findings and decision on file it appears that the subject has been for some years the ward of Clara Rungie, and that on the 28th day of July, 1942, her letters of guardianship were revoked and it was ordered that the custody of the child be restored to his father, Howard L. Case. Inasmuch as such order was self-executing, the father acted in the proper exercise of his duties as the natural guardian in assuming custody of the child. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. 2. Mortgages 🔑338
Trusts 🔑94

A corporation, to which land was conveyed on understanding that it would issue all of its stock to grantors concurrently, became "constructive trustee" for grantors on total failure of consideration for deed because of revocation of corporation's permit to issue stock before transfer thereof to grantors, so that they were "real parties in interest" and "proper parties plaintiff" in suit to enjoin trustee's sale under trust deed securing corporation's note for money subsequently borrowed by it from bank.

9. Banks and banking 🔑63½

The description of trust property in petition by superintendent of banks for authority to transfer insolvent bank's beneficial interest in trust declaration to corporation in compromise of litigation instituted thereby against superintendent as bank's liquidator is sufficient, if it contains reasonable means for identification of property.

10. Mortgages 🔑105

A trust declaration and trust deed, given to secure same obligation as part of same transaction, must be construed together, but all provisions of each must be given full effect, except insofar as they may be completely repugnant.

11. Mortgages ⟹333

Where trust declaration and trust deed, given to secure same obligation as part of same transaction, each contained express provision for sale of trust property in case of default in payment of principal, interest or taxes, court's finding that trustee had no power to declare default under trust declaration for such failure because any such default could be remedied solely by sale under trust deed was erroneous, as fact that the two instruments contained cumulative remedies for same defaults did not constitute irreconcilable repugnancy between them.

12. Mortgages ⟹335

Amendments of trust declaration by merely reducing release prices of various parts of trust property cannot be construed, under guise of "estoppel", as extending maturity of note secured by such declaration and trust deed, though parties may have waived past defaults by executing amendments.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estoppel".

13. Mortgages ⟹335

Where owners of trust property were in default in payment of taxes and interest, as required by trust declaration, when corporation, to which insolvent bank's beneficial interest in declaration was transferred by superintendent of banks, notified trustee not to permit sales of such property without corporation's approval, such owners were not entitled to benefit of declaration and notice did not constitute breach of agreement, so that trustee and such corporation were not "estopped" to assert such defaults.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop".

References in trust declaration and trust deed to date and place of record of deed describing trust property constituted sufficient description thereof.

15. Mortgages ⟹338

Where remedies under trust declaration and trust deed for same defaults were cumulative, judgment enjoining trustees' sale of trust property was not erroneous as against trustee under trust deed, though complaint alleged that such trustee was not threatening to sell under such instrument, as beneficiary's threat to require sale under trust declaration was in substance equally a threat to demand sale under trust deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

Action by Frank D. Hall and others against the Citizens National Trust and Savings Bank of Los Angeles and others for injunctions against trustees' sale of trust property and declaration of default in payment of principal of or interest on indebtedness secured by a trust declaration and trust deed. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Hearing denied; EDMONDS, J., not participating.

Richard L. North, of Los Angeles, Rosenshine, Hoffman, Davis & Martin and Elbert W. Davis, all of San Francisco, and Arch H. Vernon, Earl E. Johnson and Gilbert E. Harris, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes and David A. Sondel, all of Los Angeles, and Hagar, Crosby & Crosby, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Defendants have appealed from a judgment perpetually enjoining a proposed trustee's sale pursuant to a notice of sale theretofore given; and temporarily enjoining any such sale under either a declaration of trust or a deed of trust securing the same obligation for a period of one year from the date of entry of the judgment for failure to pay interest between February 9, 1939, and November 13, 1939, or subsequent to entry of the judgment and enjoining them for eighteen months subsequent to entry of the judgment from declaring any such default for failure to pay principal or interest prior to February 9, 1939, or between November 13, 1939, and entry of the judgment, or for failure to pay taxes prior to the entry of judgment. The judgment further declared that appellant Pacific States Corporation had not and never had had any interest in said declaration of trust or said deed of trust or in the obligations secured thereby.

The property encumbered by the instruments involved consisted of 300 acres in Leona Valley, Los Angeles County. Prior to January 13, 1927, it had been owned by respondents Frank D. Hall and Marguerite S. Hall, his wife (hereinafter collectively designated as "the Halls"); on the last mentioned date the Halls caused respondent corporation (hereinafter designated "Farm Builders") to be incorporated for the purpose of holding legal title to the land which was thereafter transferred to said corporation, upon the understanding that it would issue to the Halls all of its capital stock. A permit to issue the stock in exchange for the land was obtained but was revoked before the stock had been transferred and on December 12, 1932, Farm Builders purported to re-transfer the property to the Halls.

On July 30, 1927, Farm Builders borrowed $45,000 from Pan American Bank of California (hereinafter designated "Pan Am. Bank") evidenced by its promissory note payable on July 30, 1932, and secured by the deed of trust wherein Title Insurance and Trust Company (hereinafter designated "Title Co.") was trustee. Concurrently, Farm Builders entered into a declaration of trust with Pan Am. Bank wherein the latter was trustee and a beneficiary. On December 2, 1929, this was supplanted by declaration of trust No. 5873 wherein Citizens National Trust and Savings Bank (hereinafter designated "Citizens Bank") was trustee and Pan Am. Bank was a beneficiary. By liquidation proceedings commenced July 19, 1929, the superintendent of banks of California took over Pan Am. Bank. On January 7, 1930, the superintendent, through a deputy, executed a grant deed to Citizens Bank.

Declaration of trust 5873 provided for release prices of the lots comprising the encumbered property. On October 28, 1935, it was amended to reduce the release prices; this amendment was executed by Farm Builders, the Citizens Bank as trustee, and Pan Am. Bank in liquidation, but not by the Halls. On February 9, 1939, the declaration was again amended to further reduce the release prices; this amendment was executed by the same parties; however, it was also signed by the Halls though they were not named as parties.

Farm Builders' corporate powers were suspended June 26, 1930, and were not revived until November 22, 1940. (The transfer from Farm Builders to the Halls, the two amendments of October 28, 1935, and December 9, 1939, of the declaration of trust No. 5873, and the commencement of this action all occurred during the period of suspension.)

On November 2, 1939, in the proceedings for the liquidation of Pan Am. Bank the court, after petition filed on October 27, 1939, followed by five days notice by posting, authorized the superintendent of banks to transfer to Pacific States Corporation, among other assets, all the beneficial interest of Pan Am. Bank in declaration of trust 5873 in compromise of certain litigation instituted against him as liquidator of Pan Am. Bank by said Pacific States Corporation. On the same day the superintendent purported to make said transfer. On November 13, 1939, Pacific States Corporation notified Citizens Bank not to permit sales under the declaration of trust (pursuant to the release provisions) without its approval and thereafter Pacific States Corporation and Citizens Bank refused to approve sales. On June 4, 1940, Pacific States Corporation directed Citizens Bank to declare all obligations under the declaration of trust due and proceed to a trustee's sale. Notice of sale was given on July 3, 1940, and the sale was noticed for November 13, 1940. This action was commenced November 4, 1940.

The permanent injunction was based upon the finding that the transfer to Pacific States Corporation was void because (1) the superintendent of banks lacked the power to make such a transfer, (2) the notice of hearing of the petition was inadequate, and (3) the description of the declaration of trust was defective, and that therefore said corporation could not properly require either of the trustees to proceed to a sale; and upon the further finding that the declaration of trust (despite contrary express provision) did not authorize a sale for failure to pay principal or interest so that appellant Citizens Bank lacked authority to proceed on its own initiative as trustee.

The injunction for the limited period was based upon alleged estoppels to assert the defaults mentioned and claimed to arise out of the amendments of the declaration of trust and the notice of November 13, 1939, from Pacific States directing that further sales under the release provisions not be made. The court declined to make any finding as to the amount due for principal, interest and taxes.

Appellants first contend that respondent Farm Builders lack capacity to maintain the action because of the suspension of its corporate powers and that the Halls could not maintain the action because the deed from Farm Builders to them was void, having been executed during such period of suspension.

[1] The action, as aforesaid, was commenced November 4, 1940, and the corporate powers were revived November 22, 1940, subsequent to the filing of the answer but before trial of the cause. The precise question presented is whether a revival subsequent to the interposition of a plea in abatement raising the question, but before the hearing of the plea, is a sufficient avoidance of the plea.

Commencement of the action during the period of suspension is not a nullity and a revival of the corporate powers prior to the interposition of the plea is sufficient. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Superior Court, 91 Cal.App. 356, 267 P. 169. Appellants do not question this rule; it is their contention that the revival must come before the defendants have raised the point. It is true that language used in some cases would support that view but each of the cases cited by appellants is quite clearly distinguishable.

Boyle v. Lakeview Creamery Co., 9 Cal. 2d 16, 68 P.2d 968, did not involve the question of revival of corporate powers at all. In Smith v. Lewis, 211 Cal. 294, 295 P. 37, the court was concerned with the validity of a judgment made and entered prior to a revival of the plaintiff's corporate powers; even on that question the language is dictum insofar as the opinion expressly states that there was nothing in the record to show that there had been a revival at any time. In Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 393, 205 P. 446, the court held that the filing of a notice of intention to move for a new trial is jurisdictional for the hearing of the motion and that a notice given during the suspension was not validated by a subsequent revival prior to the hearing. That case is not analogous for, as is pointed out above, the filing of an action during a period of suspension is not a nullity. The distinction of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court made by this court in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Superior Court, supra, is equally applicable here. Cleveland v. Gore Bros., Inc., 14 Cal.App.2d 681, 58 P.2d 931, is most nearly parallel to this case and is primarily relied upon by appellants. However, the holding in that case must be confined to the facts there presented. That action was commenced during the period of suspension; shortly thereafter the period of the statute of limitations expired; the defendants in their answer pleaded the suspension of the corporate powers. After the running of the statute and the filing of the answer the corporate powers were revived. The court held that the revival could not be given a retroactive effect so as to permit the filing of the action at a time of incapacity to toll the running of the statute of limitations; it was the intervening fact of the expiration of the statute of limitations that controlled the decision. In truth the plea was not one in abatement but a defense to the action on the merits.

The question presented is controlled by the decision in Rudneck v. Southern California M. & R. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 P. 775, wherein the court held that the publication of a certificate of co-partnership subsequent to the filing of an answer pleading the failure to file the same but prior to the trial of the case would defeat the plea. At page 282 of 184 Cal., at page 778 of 193 P. the court said: "The rule is also settled that it is not necessary that the plaintiffs have complied with the statute at the time of the commencement of the action; that it is sufficient if they have done so at the time at least when issue as to the matter of abatement is made. California [Savings & Loan] Society v. Harris [111 Cal. 133, 43 P. 525], supra; Ward, etc., Co. v. Mapes [147 Cal. 747, 752, 82 P. 426], supra; Roullard v. Gray, 38 Cal.App. 79, 175 P. 479. We have no hesitation in extending this rule so as to make it sufficient if there be a compliance with the statute before trial upon the issue. It is well settled that a plea by way of abatement of another action pending will be avoided by proof that the other action is no longer pending at the time of trial, although it may have been pending when the plea was made. Collins v. Ramish [182 Cal. 360, 188 P. 550], supra, and authorities there cited. The reasoning of the decisions we have cited, beginning with California, etc., Society v. Harris, holding that in such a case as the present a compliance with the statute is sufficient if accomplished before objection is made that it has not been accomplished, proceeds upon the analogy between such a defense and one of another action pending. We see no reason for not following the analogy throughout and holding that in the case of one, as well as in that of the other, the defense fails if it appear at the time of the trial that the matter of abatement no longer exists. In fact, it would seem difficult to reconcile First Nat. Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 P. 899, with any other view. In that case a judgment in favor of a banking corporation, as plaintiff, had been given, and an appeal was taken on the ground that the defendant had pleaded and proved that the plaintiff had not filed with the county recorder certain statements which it was required by statute to file as a condition of its right to maintain an action. Pending the appeal, the statute imposing the condition was repealed, and this being made to appear to the Supreme Court, it was held that the ground of defense was removed, and the judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed, although the fact that the plaintiff had not complied with the statute plainly appeared. If the removal of the ground of such a defense after judgment is sufficient to justify a disregarding of the defense upon appeal, we can see no reason for not disregarding a very similar defense in the present action, if at the time of trial it appears that the ground for it no longer exists." The failure to publish articles of co-partnership and the suspension of corporate powers, insofar as the maintenance of an action is concerned, are attended by the same penalties or disabilities and no reason suggests itself why any different rule should be applied to one than to the other, and we therefore conclude that the revival of the corporate powers before the trial of the case was sufficient to permit respondent Farm Builders to maintain the action.

[2] Respondents argue that, irrespective of the validity of the deed, there having been a total failure of consideration for the prior deed from the Halls to Farm Builders, the latter held the property as a constructive trustee; that the Halls are therefore the real parties in interest and proper parties plaintiff. Appellants argue that there was no constructive trust because a failure of consideration is not proper grounds for rescission of a conveyance of real property, and rely upon Schott v. Schott, 168 Cal. 342, 143 P. 595, and Williams v. Reich. 123 Cal.App. 128, 10 P.2d 1030. The first of these cases involved a conveyance in consideration of a promise of future support, and the latter a conveyance in consideration of a promise to marry in the future; in neither was fulfillment of the promise expressly made a condition subsequent. These cases, as well as the many decisions in other jurisdictions to the same effect, are quite patently distinguishable from the situation here presented. In this case the conveyance by the Halls to Farm Builders was intended to be concurrent with the issuance to them of the corporate stock; the failure to deliver the stock did not therefore involve a breach of a promise to be performed in the future but, to the contrary, a failure of an implied condition to the validity of the conveyance. This distinction is recognized in Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, at page 133, 20 P. 382, 385, 12 Am. St.Rep. 29, where the court says: "It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff did not contract to convey upon the performance of the contract on the part of the defendants; therefore his promise was not dependent upon theirs * * *." Here the Halls did agree to convey upon issuance of the stock. Therefore their conveyance was dependent upon issuance of the stock.

Appellants do not contend that if the Halls had a right to rescind they are not proper parties; however, they do contend that independent of the question of law just discussed there was no evidence of the facts upon which respondents predicate their argument and no finding by the court that such were the facts. With respect to the lack of a finding appellants are in error. The court did so find in the first paragraph of finding numbered I. In their brief respondents have not indicated any evidence which would support this finding nor have we found such. However, in open court, prior to the introduction of evidence, appellants admitted by stipulation the allegations of paragraph I of the complaint wherein respondent had alleged the transfer from the Halls to Farm Builders and the subsequent revocation of the permit to issue stock, except that portion alleging the execution of the deed from Farm Builders to the Halls. As is above pointed out, the Halls rely upon their equitable interest in the property to maintain the action so that even if it be conceded that the portion of the finding referred to, wherein the court finds that Farm Builders had deeded to the Halls, is entirely lacking in evidentiary support nonetheless the remainder of the finding, which is supported by the admission just referred to, is a sufficient factual basis for respondents' argument in this connection. Though it is true that defendant Title Co. in its answer denied those allegations of the complaint, they did join in the stipulation referred to.

[3, 4] On this phase of the case there remains only the question whether Farm Builders is a proper party plaintiff. Regardless of the effect of the conveyance from Farm Builders to the Halls, if the former were asserting any actual interest there can be no doubt that it would be a proper party defendant. So long as the corporation does not object it can as well be brought before the court as a party plaintiff. California Farm & Fruit Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 744, 91 P. 593. However, the first finding is that the Halls are the owners of the property while the judgment is in favor of the plaintiffs and each of them. The error in awarding plaintiff Farm Builders injunctive relief might be harmless insofar as it would not impose any different or further restrictions on the defendants than the identical judgment in favor of the Halls alone, but the judgment here goes further. The judgment provides that each of the plaintiffs is entitled to have defendant Citizens National Bank perform the duties imposed upon it by the declaration of trust; this provision with respect to Farm Builders is clearly not supported by, and is contrary to the findings of fact, and is therefore error.

As already stated the holding that Pacific States was not the owner of the promissory note involved or of the beneficial interests in the deeds of trust securing the same, is based upon three grounds: (1) that the superintendent of banks had no authority under the Banking Act to execute the transfer; (2) that the notice of hearing of the petition for authority to make the transfer was insufficient; and (3) that the description of the declaration of trust in the order authorizing the transfer was insufficient.

[5, 6] Respondents seek to sustain the first point upon the theory that the authority of the superintendent of banks is limited to those powers contained in the Banking Act, St.1909, p. 87, and that under the Act the superintendent's authority to dispose of assets is limited to a sale thereof. Numerous authorities are cited and lengthy argument is addressed to the contention that this transaction was not a sale. But the appellants do not attempt to sustain the transaction upon the ground that it was a sale. However, we cannot agree with the contention that the authority of the superintendent of banks is so limited. Such a construction of the Act would threaten if not defeat the objectives sought to be accomplished by the provisions for the liquidation of insolvent banks. It may be conceded that in liquidation proceedings the authority of the superintendent of banks emanates entirely from the provisions of the Act but those provisions are to be given a liberal and not a strict construction. Wilson v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.2d 632, 43 P.2d 286; Evans v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 563, 572, 96 P.2d 107. It is true that those cases involved the powers of the commissioner under the Building and Loan Act but no reason is suggested why a different rule of construction should apply here. In fact, in liquidation proceedings the powers conferred by the respective acts are remarkably similar. In applying the same rule of construction to a Banking Act the court in Ex parte Smith, 160 Ky. 83, 169 S.W. 582, 584, said: "The Banking Act confers upon the commissioner extraordinary powers; and it should be given a broad and liberal interpretation."

Section 136 of the Bank Act provides in part as follows: "* * * the superintendent of banks shall have authority to collect all moneys due to such bank and do such other acts as are necessary or expedient to collect, conserve or protect its assets, property and business, and shall proceed to liquidate the affairs thereof as hereinafter provided. * * * The superintendent of banks may sell any real or personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct or approve. * * *

"For the purpose of executing and performing any of the powers and duties hereby conferred upon him, the superintendent of banks may * * * execute, acknowledge and deliver any and all deeds, assignments, releases and other instruments necessary and proper to effectuate any sale of real or personal property or other transaction in connection with the liquidation of said bank * * *." St.1929, p. 471.

In Re Liquidation of Cashmere State Bank, 169 Wash. 258, 13 P.2d 892, in holding that similar general powers authorized the bank examiner to negotiate a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be secured by the bank's assets, in order to obviate the necessity of a forced liquidation of "frozen" assets, the court at page 894 of 13 P.2d, said: "Whatever, therefore, may be reasonably necessary in order to enable the state supervisor of banking to properly function and finally to effect as great and speedy a return as possible, to those entitled thereto, may be said to be included within the preservation and administration of the bank's assets. What is necessary to preserve and administer such assets must necessarily be a matter for the state supervisor to determine in the first instance, subject, however, to the approval of the court." In Lummus Cotton Gin Co. v. Taylor, 188 Ark. 100, 64 S.W.2d 90, it was held, under provisions of a Banking Act almost identical to ours, that the bank commissioner was authorized to exchange notes and other property of an insolvent bank for claims against the bank.

[7] The trial court also found that the notice of the hearing on the petition for authority to execute the assignment to Pacific States was insufficient. Even if it be assumed that notice was required and that the specified notice was not adequate, that fact does not render the order subject to collateral attack. The court by the express terms of the Banking Act had jurisdiction of the liquidation proceedings, so that the language of the court in Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, at page 77, 43 P. 408, at 409, is applicable: "Conceding, however, that the proceeding for confirmation of the sale was irregular, as claimed, and that notice of the sale was not published for the time required by the order of court, yet these irregularities or errors in the exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction would not invalidate the sale nor the administrator's deed to the extent of making them vulnerable to the collateral attack, made upon them in the court below." See, also, Weadon v. Shahen, 50 Cal.App.2d 254, 123 P.2d 88. Moreover, it is doubtful that any notice was required for, as said in Dugger v. Cox, 6 Cir., 110 F.2d 834, 836, where the court was considering similar provisions of the National Bank Act, 12 U.S.C.A. § 192: "The Statute does not contemplate notice to those interested and there are none of the essentials of a controversy, the proceedings lacking judicial characteristics." To the same effect is Fifer v. Williams, 9 Cir., 5 F.2d 286. The last mentioned case is a complete answer to respondents' contention that the proceedings for authority to execute the assignment constituted a trial. The holding of the court was expressly to the contrary.

[8, 9] Nor can the finding of the lower court be sustained upon the ground that the description of the trust instrument was inadequate. The declaration of trust was described by date, the name of the trustee, and the trust number; it may be that a more precise description could have been given but what was in fact given was sufficient to enable the court to identify the property. It should be noted the lower court found that the description in the petition and order was defective. Title did not pass by virtue of the order but by the assignment authorized. In the petition it was sufficient if the description contained reasonable means for identification of the property. For these reasons the lower court was in error in holding that the Pacific States had no interest in the trust instrument, and, since the Pan Am. Bank had parted with its entire interest in the declaration of trust, it is unnecessary to consider appellants' contention that the court erroneously adjudicated its rights thereunder.

[10, 11] The trial court concluded that the Citizens Bank as trustee was without power to declare default under the declaration of trust for failure to pay principal, interest, or taxes, for the reason that any default in respect to those matters could be remedied solely by a sale under the deed of trust. Each of the instruments contains express provisions for a sale in the case of such defaults. No evidence has been alluded to nor has any been found in the transcript concerning the construction of these provisions, nor has authority been cited or found. Having been given to secure the same obligation and as part of the same transaction the two instruments are to be construed together, but all the provisions of each must be given full effect except insofar as they may be completely repugnant. That the two instruments contain cumulative remedies for the same defaults, that is, a sale by either of two different trustees, certainly is not an irreconcilable repugnancy. It may be that the interpretation of the trial court is consistent with the intention of the parties but there being no repugnancy and the provisions for sales being clear and unambiguous there is no room for judicial construction. The finding of the trial court was error.

[12, 13] In support of the findings that appellants are estopped to assert default for periods of twelve months and eighteen months respondents rely upon the amendments of the declaration of trust and the notice of November 13, 1939, from Pacific States to Citizens Bank not to permit sales without the approval of the former. Respondents refer to other "numerous and varied acts of the parties" but, except for the amendments and notice just referred to, these acts did not amount to more than a mere forbearance. The amendments merely reduced the release prices of the various parcels of the property; it may be that by executing the instruments the parties waived past defaults but they cannot, under the guise of an estoppel, be construed to be an extension of the maturity of the note. As said in Rottman v. Hevener, 54 Cal.App. 474, at page 481, 202 P. 329, at page 332: "In taking leave of this question, it may indeed be said that if the doctrine of estoppel were extended to cover a situation such as we have here, it would subvert the salutary rule that a written contract must prevail over previous verbal arrangements, as well as the rule that a written contract can be altered only by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement, and would open wide the door to all the evils which these two rules were intended to prevent." Appellants justify the notice of November 13, 1939, upon the ground that respondents were then in default. Article III, subdivision 4(b) of the declaration of trust provided that the trustee, from moneys received, should pay taxes, and subdivision 4(e) of that article provided for payment of interest. Article IV, subdivision 3 provided: "The Beneficiary (Farm Builders) covenants and agrees to deposit with the Trustee, all sums necessary for the payment of items shown in article III. * * *" Subdivision 4 of the same article reads: "The Beneficiary shall have the privilege of retaining possession of the said Trust property and to have the management and control of the same, so long as there is no default hereunder, * * *." Article V, subdivision 15 contains this condition: "Time is the essence of this Agreement and full performance by the Beneficiary of all its obligations hereunder, is and shall be a condition precedent to its rights to the benefits of this Declaration of Trust." On November 13, 1939, taxes and interest were in default, respondents therefore were not entitled to the benefits of the declaration of trust and the notice of that date did not constitute a breach of the agreement.

[14] Respondents assert that the description of the property in the notice of default and in the notice of sale was defective. The trial court did not so find. Moreover, the reference in each of said instruments to the date and place of record of a deed describing the same property was sufficient. 9 Cal.Jur. 297.

[15] Appellants contend that the judgment against the Title Co. was erroneous because the plaintiffs themselves alleged in their complaint that the Title Co. was not threatening to sell under the deed of trust. It is true that such is the allegation. However, as we have pointed out above, the remedies under the two instruments were cumulative consequently the threat of the beneficiary to require a sale under one was in substance equally a threat to demand a sale under the other. To enjoin a sale under one and not under the other would be an idle act.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the lower court erred in ordering judgment in favor of Farm Builders and in holding that Pacific States Corporation had no interest in the trust instruments; it further erred in holding that no sale under the declaration of trust could be made for failure to pay principal or interest. The findings and evidence are insufficient to support either injunction.

The judgment is reversed.

2. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(3)

As respects right to maintain malicious prosecution action, where justice of peace did not instruct jury to acquit defendant, but dismissed the action, justice was acting under statute providing that a court may order an action or indictment to be dismissed, and not under statute providing that if, at any time after evidence on either side is closed, court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, court may advise jury to acquit defendant. 4. Criminal law 🔑752½

The power of a trial judge to dismiss a criminal action is discretionary. Pen.Code, § 1385.

5. Criminal law 🔑752½

The Legislature in enacting the statute providing that a court may order an action or indictment to be dismissed, and requiring that the reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered on the minutes, did not contemplate that the court in each case should merely enter the words "in furtherance of justice", but contemplated a statement of the reasons for dismissal. Pen. Code, § 1385.

6. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(3)

Where criminal case was dismissed for insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction, the basis of a malicious prosecution action was thereon established as against contention that where termination of a criminal prosecution has been brought about by the procurement of the defendant therein, an action for malicious prosecution cannot be maintained. Pen.Code, § 1385.

7. Indictment and information 🔑125(4)

The statute penalizing the making of electric connections and tampering with electric meters to avoid payment for current, etc., enunciates several distinct offenses, and hence there can be no application of the rule that when a statute enunciates a series of acts, either of which separately or altogether may constitute an offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count. Pen.Code, § 499a.

8. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)

On appeal by plaintiff from judgment of nonsuit in malicious prosecution action at conclusion of plaintiff's opening statement, District Court of Appeal was required to draw all reasonable inferences permitted by the opening statement in favor of plaintiff.

9. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(2, 4)

Where original complaint charged plaintiff with making a connection with defendant's electric lines with intent to defraud by using current without passing through a meter, and amended complaint charged that plaintiff tampered with the meter of defendant, different offenses were charged and conviction on the first complaint did not establish "reasonable cause" for filing the amended complaint and on termination of proceedings on such complaint in plaintiff's favor, facts were sufficient "prima facie" to form the basis of an action for malicious prosecution. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pierson M. Hall, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by William C. Bealmear, also known as Wm. C. Bealmear, against the Southern California Edison Company, Limited, and G. H. Moore. From a judgment or an order of dismissal granting defendants' motion for a nonsuit, the plaintiff appeals.

Order and judgment reversed.

Elbert E. Hensley and John H. Klenke, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Roy V. Reppy, E. W. Cunningham, and R. E. Woodbury, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SCHAUER, Presiding Judge.

[1] Plaintiff in this action for malicious prosecution appeals "from the order of court * * * granting defendants' motion for a non-suit, and from the judgment or order of dismissal * * * granting defendants' motion for a non-suit." The order granting the nonsuit, upon which the "judgment or order of dismissal" was based, was made upon motion of defendants at the conclusion of the opening statement of plaintiff's counsel, before the introduction of any evidence, and, according to its recitals, "on grounds it appears there has not been a final legal determination of the criminal proceedings in favor of defendant prior to commencement of this action." Because either an order of dismissal or an order of nonsuit, entered upon the minutes of the court, constitutes a final judgment from which an appeal may be taken, and since for all purposes of this appeal both orders amount to the same thing (2 Cal.Jur. 158–159, and cases there cited), references hereinafter in this opinion will be to the judgment only.

By allegations in the complaint admitted by defendants' answer it is established that defendants on or about May 14, 1938, in the Justice's Court of San Gabriel Township, charged the plaintiff with having violated section 499a of the Penal Code in that said plaintiff "being the person in charge and control of the premises located at 513 La Merced Road in the City of Wilmar, * * * did wilfully and knowingly, with intent to injure and defraud Southern California Edison Company, Ltd., a corporation, make or cause to be made a connection with an electric wire and electric appliance operated by the Southern California Edison Company, Ltd., a corporation, * * *; and * * * [with similar knowledge and intent] use or cause to be used such connection in such manner as to supply electric current for heat or light or power to an electric lamp or apparatus or device, by and at which electric current for heat or light or power is consumed * * * without passing through a meter * * *." It is further alleged and admitted that defendants on those charges and at that time caused the plaintiff to be arrested, imprisoned for 14 hours, and compelled to give bail.

The plaintiff's complaint further avers in substance, and defendants admit, that some five months later, on October 20, 1938, the defendants caused a second or so-called "amended" complaint to be filed in the same justice's court whereby plaintiff was charged with violation of section 499a of the Penal Code and in which the same specific averments contained in the original complaint were repeated and in addition to which it was charged that plaintiff "did knowingly and wilfully and with intent to defraud said Southern California Edison Company, Ltd., a corporation, alter and procure to be injured and altered an electric meter and obstruct its working and procure the same to be tampered with and injured and did use and cause to be used said electric meter and appliance so tampered with and injured." Whether the so-called "amended" complaint technically constitutes an amended complaint or a new action we need not now determine. Plaintiff's complaint continues with allegations that the "amended" criminal complaint was duly transferred to the Justice's Court of Pasadena Township and that "thereafter between the said 3rd day of November and the 7th day of November, 1938, said case was tried upon its merits, and on the 7th day of November, 1938, after the trial of said cause the said amended complaint was dismissed by the court for insufficiency of the evidence and the plaintiff was acquitted of said crime and his bail exonerated; and said prosecution is wholly and finally ended and determined in favor of this plaintiff." Defendants admit the transfer of the case to the Justice's Court of Pasadena Township and that it was on trial during the period alleged, but deny that plaintiff was acquitted or that the prosecution was ended or determined in favor of plaintiff. The defendants also deny that any charge was made maliciously or without probable cause.

At the opening of the trial in this action plaintiff made an offer of proof including the following facts: that from the year 1934 to a date subsequent to the filing of the criminal charges against him he had resided at 513 La Merced Road, Wilmar, California; that during all of said time the defendant Southern California Edison Company, Ltd., had serviced the premises with electrical current; that it was an old four-room house the wiring system of which was old and had not been changed since its original installation; that plaintiff had complained to the defendant Edison Company that the electric lights flickered, that the radio sometimes would not work, and that his bills were sometimes too high and were irregular; that in March, 1938, prior to the filing of the criminal charge, the defendant company admitted to plaintiff that it had overcharged him; that on April 4, 1938, representatives of the defendant company came into plaintiff's home and searched it and examined the wiring and found nothing irregular but told plaintiff "that they would not bring any charges against him if he would buy an electric range from the Edison Company"; that subsequently a representative of the defendant company threatened on several occasions to have plaintiff arrested if plaintiff did not pay a sum of money to him; that during the month of April, 1938, plaintiff had his house rewired in compliance with the request of the defendant company and a new meter was installed by the company; that the defendant company endeavored to coerce plaintiff into buying an electric range. On May 14, 1938, a Saturday, plaintiff was arrested in the evening and confined in jail until the following morning; in June, 1938, plaintiff was tried before a jury on the charges filed and was found guilty; on appeal to the Appellate Department of the Superior Court the judgment of conviction was reversed; thereafter the complaint "was dismissed upon motion of the District Attorney for the purpose of filing an amended complaint." (The substance of such so-called amended complaint is hereinabove set forth.) A change of venue was requested, the case transferred to the Justice's Court of Pasadena Township and after trial on November 3 to 7, 1938, the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. Hensley: If your Honor please, on behalf of the defendant, I want to at this time move to dismiss this complaint and charge on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to establish the charge. (Argument to the Court on motion)

"The Court: Well, I feel that the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant has committed this crime.

"Mr. Hunt: Well, I never quarrel with the Court when the Court arrives at his decision.

"The Court: Well, the Court feeling in this matter that the evidence is insufficient to show the defendant guilty of this crime, the matter will be dismissed."

A minute order of dismissal was then entered, the defendant was discharged, and his bail was exonerated.

Upon conclusion of the foregoing summarized opening statement defendants moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "1. That there was no final and legal termination of the said criminal cause upon the amended complaint in favor of the plaintiff and therefore, an essential element for an action for malicious prosecution was entirely absent. 2. That there was a conviction on the original complaint which is a complete defense as it conclusively shows probable cause for the criminal prosecution under both the original and the amended complaints."

Upon each of the two grounds above stated defendants urge that the judgment of nonsuit was properly entered. We conclude that the nonsuit could have been properly granted upon neither of such grounds and that the judgment appealed from must be reversed.

[2] Defendants' chief argument in support of their first ground for nonsuit is that by the terms of section 1118 of the Penal Code, the justice of the peace of Pasadena Township was without power to dismiss the "amended" criminal complaint against plaintiff herein because of insufficiency of the evidence. Section 1118 of the Penal Code provides that "If, at any time after the evidence on either side is closed, the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit the defendant. But the jury are not bound by the advice," and it has been several times stated by our courts that this section does not empower the court to arbitrarily direct the jury to acquit the defendant (People v. Stoll (1904), 143 Cal. 689, 691, 77 P. 818; People v. Roberts (1896), 114 Cal. 67, 68, 45 P. 1016; People v. Daniels (1894), 105 Cal. 262, 266, 38 P. 720). The difficulty with defendants' proposition on this point is that the justice of the peace was not acting under section 1118 of the Penal Code. He did not advise or instruct the jury to acquit the defendant; he dismissed the action. It seems apparent to us that in so dismissing the criminal complaint the justice was acting under the terms of section 1385 of the Penal Code which provides that "The court may, either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney, and in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes."

[3-5] Although the above quoted section 1385 does not specifically contemplate a motion by a defendant on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, or any other ground, practicality suggests that the court in acting on its own motion "in furtherance of justice" must in some way have its attention brought to the facts which impel its action. Whether the trial judge on his own initiative engages in inquiry which brings the facts to his attention and then of his own volition orders a dismissal, or whether the district attorney makes the application, or whether a suggestion is made by the defendant, seems relatively inconsequential. If and when a trial judge determines that the circumstances are in fact such that it will be in furtherance of justice in any particular case for him to assume the grave responsibility to the people of his jurisdiction of ordering a criminal action dismissed it is not only his prerogative but his duty to make such order. It is a discretionary power, the use of which entails consideration of all pertinent facts (see Gossman v. Gossman (1942), 52 Cal.App.2d 184, 126 P.2d 178), but within the limits of judicial discretion the legislature has left it to the trial judge to determine what particular facts constitute reasons warranting the dismissal (People v. Disperati (1909), 11 Cal. App. 469, 476, 105 P. 617; People v. Superior Court (1921), 53 Cal.App. 185, 199 P. 840; People v. Martin (1924), 70 Cal.App. 271, 276, 233 P. 85; Wilson v. Troy (1937), 19 Cal.App.2d 156, 158, 64 P.2d 1141). The legislature in enacting section 1385 and requiring that "The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes" certainly did not contemplate that the court in each such case should merely enter the words "in furtherance of justice." A statement of the reasons, in the opinion of the court, why a dismissal in a particular case would be in furtherance of justice, is rather what was contemplated. It is difficult to conceive of any more appropriate or compelling reason than that the evidence is legally insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty.

Defendants advance also the argument that where the termination of a criminal prosecution or civil action has been brought about by the procurement of defendant therein an action for malicious prosecution cannot be maintained and cite, among others, the cases of Holliday v. Holliday (1898), 123 Cal. 26, 35, 55 P. 703, and Paskle v. Williams (1931), 214 Cal. 482, 484, 6 P.2d 505.

We are of the opinion, however, that the case of Jaffe v. Stone (1941) 18 Cal.2d 146, 114 P.2d 335, 135 A.L.R. 775, provides a conclusive answer to the above stated contention and also to the defendants' general proposition that there was no final legal termination of the criminal proceedings in favor of plaintiff. In that case the plaintiff (in the malicious prosecution suit) alleged that after being arrested under a complaint charging him with grand theft, a felony, he moved at the preliminary hearing for dismissal of the proceeding on the ground that there was no evidence to prove his guilt, and that the motion was granted and the proceedings dismissed. It was held that such dismissal satisfied the requirement of a final and favorable termination of the proceeding sufficient to support an action for malicious prosecution, the court stating (18 Cal.2d page 150, 114 P.2d page 338, 135 A.L.R. 775):

"If it [the dismissal] is of such a nature as to indicate the innocence of the accused, it is a favorable termination sufficient to satisfy the requirement. If, however, the dismissal is on technical grounds, for procedural reasons, or for any other reason not inconsistent with his guilt, it does not constitute a favorable termination. * * * [18 Cal.2d page 151, 114 P.2d page 338] On the other hand, where the prosecuting officials press the charge before the committing magistrate, the accused does not seek improperly to prevent a fair hearing, and the complaint is dismissed for failure to produce a case against the defendant, there is a favorable termination sufficient to form the basis of a tort action. * * *

"[18 Cal.2d page 152, 114 P.2d page 339] In stating the requirement of termination, courts often say that the proceeding must be 'finally' terminated. Such a statement is entirely accurate if the ordinary reasonable meaning of the words is taken. The proceeding must be finally terminated; that is, the particular criminal proceeding commencing, for example, by complaint and arrest, must have passed through some such stage as preliminary hearing and dismissal, or trial and acquittal or abandonment by the prosecuting authorities. When this has occurred, that proceeding is finally terminated. If the termination was such as not to constitute a bar to a new prosecution, the accused may be charged and tried again for the same offense; but this will be a new proceeding, with a new court number, new pleadings, new judge and jury, and a new judgment.

"[18 Cal.2d page 156, 114 P.2d page 341] * * * It is immaterial whether the termination is a bar to any further prosecution for the same offense, or whether the accused may be charged and tried anew. Only if the new proceeding is already instituted can the accused be precluded from suing for malicious prosecution."

[6] In the case now before us the dismissal was for insufficiency of the evidence to justify a conviction, or, as expressed in the Jaffe case, for "failure to produce a case against the defendant," the particular criminal proceeding was finally terminated, and the basis of a malicious prosecution action was thereupon established (see also Miller v. Lee (1942), 52 Cal.App.2d 10, 125 P.2d 627).

Defendants' second ground urged in support of the nonsuit—that the conviction on the first criminal complaint, even though reversed on appeal, established probable cause for the prosecution under the "amended" complaint (see Roos v. Harris (1928), 203 Cal. 201, 202, 263 P. 225; Carpenter v. Sibley (1908), 153 Cal. 215, 217, 94 P. 879, 15 L.R.A.,N.S., 1143, 126 Am.St. Rep. 77, 15 Ann.Cas. 484; Holliday v. Holliday (1898), supra, 123 Cal. 26, 32, 55 P. 703; Norton v. John M. C. Marble Co. (1939), 30 Cal.App.2d 451, 454, 86 P.2d 892) —is answered, as pointed out by plaintiff, by an analysis of section 499a of the Penal Code, violation of which was charged by both the original and the "amended" criminal complaints. Four different crimes are there created (all predicated in part on the guilty knowledge and intent therein specified): (1) to "make or cause to be made any connection * * * with any electric wire or electric appliance * * *"; (2) to "use or cause to be used any such connection * * *"; (3) to "injure, alter or procure to be injured or altered any electric meter * * *"; and (4) to "use or cause to be used any electric meter, or appliance so tampered with or injured * * *." The original criminal complaint charged plaintiff herein with knowingly and with intent to defraud defendant Southern California Edison Company making or causing to be made and using or causing to be used a connection with an electric wire and electric appliance operated by the defendant Southern California Edison Company, Ltd., and on reversing the judgment of conviction under such complaint the Appellate Department of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County rendered the following memorandum opinion: "The defendant is not charged with tampering with or injuring the meter on his premises or with using such meter knowing that the same had been tampered with or injured; he is charged with making, or causing to be made, and using a connection with an electric wire, so that electric current would be consumed 'without passing through a meter'. The evidence is wholly insufficient to establish that any connection was so made on defendant's premises that Electric current was consumed therein without passing through the meter. The evidence tending to show that some current passed through the meter without registering therein is not at all the equivalent of proof that the current was consumed without passing through the meter. The statute does not declare it to be an offense merely to use electric current which has passed through a meter which is not registering. The judgment is reversed and cause remanded * * * for a new trial." The "amended" complaint thereafter filed charged plaintiff herein, in addition to the charges set out in the original complaint, with altering and procuring to be injured and altered an electric meter and obstructing its working and procuring it to be tampered with and injured and using and causing to be used said electric meter so tampered with and injured.

Defendants argue that but a single crime is defined by section 499a of the Penal Code, that both the original and the "amended" criminal complaint charged the same crime, that the "amended" complaint made good a defect in the original complaint, and that "the filing of the amended complaint therefore operated not as the beginning of a new prosecution but only as a continuation of the prosecution instituted by the filing of the original complaint." In support of this view numerous cases are cited to the effect that "when a statute enunciates a series of acts, either of which separately or all together may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that notwithstanding each act may, by itself, constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense." (See 14 Cal.Jur. 61; People v. Frank (1865), 28 Cal. 507, 513; People v.

Harrold (1890), 84 Cal. 567, 568, 24 P. 106; People v. Leyshon (1895), 108 Cal. 440, 442, 41 P. 480; People v. Gusti (1896), 113 Cal. 177, 45 P. 263; People v. McClennegen (1925), 195 Cal. 445, 452, 234 P. 91; People v. Horiuchi (1931), 114 Cal.App. 415, 427, 300 P. 457.)

[7] With this general principle of law we are in full accord, but it does not apply where, as here, the statute enunciates several different and distinct offenses, rather than merely a series of acts constituting the offense. The situation here is similar to that in People v. Plath (1913), 166 Cal. 227, 135 P. 954, and to that in Ex parte Roberts (1910), 157 Cal. 472, 108 P. 315, in both of which cases section 337a of the Penal Code, relating to gambling by pool-selling, bookmaking, bets, and wagers, was analyzed by our Supreme Court and found to declare several distinct crimes. It is to be noted that at the time Ex parte Roberts, supra, was decided section 337a comprised but a single sentence, as does section 499a, here in question. Nevertheless, the court there declared, 157 Cal. at page 474, 108 P. at page 315: "Although comprising but a single sentence, section 337a of the Penal Code creates many distinct offenses. It begins by the phrase 'every person,' [as does section 499a], and each subsequent clause is connected therewith by appropriate punctuation. It is written in the disjunctive throughout, and the several offenses therein described are apparently as distinct and independent of each other as if they had been enacted in separate sections." In further clarification of this distinction it should be here pointed out that People v. Frank, supra, People v. Harrold, supra, and People v. Leyshon, supra, all involved construction of the statute defining the crime of forgery (Pen.Code, sec. 470), which statute declares that "Every person who * * * [does any one of a series of acts] is guilty of forgery." Thus it was a statute enunciating a series of acts constituting but one offense which was there analyzed, rather than, as here, a statute defining several distinct offenses. Upon individual scrutiny the other cases advanced by defendants in support of their second ground for nonsuit are found to be equally inapplicable here.

[8] It is to be remembered that this appeal comes to us from a judgment of nonsuit; that in considering it all reasonable inferences permitted by the opening statement must be drawn in favor of plaintiff; and that our ruling herein does not preclude, but rather tends to require, trial on the merits as to whether probable cause did or did not exist for the making of the charges by defendants (Sebastian v. Crowley (1940), 38 Cal.App.2d 194, 203, 101 P.2d 120; Perry v. Washington National Ins. Co. (1936), 14 Cal.App.2d 609, 616, 58 P.2d 701, 59 P.2d 158; Haydel v. Morton (1935), 8 Cal.App.2d 730, 733, 48 P.2d 709).

[9] We conclude that the second (so-called amended) criminal complaint, in addition to reiterating the offense charged in the first complaint after the evidence had been held insufficient to establish it, set forth new and independent charges; that the conviction on the first complaint, under the circumstances shown here, does not alone establish reasonable cause for the filing of the new complaint; that the proceeding on the new complaint was finally terminated in favor of plaintiff, and hence that the facts admitted by the pleadings augmented by those set forth in plaintiff's opening statement, are sufficient prima facie to form the basis of an action for malicious prosecution. The orders and the judgment appealed from are reversed.

Original proceeding by Edna M. Ringel for a writ of mandate to compel the Superior Court of Alameda County and T. W. Harris, Judge thereof, to enter a final decree of divorce nunc pro tunc.

Writ granted.

Charles H. Seccombe, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ralph E. Hoyt, Dist. Atty., J. Frank Coakley, Chief Asst. Dist. Atty., R. Robert Hunter, Asst. Dist. Atty., and J. D. Cooper, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

[1] Plaintiff seeks a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to enter a final decree of divorce nunc pro tunc as of April 2, 1932. Though an answer was filed to the petition it raised no real issue, and, since it was submitted without proof, the cause will be treated as before us on the petition which we will treat as not controverted, as though submitted upon demurrer.

From the petition and the affidavit of petitioner filed with the application in the superior court it appears that on April 2, 1931, an interlocutory decree of divorce was duly entered in the cause entitled Clyde Ringel v. Edna M. Ringel, and then pending in the respondent court. "By mistake, negligence, and inadvertence" a final decree was not entered at the expiration of one year thereafter, or at all, but in October, 1934, the petitioner herein, believing that a final decree had theretofore been entered, married Ellis A. Jones. In April, 1942, Jones applied for an annulment of this marriage on the grounds that the final decree of divorce had not been entered prior to the second marriage. It also appears that there is no community property of the parties to the second marriage, and that the two minor children under the care and custody of the petitioner herein are the issue of the first marriage.

On May 11, 1942, the petitioner applied to the respondent for the entry of a final decree to be dated and filed nunc pro tunc as of the date she was entitled to have a final decree entered. Her application was denied upon grounds which have not been stated.

[2] Her right to a final decree is statutory. Section 132 of the Civil Code. When there has been no reconciliation, and no facts occurring subsequent to the entry of the interlocutory decree showing fraud or mistake, the provisions of the section are mandatory. 9 Cal.Jur. p. 767; Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 P. 897; Keller v. Keller, 122 Cal.App. 712, 10 P.2d 541.

[3] Petitioner rests her case upon section 133 of the Civil Code as amended in 1935 and which reads in part: "Whenever either of the parties in a divorce action is, under the law, entitled to a final judgment, but by mistake, negligence or inadvertence the same has not been signed, filed or entered" the court may cause a final judgment to be entered as of the date when the same could have been given or made if applied for. The historical background of this legislation and the reasons for its enactment are considered in Macedo v. Macedo, 29 Cal. App.2d 387, at page 391, 84 P.2d 552, at page 554, where the court said: "The act is both curative and remedial, and the retroactive operation of such statute should be given effect unless it disturbs some vested right or impairs the obligation of some contract. Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 P.

352; 1 Kent's Comm. 455." The Macedo case is decisive of all the points raised by respondent relating to the interpretation of the statute.

[4] It is not denied here that there are no property rights involved, and there are no equitable grounds upon which the denial of the application could be founded. Upon the authority of the cases cited the prevailing party is "entitled to a final judgment" under section 133 of the code when the time has expired after entry of the interlocutory decree and no grounds have arisen in the intervening period—such as fraud, mistake, or equitable considerations—which would justify a denial of the application. The authorities uniformly hold that when such conditions arise the court should not enter a final decree, but they are all in accord that the prevailing party is entitled to the decree when none of these conditions does exist.

Let a writ issue as prayed.

STURTEVANT and SPENCE, JJ., concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Albert Picard and Francis McCarty, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

William P. Caubu, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendants in an action for breach of a building contract.

The contract is in the printed form used generally by building contractors in San Francisco; it is dated October 5, 1939, and provides that plaintiff "within the space of one hundred twenty working days from and after the date of recording this contract" (emphasis ours) furnish labor and materials and complete the construction of three buildings on a certain parcel of land owned by defendants, for which he was to receive the sum of $26,490. The above italicized words were not a part of the printed form, but were typed therein. The contract was never recorded, and no construction work was ever commenced.

The defendants, while admitting the execution of the contract, set up as a special defense and answer to the allegations of the complaint, and also as a separate answer and defense to the whole thereof, a collateral agreement which they stated was entered into between the parties contemporaneously with the contract and was to the effect that it was necessary to finance the building operation, which was to be done through the facilities of the Federal Housing Administration, and that unless a total minimum of $25,200 could be obtained from this source, the construction should not proceed and the contract should not be operative or effective.

It appears that a preliminary application for a loan from the F. H. A. was made through a local bank about September 10th. On October 6th, the day following the date of the contract, formal application was made in an amount of $33,000. The plans and specifications accompanying the application were prepared by an architect proposed by plaintiff and were in accordance with requirements of the F. H. A. The record shows that $99 to accompany the application was advanced by the defendants on that date to cover costs. The building department of the bank thereafter recommended that $30,000 only be applied for, and the application in this amount was finally delivered to the F. H. A. on October 13th.

The special defense also sets forth that being advised by the F. H. A., on October 25th, that it would make a construction loan in an amount not exceeding $21,000, the defendants so informed the plaintiff, who agreed that by reason thereof the contract was at an end.

Around November 1st, the architect for the proposed building operation demanded settlement by defendants of his fees for work done—thus presumably recognizing that his services were at an end—and was subsequently paid.

On January 5, 1940, plaintiff through his attorney made a formal offer and tender to proceed with the construction of the buildings under the terms of the contract, and advised defendants that unless they immediately proceeded with such construction an action would be brought against them for damages for breach of the contract.

The court found that the facts set up in the special defense were true; that the contract did not become effective; that following the decision of the F. H. A. to loan less than the $25,200 the plaintiff agreed with defendants that the contract was at an end.

Plaintiff admits that he understood that financing was to be arranged through the F. H. A., but that it was his understanding the defendants would furnish any additional amount necessary to complete construction. He contends that the court found that facts admitted by the pleadings were not true; that parol evidence of terms and conditions of a contract is not admissible where the contract has been reduced to writing; and that its terms cannot be changed or varied by parol testimony, or by extrinsic evidence.

Defendants contend that the parol testimony did not seek to change or vary the terms of the written instrument but to show a condition precedent to its going into effect, its conditional delivery, and an explanation of what the parties intended by the typed words "the date of recording this contract" in the printed form.

[1-4] It is a fundamental rule of contract law that when the understanding of parties has been reduced to writing, all contemporaneous negotiations and intentions are deemed merged in the instrument, which should ordinarily be deemed the measure of the rights and liabilities of the parties. The execution of the instrument in writing supersedes all oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter preceding or accompanying such execution. Alameda County Title Ins. Co. v. Panella, 218 Cal. 510, 24 P.2d 163; San Francisco Milling Co. v. Frye & Co., 2 Cal.App.2d 563, 38 P.2d 165. The general rule is that oral agreements will not be permitted to change the express written provisions of a contract. However, should the taking effect of the contract, or any of its provisions, be contingent upon the happening of a future event, parol evidence may be admitted to show the cause of its non-performance either in whole or in part. This may necessitate the admission in evidence of a preceding or contemporaneous oral agreement.

In Gleeson v. Dunn, 113 Cal.App. 347, 350, 351, 298 P. 119, 121, the court quoted with approval from Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U.S. 228, 14 S.Ct. 816, 38 L.Ed. 698: "'"The error was in applying to the case the familiar and well-established rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary a written contract. A written contract must be in force as a binding obligation to make it subject to this rule. Such a contract cannot become a binding obligation until it has been delivered. Its delivery may be absolute or conditional. If the latter, then it does not become a binding obligation until the condition upon which its delivery depends has been fulfilled."'" P. A. Smith Co. v. Muller, 201 Cal. 219, 256 P. 411; Harper v. French, 29 Cal.App. 2d 214, 84 P.2d 216; Wolters v. King, 119 Cal. 172, 51 P. 35; Cooper v. Cooper, 3 Cal.App.2d 154, 39 P.2d 820; Restatement of the Law, Contracts, sec. 241, p. 340; 3 Williston on Contracts, sec. 634, p. 1822; IX Wigmore on Evidence, 3d Ed., sec. 2410, p. 30.

In Davis etc. Co. v. Advance, etc., Wks., Inc., 38 Cal.App.2d 270, 100 P.2d 1067; Hanrahan-Wilcox Corp. v. Jenison M. Co., 23 Cal.App.2d 642, 73 P.2d 1241, and Big Boy D. Corp., Ltd., v. Etheridge, 44 Cal. App.2d 114, 111 P.2d 953, cases cited by appellant, there is nothing inconsistent with the views herein expressed. In the Davis case, upon a plea for reformation of a contract upon the basis of mutual mistake, evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement not inconsistent with the terms of the writing was admissible since it covered a matter upon which the writing was silent. In the Hanrahan-Wilcox case the oral agreement was held to be inconsistent and contrary to the provisions of the written contract. In the Etheridge case, the contract was complete in itself without resort to extrinsic evidence.

[5] In the present case, labor, materials, etc., were to be furnished and the construction completed "within the space of one hundred twenty working days from and after the date of recording this contract." Since the contract was never recorded—and obviously for some good reason, particularly considering the manner of the insertion of the typed words—there was no effective date of commencement or completion of the work.

The reason for the non-performance of the contract was a material issue. If the evidence in this respect showed a condition precedent in the form of an oral contract, before the happening of which the contract, even though executed and delivered, was to have no legal life or binding effect, such evidence, under the authorities cited, is admissible. The parol evidence here is not directed toward any interference with the manifest meaning of the contract as evidenced by its wording, but was admitted for the purpose of showing that a condition precedent to the going into effect of the obligations thereof had not arisen. The indefiniteness of the provision relating to the recording of the contract indicates that the parties contemplated its recordation subsequent to that of the mortgage or deed of trust given to secure a loan by the F. H. A., so that any mechanics' liens arising from the contract would be secondary to such indebtedness.

That plaintiff knew that the performance of the contract was contingent upon the obtaining of a F. H. A. loan is demonstrated by his preparation and delivery to the bank of specifications as required by the former. The evidence is sufficient to show that plaintiff knew what financial arrangements were to be completed before the contract became effective. There was testimony by one of the defendants as follows:

"Q. Now, was any discussion had as to the amount of money that would be necessary to be obtained from the F. H. A. before you could proceed with the buildings? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How much? A. $8,500.00 [for each of three buildings].

"Q. $8,500.00? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what did you say to Mr. Paratore about that? A. Well, I said if we could obtain $8,500.00 we were willing to go ahead with the buildings, and if we couldn't obtain that, why, we just couldn't go ahead.

"Q. In other words, you couldn't finance it? A. No, we did not have the money to finance it.

"Q. Now, what was the amount of the commitment? You learned of the commitment from the Federal Housing, didn't you? A. $7,000.00."

The court found against plaintiff as to there being any foundation for his claim that he understood the defendants were willing to furnish any additional cash not procurable from the F. H. A.

[6] It appears from the record that the trial court erred in several of the findings, in that they were not supported by the evidence, or, as to matters admitted by the answer and stipulated to be true, found by the findings to be untrue. Manifest as that fact is, it is also true that the challenged findings are immaterial. Having determined that there was another agreement which operated to terminate the written contract on the nonhappening of the condition precedent, those findings were unnecessary to the judgment rendered. The error therefore is not prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Sam Peri and others against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation and others for injuries sustained in a collision between an automobile and a train. From a judgment for plaintiffs, named defendant appeals.

Reversed with directions.

Lyndol L. Young and Forrest F. Murray, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Blackwood and Samuel P. Young, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

In this action for damages for personal injuries, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion in the alternative form for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

Briefly the facts are as follows: Plaintiffs were guests in an automobile which collided with the fourth car of defendant's freight train of thirty-two cars which was crossing the highway. The accident occurred at night during a heavy fog. The train was traveling about four miles per hour; the automobile, according to plaintiffs' witnesses, about fifteen miles. Visibility was poor.

It is appellant's contention, "that the presence of the train, the engine and three and one-half cars of which had already entered and passed over Atlantic Boulevard, was only a remote condition of the accident and not a proximate cause thereof, and that the sole proximate cause of the plaintiffs' injuries was the negligent act of Mr. Guida, the driver of the automobile, in attempting to drive his automobile upon a railroad crossing which at the same time was being occupied by a passing train. * * *" It is argued, therefore, that the evidence fails to show any actionable negligence on the part of defendant, hence the action of the trial court was error.

It is respondents' contention, on the contrary, that there was "ample and sufficient evidence of defendant's negligence to support the verdicts in the following particulars:

"(1) No bell or whistle of the train was sounded as it approached or was crossing the arterial highway.

"(2) Neither the bell nor the light of the wigwag at the crossing was operating as the train approached and crossed said place.

"(3) Visibility being limited to 5 feet to 15 feet for dark objects, but 35 feet to 50 feet for lighted objects, at the time the dark, unlighted, long train of cars was slowly and silently crossing the dark main highway, the failure to put out a lighted lamp or flare on the road was negligent was a question for the jury, especially where there was a crew of five men on the train, four of whom at all times mentioned were, and remained, on the locomotive, although only two men were needed there, and the fifth man was on top of the last car with a lamp in his hand; and, moreover, the jury had the right to believe that the wigwag was not working and that the crew on the engine knew and saw it was not operating, as they began and were crossing the highway." (Italics included.)

With regard to the evidence in support of respondents' contention it is pointed out, quoting from their brief, that "Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to respondents, the record shows:

"Neither the bell nor whistle of the locomotive was sounded as it approached the crossing, or as it was crossing the highway. The wigwag signal was neither ringing nor lighted at any time during the approach of or crossing of the train. The automobile in which plaintiffs were riding approached the crossing at approximately 10 to 15 miles per hour, the driver bending over the wheel, looking out of the window for objects ahead of him. The visibility of dark objects ahead was from 5 to 10 feet, and of lighted objects from 35 to 50 feet. Plaintiffs and the driver of the automobile were familiar with the crossing and knew that a wigwag signal was maintained at the crossing and would begin ringing and become lighted when a train was at least several hundred feet from, and approaching, the highway, and continue to so operate while the train was crossing the highway, and they were looking for this light and listening for the bell as they approached this crossing, but the light was not lit and the bell was not ringing. When the automobile was about 15 feet from the tracks, upon which the box cars were traveling, the driver saw a side of a box car ahead of him and immediately swerved his automobile to his right and applied his brakes, but could not stop his automobile in time to avoid colliding with one of the box cars. * * *"

Respondents rely in particular on Harper v. Northwestern Pac. R. Co., 34 Cal. App.2d 451, 93 P.2d 821, and Mallett v. Southern Pac. Co., 20 Cal.App.2d 500, 68 P.2d 281, and from them, as well as others, argues that, "It follows from the foregoing authorities that if the wigwag signal was not working (and the jury must be presumed to have accepted plaintiffs' testimony to this effect) then it was the duty of the defendant to give some other adequate warning signal of the approach of the train, and its failure to perform this duty was the proximate cause of the accident." (Italics added.)

Referring to respondents' recital of the evidence, as quoted, appellant comments as follows: "Under the heading 'Review of the Testimony' respondents set forth their incorrect version of the evidence and cite certain references to the reporter's transcript in support thereof. Both are misleading and incorrect. The statement that neither the bell nor the whistle of the locomotive were sounded as it approached the crossing and the further statement that the wigwag signal was neither lighted nor ringing at any time during the approach of or the crossing of the train, is directly contrary to the substantial and preponderating evidence. * * *"

The fact is that, with regard to the question as to whether the "wigwag" was operating, or the bell and whistle of the locomotive were sounded, the record reveals the evidence to be conflicting.

Notwithstanding repeated reference in the briefs to the asserted omissions of defendant company with regard to its duty as the train approached the crossing, a consideration of that subject is of no help in determining the question herein presented. That question, and it is the sole question, may be summed up in a few words, viz: Is there any evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the defendant company was negligent in the operation of the train at the time the accident occurred, and if so, was such negligence the proximate cause of the alleged damage?

[1] Manifestly, since the accident occurred after a part of the train had passed and while the remainder was crossing the highway, what occurred before is beside the issue. The duties and responsibilities of defendant company are entirely different under two such different situations.

The facts in the case at bar are somewhat similar to the facts in Dunlap v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 12 Cal.App.2d 473, 476, 55 P.2d 894, 895. There the court declared as follows:

"Appellant earnestly insists that it was a debatable question of fact, upon which reasonable minds might disagree, as to whether or not the defendant railway company was negligent in running its cars across the highway on a dark and foggy night without providing a flagman, red flares, or some other means of warning to travelers at the intersection; but the authorities seem to hold that railway companies, through their agents, in the reasonable management of their trains which are rightfully upon a crossing, are not chargeable with knowledge that an automobile, bearing headlights of sufficient power to enable the driver to avoid an obstruction in the road, was nevertheless likely to crash into a moving train unless a danger signal or flagman with a lighted lantern was stationed in the highway. Gage v. Boston & M. R. Co., 77 N.H. 289, 90 A. 855, L.R.A.1915A, 363.

"In the instant case the defendant's cars were rightfully occupying the crossing, and the trainmen were exercising due care, so far as the management of the train in approaching and passing over the crossing was concerned.

"The accident was not caused by the train running into the automobile in which the deceased was riding, but by the automobile running into defendant's freight train as the latter was slowly passing over the crossing. It was not occasioned by any mismanagement of the train. In the case of Mabray v. Union Pac. R. Co., D.C., 5 F.Supp. 397, 400, it was held that a railroad company has a right to occupy a crossing in the conduct and operation of its business, and that such obstruction is in itself notice of danger, so that the railroad company is not bound to give any further warning; and that, after a train has reached a crossing, the duty of a flagman ends as to that train, since then the train itself is a sufficient warning. This doctrine also finds support in 52 Cor. Jur., p. 189, and Brown v. Southern Ry. Co. (Pennington v. Southern Ry. Co.) [5 Cir.], 61 F.2d 399.

"No question of the giving of a warning of the approaching train is here involved, because at the time of the accident the engine had passed the crossing and was several hundred feet north thereof. 'All crossing signals are intended to protect the traveler against approaching trains and have been so regarded by our courts.' Mabray v. Union Pac. R. Co., supra" (Italics included.)

In both the Harper case and the Mallett case, supra, relied on by the respondents as hereinbefore noted, the court specifically distinguishes the Dunlap case.

[2-4] Respondents' contention "That the failure to put out a lighted lamp or flare on the road was negligent was a question for the jury," is without merit. The authority to regulate such matters is vested in the Railroad Commission. The regulations established by the commission contain no such requirement. Obviously, the trial jury was without power to establish such a requirement and then for the failure to have complied therewith, find, in effect, such failure to have been negligence. Moreover, as pointed out in the Dunlap case, supra, railway companies are not chargeable with knowledge that an automobile is likely to be driven into the side of a moving train. Unless required to do so by ordinance or otherwise, the weight of authority sustains the proposition that the failure to maintain or use signals in the circumstances is not negligence. Manifestly, the lawful operation of a railway train is not negligence per se. The evidence reveals no act or omission on the part of the defendant company that constituted negligence under the law, which can be held to have been the proximate cause of the alleged damage.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed with directions to enter judgment for defendant.

SCHOTTKY, Justice pro tem.

Appellant was administrator of the estate of his father, Chris Norgard. He filed a claim against the estate which claim set forth in substance that on February 5, 1938, claimant owed said Chris Norgard the sum of $1,866.44 on a promissory note, and that on said date said Chris Norgard stated to, and agreed with claimant that if the latter would take care of the business affairs of said Chris Norgard, under the latter's instructions from that date "until the date of the death of Chris Norgard," the claimant would be paid for such service the full amount due on said note at the date of the death of Chris Norgard, plus the actual and necessary expense incurred by claimant in looking after said business affairs; that it was mutually agreed between claimant and said Chris Norgard that in consideration of the promise of claimant so to do, on the date of the death of Chris Norgard, said promissory note would be considered canceled; that claimant did take care of the business affairs of Chris Norgard until the latter's death which occurred on September 5, 1938, and in so doing, incurred and paid out certain expenses enumerated in the claim. The claim then concludes: "Claimant therefore claims the sum of $1866.44 with interest thereon from February 15th, 1938, plus the sum of $311.10 as aforesaid, all from the estate of Chris Norgard, deceased."

The claim was presented to the judge of the court and rejected by him, and appellant thereupon filed suit against the estate, and the judge of the court appointed attorneys to represent the estate in the litigation, all in accordance with section 703 of the Probate Code.

The foregoing facts are substantially set forth in the complaint. Count 1 of the complaint is based upon that portion of the claim which seeks the amount of the promissory note plus expenses incurred by Elmer Norgard, and count 2 is based upon their agreement that if plaintiff would perform said services for Chris Norgard from the 5th day of February, 1938, to the date of the death of Chris Norgard, that at the date of the death of Chris Norgard said promissory note would be considered canceled and paid in full.

Defendant estate filed an answer admitting the indebtedness from appellant to deceased, and denying the other material allegations of the complaints for lack of information or belief, and a special defense to each count was interposed that the agreement was not in writing, and was therefore invalid and barred by the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure and subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code. A cross-complaint was also filed seeking to recover on the promissory note from appellant to deceased. Appellant filed an answer to the cross-complaint in which he claimed that said promissory note had been paid in full, "as more fully appears by the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint on file herein, which allegations are hereby referred to and incorporated herein," said answer concluding with the following prayer: "Wherefore, said cross defendant prays that cross complainant take nothing herein and that the prayer of plaintiff's complaint on file herein be granted, and for such other and further order and judgment as may be proper in the premises."

Prior to the time of the trial, defendant estate filed a dismissal of the cross-complaint with the clerk of the court.

The action went to trial, and when appellant attempted to testify as to the conversation and agreement with deceased, objection was made upon two grounds: One, that the contract set forth in his claim was within the statute of frauds (subd. 6 of § 1973, Code Civ.Proc.); and two, that under subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, appellant could not testify as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of the deceased. These objections were sustained by the court.

Artie Norgard, a daughter of appellant, was called as a witness, and testified that she heard a conversation between Chris Norgard and appellant on the 5th day of February, 1938, wherein Chris Norgard stated to appellant that if the latter would come up when he wanted him to come, and manage his business until he got better, that he would consider the rest of the note paid, and that he would also pay appellant for his expenses in running back and forth, to which appellant agreed.

Isabell Daugherty, a witness called by plaintiff, testified that she saw Chris Norgard in bed at Eureka in the latter part of June, 1938; that he was ill and in bed at that time; and that at that time, in a conversation with Mr. Norgard, the latter stated that appellant was taking care of his business, and that appellant owed him some money and he was going to let him work it out by taking care of his business until he was able to take care of it himself.

Gertrude Tethrow, a witness called by appellant, testified that she was Chris Norgard's nurse for several months prior to his death, and that Chris Norgard told her appellant would take care of his business because appellant had full charge of all of it, and that he and appellant had fixed it up about this note of $1,866.44, and that he and appellant had squared the bill and just called it a square deal for appellant to take care of his business for him.

Appellant was then granted permission to file an amended complaint, and appellant filed an amendment to complaint, in which counts 1 and 2 were amended by making the period of time during which it was agreed that appellant would take care of the business affairs of deceased "from that date during and while he, the said Chris Norgard, was ill," instead of "from that date until the death of said Chris Norgard," as set forth in the claim as filed, and in the original complaint.

After the filing of the amended complaint, the trial was resumed and appellant's counsel again called appellant as a witness and attempted to have him testify as to matters occurring before the death of Chris Norgard. The court sustained objections to such offered testimony, stating: "As to any facts, matters of fact occurring before the death of Chris Norgard, I am satisfied the witness is not a competent witness."

The case was then submitted to the court, and the court rendered judgment in favor of respondent estate, and this appeal is from said judgment.

Appellant's first contention is that subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, does not apply to the case at bar, and that therefore he was a competent witness in substantiation of the allegations of his amended complaint. He asserts that this action is not one against an executor or administrator. Section 1880, so far as applicable here, reads as follows: "The following persons cannot be witnesses: * * * 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person."

[1] This argument is ingenious, but without substantial merit. The claim is filed against an estate and not against an executor or administrator, and if allowed, is paid out of the estate and not by the executor or administrator. The section is clearly intended to prevent any person having a claim against an estate from testifying as to any fact occurring before the death of such deceased person. The fact that the administrator in this case was himself suing the estate upon a claim filed by him, would not permit him to testify. The meaning and intent of the statute of fraud is clear, and it applies to all claimants against the estate of a deceased person.

[2] Appellant next contends that he "was entitled to testify in substantiation of the allegations contained in count 2 of his amendment to complaint, by reason of the fact that such cause of action was not necessarily based upon any claim filed against the estate." Appellant then quotes said amendment, which reads as follows: "It was furthermore orally agreed by and between this claimant and said Chris Norgard, on the said 5th day of February, 1938, that if this plaintiff would perform the said services hereinabove referred to for said Chris Norgard from the said 5th day of February, 1938, during the illness of said Chris Norgard, that said promissory note would, by said parties, to-wit: said Chris Norgard and said plaintiff herein, be considered canceled and paid in full; that said plaintiff is therefore entitled to have said note canceled and declared to be of no further force nor effect."

It appears from said allegations that appellant relies upon a contract or agreement between himself and deceased, and hence his asserted claim must be held to be based upon a contract. Section 707 of the Probate Code, so far as it is applicable here, reads as follows: "All claims arising upon contract, whether they are due, not due, or contingent, and all claims for funeral expenses, must be filed or presented within the time limited in the notice or as extended by the provisions of section 702 of this code; and any claim not so filed or presented is barred forever * * *."

Therefore, if count 2 is based upon a claim, appellant would not be permitted to testify, and if said count 2 is not based upon a claim, then it is barred under section 707, supra.

[3] Appellant's third contention is that he was a competent witness to substantiate the allegations of his affirmative answer to respondent's cross-complaint. As hereinbefore stated, respondent filed a dismissal of the cross-complaint prior to the trial, and introduced no evidence in support thereof. Even if it were true that appellant, by incorporating in his answer to the cross-complaint by reference, the allegations of his complaint, and praying that the prayer of his complaint be granted, was entitled to introduce evidence in support of the affirmative allegations of his answer in spite of the dismissal of the cross-complaint, still this would not relieve appellant from the prohibition of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cross-complaint having been abandoned by respondent estate, and no evidence having been introduced by respondent in support thereof, appellant was in precisely the same situation with reference to the affirmative allegations of the cross-complaint as he was with reference to his complaint.

In the case of George v. McManus, 27 Cal.App. 414, at page 418, 150 P. 73, at page 75, the court said: "Respondent insists, however that the statute does not apply to a case where the action is brought by the personal representatives of a deceased person to recover upon facts which occurred prior to the death of the testator, and that, inasmuch as defendants filed a counterclaim asking for affirmative action, such fact rendered the testimony of plaintiff competent. In Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 52 Cal. 336, it is held that, where an action is brought by an executrix upon a demand, not against, but in favor of, the estate, the defendant, though a party to the transaction had with the deceased, is nevertheless a competent witness in his own behalf in defending the action. It is apparent, however, upon an examination of the record presented, that the evidence of plaintiff was offered, received, and considered by the court in support of the allegations of his complaint. Since defendants had offered no evidence in support of their counterclaim when plaintiff was called to testify, it is clear, therefore, that such evidence was not offered in rebuttal of any testimony given by defendants' witnesses. The purpose of the rule is that, where the voice of one party to a transaction is closed by death, the other will not be permitted to testify as to the facts of the transaction in enforcing a money demand against the estate of such deceased person. In our opinion, the case falls within the provisions of section 1880 [of the Code of Civil Procedure], and it was prejudicial error to permit plaintiff to testify, as to the occurrences and facts upon which he based his claim and demand."

Our conclusion is that the trial court did not err in holding that appellant was not entitled to testify as to matters occurring before the death of the deceased. The rule announced in subdivision 3 of section 1880, supra, is a salutary one, and one supported by sound public policy. Where the voice of one party to a transaction is closed by death, the other should not be permitted to testify as to the facts of the transaction in enforcing a money demand against the estate of the deceased person.

[4] The final question which we must consider is whether or not the record supports the judgment of the trial court. No evidence was introduced by respondent, and the only evidence admitted by the court was the testimony of the witnesses Artie Norgard, Isabell Daugherty and Gertrude Tethrow, hereinbefore referred to. The trial court is the sole judge of the weight and effect of testimony and of the credibility of witnesses, and is free to disbelieve them, even though they are uncontradicted, if there is any rational ground for doing so. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 P. 147. As was said by our Supreme Court in the very recent case of Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868, 871: "There are many reasons why a jury may refuse to believe a witness. Section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be repelled by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, or integrity, or his motives, or by contradictory evidence; and the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility.' Section 2061, subd. 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'That a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others.' In passing on the credibility of a witness, the jury is entitled to consider his interest in the result of the case. See cases collected in 27 Cal.Jur. 180, § 154."

It must not be overlooked, however, that the verified claim of appellant, attached as an exhibit to the verified complaint of appellant, stated that it was mutually agreed between appellant and Chris Norgard that if appellant would take care of the business affairs of Chris Norgard "until the date of the death of Chris Norgard," said promissory note would be considered canceled at the date of the death of Chris Norgard. The trial court had a right to consider the statement of appellant in said claim, as to what was agreed between appellant and Chris Norgard, and said statement was certainly contradictory to the testimony of the three witnesses of appellant. The trial court found that it was not true that appellant and Chris Norgard entered into the agreement set forth in the claim, or the agreement set forth in the amended complaint, and also found that it was not true that appellant thereafter took care of the business affairs of Chris Norgard.

[5] Applying the well settled principles of law hereinbefore set forth, to the instant case, we are satisfied that the evidence of appellant's witnesses was not so "clear, positive, uncontradicted, and of such a nature that it could not rationally be disbelieved," and that the record supports the findings and judgment of the trial court.

In view of the foregoing, the judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON, Justice (concurring).

I concur. The appellant may not complain of the defendant's dismissal of its cross-complaint before the trial began, for the reason that no affirmative relief was sought by the answer thereto, and because all of the issues involved therein were tried and determined in the suit which was founded on the original complaint.

The appellant, who was administrator of his father's estate, brought suit under section 703 of the Probate Code to cancel a note which he had executed, on the ground that it was fully satisfied by services rendered under an alleged agreement to that effect. An attorney was appointed to represent the estate, as authorized by that section. The estate answered the complaint, admitting the execution of the note but denying the agreement to cancel the instrument and denying the alleged performance of services. It asserted that an unpaid balance of the note, in the sum of $1,866.44, remained due and owing to the estate. At the same time a cross-complaint was filed, alleging the execution of the note and that said balance remained unpaid and due to the estate. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, admitting the execution of the note, but alleging that it was fully paid. The answer contained no demand for affirmative relief. In effect, it contained no more than a denial of the essential allegations of the cross-complaint. The prayer asked that the cross-complainant take nothing by that pleading.

The answer to the cross-complaint raised no issues which were not contained in the cause which was founded on the original complaint. Before the trial of the cause, the cross-complaint was voluntarily dismissed under the provisions of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

I am of the opinion that the cross-complaint was properly dismissed for the reason that affirmative relief was not sought by the answer thereto. But even though it be deemed that the answer did seek affirmative relief, which I do not concede, the dismissal was harmless because all of the issues which were raised by the answer were included in the cause which was founded on the original complaint and determined by the court on the merits of the case. In the case of Hanson v. Goldsmith, 170 Cal. 512, 150 P. 364, which was a suit to quiet title to real property, the cross-complaint of the defendant, which demanded affirmative relief quieting title in him as the alleged owner thereof, was dismissed over his objection. The court held that dismissal was harmless since the same issues were contained in his answer to the original complaint, and determined the merits adversely to him. The same relative situation exists in the present case.

The appellant complains of the dismissal of the cross-complaint because that procedure deprived him of the opportunity of testifying regarding his father's alleged agreement to cancel the note in consideration of services performed, since the cross-complaint was not founded on a claim against the estate, and his evidence would therefore have been competent, while that testimony was excluded in the action based on the original complaint, under the provisions of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There is no merit in that contention. It is not error to dismiss a cross-complaint, to which dismissal a pleader would otherwise be entitled, merely because the cross-defendant may thereby lose his right to testify against a dead man, contrary to the provisions of section 1880. That is particularly true when the answer to the cross-complaint raises no new issues which are not contained in the pleadings upon which the original action is founded. To so hold would result in circumventing the application of the wholesome provisions of section 1880, which were wisely adopted in the interest of justice. Rules of procedure should not be employed as a game of strategy to avoid the effect of sound principles of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by J. O. Navone against Clarence Young and others to enjoin waste and trespass, and for damages, wherein defendant F. H. Hood filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse decree, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Clarence E. Rust, of Oakland, for appellant.

C. W. Pearson, of Placerville, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment quieting respondent Hood's title to, and establishing the fraud of appellant in the matter of a contract entered into between the parties to work, a parcel of mining land.

The facts of the case are as follows: F. H. Hood had for many years been the owner of a mining property, in connection with which he had been endeavoring to discover a method by which the minerals contained in the complex ore found thereon could be reduced and recovered. Plaintiff, a mechanic and mine operator, represented to Hood that he had discovered a method of reducing the ore; that he could concentrate it and had done so. After some negotiations the parties entered into a partnership agreement, by the terms of which plaintiff was to furnish specific equipment and erect and operate a mill for the recovery of the minerals, and Hood was to deed him an interest in the land. A plant was partially constructed and some of the specified machinery installed, but the ore concentration was a failure, and plaintiff stated he was through and left the property. Thereafter, upon defendants Young and Morgan attempting to work the property, with Hood's consent, plaintiff claiming an interest in the real property, filed suit to enjoin waste and trespass and for damage, joining Hood as defendant, he having refused to join in the action. Hood answered and filed a cross-complaint in which he sought to quiet title against the plaintiff; the latter filed an answer thereto claiming an interest in the land. The action was tried substantially as a quiet title suit. Title in respondent Hood was proved and admitted; appellant based his claim of interest in the real property upon the contract above mentioned.

The court decreed the contract to be invalid and void; that it be cancelled and annulled, and that F. H. Hood be declared to be the true and lawful owner of the land described in the complaint and his title quieted against all claims of appellant; that appellant be authorized to remove all personal property placed by him on the land, and that he have judgment against defendants Young and Magee for $75, to cover damage to his equipment caused by their mining operations.

Appellant contends that a finding of fraud as such was outside the issues of the case; that there was no evidence to justify such a finding, and that the court erred in admitting evidence of certain letters antedating the written contract of the parties, as the effect of such evidence was to vary the terms of an unambiguous contract. After the submission of the briefs, on oral argument appellant admitted that the first point was without merit.

Relative to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of fraud on the part of appellant, there is evidence that he had considerable experience with mining machinery and mining operations, and that respondent Hood's experience, if any, was quite limited; that he represented that he "might be able to furnish almost everything in the machinery line"; that he had made a success of his method of reducing ore and could concentrate that on the Hood property. There is also evidence that the above contract was entered into as the result of Hood's confidence in appellant. After the work commenced, appellant sought to excuse and explain his failure to concentrate the ore, but finally abandoned the work.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence does not show an intention to deceive Hood. A mining engineer of some thirty-seven years' experience testified that most of the machinery installed by appellant was over thirty years old and that it had no value except as junk. A witness who worked with appellant testified: "A. We [appellant and the witness] used to talk about the possibility of getting a title to the property there, whether he had fulfilled his agreement with Mr. Hood and whether he was going to be able to get the property or not, and I remember one time in particular we talked about, used to talk about it a good deal, sometimes talked maybe for an hour or so especially before we went to sleep. After it was all over and we were just about through talking about it he said 'Well, I suppose if somebody was fool enough to give me half of the property for a lot of old junk, why not take it?'" There is no error in the trial court's refusal to adopt appellant's theory that the whole matter was an honest mistake. The evidence taken as a whole indicates substantially that there was an intent to deceive.

[2] Independent of the question whether or not the evidence shows such intent, appellant claims the court erred in admitting in evidence certain letters antedating the written contract of the parties; that the effect of such evidence was to vary the terms of an unambiguous written instrument. Appellant, in his answer to Hood's cross-complaint, alleges his interest in the land to be an undivided 9,405/20,000; Hood's interest to be a 5,095/20,000 and that a 5,000/20,000 interest has been set aside by the parties "for the further development of said property." When this answer is read in conjunction with appellant's exhibit "Mining Partnership Agreement," there is legal justification for allowing in evidence, as an explanation of the labor and duties to be performed by appellant, the parol testimony and the letters, which do not conflict with the specific provisions of the partnership agreement, but explain its unexpressed terms and conditions (Kellogg v. Snell, 93 Cal.App. 717, 270 P. 232; Buckner v. A. Leon & Co., 204 Cal. 225, 267 P. 693; McKee v. Lynch, 40 Cal.App.2d 216, 104 P.2d 675; Stockburger v. Dolan, 14 Cal.2d 313, 94 P.2d 33, 128 A.L.R. 83), a vital matter to be considered in the final adjudication of the rights of the parties and their respective interests in the land.

The judgment is affirmed.

In determining whether a party is entitled to a trial by jury, neither the caption of the pleadings nor the prayer is conclusive in determining whether a legal or equitable cause of action is stated, and a court must look to the whole of the pleadings, and to all facts of the case.

2. Election of remedies 🔑3(1)

An "action for damages" is based on an affirmance of the contract, while an "action for rescission" is based on a disaffirmance thereof. and such remedies are mutually inconsistent, although damages may be prayed for in event rescission cannot be had.

3. Jury 🔑13(14)

If a complaint states two complete rights of action, one legal and one equitable, a jury trial may be obtained on the issues raised by the legal cause.

4. Jury 🔑13(14)

Where legal and equitable remedies are sought in the same action, each remedy is governed by the law that would apply to it if the other remedy had not been requested, and hence, even though the action is essentially equitable, if the plaintiff requests legal relief, the parties are entitled to a jury trial on the legal issue.

Jury 🔑14(6)

Where plaintiff by complaint sought first to rescind instruments and secondly to state a cause of action at law for damages on ground that she was damaged and defrauded of her property, trial by jury of issues of fact as to fraud and damage was a matter of right, and hence a defendant was entitled to appeal from superior court's order granting plaintiff's motion for new trial, on ground that order was an "appealable order" under statute providing that appeal may be taken from superior court's order granting a new trial in an action or proceeding where a trial by jury is a matter of right. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

Action by Arthur Hutchason, as administrator of the estate of Virginia Hutchason, deceased, substituted party plaintiff for Virginia Hutchason, against Ben W. Marks, also known as B. W. Marks, Roland Cummings, and others for cancellation of certain instruments and for damages because plaintiff was allegedly defrauded of property. From an order granting the plaintiff a new trial, Roland Cummings appeals, and the plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal.

Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

Joseph Musgrove, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker and Bailey & Poe, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

Respondent plaintiff has moved to dismiss this appeal on the ground that the order attempted to be appealed from is not an appealable order. The notice of appeal recites that it is taken "from the order * * * granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial as against defendant Roland Cummings." Plaintiff contends that the action is equitable in character, that in it trial by jury was not a matter of right, and hence that the order granting a new trial is not in the category made appealable by statute.

Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the statute in question. It provides that "An appeal may be taken from a superior court in the following cases: * * * 2. From an order granting a new trial * * * in an action or proceeding where a trial by jury is a matter of right * * *." Section 936 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "A judgment or order, in a civil action, except when expressly made final by this code, may be reviewed as prescribed in this title, and not otherwise, except as otherwise expressly provided." It is not contended that the order attacked is appealable unless it comes within the purview of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted. Determination of this motion depends on the answer to the question: Does it affirmatively appear that there is no issue as to which trial by jury is a matter of right? Upon examination we find that the record requires a negative answer.

[1] The complaint is labeled "First Amended Complaint for Cancellation of Instruments and for Equitable Relief." But neither the caption of the pleading nor the prayer is conclusive (Standard Brands of California v. Bryce, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 718, 721, 37 P.2d 446); we must look to the whole of the pleadings and to all the facts of the case. See Bettencourt v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 1932, 216 Cal. 174, 179, 13 P.2d 659. In the complaint before us plaintiff alleges that the defendants, by means of false and fraudulent representations, and without valuable consideration, induced plaintiff to convey to them a certain promissory note for the principal sum of $25,000, secured by a mortgage on real estate in the City of Los Angeles; that the defendant Prouse, over a period of several months, by means of false and fraudulent representations, and without substantial consideration, procured the plaintiff to convey a parcel of real estate and to advance or become obligated for and pay various sums of money. The complaint further alleges that subsequent to all of the previously mentioned transactions defendants "with intent to further deceive and defraud plaintiff * * * falsely represented * * * that they would settle for all advances made by her" and by means of further false and fraudulent representations induced plaintiff to deliver to defendants certain personal property and to execute an agreement, dated January 5, 1937, in the form of a letter addressed to plaintiff, providing in part that "The undersigned hereby agrees that in full consideration for all financial assistance given by you to the undersigned and/or associates, either in cash or in real or personal property * * * and as full repayment to you of all advances by you to F. C. Prouse personally * * * the undersigned will deliver to you Temporary Stock Receipts, calling for the delivery to you of four thousand (4,000) shares, of a par value of five ($5.00) dollars per share, of privately owned stock of the American-Asiatic Life Insurance Company * * * and it is further agreed that the certificates for said stock are to be delivered to you or your nominee as and when said company is qualified to transact an insurance business.

"It is hereby further agreed that if said company is not so qualified within the time limit set forth in said receipts, or within such further extension of time as may be granted * * * all funds advanced by you, together with interest * * * shall be repaid to you by the undersigned within sixty (60) days from and after the expiration of said time * * *." Such letter purports to be signed "Morley Trust By B. W. Marks" and "B. W. Marks," personally. Endorsed thereon is the following: "The above agreement, and all terms and conditions therein set forth, are hereby approved and agreed to by the undersigned. [Signed] Virginia Hutchason."

The complaint also alleges that "Plaintiff hereby offers to return to defendants the said agreement of January 5, 1937 and any and all other property delivered to her by defendants" and "that in all of the transactions * * * defendants * * * acted in connivance with each other and in pursuance of a common purpose and scheme, and that each and all of said defendants had knowledge of the fraud practiced on plaintiff as hereinabove alleged, and acquiesced therein." A second count in the complaint reiterates all the averments of the first count and in addition alleges that the defendants entered into a conspiracy to obtain plaintiff's property "and use the same in furtherance of a plan to finance their business operations for personal profit" and that the plan "was carried out by defendants in all of the aforesaid acts as hereinabove alleged * * *." The prayer of the complaint is "Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against defendants as follows:

"1. That said assignment of note and mortgage be ordered cancelled and delivered up; that in the event said note and mortgage have been disposed of, plaintiff have judgment against the defendants for the value thereof as follows: $24,500 with interest thereon at seven per cent per annum from January 5, 1935, to and including date of entry of judgment herein;

"2. $2,458.00 with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum from June 5, 1935, to and including date of entry of judgment herein;

"3. $1,500.00 with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum from August 28, 1935, to and including date of entry of judgment herein;

"4. $2,500.00 with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum from December 1, 1935, to and including date of entry of Judgment herein;

"5. $3,000.00 with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum from March 31, 1936, to and including date of entry of judgment herein;

"6. For costs of suit; and

"7. For all equitable relief."

Up to this point in our consideration of the facts it appears that the action is primarily, if not exclusively, equitable in character. It seeks and depends on rescission of the agreement of January 5, 1937, as a step preliminary to any monetary recovery based on the several transactions specifically pleaded and as to one of those transactions—the alleged fraudulently induced conveyance of the $25,000 note and mortgage—the complaint primarily seeks recovery, on the theory of a rescission, of the specific property. As an alternative to recovery of the specific property, "in the event said note and mortgage have been disposed of," plaintiff asks judgment for their value. This alternative demand is not predicated on an alternative and legal cause of action, but is simply for alternative relief based on the equitable theory of rescission and presents a case which appears to be similar to that which is clearly and concisely delineated and disposed of by Mr. Presiding Justice Peters, speaking for Division One of the First District Court of Appeal in Crouser v. Boice, 1942, 51 Cal. App.2d 198, 124 P.2d 358.

But in our case there is an additional averment in the complaint as follows: "Plaintiff alleges that as a result of the fraud and deceit of defendants, and the advantage taken of her by said defendants, as herein set out, plaintiff has been damaged and defrauded of her property in the sum of $33,958.00." This averment is alleged in Count I and is incorporated in Count II by reference. Furthermore Count II alleges that the asserted conspiracy "was carried out by the defendants * * * to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $33,958.00." Such averments suggest that plaintiff in drafting her complaint was endeavoring, first, in equity, to avoid the effect of the contract of January 5, 1937, and, second, to state a cause of action at law for damages, based on the right declared in section 1709 of the Civil Code, "One who willfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers." In such an action trial by jury of the issues of fact as to fraud and damage would be a matter of right.

[2-4] We recognize that "An action for damages is based on an affirmance of the contract; an action for rescission on a disaffirmance thereof. [Citations] The two remedies are mutually inconsistent, although damages may be prayed for in the event rescission cannot be had." Davis v. Rite-Lite Sales Co., 1937, 8 Cal.2d 675, 678, 67 P.2d 1039, 1040. As to the item concerning the $25,000 note and mortgage we may assume that plaintiff's theory is purely that of rescission and that damages are sought only in the alternative that the specific property cannot be recovered. (Whether, on such a state of the pleading, upon a showing at the outset of the trial that the specific property was not recoverable, and that plaintiff would seek only the recovery of damages, a jury could be demanded as a matter of right to try the issues as to fraud and damage, we need not determine.) The $25,000 note and mortgage transaction was only one of several pleaded in both counts. Another transaction pleaded in each count was one in which plaintiff was allegedly induced by defendants' fraudulent representations to endorse a promissory note and hypothecate property in favor of a person (corporation) not a party to this action. The note was defaulted, plaintiff's hypothecated property was sold, and she was damaged thereby in the sum of $3,000, according to averments in her complaint. Her theory of action, insofar as her cause of action is predicated on this item, is obviously an action at law for damages against each person connected with the fraud. See Swasey v. L'Etanche, 1936, 17 Cal.App.2d 713. 718, 62 P.2d 753. As to the issues of fact arising out of that item, a trial by jury would be a matter of right. It has been said to be the law that "There is no right to a trial by jury where the gist of the action as thus determined [by examination of the pleadings and all the facts of the case] is for the enforcement of some right cognizable only in equity, even though legal relief results as an incidental part of the recovery. The fact, therefore, that the prayer contains a demand for damages is not controlling, for where the cause of action is essentially equitable, the prayer for damages is merely incidental to the relief sought, and if the action is properly brought in a court of equity, that court will determine all the issues in the case." Bettencourt v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, supra, 1932, 216 Cal. 174, 179, 13 P.2d 659, 661. But in the later case of Pacific Western Oil Co. v. Bern Oil Co., 1939, 13 Cal.2d 60, at page 69, 87 P.2d 1045, at page 1049, the Supreme Court after reviewing the cases of Hughes v. Dunlap, 1891, 91 Cal. 385, 27 P. 642; Farrell v. City of Ontario, 1919, 39 Cal.App. 351, 178 P. 740; and Franklin v. Southern Pacific Co., 1919, 40 Cal.App. 31, 180 P. 76, concerning the right to a jury trial on the issue of damages in an action for an injunction to restrain future trespassing and to recover damages for previous trespasses, said "Neither has there been any decision of this court or of the District Court of Appeal to which our attention has been called holding that a party to an action like the instant one is not entitled as a matter of right to a jury when the question of damages is put in issue by the pleadings until the decision of this court in the case of Bettencourt v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 216 Cal. 174, 13 P.2d 659. * * * In so far as the case of Bettencourt v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, supra, is contrary to the rule thus announced, it is overruled." Likewise in Connell v. Bowes, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 870, at page 871, 123 P.2d 456, the Supreme Court speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Gibson says, "It is now established in this state, however, that if a complaint states two complete rights of action, one legal and one equitable, a jury trial may be obtained upon the issues raised by the legal cause. * * * Also, in Farnsworth v. Hunter, 11 Cal.2d 27, 31, 32, 77 P.2d 840, this court said that upon amendment of an equitable action so as to include a cause for damages the right to a jury trial on the latter issue could then have been asserted." In the case from which the foregoing quotation is taken it was held that the parties became entitled to a jury trial on the legal issues of fact raised by a cross-complaint even though the complaint stated a cause cognizable only in equity. In Crouser v. Boice, supra, 1942, 51 Cal.App.2d 198, 124 P.2d 358, 360, the rule is stated "Under our system of code pleading it is permissible to join legal and equitable issues in the same complaint * * *. Where legal and equitable remedies are sought in the same action, each remedy is governed by the law that would apply to it if the other remedy had not been requested. Thus, even though the action is essentially equitable, if the plaintiff requests legal relief, the parties are entitled to a jury trial on the legal issue."

[5] Upon the same principles as those enunciated in the Farrell case, supra, 39 Cal.App. 351, 178 P. 740, and followed in other cases hereinabove discussed, we are impelled to the conclusion that plaintiff's complaint contemplates the trial of legal as well as equitable issues and that upon the record before us we cannot hold that trial by jury of certain of the issues was not a matter of right.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Buyer in default under conditional sales contract for farm machinery who did not tender full compensation to seller's assignee was not entitled to benefit of statute providing for relief from forfeiture. Civ.Code, § 3275.

3. Attachment ⟹302, 314

"Third party claim proceedings" are for the purpose of determining whether the debtor has any right, title or interest in the property upon which the levy has been made and the judgment of the court in such proceedings is only made conclusive as to the right of the plaintiff or other person in whose favor the writ runs to have the property taken and to subject it to payment for other satisfaction of his judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 689.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Dan Deevy, Jr., against J. G. Lewis and others for conversion of certain farming equipment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Freitas, Duffy & Keating, of San Rafael, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan and James A. Himmel, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

In this action for the alleged conversion of certain farming equipment, plaintiff recovered judgment for $679.85 as the value of plaintiff's alleged interest in said equipment, $500 for loss of use thereof and $1,000 as exemplary damages. Upon motion for a new trial, plaintiff consented to a reduction of the exemplary damages to $250 and the motion was denied. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

The Deevy family, consisting of plaintiff together with his parents and his sister, lived upon a farm in Marin County. These parties, either jointly or individually or both, carried on activities in farming and cattle raising. Nellie Deevy, the mother of plaintiff, had an overdue account with defendants for cattle feed. In April, 1940, defendants commenced an action against Nellie Deevy and subsequently recovered judgment therein. A writ of attachment and a writ of execution had been issued in said action and levies had been made upon the farming equipment which is the subject of this action.

Prior to the commencement of said action against Nellie Deevy, plaintiff and said Nellie Deevy had entered into a conditional sales contract for the purchase of said farming equipment from the Grandi Company. Said company had discounted said contract by assignment to a bank. After numerous defaults by the purchasers under the terms of said contract, the bank reassigned said contract to the Grandi Company in June, 1940. Shortly thereafter, under instructions from plaintiff herein, the Grandi Company filed a third-party claim in the action brought by defendants against Nellie Deevy. In said third-party claim, the Grandi Company recited the facts concerning the conditional sales contract including the following: "* * * which said contract has been breached by the purchasers above named for failure to pay the sums due upon said contract in accordance with the terms thereof and that the undersigned has elected to declare a breach of said contract and to retake possession of the property transferred thereunder. * * *" It is conceded that the purchasers were in default at the time said third-party claim was filed and that no further payments were thereafter made. At about the time of the filing of the third-party claim by the Grandi Company, plaintiff herein also filed a third-party claim in said action.

In order to protect their interests, defendants herein purchased from the Grandi Company on June 20, 1940, the conditional sales contract paying therefor the sum of $1,020.15 which was the amount of the entire balance due thereon.

The hearing on said third-party claim was held on August 2, 1940. At that hearing, plaintiff herein claimed that Nellie Deevy signed the conditional sales contract merely as an accommodation to him and that she had no interest in the farming equipment on which the levy had been made. The trial court determined that the legal title to said equipment was in defendants herein and that the equitable title was in plaintiff herein. In other words, it was determined that Nellie Deevy had no interest in said equipment and that the levy upon said equipment, made in said action against her, had failed. Defendants herein immediately advised plaintiff that repossession of the equipment would take place immediately.

Four days later, plaintiff and his attorney called on defendants' attorney and offered to pay the sum of $347 which they calculated to be a sum sufficient to pay up the delinquent payments. This offer was refused but defendants' attorney advised them that if they would apply one-half of said amount upon the judgment against Nellie Deevy, a satisfactory refinancing arrangement might be made with respect to said equipment. This counter-proposition was rejected. Two days thereafter, plaintiff and his attorney again called on defendants' attorney and offered to pay $920.15 which they claimed to be the total amount remaining due. This offer was rejected upon the ground that it was made too late and after plaintiff's rights under the contract had been terminated and upon the further ground that the amount offered was insufficient as $1,020.15 was the amount which would have been required. Thereafter defendants sold said equipment and this action followed.

The main contentions of defendants herein are that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment; that the judgment is against law; and that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury. These contentions may be considered together as all of said contentions involve the question of the rights of the parties under the conditional sales contract.

The pertinent portions of said conditional sales contract read as follows:

"4. Should purchaser fail to pay said indebtedness or any part thereof when due, or breach this contract, or if any execution or writ be levied on any of purchaser's property * * * seller, at his option, and without notice to purchaser, may declare the whole amount unpaid hereunder immediately due and payable, or seller may, without notice or demand, by process of law or otherwise, take possession of said chattels wherever located. In the event of such repossession, seller may, without notice to purchaser, declare all of purchaser's rights under the contract terminated and retain all monies paid thereon for the reasonable use of said chattels. * * *

"5. Any action to enforce payment shall not waive any of seller's rights hereunder. Any indulgences granted purchaser shall not constitute a waiver of any of seller's rights. Time is of the essence of this contract * * * seller may assign this contract without notice to purchaser."

"8. This contract shall apply to, inure to the benefit of, and be binding upon the * * * assigns of the respective parties * * *".

The jury was instructed and the trial court proceeded upon the theory that there had been a waiver by the seller of the portion of the contract making time of the essence by reason of the indulgences granted to the purchasers by the seller in accepting payments after the times specified in the contracts. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am.St.Rep. 126. We do not believe this theory can be sustained under the contract before us. It will be noted that the contract here differs from the contract in Boone v. Templeman, supra, and similar cases in that it provides that "Any indulgences granted purchaser shall not constitute a waiver of any of seller's rights."

In the recent case of Fageol T. & C. Co., v. Pacific Ind. Co., 18 Cal.2d 748, at page 756, 117 P.2d 669, at page 674, the court said, "The contract provides that time is the essence of every part thereof; that neither acceptance of any overdue payment nor the waiver of any breach of any term or condition shall 'operate as a waiver of any other prior or subsequent breach'; and that upon default repossession may be gained without previous demand of performance. Having so provided, the parties were bound by such covenants to the same extent as they were bound by any other article of their agreement. By such provisions they neither violated a statute nor contravened public policy. Where a contract expressly provides that acceptance of installment payments after they become due shall not operate as a waiver of its forfeiture provision, the acceptance of past due payments does not waive strict performance as to any other payments or conditions stipulated in the contract. Pacific Finance, etc., Co. v. Pierce, 48 Cal.App. 600, 191 P. 1115; Lundberg v. Switzer, 146 Wash. 416, 263 P. 178, 59 A.L.R. 131. It having been established that Thomas was in default as to the payment due January 10 and that such default was never waived, plaintiff's repossession of the truck was its absolute right." See also Pacific Finance, etc., Co. v. Pierce, 48 Cal.App. 600, 191 P. 1115; Brown v. Chowchilla Land Co., 59 Cal.App. 164, 210 P. 424; Lundberg v. Switzer, 146 Wash. 416, 263 P. 178, 59 A.L.R. 131.

In Miller v. Modern Motor Co., 107 Cal. App. 38, at page 44, 290 P. 122, at page 125, a case upon which plaintiff strongly relies, the court distinguishes the contract there from the contract involved in Pacific Finance, etc., Co. v. Pierce, supra, by saying that in the latter case, "* * * the contract expressly provided that acceptance by the owner of any payment after the same is due shall not constitute a waiver of the provision that time was of the essence * * *."

[1, 2] We are therefore of the opinion that the theory upon which the instructions were based and upon which the trial court proceeded did violence to the express terms of the contract of the parties, which terms were valid and gave to the seller the right to repossess the property regardless of prior indulgences. We further conclude that plaintiff may not rely upon the provisions of section 3275 of the Civil Code to sustain the judgment as the uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff failed to tender "full compensation" as required by that section as a prerequisite to relief from forfeiture. These conclusions make it unnecessary to consider the other points raised by defendants.

[3] In conclusion it may be stated that plaintiff claims that in the action against Nellie Deevy the court "found that respondent was entitled to the return of the tractor and tractor equipment" and he was therefore "entitled to immediate possession of his property." But that issue was not before the court in that case and no finding or conclusion was made thereon. Third-party claim proceedings under section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure are had for the purpose of determining whether the debtor has any right, title or interest in the property upon which the levy has been made. By the terms of that section, the judgment of the court in such proceedings is only made "conclusive as to the right of the plaintiff, or other person in whose favor the writ runs, to have said property taken, or held, by the officer and to subject said property to payment or other satisfaction of his judgment."

The judgment is reversed.

15. Criminal law 🔑409

The weight which was to be accorded defendant's admissions depended largely on defendant's motives in making the statements and whether they were voluntarily made.

16. Criminal law 🔑824(1)

A court in criminal cases has the duty to give instructions on the general principles of law applicable to the case on trial, even though they were not proposed or requested by the parties.

17. Criminal law 🔑517(1), 736(2)

If evidence of a confession is admitted, it is for jury to determine whether confession was voluntarily made and therefore entitled to consideration, and it may not be used against a defendant or considered by the jury as evidence unless the jury believes that it was freely and voluntarily made or without previous inducement, duress, threats, or intimidation.

18. Criminal law 🔑781(1)

If the state of the evidence is such that it admits of no rational conclusion other than that the confession was freely and voluntarily made, there is no necessity for instructions as to the governing rules of law with relation to the receipt and consideration of confessions.

19. Criminal law 🔑781(1)

In prosecution for violation of statute punishing crimes against children, evidence of prosecution established, prima facie, a sufficient foundation for the introduction of defendant's confession, and hence court did not err in failing to give, on its own motion, an instruction pertaining to the admission and consideration of evidence of a confession. Pen.Code, § 288.

20. Criminal law 🔑519(1)

Police officer's statement to defendant that he would bring as many as 30 children to bear witness against defendant did not render defendant's confession an "involuntary confession".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Involuntary Confession".

21. Criminal law 🔑519(1)

The fact that defendant may have had some secret hope that a confession would be to his advantage would not render the confession inadmissible on ground that the confession was an "involuntary confession".

22. Criminal law 🔑519(1)

A confession dictated by the hopes and motives of an accused and inspired solely by his own mental processes and emotions is a "voluntary confession".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Voluntary Confession".

23. Criminal law 🔑519(1)

The pressure exerted on an accused by others, tending to influence his actions, in making a confession, and not the pressure of the circumstances surrounding the accused, is to be weighed in determining whether his confession has been a "voluntary confession" or a confession under the compulsion of external influence.

24. Criminal law 🔑781(4)

Requested instruction that admissions of defendant, whenever made, are not sufficient to convict him unless prosecution proves beyond a reasonable doubt by testimony other than admissions of defendant that defendant committed offense with which he is charged, was properly refused as not correctly stating the law.

25. Criminal law 🔑1172(2)

Giving of instruction to effect that defendant should be conclusively presumed to be sane on dates of alleged offenses and at time of trial was not harmful though no defense of insanity was interposed, where testimony of defendant, of a physician, and of a witness who volunteered statement that she did not believe that anyone would have committed acts charged if he had been sane, furnished sufficient reason for instruction.

26. Criminal law 🔑1119(4)

Where defendant failed to comply with rule of District Court of Appeal requiring a defendant to bring up in the transcript anything said by his own counsel which may have prompted district attorney's statement complained of, no misconduct which would call for a reversal was shown. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence L. Kincaid, Judge.

George S. Hubbell was convicted under the first count of a violation of the statute punishing crimes against children, under the second count of a violation of the statute punishing crimes against children, and under the third count of a violation of the statute punishing sex perversions, and he appeals.

Judgments of conviction for violation of the first and third counts reversed and cause remanded for a new trial, and judgment of conviction under the second count affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and R. S. McLaughlin, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

Defendant was convicted by verdict of a jury of two counts of violation of section 288 and one count of violation of section 288a of the Penal Code. The offense involved in count I of the information was alleged to have been committed in July, 1938, upon the person of a female child nine years of age, while she was seated upon defendant's lap in his home and upon an occasion when other young children were present and being entertained by defendant with stories, which form of entertainment frequently brought neighborhood children to defendant's home. The offense involved in count II was alleged to have been committed in the defendant's home upon the person of a thirteen-year-old boy, consisting of a violation of section 288 on March 24, 1940, and the third involving a violation of section 288a on December 12, 1940, with the same boy. The information was filed February 11, 1941, and the trial was commenced September 30, 1941. Defendant appeals from the judgment as to each count and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence was insufficient to support a conviction of any of the offenses charged. The acts testified to in two instances clearly came within the purview of section 288 and in the other instance of section 288a of the Penal Code. Appellant's argument is that the stories of the children were confused, contradictory, and unworthy of belief. While there were conspicuous weaknesses in the testimony, which we shall point out, the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment is not sustainable as to any of the three counts.

We should preface our discussion of the conviction under the first count by saying that while we think it was not legally insufficient to support the judgment of conviction, we consider the evidence of guilt to be palpably weak. The proof of the crime was so inconclusive as to lead us to believe that the defendant probably would not have been convicted under this count except for certain errors occurring at the trial in the receipt of evidence and instruction of the jury, which call for a reversal.

The trial took place more than three years after the date of the offense as alleged in count I. The prosecutrix, whom we shall designate as Jane Doe, lived in defendant's neighborhood, was acquainted with defendant's young daughter who lived with him part of the time, and she frequently came to defendant's home with other young children. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether Jane ever was in defendant's home after the summer of 1937. She had no definite recollection as to the year in which the alleged offense occurred, but the evidence of all of the witnesses who testified on the subject was to the effect that she never returned to the defendant's home after either the summer of 1937 or 1938. The testimony of defendant and his witnesses that she had not been in his home after the summer of 1937 was definite and was supported by circumstances strongly tending to establish that fact. The child's mother testified to a complaint made by the child to her concerning the defendant in July of 1938 and which she said was about a week after the date of the alleged incident, as the time of the occurrence was related to her by her daughter. We shall assume that this evidence, which stands alone, was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the offense charged in count I was not committed more than three years prior to the filing of the information.

[3] The testimony of the prosecutrix was to the effect that she was in defendant's home with five or six other children one afternoon during the summer school vacation; that she was seated on defendant's lap while he was telling a story, which he was "acting out with his hands"; that during the telling of the story he touched her private parts once but did not rub them, the plain import of her testimony, in which the circumstance was related several times, being to the effect that the contact of defendant's hand with her body was at most but momentary. While it was a procedure not unusual in such cases, the child's story was elicited by leading questions. Practically all of the facts relating to the occurrence had completely left the mind of the prosecutrix. She could not recall how she was seated in defendant's lap, whether she was moved from one knee to the other, the names of any of the children who were present, where or how they were seated, and in response to the court's questions could not recall whether the panties she had on were tight or loose fitting, nor how much of her legs they covered, or anything else about them. She could not recall at what point in the story being told by defendant the incident occurred, although she testified that she remained on his lap until the story was finished. She recalled going to her home afterward but could not recall whether her mother was present when she arrived. In similar respects her testimony made it clear that she had but an indistinct recollection of what had taken place at the time, the sole specific fact that she was able to recall being that the defendant in some manner had placed his hand upon her private parts beneath her clothing. She was not injured in any manner and there was no evidence that she had been startled or frightened by the experience, nor was there anything in her testimony to suggest that the alleged conduct of defendant had made a firm impression upon her mind. It is not surprising that the child was unable to testify with greater certainty as to the identity of the children who were present and as to the other attendant circumstances. It would have been unusual if such matters had not passed from her mind after the elapse of more than three years, but it is nevertheless true that her recollection was uncertain as to the manner in which the alleged offense was committed and as to details bearing directly upon the question of criminal intent. Under these circumstances, where the evidence that a crime was committed consists of the uncertain testimony of a young child, given more than three years after the date of the alleged offense, it is our duty to give critical attention to all of the rulings of the court during the trial and to the manner in which the jury was instructed, in order to satisfy our minds whether errors were committed that were prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

[4] The mother of the prosecutrix testified, over objection of defendant, that a week or two after her daughter had made complaint to her she made a report to the police at the police station. No testimony was given as to any conversation she had upon that occasion, although she did testify that she did not, following that report, appear in court as a witness against defendant. The clear inference from the testimony was that a report had been made as to an alleged act of misconduct of defendant but that it had not been made the subject of a criminal charge. Evidence that the mother complained to the police some three weeks after the alleged commission of the offense was not admissible for any purpose. Its effect upon the minds of the jury, we think, would have been to strengthen the mother's testimony to the effect that the child had complained to her and the evidence carried the implication that the mother, at least, believed that the defendant was guilty of some offense against her daughter. We are aware of no rule of evidence which permits a party to prove the acts of his witness, otherwise inadmissible, for the sole purpose of giving circumstantial support to the truth of the recitals he has given on the stand and to thus bolster his testimony. Certainly the evidence was not admissible under the rule which permits proof of complaints made by minors and others contemporaneously with or within a short time after the commission of offenses of violence against them, and we think it was not admissible upon any tenable theory. The mother was permitted to testify further, over objection, that she had also talked with a police officer, who was a witness in the case, in January, 1941, when he came to her house, the natural inference being that they discussed the occurrence as to which the previous complaint had been made. It is not at all unreasonable to believe that this evidence would have tended strongly to convince the jury that defendant must have been guilty of misconduct of some sort, as otherwise the complaints to the police would not have been made. Unsanctioned by any rule of evidence, the complaints made by the mother, with the implications naturally flowing therefrom, were hearsay and under the facts of the present case were prejudicial to defendant.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "Proof of the corpus delicti means proof of the essential elements necessary to constitute the crime charged and of the existence of criminal agency or means as the cause of them. It may be proven by circumstances shown in evidence, or by inference drawn from facts proven. The evidence of the corpus delicti need not be of conclusive character, and need not necessarily connect the party informed against with the commission of the crime, in order to justify the consideration of an admission or confession of such party so charged with the crime. It is not necessary that the corpus delicti should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before proof may be made of an admission or confession. Prima facie evidence of the corpus delicti is sufficient; and it is for the court to say whether there is sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti to go to the jury, precisely as in the case of any other material fact."

[5, 6] It is contended that this instruction was confusing; that it was susceptible of a construction that prima facie evidence alone was required to establish the elements of the offense; that the court had determined that the proof of the crime aside from any confession of the defendant was sufficient to meet the requirements of the law and that the jury must abide by that decision. This criticism is well founded. The rule of law stated in the instruction is exclusively one for the guidance of the court during the trial. It is the duty of the court in the first instance to pass upon the sufficiency of the proof of the corpus delicti before admitting a confession or admission of the defendant, but that is a matter with which the jury is not concerned. There could be no proper occasion for the giving of the quoted instruction and the jury inevitably must have been confused in its endeavor to apply the rule stated to their own duties, since any attempt to do so would have led them astray. We think the instruction as given was susceptible of a construction by the jury that they were obliged to accept the decision of the court as to the sufficiency of such evidence. Necessarily the jury would have believed that the instruction was given for their guidance but we think it would have been impossible for them to have found such guidance in the statement of a rule which has application only to questions of the admissibility of evidence. That the instruction was seriously prejudicial to defendant in view of the unsatisfactory proof of guilt under count I cannot be doubted.

[7] In the cross-examination of a police officer, he was questioned by the defendant concerning testimony he had given at the preliminary examination in which he related a conversation he had had with defendant, and his testimony was read, as follows: "A. Well, I asked him if he knew who made the complaint against him whereby he was brought before the authorities at the University, and he said he had a good idea who it was. I asked him if he knew who it was and he said, 'I suspect it was [John Doe, the prosecuting witness].' I asked him if he had ever fondled [John Doe], and he said, 'Well, not intentionally, but maybe psychologically he had, but he didn't mean to harm the boy intentionally'." Upon redirect examination, over objection of defendant, the District Attorney read at length from the testimony of the witness given at the preliminary, the testimony so read relating but briefly to the matter inquired about on cross-examination, as we have quoted it, but extensively to defendant's alleged statements to the officer relating to many other matters, and containing statements strongly indicating, if not admitting, guilt. These passages from the testimony were read over the repeated objections of defendant and upon the insistence of the District Attorney that he had a right to read them because they were all contained in a single answer of the witness to a question propounded at the preliminary and because he contended that they tended to clarify the testimony of the witness with respect to the single matter which we have already alluded to elicited upon his cross-examination at the trial. It is apparent that the purpose of the District Attorney was not merely to clarify the testimony of the witness in the particular in question, which required only the reading of a single sentence, but to read as much as the court would allow of the other damaging statements of defendant that had been testified to by the witness at the preliminary. The witness had related his recollection of the same conversation in his direct examination at the trial, concluding with the statement, "I think that about covers it," he had been cross-examined as to the same conversation and yet the District Attorney, not by questions properly propounded, but by reading from the preliminary transcript, supplemented the testimony of the witness, after he had testified at length, and this, as we shall point out, in defiance of the rulings of the court. At one point the court struck out a portion of the testimony read and instructed the jury to disregard it and soon thereafter stated, "I think perhaps, as it is very lengthy, it has gone far enough." The defense made a motion to strike out additional portions, which motion was granted by the court. The District Attorney continued reading testimony having no relation whatever to the cross-examination and containing further damaging admissions of defendant, whereupon defendant made another motion to strike more of the testimony and the court said: "I think the motion to strike will be granted, and you had better abstain from reading all that balance. * * * It covers a multitude of subjects and it has drifted away from the original purport of that portion defense counsel referred to in their cross examination. * * * That portion is down to the time when the court granted the first motion to strike, and from there on the motion to strike is granted and it is stricken." The District Attorney continued with his reading along the same lines, elicited from the witness that he had so testified at the preliminary, and finally offered the original transcript of the testimony of the witness at the preliminary hearing covering his entire direct and cross-examination. In this manner the District Attorney contumaciously ignored the adverse rulings of the court and placed before the jury former testimony of the witness, which was not admissible under the circumstances. The offer of the entire testimony of the witness given at the preliminary, without reason to believe that it would or should be received in evidence, carried the imputation that there was other testimony of like damaging character. Defendant repeatedly assigned the conduct of the District Attorney as prejudicial misconduct and the court, in denying the assignments, admonished the jury to disregard the import of the offer of proof as thus made. The conduct persisted in by the District Attorney was wholly lacking in fairness to defendant and in respect for the court's rulings.

We are of the opinion that the conduct was prejudicial to defendant. Some of the testimony as thus read had been stated in substance in the direct or cross-examination of the witness upon the trial, but statements in addition to the facts previously testified to were placed before the jury only by the reading of the testimony by the District Attorney. One of these statements was to the effect that defendant had stated that he and a young boy, brother of the male prosecuting witness, had stripped and taken showers together and that he saw nothing wrong in that; another was that John Doe had placed his, defendant's, hand upon his, John Doe's, naked skin and that this had given defendant sex gratification; another statement of defendant related in the testimony at the preliminary was that he had fondled the prosecutrix Jane Doe in his home but did not know when it was; a further statement was that he had had another female child in his lap on a bus and had received sex gratification from placing his hand upon her stomach. Also included in the testimony read was an alleged statement of defendant that he had known for a long time that he was a sex pervert and a statement concerning the soiling of his clothes as a consequence of sex activity when fondling children. Other statements read from the testimony, while corresponding generally with the testimony of the witness at the trial, were yet more specific and damaging.

The several rulings of the court striking out portions of the testimony, and the admonition respecting the prosecution's offer of the entire testimony of the witness at the preliminary could not repair the damage that had been done. Nor is it an answer to the charge of unfair conduct on the part of the District Attorney that some of the testimony read was mere repetition of testimony given by the witness at the trial nor that defendant made a statement in writing, which we shall refer to later, containing damaging admissions of somewhat similar import. Mere rulings striking out testimony or admonitions to pay no attention to it cannot remove the feelings of revulsion and abhorrence that are occasioned by narrations that shock the senses and arouse resentment toward the accused. The harm that comes from the needless and unwarranted repetition of such inculpatory statements, as well as from damaging statements improperly placed before the jury, is, of course, greatly magnified in a case where the evidence of guilt is conspicuously weak, as it was under count I.

In view of the conflict in the evidence whether Jane Doe had ever been in his home after the summer of 1937, it was of extreme importance to defendant that the jury should have had a clear understanding of the statute of limitations as applicable to the offense charged in the first count. An instruction was requested and refused by the court which stated the law concisely and clearly and the following instruction was given at the request of the People:

"An alibi simply means that the defendant was at another place at the time the crime charged is alleged to have been committed. All the evidence should be carefully considered by you, and, if the evidence on the subject, with reference to any particular count in the Information, considered with all the other evidence, is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant on that particular count, you should acquit him. It is sufficient to justify an acquittal if the evidence upon that point raises a reasonable doubt of his presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged, if you find that a crime was committed.

"The Court further instructs the jury that although as to each count in the information it is alleged that they were committed 'on or about' a particular date, that it is wholly immaterial on what day or night the offense was committed, provided that you believe from the evidence that it was committed, and that the same was committed within three years prior to the filing of the information in this case, taking into consideration however the first paragraph of this instruction hereinabove set out, and if on any particular count as charged in the information any evidence of alibi is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant on that particular count, you should then give the defendant the benefit of that doubt on that particular count.

"The Court further instructs the jury that the information in this case was filed in the Los Angeles County Clerk's office on February 11, 1941."

[8, 9] The defense of alibi was not involved. The question as to time was whether the prosecutrix ceased coming to defendant's home in 1937 or 1938. It was her absence during the summer of 1938 that was heavily relied upon by defendant, not his own absence, and the question of alibi had nothing to do with the defense of the statute of limitations upon which defendant relied nor with any other issue in the case. The instruction was a confusing attempt to state three legal propositions: First, to define the defense of alibi; second, to state that the proof need not show the commission of the several offenses on or about the several dates charged in the information but that it would be sufficient if it established the commission of the crimes, severally, at any time within three years prior to the filing of the information; and, third, that if the offense charged in count I (the only one as to which the statute could have operated, under the evidence, as a defense) was proven to have been committed, defendant would be entitled to an acquittal if the date of the offense was more than three years prior to the filing of the information. Without simplicity and clarity in the expression of legal principles, jury instructions must inevitably defeat rather than accomplish their purpose. What was the jury to understand from the statement in the instruction reading, "taking into consideration however the first paragraph of this instruction hereinabove set out"? What would the jury know about the paragraphs of the writing which was being read to them? And if they had been able to identify the paragraph referred to, how would they have been able to see any connection between the proof as to the date of an offense and any doubt they might have of defendant's "presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged"? A common result of a shot at the flock is to bring down nothing but feathers. A "stock" instruction, unsuited to the case, stating irrelevant principles and confusing those that are relevant cannot be expected to produce any better results. Defendant was entitled to a simple, direct and specific instruction as to his defense of the statute of limitations as applied to the proof under count I. Such an instruction was not given. The instruction as given implied that there was a statute of limitations of three years but did not state that the bar of the statute would constitute a valid defense, and what was said on the subject was qualified by the ambiguous phrase above quoted. We cannot know how this instruction was understood by the several members of the jury nor whether it affected their verdict. There is so much uncertainty about it that we are not inclined to predicate a reversal upon any prejudice we might believe resulted from it. We cannot leave the subject without observing that the District Attorney would do well to discontinue the use of this instruction, which was given at his request.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial under count I must be reversed.

What has been said as to the erroneous instruction on corpus delicti and of the misconduct of the District Attorney is applicable to counts II and III, although we do not reach the same result as to the disposition that should be made of the case under each of these counts.

A reversal of the conviction under count III is also required for the reason that the instruction on corpus delicti and the misconduct of the District Attorney, with certain additional errors to be discussed, considered in the light of the evidence under that count, resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

As to this count corroboration of the testimony of the prosecuting witness was required if he was found to be an accomplice. The inference that he was such accomplice was so strong and the corroborating evidence under this count so weak that the errors committed in the trial preclude an affirmance of the judgment under section 4½, Article VI, of the Constitution. The boy, John, who was 15 years of age at the time of trial, had frequently visited defendant in his home, as had many other children; he testified that he had visited defendant over a long period of time and as often as twice a week. On January 7, 1941, he was apprehended by police officers in the commission of an act of personal misconduct at a service station and was taken to his home, where he was questioned by his mother. She was called as a witness and testified, over defendant's objection, that John at that time made a complaint to her about defendant, no details of the complaint being given. Count II charged an offense committed March 24, 1940, and count III an offense committed December 12, 1940. The inference would be that the complaint to the mother related to both dates.

[10] It is sought to justify the introduction of this testimony under the rule that where an offense of the nature of those here charged has been committed against one under legal age, the fact that a complaint was made while the occurrence was recent may be proved by the victim or by the person to whom the complaint was made. The point is made by appellant that the complaint as made was not as to a "recent" occurrence within the applicable meaning of the word, and this contention must be upheld.

It is the settled law in this state that evidence of the fact that the victim of rape made complaint of the occurrence is admissible in a criminal prosecution, People v. Mayes, 1885, 66 Cal. 597, 6 P. 691, 56 Am.Rep. 126; and cases collected in 22 Cal.Jur. 383–4. According to Mr. Greenleaf, as quoted in the cited case, such evidence is admissible only as corroborative of the testimony of the prosecutrix. The original reason for the rule was that since it is presumably the natural thing for a female who has been outraged to make outcry or prompt complaint of the crime, the fact that she did promptly complain is provable to meet the inference of consent which might be drawn from her silence. In People v. Wilmot, 1903, 139 Cal. 103, 105, 72 P. 838, 839, the court said in that connection: "The reason for the rule admitting such testimony would appear to be wanting in the case where the act is accomplished with a female who fully understands the nature thereof, and freely and voluntarily submits thereto. Doubtless, however, evidence of the fact of complaint of injury on the part of one under the age of legal consent would in most cases be competent, and this court has in this respect made no distinction between cases where there was actual resistance and those where resistance and nonconsent were conclusively inferred by the law." In People v. O'Bryan, 1933, 132 Cal.App. 496, at page 503, 23 P.2d 94, 97, it was said: "We think it may be fairly stated as the general rule that evidence as to the complaints of an outraged woman may be admitted only as corroborating or sustaining her testimony, and that when she does not appear as a witness, even the fact that she made complaint, however recently after the injury, is not admissible. There is an exception to this rule in the case of a child too young to testify, the courts holding that testimony as to the complaint in such case and under certain circumstances may be given by the person to whom complaint is made. People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 162, 66 P. 202;

People v. Bianchino, 5 Cal.App. 633, 636, 91 P. 112. We know of no other exception."

This type of evidence escapes exclusion under the hearsay rule only because it portrays a verbal act manifested while the victim is influenced by the shock of mistreatment and because the fact of complaint expresses a spontaneous reaction to an unusual and disturbing experience. A mere casual recital of the facts to acquaintances is not such a complaint as may be proved, People v. Wilmot, supra, nor is an admission obtained from a child as the result of a spanking, People v. Ewing, 1925, 71 Cal.App. 138, 142, 234 P. 917. It is important to bear in mind that the hearsay rule has never been relaxed so as to allow evidence of the substance of the statements constituting the complaint. A conviction in the Mayes case, supra, was reversed because of the improper allowance of evidence of the details of statements made by complainant to her sister concerning the defendant's conduct, and subsequent cases have held strictly to that doctrine. And it must be apparent that a complaint which is a verbal act of the victim when made under the influence of shock resulting from the experience becomes mere hearsay when it is made after the shock has worn off and appears to have been a dispassionate recital of a past event. Therefore the element of time becomes highly important. A review of a great number of reported cases in our state discloses that there has been a general recognition of the rule that complaints cannot be proved unless they have been made promptly. Most of the cases involved such complaints and we find constant repetition of statements that the complaints had been made immediately or shortly after the occurrence. And we also find constant repetition of the rule that complaints to be provable in such cases must have been made "immediately," "as soon as possible," "at the earliest practical moment," "at the earliest opportunity," etc. In fact, the importance of the element of time has never been questioned. In the few cases where it has appeared that there was unexcused delay in making complaint, proof of the complaint has been held to be prejudicial error. In People v. Lambert, 1898, 120 Cal. 170, 52 P. 307, there had been a delay of something less than two months; in People v. Gonzalez, 1907, 6 Cal.App. 255, 91 P. 1013, there had been a delay of a month and a half, and in each case the testimony was held to have been inadmissible under the hearsay rule. In People v. O'Bryan, supra, 132 Cal.App. 496, 23 P.2d 94, a police officer had testified over objection of the defendant that an adult victim of an alleged attempt to commit incest had appeared at the police station some four hours after the commission of the alleged crime and made complaint "concerning a lascivious attack committed upon her by her father, O'Bryan, the defendant in this case." The court said of this testimony (page 503 of 132 Cal.App., page 97 of 23 P.2d): "Whether the alleged victim of the assault in this case would have testified that she made complaint to the police officers we shall never know, because she died before the case first came to trial. Having in mind the fact that testimony of a complaint made as soon as possible after an attack is admissible in the case of an adult victim of rape to demonstrate the fact that the act was committed against her will, and knowing that instead of making an immediate complaint the woman alleged to have been injured in this case did not telephone the police or go to the police station, if at all, until approximately four hours after the time of the offense charged, and then only after defendant had refused to go back to her house at the point of Wilemon's gun there to settle with her husband we seriously doubt whether the admission of her own testimony on these points would have been justified."

In People v. Bianchino, 1907, 5 Cal.App. 633, 91 P. 112, a case involving a 5-year-old girl who had no understanding of the seriousness of the offense (rape), it was held not error to receive evidence of a complaint made several weeks after the assault and at a time when a physical examination by a physician disclosed injuries and a venereal infection. The exceptional circumstances of the case were pointed out in the opinion as bringing it substantially within the rule justifying evidence of complaints.

The admission of evidence of a complaint made by the boy to his mother was unquestionably erroneous. Almost ten months had elapsed since the date of the first charged offense and almost a month since the last one. If it be argued that the case falls within the holding of the Bianchino case, which is the most that could be argued in support of the court's ruling, the dissimilarity of the facts answers the argument. Instead of a 5-year-old girl we have here a boy who was almost 14 years of age at the time of the first alleged offense and 14½ years old at the time of the last one. Not only that, but there was testimony by the same police officer that the boy admitted that he had participated with defendant in committing upon the person of defendant the identical act constituting a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code which he had accused defendant of having committed with him, as charged in count III. To be sure, the boy testified that until he was told so by the officers he did not know that his acts or those of defendant to which he testified were wrong, but this testimony, which would be expected of any prosecuting witness under the same circumstances, was not sufficient to justify the testimony as to complaints made under the circumstances related. Furthermore, the accusations against defendant were made under conditions which would have prompted the boy to seek justification or excuse for his own misdeeds, which had resulted in his apprehension by the police. Needless to say, he had had ample opportunity to make complaint and if his mere statement that he did not appreciate the wrongful nature of the acts would be sufficient foundation for evidence of the complaints, the bars would be down for admission of such evidence in all similar cases where, in the absence of such testimony, evidence of complaints would be pure hearsay. In addition to all of this, it further appeared without contradiction that in the latter part of January, 1941, he was again questioned by his mother and the police officers in the presence of defendant at the police station. There he had first answered that the defendant had done nothing to him. His mother then said to him, "You have got to say what you told me before" and the officer said, "Now you have got to say what you told me before," whereupon the boy made statements to the effect that both he and the defendant had committed the several acts mentioned. Thus it was brought before the jury definitely what would nevertheless have been inferred, namely, that the several complaints theretofore made by the boy had constituted a recital of such acts.

[11] The testimony of the mother with reference to her son's complaint was admitted over defendant's objection. The testimony of the officers as to the bare fact that a complaint was made by the boy on the following day came in without objection. The testimony relative to the boy's accusations made in the presence of the defendant some two weeks later was admissible and, as we have seen, covered the same field as the statements made to the mother and the officers. Neither the fact that the objectionable testimony of the officers as to complaint having been made was not objected to nor the fact that the boy later repeated his charges in the presence of defendant detracts from the error in the admission of the mother's testimony. Even if the officers' testimony had been objected to and excluded, the harm had already been done in receiving the mother's testimony. Defendant's counsel no doubt had reason to believe that any objection they might make to the testimony of the officers would be overruled as previous objections had been. Sufficient has been said upon this subject to show error in the admission of the testimony of the boy's complaints and the prejudicial nature of the evidence.

[12] The jury was instructed that the charges in counts I and II required no corroboration; that corroboration of the testimony of John was required under count III, provided he was found to be an accomplice of defendant in the act charged and, in effect, that whether he was an accomplice depended upon whether he knew that the act committed was a crime in which he was assisting at the time of its commission. We cannot know whether the jury regarded him as an accomplice. He was a school boy who had apparently normal mentality; at least it was not shown that he was a stupid boy. He was 14½ years old at the time of the commission of the act charged in count III and was not shown to have acted involuntarily upon any of the occasions to which his testimony related. It must be conceded that it would have been wholly within the bounds of reason for the jury to have found that he was an accomplice as to the act charged in count III and similar acts which he admitted he himself had committed. People v. Robbins, 1915, 171 Cal. 466, 472, 154 P. 317.

In view of what is considered to be the extreme likelihood that the jury regarded the boy as an accomplice to the crime charged in the third count, it is important to consider in this connection also the instruction as to corpus delicti which we have already discussed. If the boy should be considered as an accomplice, a serious doubt would exist as to whether there was sufficient corroboration to sustain a conviction under count III. The principal corroborative evidence consisted of oral and written admissions to which we shall presently refer. Defendant had consistently denied having committed the act charged in count III. There were reasonable grounds upon which the jury could have found that the boy was an accomplice, that his testimony was without sufficient corroboration and that the admissions of defendant were wholly insufficient to show guilt of this offense, and if they had so believed, it would have been their duty to acquit. They could have construed defendant's admissions as implying guilt of this offense but could have believed that there was no other evidence which they deemed sufficient to prove the elements of the offense, and if they had so believed, it would have been their duty to acquit. But under this instruction they were not free to follow either of these courses. The court, as they were told, had passed upon the weight of the evidence tending to prove the elements of the offense, and they could not know the difference between a determination as to the sufficiency of the evidence to meet a rule of law and its sufficiency to establish guilt. The instruction was especially harmful to the defense to count III because of the close question whether the boy was an accomplice. Bearing in mind the weakness of the evidence relied upon by the prosecution for a conviction under count I and the culpable admissions of the prosecuting witness and the lack of corroboration of his testimony under count III, the language of the Supreme Court in People v. Baldwin, 1897, 117 Cal. 244, 249, 49 P. 186, 187, is particularly appropriate. The court there said: "In this class of prosecutions, the defendant, owing to natural instincts and laudable sentiments on the part of the jury, and the usual circumstances of isolation of the parties involved at the commission of the offense, is, as a rule, so disproportionately at the mercy of the prosecutrix's evidence, that he should be given the full measure of every legal right in an endeavor to maintain his innocence." Because of these errors, the conviction under count III must be reversed.

[13, 14] We have next to consider the effect of the errors already discussed upon the conviction under count II. This charged an offense as to which no corroboration was required. Notwithstanding the errors which require a reversal under counts I and III, the same result will not follow as to the conviction under count II unless we are convinced from a consideration of all of the evidence and the significance of the errors as affecting the verdict that there has been a miscarriage of justice within the meaning of section 4½, Article VI, of the Constitution. It therefore becomes necessary to recite the substance of the evidence tending to establish guilt.

Defendant was called before some of the members of the faculty of the institution where he was employed, was informed of charges brought to their attention respecting his treatment of children, and following a conference, resigned his professorship. He then voluntarily accompanied a police officer employed by the institution to a police station, where he was questioned by officers and made a written statement and certain oral admissions to which we shall refer. Upon the following day he was confronted by John in the presence of the latter's mother and two officers. Upon that occasion John, in the presence of the named persons, made statements accusing defendant of the offenses charged against him. At the conclusion of the interview defendant said to John's mother: "I am sorry that this happened to your boy, Mrs. [Doe]. Please try not to think too badly about me." She answered: "Professor, I don't know what to say. I had such faith in you." And he replied: "I know you had." Upon the preceding day defendant, in the presence of the officers, in his own hand wrote a statement headed "Confession," which read, in part:

"I do not wish to be a menace to children. I feel that I am, and shall probably continue to be while I have my liberty. Therefore I make this confession of essential guilt, in the hope that society will do something to remove the threat of my being at large.

"Accusations: excessive fondling [John Doe] (guilty); feeling of sex parts (if true, unintentional, but in some cases perhaps not without foundation) [here are named the children involved in counts I and III and another female child] (one act, about July, 1940) (Last act with [John Doe], about December 12, 1940.) * * *

"In all, so many children have been involved, and such interpretations have been made, and such psychological foundations exist, that I wish to make my general plea guilty."

Even more damning statements were made in the writing, but we find it unnecessary to quote or discuss the same or defendant's lengthy attempts on the stand to explain away the manifest implications of guilt which they plainly convey. Two police officers testified to oral admissions made by defendant which were so complete and specific as to be in themselves irreconcilable with innocence of violations of section 288 of the Penal Code. In his testimony at the trial defendant admitted having made many of the statements testified to by the officers, and with reference to such statements as well as to the written statements that he had made, gave lengthy explanations to the general effect that he had admitted to the officers that the various acts could have been committed and that certain results of a sexual nature, stated in their raw details, could have been accomplished, but that he had not intended to admit that they had actually happened. It cannot be doubted for a moment that these admissions, if believed by the jury to have been truthfully made, taken in connection with the testimony of the prosecuting witness, if believed, and the evidence of frequent opportunities for commission of such offenses, furnished complete evidence of defendant's guilt under count II of the information. And here we might say, because we have not heretofore discussed the effect of defendant's admissions, that they do not apply with anything like the same force to the charge under count III, which defendant at all times denied, nor were they as potent under the weak independent evidence applying to count I as they were as applied to count II.

[15] The weight which was to be accorded defendant's oral and written admissions depended largely upon defendant's motives in making the statements and whether they were voluntarily made. It is not contended that the statements were induced by threats (except as hereinafter noted), fear or promises of any nature nor that they were the result of any adverse pressure or overpersuasion on the part of the officers. Defendant was asked by the officers to make a statement and did so before he was placed under arrest. He was told by one of the officers that they wanted no statement unless it contained the truth and he composed his written statement with deliberation. The major part of the discussion with the officers followed the writing of the statement and contained further statements which in themselves constituted a confession of sexually-induced practices with children, although they fell short of express admissions of guilt of the specific offenses charged. Defendant's explanation of the circumstances under which the admissions were made and of his motives in making them were given upon the stand at great length. A few excerpts from the record will be sufficient to illustrate the tenor of the testimony in this connection.

"A. He [Officer Lake] told me that I should make a confession or a statement. He didn't promise me that I would escape trial or that the children would not be brought in as witnesses. He didn't promise me anything. But he told me I should make a confession or a statement, and I said that I would like to accomplish that, in spite of the fact that I was innocent of the charges against me, and then we discussed whether I should write such a statement or make it orally. I said that I would write it.

"Q. Now, did Officer Lake say anything with reference to your statement that you would like to accomplish the arrest even though you were innocent of the charge? A. Officer Lake told me that he just couldn't understand a person who wanted to confess to crimes that they had not done, and he gave me several instances of people who had done so. He told me that he thought he would not be able to sleep nights if he were conscious that he had sent an innocent man to prison.

"Q. Then what did you do? A. I might—yes, I will tell you, I wrote my statement, but I would like to add to what I was saying before that I had no intention of making a false confession or saying anything that was untrue. I wanted to write a statement which would do just what I have said I wanted to do, which would get me ultimately in prison and would not involve the children in any further harm or make them tell any more lies about me, or about anything else, just leave them out of it, if I possibly could. * * * I valued my own freedom, and my own future life, at just about zero. I didn't care whether I were free or not free. I felt that these charges had forever made it impossible for me to be an acceptable member of society, and especially the society of children. Any child hereafter who was even seen talking to me would be subject to suspicion, and might be brought in for questioning on very personal matters. Parents would have no faith in me, and my life with children was at an end. * * * It says, 'Without any threat of any kind,' Mr. Lake had told me that he would bring the children to witness against me. He said I believe that he might be able to bring as many as thirty children to bear testimony against me. It didn't occur to me at the time, but it is true that that was the very soundest threat that he could have possibly made; nothing would have driven me to write a statement like that sooner than such a statement.

"Q. Why? A. I was filled with absolute horror at the thought of having thirty children, or even two children, dragged out to go through matters of that kind. I felt that would do them incalculable harm. I felt that any harm that might be done to me was simply infinitesimal in comparison to the harm that would be done to those children. Children are in a malleable and plastic state of development, and harm to them at that time is just criminal. I felt that the very thought that they had involved me by mentioning my name, had already involved me terribly in their statements—and I didn't want to involve them one bit further, if I could help it. So that in the view that there was a threat, which though it may not have been meant as a threat, had a very powerful effect upon me."

One of defendant's witnesses was a psychiatrist, who testified at length about defendant's mental condition and characteristics. We find in his testimony such statements as the following:

"I regarded his sexual immaturity to be a pathological situation, he having failed to grow up beyond the infantile or childish level in his sexual interest. * * * It would be an example of a pathological mental state, a mental disorder. * * * I would say that he has remained essentially infantile in his sexual development, although from an adult standpoint he is essentially asexual. * * * No, I mean that psychologically his interests in sex were those of a small child. * * *

"Q. Now, you say in your opinion Dr. Hubbell has an illness? A. Yes, this is a mental illness.

"Q. Would you say he is insane or ever has been? A. No, I said he is not insane."

After reading at length the testimony of the physician, which was to the same general effect as the portions we have quoted, we have been unable to discern what fact or facts pertinent to the defense of not guilty were attempted to be established or that the testimony had any bearing at all upon that defense. The clear impression conveyed by a reading of the testimony of defendant relating to his oral and written admissions, and that of the physician, is that the tragic aberration of which defendant was pictured as the unfortunate victim brought him unwillingly to the borderline of the offenses charged. The testimony, as we read it, is corroborative of the other evidence tending to establish guilt. This conclusion necessarily follows from the fact that the defense was that the acts charged had not been committed and from the further fact that the deficiencies of defendant, however they be classified, would not avail to establish his innocence if the acts were committed with any of the elements of intent entering into the crime as defined by the Penal Code.

[16-19] It is contended that the failure of the court to instruct the jury as to the law pertaining to the admission and consideration of evidence of a confession requires a reversal of the convictions as to all counts. No such instruction was requested by defendant but it is claimed that it was the duty of the court to give one of its own motion. Undoubtedly it is the duty of the court in criminal cases to give instructions on the general principles of law applicable to the case on trial, even though they are not proposed or requested by the parties. People v. Scofield, 1928, 203 Cal. 703, 709, 265 P. 914; People v. Heddens, 1936, 12 Cal.App.2d 245, 55 P.2d 230; People v. Curran, 1938, 24 Cal.App.2d 673, 676, 75 P.2d 1090; People v. Warren, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 103, 116, 104 P.2d 1024. We may assume, although it is not so stated by appellant, that the principles of law he has in mind are those stated in People v. Dye, 1931, 119 Cal.App. 262, 270, 6 P.2d 313, namely, that if evidence of a confession is admitted, it is for the jury to determine whether the confession was freely and voluntarily made and therefore entitled to consideration, and that it may not be used against a defendant or considered by the jury as evidence in the case unless the jury shall believe from the proof as to the circumstances under which it was given that it was in fact freely and voluntarily made or, in other words, made without previous inducement, duress, threats or intimidation. The court, speaking through Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey, said (page 270 of 119 Cal. App., page 316 of 6 P.2d): "To 'threats and inducements' we think it appropriate to add, any illegal process whereby through external means of pressure the free will of the defendant has been overcome." We may concede for the purposes of this opinion that it is the duty of the court to so instruct the jury of its own motion in every case in which evidence is received of an admission by the defendant which could reasonably be construed or is contended by the prosecution to be a confession, if there is a failure of proof on the part of the prosecution or other evidence in the case which would reasonably lead to a belief that the confession was not freely and voluntarily made. We may also concede what defendant at the trial strenuously denied, that his written and oral statements did amount to a confession. We are nevertheless of the opinion that if the state of the evidence is such that it admits of no rational conclusion other than that the confession was freely and voluntarily made, there is no necessity for instructions as to the governing rules of law with relation to the receipt and consideration of confessions, and that the failure of the court to give such instructions of its own motion does not constitute error. Here the evidence of the prosecution did establish, prima facie, a sufficient foundation for the introduction of the confession. We find nothing in the evidence of defendant which is in conflict with the evidence of the prosecution upon that subject, nor do we find anything in defendant's testimony, given its fullest effect, which tends to show that the confession in a legal sense was not free and voluntary. His testimony is replete with assertions that he was hopeless for his own future, that he was solicitous of the welfare of the children involved, that he felt that they would be harmed if brought to court to testify in the case, that he was more interested in their welfare than in his own, and that it was his motive and desire in making his written and oral admissions to bring about his own incarceration in a manner that would avoid the appearance of the children in court.

[20-23] It will be noticed in the foregoing quotations from defendant's testimony that one of the officers stated to defendant that he would bring as many as thirty children to bear witness against defendant. It is now argued that this statement constituted a threat and that defendant was induced thereby to make the alleged confession in order to save the children the embarrassment and harm that might come from their appearance in court. No authority is cited which supports this proposition and we consider it untenable. A reading of the testimony of defendant with relation to this incident refutes the argument that defendant in making the confession acted upon the statement of the officer and he definitely testified that it would have made no difference to him whether two children or thirty children had been involved. But the statement of the officer was not the sort of threat or intimidation that would have rendered the confession involuntary had it been acted upon. The brief quotation we have made from People v. Dye, supra, 119 Cal.App. 262, 6 P.2d 313, is broad and comprehensive and recognizes that the process which can invalidate a confession must be exercised "through external means of pressure." Regardless of what defendant's motives may have been, there were no "external means of pressure" used. The officers suggested to defendant that he make a statement. They did not insist upon it nor does it appear that the witness was reluctant to make one. In fact, it appears that he wished to make a statement, not on account of any benefit that he hoped to receive, but because, as he testified, he did not wish the children to be brought into court. It affirmatively appears from defendant's testimony that the officer did not promise him that he would escape trial or that the children would not be brought in as witnesses, and that he made no promise whatever, and yet under these circumstances defendant said that he would like to make a statement. Even if he had had some secret hope that a confession would be to his advantage, that would not have rendered the confession inadmissible. People v. Luis, 1910, 158 Cal. 185, 191, 110 P. 580. His desire to save the children from being brought into court did not tend any more strongly to show an involuntary nature of the confession than did the wish of the defendant in People v. Smalling, 1892, 94 Cal. 112, 113, 29 P. 421, to take responsibility for the crime upon himself in order to free his sister, who was also under arrest, which motive was held not to invalidate his confession as material and competent evidence. It must be apparent that a confession dictated by the hopes and motives of the accused and inspired solely by his own mental processes and emotions is voluntary in a legal sense. It is not the pressure of the circumstances surrounding an accused person, but pressure exerted by others tending to influence his actions, that is to be weighed in determining whether his confession of guilt has been made voluntarily or under the compulsion of external influences. We are satisfied that there is to be found in the record no basis which the jury could reasonably have regarded as a valid ground for disregarding defendant's alleged confession as involuntary or for believing that his willingness to make the confession was to any extent the result of the act or conduct of any other person, and we conclude therefore that there was no error in the failure of the court to give the instruction. People v. Chan Chaun, 1940, 41 Cal. App.2d 586, 592, 107 P.2d 455, and cases there cited.

[24] Defendant tendered an instruction reading in part as follows: "* * * that admissions of the defendant whenever made are not sufficient to convict him unless the prosecution proves beyond a reasonable doubt by testimony other than admissions of the defendant that the defendant committed the offense or offenses with which he is charged in the information on file." The court declined to give the instruction. No other instruction was asked and none was given on the subject of admissions or confessions. The instruction did not correctly state the law, for it is not true, of course, that the proof, independently of any admissions of the defendant, must be sufficient to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt before a conviction can be had. The instruction therefore was properly refused.

[25] Defendant complains of an instruction to the effect that he should be conclusively presumed to be sane on the dates of the alleged offenses and at the time of trial. No defense of insanity was interposed but we believe no harm could have resulted from the instruction. The testimony of defendant, of the physician hereinbefore quoted and that of another of defendant's witnesses who had volunteered the statement that she did not believe that anyone would have committed the acts charged if he had been sane furnished a sufficient reason for the instruction. After reading the testimony of defendant in full we entertain no doubt as to his sanity, but we cannot say that it could not have left a contrary impression upon the minds of the jurors. The vice which counsel attributes to the instruction is that it suggested that defendant was relying upon insanity as a defense and that this was highly prejudicial to his case as it was presented. We think the jury could not have received any such impression but would have understood the contrary.

Other instructions complained of were identical with those recently approved in People v. Kearney, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 147, 126 P.2d 612, and they require no specific attention.

[26] In his closing argument the District Attorney stated that he was precluded by rules of law from proving the statements made by the children to their mothers while the defense was not so limited, and he said, in part: "So I can only say they didn't dare to ask the mothers what the children told them—Mrs. T., for instance, or Mrs. B." The statement was assigned as misconduct and the court admonished the jury to consider it "as purely argument of counsel and not as evidence." If, as now suggested by the People, the statement probably was made in reply to some argument by the defense, the better course for the District Attorney would have been to object to statements of defense counsel which might have called forth an improper reply to an improper argument. But as defendant has failed to comply with section 7 of Rule II of this court, under which he was required to bring up in the transcript anything said by his own counsel which may have prompted the statement complained of, we have no way of judging whether the statement was wholly unwarranted or had been invited by statements equally improper. Upon the record before us no misconduct is shown in this incident which would call for a reversal.

It is our opinion that the testimony of the boy John as to the commission of the offense charged in count II, considered with the other evidence which we have noted, presented a case so strong as to preclude a reversal, notwithstanding the errors which we have discussed.

The judgments and the order denying motion for new trial as to counts I and III of the information are reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial; the judgment and order denying motion for new trial as to count II are affirmed.

SHAW, Justice pro tem., concurred.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment and in everything said in Mr. Justice SHINN's opinion except certain portions of it which deal with defendant's asserted confession and which are inconsistent with the views hereinafter expressed. Defendant's statement, as applied to count II, in my opinion constitutes a confession. While the evidence tending to negative its voluntary character seems to me to be of little weight, I believe that we cannot say that as a matter of law there was no issue of fact as to whether such confession was voluntarily given. Such issue should have been submitted to the jury with appropriate instructions. Upon the entire record, however, I am of the opinion that the failure to so submit such issue did not affect the verdict as to count II.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Robert R. Syer, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Pierre Joseph Michaud, deceased. From an order denying her petition to be appointed administratrix of the deceased and appointing Jules Boutin as administrator, Jessie A. Spalding, public administratrix, etc., appeals.

Arnold Rumwell, of Palo Alto, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the public administratrix of Santa Clara County from an order denying the petition of appellant to be appointed administratrix of the estate of Pierre Joseph Michaud, deceased, and appointing respondent Jules Boutin administrator. Jules Boutin is a first cousin of the decedent. His testimony on the hearing disclosed that the decedent had a father and two brothers residing in that part of France now occupied by Germany, that he had last seen them when he was in France in 1909, had not heard from them since that time and did not know whether they were living or dead. Appellant takes the position that this evidence is not sufficient to establish that Boutin is in the class of "next of kin entitled to share in the estate" (Prob.Code, § 422), and that in the absence of such showing the public administratrix is entitled to preference of appointment over Boutin. Estate of Eggers, 114 Cal. 464, 46 P. 380.

We need not decide whether the evidence would support a finding that decedent left no closer relatives living than respondent Boutin since in our opinion this appeal is governed in any event by Probate Code sections 259, 259.1 and 259.2, enacted in 1941 and reading (in part) as follows:

"§ 259. The rights of aliens not residing within the United States or its territories to take either real or personal property or the proceeds thereof in this State by succession * * * is dependent in each case upon the existence of a reciprocal right upon the part of citizens of the United States to take real and personal property and the proceeds thereof upon the same terms and conditions as residents and citizens of the respective countries of which such aliens are inhabitants and citizens * * *.

"§ 259.1. The burden shall be upon such nonresident aliens to establish the fact of existence of the reciprocal rights set forth in Section 259.

"§ 259.2. If such reciprocal rights are not found to exist and if no heirs other than such aliens are found eligible to take such property, the property shall be disposed of as escheated property."

[1, 2] Assuming, as claimed by appellant, that the evidence is not sufficient to negative the existence of closer relatives of decedent residing in that part of France now occupied by Germany, no attempt was made to prove that such relatives would be entitled to inherit under Probate Code section 259, a burden clearly cast upon appellant by section 259.1, since appellant's sole claim to the right to administer depends upon a showing that respondent Boutin is not one of "the next of kin entitled to share in the estate."

This follows necessarily from the provisions of section 259.2 which must be construed as giving more remote kindred resident in this country the right to inherit where the nearer relatives resident in a foreign country are barred from inheritance by section 259. It is a settled rule of the common law that "Incapacity of the heirs first entitled to succeed to property will not effect an escheat, but the property will pass to the persons next entitled to take as though the first heirs had not existed." 19 Am.Jur., 388; 30 C.J.S., Escheat, § 2, p. 1166; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L.Ed. 613; Connolly v. Probate Court, 25 Idaho 35, 136 P. 205. The language of section 259.2, "if no heirs other than such aliens are found eligible to take such property," should be construed in view of this rule of law to entitle respondent Boutin, as a first cousin, to inherit, if all nearer relatives are nonresident aliens barred from inheritance by section 259.

The order appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Action by Marie Krum and John Raymond Krum against Clair Malloy and Richard Malloy to recover for the death of John H. Krum, deceased, and for injuries sustained by John Raymond Krum in an automobile accident. The case was dismissed as to Richard Malloy. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for appellants.

Mills & Wood, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

Plaintiffs appeal from an adverse judgment which comes before us on the judgment roll alone. The following facts were found by the trial court: Claire E. Malloy, aged 19, sued herein as Clair Malloy, was at the time of the automobile accident in question, a co-owner with his father, Paul Malloy, of the automobile involved. The defendant Richard Malloy was also alleged to be a co-owner of the automobile. The case was dismissed as to him. The father, Paul Malloy, was killed in the accident. The plaintiff and appellant Marie Krum is the surviving widow of John H. Krum who, while riding in his car, was killed as a result of the collision. Plaintiff and appellant John Raymond Krum, who suffered injuries, is the son of the decedent John H. Krum and Marie Krum. Also killed as a result of the same accident was Robert Marvin Krum, another son of the plaintiff and appellant Marie Krum and the deceased John H. Krum. The accident occurred on the 1st day of January, 1941, on Highway 101, near San Onofre.

It was alleged in the amended complaint that the automobile was being driven by Paul Malloy "with the permission and consent of the said Clair Malloy and Richard Malloy." This allegation was denied in the answer.

The court found that the accident was caused by the negligence of the decedent Paul Malloy and further found that the negligence of Paul Malloy was a proximate cause of the death of both John H. and Robert Marvin Krum; that at the time of the accident Claire E. Malloy and Paul Malloy were co-owners of the automobile; that Claire resided at the home of his father and was not present in the automobile when the accident herein mentioned occurred; that Paul Malloy, at the time of the accident, was operating the automobile in his own right as a co-owner and not upon the business of Claire E. Malloy; and that plaintiffs take nothing from the defendant Claire E. Malloy, as a co-owner of the automobile.

The question involved is this: Under section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2353, where a father and his minor son are co-owners of an automobile, which automobile is operated by the father in his own right as co-owner and not upon the business of the son, the son not being present in the automobile, is the son liable for the negligence of the father?

Section 402 of the Vehicle Code reads: "Liability of Private Owners. (a) Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner, and the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages."

This section was originally section 1714¼ of the Civil Code. It imposed liability upon the owner of a motor vehicle not operated by the owner, but by some other person, with his consent. This liability was a radical departure from the common law. It has been held in California, prior to the enactment of section 1714¼ of the Civil Code, supra, that in the absence of statute, there was no liability upon the owner who loaned his automobile to another or permitted another to drive it. It is argued by respondent that since the statute imposes new and unusual liability which partakes of the nature of a penalty, it should not, at least, receive a construction favoring the imposition of the liability here claimed by appellants.

[1] Appellants first cite section 4 of the Civil Code as declaring that the section here involved should be liberally construed. Each code contains a similar provision in reference to the construction of its provisions. § 4, Code Civ.Proc.; § 4, Pen.Code. No such provision is set forth in the Vehicle Code. Even though section 4 of the Civil Code may be held to be applicable to the provisions of the Vehicle Code, it must nevertheless clearly be shown that it was the object of the Legislature and the act itself, to fix a liability upon a co-owner of an automobile by virtue of his co-ownership regardless of other qualifications and exceptions. It is evident that the Legislature only intended that the owner of a car should be liable for the consequences of his own negligent driving and for the negligent driving of those whom he permits to drive it. In the main, the statute declares the rule that the owner of a car may choose his agents and employees, and may control possession of the vehicle. It is not evident that the Legislature intended to make each part-owner of a car liable for the consequences of the negligent operation of it by a co-owner or the other co-owner's agent or employee. In the first place, the foundation for such a rule does not exist, since a part-owner of an automobile may not choose the agents or employees of the other owner nor control possession of the car by the co-owner. In the second place, the language of the law, fairly interpreted, does not evidence a purpose to visit upon a co-owner the consequences of negligence committed by persons whose custody and possession of the car he may not and cannot control. It would therefore appear that it was not the object of the Legislature to attach liability upon a co-owner of an automobile under all conditions.

Section 4468 of the Political Code provides: "The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, or the constitution or laws of this state, is the rule of decision in all the courts of this state."

[2, 3] This section is to be considered in conjunction with the rule stated in Civil Code, section 4. Burlingame v. Traeger, 101 Cal.App. 365, 281 P. 1051. When read in conjunction with section 4 of the Civil Code, section 402 of the Vehicle Code, as now worded, is not repugnant to the rule of strict construction as applied to co-ownership. The Supreme Court has held in this respect, that section 402 of the Vehicle Code should be strictly construed. McCann v. Hoffman, 9 Cal.2d 279, 70 P.2d 909; Weber v. Pinyan, 9 Cal.2d 226, 70 P.2d 183, 112 A.L.R. 407; Whitechat v. Guyette, 19 Cal.2d 438, 122 P.2d 47; Prager v. Isreal, 15 Cal.2d 89, 98 P.2d 729. See, also, Cook v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.App.2d 608, 55 P.2d 1227, and cases cited; Swing v. Lingo, 129 Cal.App. 518, 19 P.2d 56.

In Mittelstadt v. Kelly, 1918, 202 Mich. 524, 168 N.W. 501, 503, where the statute in that state imposing liability on an owner of an automobile was substantially the same as ours, the same question of liability of a co-owner was considered. That statute provided that "The owner of a motor vehicle shall be liable for any injury occasioned by the negligent operation of such motor vehicle * * *. Provided, that the owner shall not be liable unless said motor vehicle is being driven by the express or implied consent or knowledge of such owner. * * *". In the Mittelstadt case a father and son together purchased a car, each contributing to the purchase price. It was registered in the son's name and it was contended that the father was a part owner. It was sought to fix liability upon the father as part owner. It was there held that the father, the co-owner, was not liable for several reasons, mainly because he could not control possession of the car by the co-owner and that the language of the law, fairly interpreted, did not evidence a purpose to visit upon the owner the consequences of negligence committed by persons whose custody and possession of the car he may not and could not control.

In the case of Leppard v. O'Brien, 225 App.Div. 162, 232 N.Y.S. 454, affirmed in 252 N.Y. 563, 170 N.E. 144, the facts were essentially as they are here. The defendant was the co-owner with his brother of an automobile. Each drove the car whenever he chose so to do. At the time of the accident, the brother not operating was at home and the car was not being used on the defendant's business. The court held the non-operating co-owner not liable under the New York statute which was, in substance, similar to section 1714¼ of the Civil Code of California. It was so held in Weber v. Pinyan, supra. In the case of Leppard v. O'Brien, supra, the court quotes at length (232 N.Y.S. page 458) from the Michigan case of Mittelstadt v. Kelly, supra, and quotes the Michigan statute. The New York court drew no distinction between the New York and Michigan statutes, as to the purpose and intent of the Legislature. It was there stated that "The object was to prevent an owner, who had given permission, express or implied, for the use of his car, from escaping liability by saying that it was not being used in his business. His permission for its use was made the basis of his liability. He was assumed to have the right to grant or withhold such permission. If it was being driven without his permission, or contrary to his express orders, no liability attached to him. * * *" [225 App.Div. 162, 232 N.Y.S. 456.]

The Leppard v. O'Brien case has been recognized and cited with approval in this state. Cook v. Superior Court, supra; Weber v. Pinyan, supra; Bradford v. Sargent, 135 Cal.App. 324, 27 P.2d 93. It has also been cited and approved in the following New York cases: Houlihan v. Selengut, 175 Misc. 854, 25 N.Y.S.2d 371, 374; Wadsworth v. Webster, 237 App.Div. 319, 261 N.Y.S. 670, 673; Glennie v. Falls Equipment Co., 238 App.Div. 7, 263 N.Y.S. 124, 131. It was also cited in Robinson v. Ebert, 180 Wash. 387, 39 P.2d 992, at page 994, where the court said: "* * * it was properly held that one of them [the brothers] was not responsible for injuries inflicted by the other in driving the jointly owned automobile. The brother held not liable was not in the car at the time of the accident, and it was not being used or operated in his business or in any joint enterprise."

Appellants cite Parlov v. Lozina, 49 Ont. L.R. 299, in which case liability was based on a different statute and on the theory of joint ownership, but which did not take into consideration the additional facts found in the instant case that the co-owner was operating the automobile on his own business.

In the case of Buchel v. Williams, 273 Mich. 132, 262 N.W. 759, 761, cited by appellant, the court held that it was error to release the co-owner because the car was "being operated at the time with her knowledge and consent and for the benefit of the joint owners." Such is not the finding here. Moore v. Noorthoek, 280 Mich. 431, 273 N.W. 758, is also cited by appellant which case was decided upon the theory that consent by the co-owner was presumed to have been given under a statute which presumed consent where the car was driven by an immediate member of the family.

We believe the facts and statute involved in the Leppard v. O'Brien case, supra, were so similar to the statute and facts here involved that we need but quote therefrom to dispose of the issue here presented. The opinion refers to the ownership of the car as joint; that the understanding between the owners was that each of them should use it when he wanted it, and, as to this, the court said:

"That was not the permission contemplated by the statute in question. It cannot be assumed that their minds met on the subject-matter of this statute. The fair inference is that they simply expressed their understanding of their respective rights in conformity with the law relating to their status as joint owners. Their common understanding neither added to nor subtracted anything from the rights which the law gave them. Each of them, in the eyes of the law, had title and possession without the permission of the other, and used it in his own right; neither of them could so control possession and operation of the car as to deny permission to the other owner or his agents and employees."

The court then said: "It nowhere appears in the statute that the Legislature intended that the vicarious liability created by its enactment should be visited upon one who could not prevent or control the use or operation of his car by withholding permission. * * * If the Legislature should deem it proper to impose such a penalty on joint ownership of an automobile, such a purpose should be clearly expressed in the statute.

[4] By section 66 of the Vehicle Code of this state, St.1940, 1st Ex.Sess., p. 9, an "owner" is defined to be "a person having all the incidents of ownership, including the legal title of a vehicle whether or not such person lends, rents or pledges such vehicle." Obviously, one of the incidents of ownership is the right of control of the vehicle (Leppard v. O'Brien, supra), and this Claire E. Malloy did not have as against his father Paul Malloy. The findings of the court negative any element of permission on the part of Claire E. Malloy. He was a minor, living at the home of his father, and manifestly could not control the conduct of his father. He was not present in the automobile and as his father was operating the automobile in his own right, and not upon the business of Claire E. Malloy, it must follow that the judgment of the trial court should be and is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Maria A. White, as executrix of the will of Adelina Soares, deceased, against the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association, Maria Isabel Torres and David C. Torres. From a judgment quieting the title of defendants Torres to a savings account in defendant bank, plaintiff appeals.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This appeal by the executrix of the will of Adelina Soares, deceased, is taken from a decree quieting the title of the defendants, Torres, to a savings account in defendant bank.

On July 23, 1940, the decedent was confined to her bed by what proved to be a fatal illness. She summoned M. L. Reece, a teller of defendant bank, to her home and informed him that she wished to convert a savings account which she had in his bank into a joint tenancy account with her sister Maria Isabel Torres and her nephew David C. Torres. Reece prepared a joint account card to be signed by the three intended joint depositors, and the decedent gave this card to a neighbor, Mr. Peterson, and requested him to mail it to the Torres, who were residing in Massachusetts, for their signatures. The signed card was returned to Peterson by the Torres and received by him about July 30. At decedent's request Peterson delivered it to the bank bearing all three signatures. About August 7 or 8, decedent called in Peterson again and asked him to get in touch with Reece and find out why the transfer had not been completed; "she thought she might die before she had her signature put on there." Peterson telephoned Reece and on August 9, Reece again visited decedent. The decedent signed two withdrawal orders (the second because her signature on the first was not distinct) and delivered the orders and her bank book to Reece for the purpose of transferring the money in her separate account into a joint account with the Torres. This was on Friday after banking hours. The bank was not again open for business until Monday morning, August 12. On Sunday, August 11, the decedent died before the bank book and withdrawal order had been taken to the bank by Reece. It was stipulated that Reece was not the agent of the bank.

It is appellant's position that Reece was decedent's agent for the purpose of having the account transferred into joint tenancy and that her death terminated his agency before the transfer was actually made. That decedent intended to transfer a joint tenancy interest in her account to the Torres by way of gift is plain from her entire course of conduct. The court found that prior to August 11, 1940, decedent did create a joint tenancy with the Torres in her account. Certainly before her death she had done everything within her physical power to complete the gift. She had procured and delivered to the bank the joint account card duly signed, and she had delivered to Reece her bank book and a withdrawal order with instructions to have the account transferred on the books of the bank to a joint tenancy account.

[1-4] All that is necessary to a completed gift of personal property is a delivery, actual or symbolic, to the donee or to another for his benefit with the intent to vest title in the donee. Here decedent delivered her bank book, together with a withdrawal order, to Reece. The delivery of a bank book, with donative intent, has consistently been held sufficient to constitute a gift of a savings bank account, whether accompanied by a written order or not (Wilson v. Crocker First Nat. Bank, 12 Cal.App.2d 627, 630, 55 P.2d 1208, and cases there cited; Cahill v. Goecke, 10 Cal.App.2d 279, 51 P.2d 905) and the delivery may be as effectively made to a third person for the benefit of the donee as to the donee himself. Estate of Escolle, 134 Cal.App. 473, 480, 25 P.2d 860, and cases there cited. If the decedent when she delivered the bank book and withdrawal orders to Reece intended thereby to transfer to the Torres a joint tenancy interest in her account by way of gift under the authorities above cited the gift was accomplished at that time. When the clear intention of the donor to make a gift can be carried out without doing violence to the established principles of law the courts should not seek highly technical reasons for defeating the gift.

[5-9] It is suggested that under section 15a of the Bank Act (Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 652) a deposit in joint tenancy form must be completed in the bank to create a joint tenancy in the account, but there is no language in section 15a purporting to make compliance with its terms the exclusive method of creating a joint tenancy in a bank account. Since the 1935 amendment to Civil Code, section 683, a joint tenancy may be created "by transfer from a sole owner to himself and others," and no good reason appears why the transfer so authorized may not be made by any recognized method for the transfer of personal property. At a time when a joint tenancy could only be created by conveyance from a third person to the joint tenants it was recognized that a joint tenancy in personal property could be created by oral transfer (Estate of Harris, 169 Cal. 725, 147 P. 967; Young v. Young, 126 Cal.App. 306, 14 P.2d 580) and it is now well settled that a valid gift of personal property may be made, although the donor retains an interest therein. Gordon v. Barr, 13 Cal. 2d 596, and cases cited at page 602, 91 P.2d 101. The rules of the bank could not operate to prevent the transfer by way of gift (Donovan v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 90 Cal.App. 489, 265 P. 995; Braun v. Brown, 14 Cal.2d 346, 354, 94 P.2d 348, 127 A.L.R. 773) and the transfer of a savings account is not subject to the rule governing checks drawn on commercial accounts which requires such checks to be presented to the bank before the maker's death. Spellacy v. Dauterman, 122 Cal. App. 416, 419, 420, 10 P.2d 114.

The case of Smith v. Bliss, 44 Cal.App. 2d 171, 112 P.2d 30, is relied on by appellant. In that case the decedent, Mrs. Coffin, had opened a joint tenancy account for herself and plaintiff. On an envelope containing the bank book evidencing this joint account the decedent wrote: "Make it joint tenancy 20,000" and signed her name. It was the plaintiff's claim that this created a trust to the extent of $20,000 in the undistributed estate of Mrs. Coffin's husband. The bare recital of these facts is sufficient to show the inappositeness of that case to the one before us on this appeal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MADDEN, Chief of Division of Narcotic Enforcement, et al. v. RILEY, State Controller.

Civ. 6855.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Aug. 7, 1942.

1. States 🔑62

Under statute providing for allowance of traveling expenses of state officers and employees when away from their headquarters on state business, and providing, in next sentence, for allowance of traveling expenses of officers and employees traveling outside the state on approval by the governor and director of finance, journey outside the state must be undertaken in performance of state business for traveling expenses to be allowable. Pol.Code, § 352.

2. States 🔑119

The Legislature has no authority to authorize use of public funds to pay traveling expenses of state officers and employees on journeys outside the state except as respects journeys on state business. Pol.Code, § 352.

3. States 🔑176, 181

The approval by governor and director of finance of claim of state officer or employee for expense of traveling outside the state raises "prima facie" presumption that claim is valid, but presumption may be rebutted, and such approval is not binding on controller so as to require payment of claim without audit by controller. Pol.Code, §§ 352, 433.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Prima Facie".

4. States 🔑183

The determination of state controller as to validity of claim against the state is subject to judicial review in proper proceeding. Pol.Code, § 433.

5. Officers 🔑94

Fees, expenses, and compensation of public officers must be authorized by statute, and the provisions of such a statute should be strictly construed.

6. States 🔑62

The only traveling expenses to which state officers and employees are entitled are those which are necessarily incurred in performance of, or incidental to, service for which such officers and employees are regularly employed. Pol.Code, § 352.

7. States 🔑62

The purpose for which state officer attends convention must have some direct connection with fulfillment of his own public duties in the department in which he is employed to entitle him to recover traveling expenses on ground that attendance at convention is "state business". Pol.Code, § 352.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "State Business".

8. States ⟹62

The attendance of chief of division of narcotic enforcement at convention, outside the state, of Pacific Coast International Association of Law Enforcement, was "state business" so as to authorize allowance of claim against the state for traveling expenses, where such officers secured co-operation, reciprocity, and aid of peace officers of other states who constantly dealt with offenders against narcotic laws. Pol.Code, § 352.

Mandamus by Paul E. Madden, as Chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement, and others, against Harry B. Riley, State Controller. On demurrer to the petition.

Demurrer overruled.

Robert Clifton, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., Robert W. Harrison, Chief Asst. Atty. Gen., and Chas. W. Johnson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

By means of a writ of mandamus the petitioners seek to require the state controller to allow a claim and to draw his warrant in payment of necessary traveling expenses incurred by the Chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement of California, in attending a convention of the Pacific Coast International Association of Law Enforcement, held at Reno, Nevada, August 27, 28 and 29, 1940. The Governor and the Director of Finance of California approved the allowance as required by section 352 of the Political Code. The controller rejected the claim on the ground that the expense was not incurred in the performance of state business. A demurrer and answer to the petition were filed by the respondent. The answer controverts essential facts alleged in the petition. The demurrer asserts that the petition fails to state facts sufficient to justify the issuance of the writ.

The petition alleges that Paul E. Madden, as chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement of California, incurred necessary expenses amounting to $13, in attending the convention of the Pacific Coast International Association of Law Enforcement at Reno, Nevada, on the dates previously mentioned; that the said sum was subsequently paid by the petitioner, Heda M. Goucher, the disbursing officer of said Narcotic Enforcement Division, out of the revolving fund of that department which is maintained for that purpose; that the said expenses of petitioner, Madden, were previously duly authorized and approved by both the Governor and the Director of Finance of the State of California, as required by section 352 of the Political Code, in the following language:

"August 26, 1940.

"Hon. Harry B. Riley
"State Controller
"Sacramento, California

"Dear Mr. Riley:

"Permission is hereby granted to Paul E. Madden, Chief, Narcotic Division, to be absent from the State of California August 27, 28 and 29, 1940, for the purpose of attending a convention of Pacific Coast Law Enforcement officials at Reno, Nevada. It is important that Mr. Madden attend this conference in order that he may confer with narcotic enforcement officials from Washington, D. C., who are going to attend the gathering.

"The expense of this trip is not to exceed $25.00 and is to be paid by the State of California upon presentation of properly certified and itemized bills from the appropriation for the Support of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement.

"Itinerary of trip: San Francisco to Reno, Nevada; and return.

"Sincerely,
"Culbert L. Olson,
"Governor of California

"Approved:
"J. R. Richards,
"Director of Finance."

The petition further alleges that the purpose for which Mr. Madden attended said convention, which consisted of delegates from twelve states and territories of the United States, and from the national capital at Washington, D. C., was to confer with the said representatives and to cooperate with the peace and narcotic enforcement officers of the United States to secure uniform and effective administration and enforcement of the narcotic laws of California, and among the several states of this Union.

It is also stated in the petition that there are ample funds duly appropriated and allotted to the special support of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement in the State of California, from which to pay the demand in question; that the claim was regularly presented in due form to the state controller, with the written approval of the Governor and the Director of Finance of California, for auditing and allowance thereof; that the claim was rejected by the controller as unlawful and invalid, on the ground that the services of said officer in attending the Pacific Coast Law Enforcement convention at Reno, Nevada, for the purposes assigned, do not constitute "State business," and that said expenses may therefore not be allowed.

The chief issue to be determined is whether section 352 of the Political Code authorizes the approval and allowance of claims for necessary expenses of the representatives of state departments, in attending conventions inside or outside of the state, for purposes appertaining to the particular business of the department to which they belong. That section reads: "All heads of departments, chiefs of divisions, assistants, deputies, agents, experts and other employees of a department shall be entitled to receive in addition to their salaries, their actual necessary traveling expenses when away from their headquarters on State business. Actual and necessary traveling expenses shall be allowed such persons when traveling outside of the State, when such traveling and expenses have been approved by the Governor and by the Director of Finance. Except as otherwise expressly provided by any act creating a new department, the members of no State board or commission which is created or continued in force by such act, shall receive any compensation for their services, but they shall be allowed necessary expenses incurred in the performance of duty."

In the present proceeding it is conceded by the respondent that: "If the authority for such expenditure exists, funds are available by virtue of the appropriation 'for the support' of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement contained in Section 2 of the Budget Act of 1939, Stats.1939, ch. 486, item 157, p. 1850. No contention is made by respondent that the funds therein appropriated have been exhausted."

Section 352 of the Political Code clearly authorizes the payment of "actual necessary traveling expenses" of heads of departments, chiefs of divisions, assistants, deputies, etc., "when away from their headquarters on State business." When such expenses are incurred in traveling on state business within the state, the approval of neither the Governor nor the director of finance is required as a prerequisite to the payment thereof; but, under such circumstances, it is the duty of the state controller, incident to his duty to audit and pay such claims, to first determine that the expenses were necessarily incurred by the officer or employee in the performance of "State business." When such necessary expenses are incurred in traveling on state business outside of the state, they may not be allowed or paid except when they "have been approved by the Governor and by the Director of Finance." If it appears that an officer or employee mentioned in section 352 has actually incurred necessary traveling expenses in attending to state business outside of the state, and that a claim for such amount has been approved for that purpose by the Governor and by the director of finance, it is the duty of the state controller to audit the claim and to draw his warrant in payment thereof, as required by law.

[1, 2] The petitioners assert that the second sentence of section 352 authorizes the Governor and director of finance to permit officers or employees to recover necessary expenses incurred in traveling outside of the state, regardless of whether the journey is undertaken in the performance of state business. We do not agree with that construction of the statute. In our opinion the entire section deals with necessary expenses incurred in traveling inside or outside of the state, only when the officers or employees are engaged in state business. It is apparent that if the petitioners' construction of that language is correct, the act would authorize the approval and payment of claims of officers or employees for traveling expenses incurred in going to any place in the world, on their own private expeditions, for personal recreation, pleasure or business. The Legislature has no authority to authorize such illegal misappropriation of public funds. That is not a reasonable construction of the statute. We are convinced that section authorizes the payment of traveling expenses, either inside or outside of the state, only when the officers or employees are engaged in state business. The language of that section appears to clearly indicate that fact. After the first sentence asserts that certain designated officers or employees may recover their traveling expenses "when away from their headquarters on State business," the following sentence declares that "such persons when traveling outside of the State" [on state business] may recover their traveling expenses, provided their claims are first approved by the Governor and by the director of finance. We think the words "on State business," which we have inserted in brackets in the previous sentence, are necessarily implied as a part of that provision. Any other construction would lead to an absurdity and authorize the payment of illegal claims.

[3] The petitioners then contend that the second sentence of section 352 renders the validity of a claim for expenses incurred in traveling outside of the state, absolutely conclusive upon the state controller, requiring him to draw his warrant in payment thereof, "when such traveling and expenses have been approved by the Governor and by the Director of Finance." It is argued that such approval becomes final and conclusive evidence that the authorized journey was undertaken in pursuance of state business. That conclusion is reached by asserting that it must be presumed the chief executive and the director of finance would not approve an illegal claim, and that an exercise of discretion on the part of those officers in approving and allowing the expenditure of funds may not be interfered with by either the controller or the courts. We assume that neither of those officers would knowingly approve an illegal claim, and that their approval does carry with it a prima facie presumption that the claim is valid. But that presumption may be rebutted.

We do not agree with the last-mentioned construction of the effect of the approval by the Governor and the director of finance of a claim for traveling expenses. Their approval may raise a presumption that the services were to be performed in pursuance of state business and that the claim is valid, but it does not become conclusive of those facts so as to deprive the controller of his duty to audit the claim and to refuse payment thereof if it appears to be illegal. The state controller is constituted by law the ultimate fact-finding tribunal whose duty it is to pass upon such claims and to reject them if he finds them to be illegal. § 433, Pol.Code. This does not mean that the Governor or the director of finance has approved or allowed an illegal claim. It may merely mean that the claim is illegal for the reason that the services for which it was previously approved were not actually performed, or that the convention was held for a purpose entirely different from that which was represented by the claimant. Under such circumstance, it is the duty of the controller to reject the claim.

It will be observed that section 352 requires the approval by the Governor and the director of finance of two different features of the claim, namely, the privilege to travel outside of the state, and the right to incur specified expenses in the course of that journey. That section declares that said traveling expenses, outside of the state, may be paid only when "such traveling and expenses have been approved."

In the present case the approval of the Governor and the director of finance, authorizing Mr. Madden to attend the convention at Reno "in order that he may confer with narcotic enforcement officials," and limiting his expenses, so incurred, to $25, was given in writing on August 26th, before the convention was held or the services were performed. We assume the Governor and director of finance approved that journey and expenditure of costs of the trip for a legitimate purpose and with full understanding that the object of attending the convention was in line with the claimant's official duties as chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement, and that the authorized services therefore constituted state business. That does not preclude the controller, in the exercise of his duties, when the claim is actually filed for allowance, from examining the facts to ascertain whether the business of the convention in fact included duties incident to those of Mr. Madden's regular employment, or whether he did actually attend the convention. If for any valid reason the controller finds that the services were not performed, or that they do not constitute state business, or that the expenses were not incurred, it is his duty to reject the claim.

It is the duty of the state controller to audit claims presented against the state and to draw his warrant in payment of such claims only as are authorized by law. Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal. 283, 36 P. 580, 834; § 433, subds. 10, 17 and 19, Pol.Code. Section 433 provides in part:

"It is the duty of the controller: * * *

"10. To audit all claims against the state in cases where there are sufficient provisions of law for the payment thereof; * * *

"17. To draw warrants on the treasurer for the payment of moneys directed by law to be paid out of the treasury; but no war- rant must be drawn unless authorized by law, and upon an unexhausted specific appropriation provided by law to meet the same. * * *" (Italics ours.)

In rebutting a similar contention that the controller was bound by the approval of a claim by the Engineering Department, and that he was powerless to challenge its validity on that account, the Supreme Court said in California Highway Comm. v. Riley, 192 Cal. 97, at page 112, 218 P. 579, at page 586, that: "The demand here under consideration having been so made, allowed, and audited, it is said to be the plain mandatory duty of the respondent not to question the same, but to draw his warrant therefor. The various provisions of section 433 of the Political Code seem to indicate that the controller's duties and responsibilities are not so narrowly restricted, but it is not necessary to here determine their precise nature and extent. The writ of mandate is, in a measure at least, a discretionary writ, and it will not be granted where its enforcement would work an injustice or accomplish a legal wrong. [Citing authorities.] It will not issue to compel an auditor to draw his warrant for an illegal claim even though it has been audited and allowed by the board which is charged with that duty and responsibility. Walton v. McPhetridge, 120 Cal. 440, 52 P. 731."

[4] We conclude that it was not only the privilege, but it was the duty of the state controller, to audit the claim which is involved in the present proceeding and to determine whether it was valid or invalid, and to draw or withdraw his warrant therefor, dependent upon his conclusion in that regard. His determination concerning the validity of such claims is subject to review of the courts in proper proceedings. California Highway Comm. v. Riley, supra; Irwin v. County of Yuba, 119 Cal. 686, 52 P. 35; Gibson v. County of Sacramento, 37 Cal.App. 523, 174 P. 935; Shanks v. Commonwealth, 219 Ky. 212, 292 S.W. 837.

This brings us to the problem of what constitutes state business, and whether the allegations of the petition sufficiently show that the expenses, for which the claim was presented, were incurred by Mr. Madden incident to his performance of state business.

We shall not attempt to give a comprehensive definition of state business. That might be an arduous undertaking. It would be far easier to determine, by way of illustration, what activities are deemed not to constitute state business.

[5, 6] It is true that fees, expenses and compensation of public officers must be authorized by statute and that the provisions therefor should be strictly construed. Sarter v. Siskiyou County, 42 Cal.App. 530, 534, 183 P. 852. It must be conceded the only traveling expenses to which officers and employees of the state are entitled are those which are necessarily incurred in the performance of, or incidental to, the service for which such officers and employees are regularly employed. The expenses of the chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement, in attending a convention of civil engineers, would clearly not be authorized, for the reason that civil engineering is not in his line of employment. Such authorization might be deemed to be illegal and void. It has been frequently held that attendance of officers or employees at conventions for the mere purpose of acquiring general information, instruction or knowledge applicable to the nature of services demanded in their particular department, or the mere fact that the delegates attending the conventions propose to discuss ways and means of attaining greater efficiency in the duties of their respective similar offices, does not constitute state business, unless the statute specifically so declares. Attendance at conventions, under such circumstances, has been held to be merely educational in its nature. Some of the cases declare that public officers are expected to secure their education, qualifying them for efficient service in their particular employment, at their own expense, and not to expect the public to pay for that training. The courts have repeatedly held that claims for services similar to those which have been previously mentioned are illegal and void. Irwin v. County of Yuba, supra; Jefferson County v. Jefferson County Fiscal Court, 269 Ky. 768, 108 S.W.2d 810; Smith v. Holovtchiner, 101 Neb. 248, 162 N.W. 630, L.R.A.1917E, 331; Gibson v. County of Sacramento, supra. In the case last cited it is said at page 525 of the opinion in 37 Cal. App., at page 936 of 174 P., that: "It cannot be doubted that 'one who demands payment of a claim against a county must show some statute authorizing it, or that it arises from some contract, express or implied, which finds authority of law.' Irwin v. County of Yuba, 119 Cal. 686, 52 P. 35; Woods v. Potter, 8 Cal.App. 41, 45, 95 P.

1125. Nor may the payment of such a claim be allowed upon the theory that the services performed for which compensation is claimed were beneficial. There must be some statutory or constitutional authority for compensation for services rendered to a county, otherwise it cannot legally be paid, however beneficial the services performed may be to the county or the public generally."

In opposition to the payment of claims for traveling expenses incurred by officers in attending conventions for the mere purpose of acquiring general knowledge or improving their education, it is said in the case of Jefferson County v. Jefferson County Fiscal Court, supra [269 Ky. 768, 108 S.W.2d 811]: "But the Statute does not expressly or by necessary implication authorize the fiscal court to appropriate the county funds to pay the expenses of its officers for educational purposes. The presumption is that such officers were qualified for the performance of their duties before they were employed, and if they desire further education or information relating to their work, they must acquire such at their own expense. It would be no more reasonable for the county to pay such expenses of the officers here in question than it would be to pay tuition and other expenses incurred in sending any other county officials to school in order that they may better qualify themselves for the discharge of their official duties. Shanks v. Com. 219 Ky. 212, 292 S.W. 837."

To the same effect are numerous cases from other jurisdictions, many of which have been cited by the attorney general in opposition to this petition.

On the contrary, the cases of Tousley v. Leach, 180 Minn. 293, 230 N.W. 788, and Lindquist v. Abbett, 196 Minn. 233, 265 N.W. 54, upon which the petitioner relies, do hold that officers or employees may recover traveling expenses incurred in attending conventions of similar officers for the purpose of securing general knowledge and information which would enable them to perform their particular duties more efficiently.

[7] While it is difficult to draw the line between legitimate services which may be deemed to constitute state business, and those which are not included therein, we are satisfied that the purpose for which an officer attends a convention must have some direct connection with the fulfillment of his own public duties in the department in which he is employed, to entitle him to recover traveling expenses incident thereto. We are not in accord with the two previously cited Minnesota cases in that regard. In our judgment they too greatly extend the so-called discretionary right to allow such claims, and they encourage the reckless approval of illegal demands for expenses incurred in so-called "junketing" expeditions.

[8] In the present case, however, the petition clearly states that Mr. Madden incurred necessary traveling expenses in attending the convention of law enforcement officers at Reno, not only for the purpose of securing expert information and knowledge of modern methods of apprehending and convicting violators of the narcotic laws, so as to administer the duties of his own office more efficiently, but also "to secure the cooperation of other law enforcement officials" of the several states of this Union and of the Federal authorities, to enable him to better enforce the narcotic laws of the State of California. The securing of cooperation, reciprocity and aid of the peace officers of other states, who constantly deal with offenders against the narcotic traffic, would clearly enable the claimant to obtain better enforcement of the narcotic laws in California. Certainly this renders the attendance of that convention, by the chief of the Division of Narcotic Enforcement, state business. That aid would help to more efficiently enforce the law in California, and to fulfill the very official duties for which the claimant is employed. There is a clear distinction between the cases previously cited which involve the payment of claims for traveling expenses incurred in attending conventions for purely educational purposes, and the present proceeding. We are therefore of the opinion the petition alleges facts sufficient to justify the issuance of the writ as prayed for.

The demurrer is overruled. The cause may be placed on the calendar for hearing on its merits.

Where broker fulfills all conditions of his employment, his principal's failure to carry out contract secured by broker does not affect broker's right to commission.

7. Brokers ⇨60

The voluntary abandonment of contract for sale of scrap iron by parties thereto did not affect right of broker securing contract for purchaser, to recover commission, in absence of provision in brokerage agreement making payment of commission contingent on performance of terms of sale contract.

The right of broker, securing contract for sale of scrap iron to his principal, to recover commission under brokerage contract, providing for payment to him of agreed sum per ton of material purchased "upon delivery and complete shipment and payment of the purchase price", did not fall with termination of sale contract because of principal's failure to supply vessel for shipment of materials as required by such contract.

In action to recover broker's commission for procuring sale of scrap iron to defendant, whether amount of tonnage contracted for was unavailable at agreed shipping point, so as to render immaterial defendant's failure to furnish vessel for shipment thereof as required by sale contract, was not question of expert knowledge, but a fact question, with trial court's determination of which, reviewing court may not interfere.

11. Brokers ⇨88(14)

In action to recover broker's commission for procuring sale of scrap iron to defendant, trial court's correct finding that there was no shortage in agreed tonnage available at shipping point rendered immaterial question whether broker's contract was executed under material mutual mistake of fact as to quantity of scrap iron available and hence unenforceable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Action by R. E. Clark against the Dulien Steel Products, Incorporated, and another, to recover broker's commissions for procuring a contract for purchase and sale of scrap iron. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Milton D. Sapiro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment against them for broker's commissions arising from negotiations resulting in a contract for the purchase and sale of scrap iron.

In the fall of 1939 plaintiff's assignor, Joseph Rosenberg, interested Louis Dulien, the president of the Dulien Steel Products, Inc. in the purchase of scrap iron located at Guaymas, Mexico. Mr. Dulien was advised by Rosenberg that approximately 5,000 tons of the scrap, owned by Banco Commercial del Pacifico, for whom Thomas de Reuda acted as agent, was available. Following meetings between Rosenberg and the above representatives of the prospective buyer and seller, a contract was entered into whereby the Banco Commercial del Pacific, S. A. agreed "to sell and the buyer [Dulien Steel Products, Inc.] hereby agrees to buy the following quantity of scrap iron, namely, from four thousand five hundred (4,500) to five thousand (5,000) kilos tons located at Guaymas, Mexico, and consisting of ship scrap and/or railroad scrap. * * *" It was agreed that shipment should be made within ninety days of the date of the contract, October 20, 1939, the buyer undertaking to supply a vessel at Guaymas within such period. The contract further provided that the buyer was to establish a letter of credit for the sum of eighty-five thousand dollars in favor of the seller; and that the seller establish a $20,000 guarantee with a San Francisco bank to secure performance on its part.

Several days after the signing of the contract, Rosenberg, who was acting for the buyer, presented to Dulien for signature a contract for broker's commissions, which set forth that whereas Rosenberg "has rendered services, as a broker, in the consummation of the sale of approximately 5,000 tons of iron ship scrap located at the City of Guaymas, * * * Mexico, * * * second party [Dulien Steel Products, Inc.] * * * agrees to pay to first party [Rosenberg] the sum of $1.50 per each gross ton of such scrap purchased by second party, as aforesaid, immediately upon payment of the purchase price of such scrap. * * *" Dulien objected to the latter part of the above quoted portion of the contract and inserted in his handwriting words [which we have italicized] making the commission payable "immediately upon delivery and complete shipment and payment of the purchase price of such scrap. * * *" The change was initialed by both Rosenberg and Dulien.

About a week later, defendant Hyman-Michaels Company signed a contract with the Dulien Steel Products, Inc., for a one-half interest in the Banco-Dulien contract of October 20, 1939, to which reference was made, with a right to one-half of any profit, and an obligation for one-half of any loss, arising therefrom.

The contract for the purchase of the scrap was never performed. There is evidence that the buyers were unable to get a vessel to Guaymas within the period provided; there is also some evidence that the sellers were unable to secure permits for the export of the scrap from Mexico. The contract was mutually cancelled, without, however, any participation or knowledge on the part of Rosenberg.

In the meantime, an action had been brought by plaintiff, assignee of Rosenberg, against defendants, for the commission claimed to be due as brokerage. The court made findings in his favor and awarded judgment against defendants and each of them in the sum of $6,700, based upon a purchase of 4,500 tons of scrap iron.

The appellants admit the execution of the contract with Rosenberg, but claim it was conditional; that commissions, in accordance with their contract, were to be paid only if the sale in connection with which it was to be earned was consummated; that the contract was void as the result of a mutual and material mistake of fact, in this, that only 1,875 tons of scrap were on hand for shipment from Guaymas; that there had been a complete misunderstanding among all the parties as to the amount there available. In this regard, appellants claim that in any event if Rosenberg was entitled to any commission, which they strenuously deny, he was entitled to a commission of $2,812.50 only, based upon the 1,875 tons procurable.

Respondent claims to be entitled to the full commissions; that the shipment of the scrap material was prevented solely by the default of the purchaser in not furnishing a vessel for its shipment.

Appellants base their appeal upon alleged errors of law and contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence and that the measure of damages applied is incorrect.

The trial court found that the contract was never executed, not by reason of any fault on the part of the seller, but solely due to the failure of the purchasers [appellants herein] within ninety days to provide a vessel for shipment of the scrap, of which it also found that it was not proven there were only 1,875 tons available at Guaymas. It further found that it was not true that the seller failed to perform by reason of its inability to deliver in excess of that amount or for any other reason, and that it was not true that the contracts were executed under a material mistake of fact, i. e., as to the existence of the amount of scrap sold.

[1-4] Objection is made that there is no legal justification for the court's finding in favor of respondent on his cause of action on the common counts while at the same time finding for him on the express contract; in other words, that "the action upon the written contract precludes an action on quantum meruit." The doctrine in Gabrielson v. Hague Box & Lumber Co., 55 Wash. 342, 104 P. 635, 133 Am.St.Rep. 1032, cited in support of this contention, was repudiated in Staples v. Esary, 130 Wash. 521, 228 P. 514, 515, where the court said: "Text-books and decisions might be cited to the point of exhaustion, confirming the rule that a plaintiff may, where he is seeking but one recovery, plead in the alternative either upon an express contract or in quantum meruit." The rule in the Staples case is the law of California. City of Los Angeles v. Blondeau, 127 Cal.App. 136, 15 P.2d 553; Goldwater v. Oltman, 210 Cal. 408, 292 P. 624, 71 A.L.R. 871. If, in the statement of facts, the causes of action be antagonistic, it is the duty of the court, upon the submission of the case, to determine which has been sustained. Beatty v. Pacific States S. & L. Co., 4 Cal.App. 2d 692, 41 P.2d 378. In the present case, it is claimed that there was no evidence as to reasonable value of the services performed. If so, the finding on such count in that respect is surplusage and does not injure appellants. There is no inconsistency in setting forth a cause of action in two counts, contract and indebitatus assumpsit, when each refers to the same subject matter, and all that is necessary to determine is the amount due.

As to appellants' contention that in any event respondent was not entitled to commissions based upon the sale of 4,500 tons of scrap since 1,875 tons only could have been delivered and that payment to him should be limited to an amount based upon such tonnage, the trial court found that there was no shortage in material, and that appellants could have had the amount contracted for had they supplied the vessel for its shipment. Because of the conclusion we have reached herein on other questions, it is not necessary further to consider appellants' claim that there could be no damages in excess of $2,812.50, based upon the reduced tonnage.

[5, 6] Unless a contract places additional burdens upon a broker, the general rule is that when in good faith he has secured for his principal a buyer or seller, ready, willing and able to sell or purchase, as the case may be, on terms agreed upon, and within a time limit, he is entitled to his commission. If the broker fulfills all of the conditions of his employment, the fact that his principal fails to carry out the contract does not affect the former's rights. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 P. 254; S. H. West & Co. v. Wagner, 117 Cal.App. 523, 4 P.2d 276. It should be noted in this case that not only did appellants contract with the party procured by the agent, but they further secured a $20,000 guarantee to insure the performance of the contract entered into. While such contract was eventually cancelled, it was only after the sellers of the scrap had brought suit against appellants [the purchasers]. The terms of settlement between the principals, arrived at more than ninety days after the date of their contract, are not shown by the record, neither does it appear, as stated, that the broker took any part therein.

[7] Unless the wording of the agreement with the broker made payment of his commission contingent upon the performance of the terms of the contract between the seller and the buyer or any of them, the voluntary abandonment of it by them could not affect the broker's rights. The readiness, willingness and ability of the seller was demonstrated by the buyer entering into a contract with it. Avis v. Rebhan, 92 Cal.App. 178, 267 P. 898; Johnson v. Krier, 59 Cal.App. 330, 210 P. 966; Mc-

Namara v. Steckman, 202 Cal. 569, 262 P. 297; Grove v. Lewis, 125 Cal.App. 357, 13 P.2d 847.

[8] On the strength of the wording of the broker's contract, which recited that he was to be paid $1.50 per ton of material purchased "upon delivery and complete shipment and payment of the purchase price," appellants contend that the broker's right to recover fell with the termination of the contract for the sale of the scrap iron. If, as the court found, the failure of "delivery and complete shipment" was due to the principals' fault, the broker's right should not be prejudiced. The words added by Mr. Dulien to the broker's contract merely provide a time for the payment of services already rendered, not a limitation of his right thereto. The question naturally arises as to whether there is evidence in the record indicating fault on the part of the principals. Assuming that the inserted words could be interpreted as constituting a condition precedent to the payment of the broker's commission, if the trial court made a correct finding of fault on the part of appellants, this phase of the case is at an end.

[9, 10] The record shows that appellants did not actually furnish a vessel for the shipment of the scrap, although they did endeavor to charter one. They attempt to establish that their failure to do so was immaterial since the amount of tonnage contracted for was not available at Guaymas. The burden of proving these claims was upon appellants. A dealer in scrap and metals engaged in business in Mexico City testified that he was familiar with the quantity of scrap at Guaymas; that there were only 1,875 tons. If it should be assumed that his testimony was correct, still it does not appear that such information was communicated to appellants until after the time fixed for the supplying of the vessel had expired. A reading of the testimony of this witness shows certain weaknesses and personal interest in the matter sufficient to justify the trier of the facts in discounting his testimony. The trial court was of the opinion that appellants had not satisfactorily borne their burden of sustaining the affirmative defense. The issue in this respect is not one requiring expert knowledge but is a question purely of fact, a matter in which a reviewing court may not interfere.

[11] Appellants contend that the broker's contract was executed under a material mistake of fact as to the quantity of scrap iron available, which rendered it unenforceable. The court explicitly found that there was no "material or any mistake" as to the quantity of scrap. This finding is inseparable from the finding that a shortage in tonnage was not proven. Having determined the correctness of the latter finding, the claim as to mutual mistake is immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEZOLD v. AMALGAMATED MEAT CUTTERS AND BUTCHER WORKMEN OF NORTH AMERICA, et al.

Civ. 13587.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.
Aug. 20, 1942.

1. Torts 🔑10

"Picketing" may be lawful, though no labor dispute between employer and his employees exists and object of picketing is to unionize a place of business in which none of pickets are employed.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Picketing".

2. Injunction 🔑101(3)

In action to enjoin picketing of plaintiff's market, facts, alleged in complaint, revealed by evidence, and found by trial court, that picketers warned prospective customers not to enter market because there might be trouble or they would get hurt, that number of pickets varied from two to 37 spaced a foot apart, and that they parked 10 to 12 automobiles with banners occupying almost all of space in front of market and paraded back and forth on sidewalk, established unlawful "picketing" entitling plaintiff to injunctive relief.

3. Torts 🔑10

Picketing by organized group is more than exercise of "free speech", since it involves patrol of particular locality and may induce action irrespective of nature of ideas being disseminated, so that it is subject to restrictive regulation.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Free Speech".

4. Injunction 🔑101(3)

Picketing, wherein persuasion brought to bear contains threat of physical violence, is unlawful, and use of words and aggregation of pickets reasonably inducing fear of physical molestation may properly be enjoined.

5. Injunction 🔑190

In action to enjoin picketing of plaintiff's market, where evidence showed that persons desiring to enter market were not required to force their way through picket chain, that no court order was violated, and that not even technical battery was committed by any picket on any person, and there was no evidence supporting trial court's findings that threats of physical violence were voiced against plaintiff's employees and that one of them was physically interfered with, trial court erred in concluding that defendants forfeited their privilege of peaceful picketing and should be permanently enjoined from picketing market.

6. Injunction 🔑101(1, 3)

Labor union members' use of sidewalk in front of market for purpose of spreading propaganda against operation thereof on Sundays and holidays may not be prohibited by injunction, but limitation may be placed on number of picketers using walk and manner of its use, so as to prevent intimidation of or undue interference with its use by market owner's customers.

7. Injunction 🔑189

An injunction against labor union's maintenance of picket lines interfering with free ingress and egress to and from market and adjoining parking lot held too broad as enjoining lawful acts and acts neither done nor threatened by such unions.

8. Injunction 🔑189

A decree in equity, enjoining doing of acts which parties enjoined have neither done nor threatened to do, so far as appears from evidence, is improper.

9. Injunction 🔑128

In action to enjoin picketing of plaintiff's market, evidence that pickets carried banners bearing statements, "Sunday should be a day of rest", "Free the slaves", "All union markets are closed Sunday and Monday", "We ask that all labor be given one holiday per year", "The only market in the county working its help today", etc., did not warrant judgment enjoining defendants from maintaining pickets bearing banners containing false, libelous, and misleading statements or statements calculated to convey threat of physical violence.

10. Injunction 🔑128

A judgment enjoining labor unions from placing pickets in front of plaintiff's place of business for purpose of influencing any person, firm, or corporation to refrain from selling or delivering merchandise to plaintiff or influencing truck drivers or other employees of plaintiff or corporations selling merchandise to plaintiff to refrain from delivering merchandise to such place by any means calculated to intimidate or create fear of physical violence in such persons, held improper as enjoining lawful picketing or doing of acts which defendants had neither done nor threatened to do so far as evidence disclosed.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

In this action brought to enjoin the defendants from picketing plaintiff's market, the complaint, proof and findings of fact each made out a case entitling the plaintiff to injunctive relief. The judgment which was entered, however, granted relief beyond that authorized.

The complaint states a cause of action. Much of it is taken up with a recital of facts which, summed up, establish that plaintiff's twenty-four employees were entirely satisfied with their hours of labor, wages and working conditions, were united in a union of their own, not affiliated with any other, and that no labor dispute existed between them and the plaintiff. The defendants were labor organizations and officials, it is alleged, who had conspired to compel plaintiff's employees to join their ranks. To accomplish their object the defendants picketed plaintiff's premises, using banners and the spoken word in an endeavor to convince those who were expected to deliver produce to the plaintiff's market that they should not do so; to dissuade would-be purchasers from buying; and to persuade plaintiff's employees that it was to their interest to join the defendants' unions.

[1] These facts, without others, and unaffected by any legislation that "has undertaken to balance the effort of the employer to carry on his business free from the interference of others against the effort of labor to further its economic self-interest" (Carpenters & Joiners Union v. Ritter's Cafe, 1942, 62 S.Ct. 897, 808, 86 L.Ed. 1143), do not constitute a cause of action. Picketing may be lawful, although no labor dispute between the employer and employee exists (Magill Bros. v. Building Service, etc., Union, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 506, 127 P.2d 542, and cases cited) and though the object of the picketing be to unionize a place of business in which none of the pickets are employed. American Federation of Labor v. Swing, 1941, 312 U.S. 321, 61 S.Ct. 568, 85 L.Ed. 855; Magill Bros. v. Building Service, etc., Union, supra, 20 Cal.2d 506, 127 P.2d 542.

[2-4] The complaint contains further averments, however. It is there alleged and it was revealed by the evidence and found by the trial court that those engaged in picket duty did not limit their activities to making known their grievances against the plaintiff, nor confine to appeals to reason their endeavors to persuade would-be customers not to deal with plaintiff. Among other things they stated to them: "Don't go in there lady, there might be trouble"; "Better stay out of there or you will get hurt"; "There she goes, we'll get her next"; "Don't go into that parking lot mister, if you do you won't get back out." Concerning the fact that the picketing was so conducted as to block the entrance to plaintiff's market, the complaint only alleges that the pickets varied in number from two to thirty-seven, but from the evidence it appears not only that the number of pickets varied from two to thirty-seven, but that on the first day they parked ten to twelve automobiles, with banners, occupying almost all the space in front of plaintiff's market, and then twenty-five pickets, carrying banners some two by four feet in size, paraded on the sidewalk back and forth across the sixty-foot front of the market. On the occasion when the picket line reached its peak and thirty-seven were involved, they were spaced a foot apart. The picketing continued for a week, when it ceased in deference to a temporary restraining order. After Sunday and Labor Day each day began with only two or three pickets on duty, but the number increased as the day wore on until in the evenings there would be "quite a parade"; one evening there were seventeen to nineteen on hand. Of these numbers, it would seem, two were always on the parking lot reserved for plaintiff's customers, next door to his market.

From these facts it appears that the picketing was beyond that now established as lawful. We recognize the fact that inherent in the labor practice of picketing there usually is, as in the case under review there undoubtedly was, an exercise of the constitutionally protected right freely to communicate ideas. But it would be stubbornly refusing to admit the obvious not to see in the activities of picketing on many occasions more than the mere expression of ideas. As stated by Mr. Justice Douglas, in an opinion concurred in by two of his associates in Bakery & Pastry Drivers, etc., v. Wohl, 1942, 62 S.Ct. 816, 86 L.Ed. 1178, and quoted by our Supreme Court in Magill Bros. v. Building Service, etc., Union, supra, 20 Cal.2d 506, 510, 127 P.2d 542, 544: " 'Picketing by an organized group is more than free speech, since it involves patrol of a particular locality and since the very presence of a picket line may induce action of one kind or another, quite irrespective of the nature of the ideas which are being disseminated. Hence those aspects of picketing make it the subject of restrictive regulation.' " In Magill Bros. v. Building Service, etc., Union, just cited, it was held, accordingly, that "There can be no doubt that untruthful picketing is unlawful picketing" and that an injunction, limited to a correction of the unlawful aspect of the picketing, was proper. Equally without doubt it is that picketing, wherein the persuasion brought to bear contains a threat of physical violence, is unlawful, and that the use of words and an aggregation of pickets which reasonably induce fear of physical molestation may properly be enjoined. Lisse v. Local Union No. 31, 1935, 2 Cal.2d 312, 317, 41 P.2d 314, 316; McKay v. Retail Auto., etc., Union, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 311, 320, 106 P.2d 373, 378; Steiner v. Long Beach Local, etc., Union, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 676, 682, 123 P.2d 20, 24, 25.

The injunction issued in this case, however, was too broad. After its preliminary recitals the judgment that was entered continues:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendants, and each of them, their agents, servants, representatives and employes be and they are hereby permanently enjoined and restrained from doing or attempting to do any of the following acts:

"(a) Maintaining picket lines which interfere with free ingress and egress to and from that business and the adjoining parking lot at 847 Main Street, Santa Paula, California;

"(b) Maintining pickets bearing banners containing false, libelous, and misleading statements and/or statements calculated to convey a threat of physical violence;

"(c) And enjoining any picket or representative while picketing from making any statements false, libelous and misleading, and/or calculated to convey a threat of physical violence;

"(d) Stationing or placing in front of or in the vicinity of plaintiff's business, pickets or representatives for the purpose of influencing or inducing or attempting to influence or induce any person to refrain from entering plaintiff's business, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing or attempting to influence or induce any person to refrain from purchasing any goods, wares, merchandise or other articles sold by plaintiff, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing or attempting to influence or induce any of plaintiff's employes to refrain from continuing in plaintiff's service, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing or attempting to influence or induce such employes to become members of the defendant unincorporated associations or their locals, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing any person, firm or corporation or attempting to influence or induce any such person, firm or corporation to refrain from selling or delivering merchandise and commodities to plaintiff, or to refrain from having business or contractual dealings with plaintiff, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing or attempting to influence or induce truck drivers or other employes of plaintiff or corporations selling and delivering merchandise and commodities to plaintiff to refrain from delivering to plaintiff's business merchandise and commodities ordered or intended for delivery thereto by any means calculated to intimidate or create fear in said person or persons of physical violence.

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that plaintiff recover the sum of $1,020.55 from the defendants, and each of them, by way of damages to plaintiff's business and the good will thereof."

[5] The facts of this case do not make out an aggravated or persistent case of mass picketing nor of any physical violence. Those who desired to enter plaintiff's market were not required to force their way through a picket chain, save possibly on one occasion. At the worst at all other times they had but to wait the passing of the picket line at a given point and enter the market before it returned to that point. There was no picketing in defiance of a court order. Nor was there even a technical battery committed by any of the pickets upon any person, whether customer, deliveryman or employee. True, in the complaint it was alleged and the trial court found it to be a fact that a threat "to get" plaintiff's meat department manager was made followed by the placing of pickets at his residence, but there is nothing in the evidence to bear this out. It was further found that certain threats of physical violence were voiced against plaintiff's employees, as the complaint alleged, but again the evidence fails to give the finding any support. Nor does the evidence justify a further finding that one of plaintiff's employees, while obtaining merchandise for plaintiff at a place remote from the market, was physically interfered with, although it does appear that he was called a name that should always be accompanied by a smile, that he was termed a scab, and that on the employee's return trip one of those who had been on the picket line drove his car back and forth across the road ahead of the employee's vehicle.

The picture, then, while not that of a peaceful, lawful, picket line, engaging only in practices protected by the state and federal constitutions, is yet not one in which acts of violence have so stamped themselves upon the scene that for a time at least even peaceful picketing will reflect the events of the past and appear to threaten the personal safety of customers or others, with the result that all picketing must be enjoined in order to afford the plaintiff adequate protection; and the trial court did not find this to be so as a fact. That is to say, those facts found by the trial court that are supported by the evidence do not bring this case within the principles applied in Steiner v. Long Beach Local, etc., Union, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 676, 123 P.2d 20, and Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 1941, 312 U.S. 287, 61 S.Ct. 552, 85 L.Ed. 836, 132 A.L.R. 1200. The trial court erred, therefore, in arriving at the conclusion of law "That in this case * * * defendants have forfeited their privilege of peaceful picketing," and in expressing the further conclusion that the defendants should be permanently enjoined from "having pickets in front of or in the vicinity of plaintiff's business * * *."

[6, 7] The judgment is too broad, therefore, in that it enjoins acts which are lawful, and it is also too broad in that it enjoins acts neither done nor threatened to be done. Subdivision (a), quoted above, is couched in somewhat different language but is the same in scope as the provision of the Yuba County ordinance, considered in In re Bell, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 488, 122 P.2d 22, 27, which in terms made it unlawful "for any person to loiter, stand, or sit upon any public highway, * * * sidewalk or crosswalk so as to in any manner hinder or obstruct the free passage * * * of persons or vehicles * * *." This language, the supreme court stated (page 497 of 19 Cal.2d, page 27 of 122 P.2d) "encompasses conduct that is well within the bounds of peaceful picketing sanctioned by the guarantees of due process of law. Thus a picket may be peaceful even though he loiters, stands, or sits upon a public highway, alley, sidewalk, or crosswalk, and thereby constitutes to some extent an obstruction to the free passage of persons and vehicles or an annoyance to persons who do not approve of his presence." A picket line, no matter how small and peaceful, if on the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's market, would to some extent obstruct the free passage of persons, that is to say, interfere with their free ingress and egress to and from plaintiff's market. The foreordained disapproval of the sweeping language of the ordinance, expressed in In re Bell, supra, 19 Cal.2d page 497, 122 P.2d 22, applies with equal force to the sweeping language of the judgment. The defendants have a right to use the public sidewalk in front of plaintiff's market for the purpose of spreading their propaganda. Plaintiff has a right to have his customers use the sidewalk for the purpose of entering and leaving his market. Neither right is exclusive; each may, fortunately, be exercised without a denial of the other, although each may interfere with the other. Defendants' use of the sidewalk may not be prohibited, but there may be a limitation placed upon the number using it and the manner of use, so that there is neither intimidation nor undue interference with its use by plaintiff's customers. Subdivision (a) of the judgment, however, constitutes a greater restriction than the facts found warrant.

[8, 9] The judgment further enjoins the doing of acts which the defendants have neither done nor threatened to do, so far as appears from the evidence, a field in which a decree in equity should not trespass. Cameron v. Feather River Forest Homes, 1934, 139 Cal.App. 373, 378, 33 P.2d 884; Chrisman v. Culinary Workers' Local Union, 1941, 46 Cal.App.2d 129, 134, 115 P.2d 553; Hitchman Coal & C. Co. v. Mitchell, 1917, 245 U.S. 229, 262, 38 S.Ct. 65, 62 L.Ed. 260, 281, L.R.A.1918C, 497, Ann.Cas.1918B, 461; 32 C.J. 379. We have not heretofore had occasion to note the statements appearing on the banners which the pickets carried, in addition to wearing "A. F. of L." arm bands; they were these: "Some merchants take 24 hours to do 8 hours work. How slow are you?" "We have a list of fair merchants. Is your name there?" "Sunday should be a day of rest. Do you enjoy yours?" "I don't work on Sundays and Holidays. Why do you?" "We are carrying on what Lincoln started. Free the slaves." "My baby has milk today. I arranged for it on Saturday." "Are your competitors reasonable. Some of ours are." "All Union Markets are closed Sunday and Monday. Are Yours?" "All fair merchants advertize that they will close Sunday and Monday."

"We ask that all labor be given one holiday per year." "Is that fair?" "S. P. Mkt. the only Mkt. in the County working its help today." "I don't work on Sundays or holidays. Why do you?" "Some employers are men. Others are exploiters. Which are you?" "This is the only Mkt. open today in this County. There is one small grocery store open here in Santa Paula. Please locate same." "We are acquainted with our families. Are you?" "We belong to the Union. Why can't you?" "Some work from 12 to ? We work from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m." Nowhere in the findings is it found as a fact that any one of these statements was false, libelous or misleading, and they do not appear to be as a matter of law. Indeed in the complaint it is not claimed that any of them were, although it is alleged that the pickets were "so stationed * * * so as to cause prospective customers and the general public wrongfully to believe that an actual labor dispute exists" and, further, that plaintiff lost many customers because of the signs causing them to believe that a strike existed. As pointed out in C. S. Smith Met. Market Co. v. Lyons, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 389, 394, 106 P.2d 414, the presence of pickets is not a sound ground for the inference that a strike has been called or that a labor dispute between employer and employee exists, and the making of statements such as those noted should not be characterized as fraudulent because some persons jumped to the wrong conclusion. Nor can it be argued that any of these banners carried a threat of physical violence. There was no basis, therefore, for the provisions of subdivision (b) of the judgment enjoining the defendants from maintaining pickets bearing banners containing false, libelous and misleading statements or banners calculated to convey a threat of physical violence.

[10] We are at a loss just how to interpret subdivision (d) of the judgment, but any of the possible interpretations requires us to disapprove it as a part of the judgment. This portion of the judgment would be entirely in harmony with the conclusion of law that the defendants had "forfeited their privilege of peaceful picketing," but for the words with which it ends: "by any means calculated to intimidate or create fear in said person or persons of physical violence." Insofar as the words of this phrase apply, the injunction is not against all picketing, but only against that which is unlawful because made under threats of physical molestation. If we look only to the punctuation, we conclude that the phrase applies only to stationing pickets to influence "truck drivers, or other employees of plaintiff or corporations," leaving the injunction one against even peaceful picketing as to all others mentioned. This interpretation, however, is unsatisfactory in that "truck drivers" and "other employees" would seem to be unlikely antecedents of "said person or persons." But if the qualifying words at the end of the subdivision apply only to the prior provisions where a "person" or "persons" are mentioned, again we have left provisions which would enjoin perfectly lawful picketing. If we take the only remaining interpretation of this uncertain subdivision of the judgment and determine that the concluding phrase applies to all the provisions immediately preceding it, whether they refer to a "person" or to "employees," "truck drivers," "firms" or "corporation", then again we have the judgment forbidding the defendants from doing that which they have neither done nor threatened to do, so far as the evidence discloses. For example, there is no proof that any picket endeavored, by means calculated to intimidate or create fear of physical violence, to influence any of plaintiff's employees to quit his service.

We have concluded that the judgment should be reversed rather than modified at our hands because of a combination of circumstances. In some particulars, as we have noted, the findings are not supported by the evidence and in an unknown part the damages awarded seem to be dependent upon the facts found but not proved to exist. The evidence, moreover, was acquired in large part as a result of a stipulation that "the statements contained in the affidavits may be deemed to be testified to here as if they were in court testifying." The affidavits referred to were those filed in support of plaintiff's application for a temporary restraining order. Without holding that evidence so obtained may not properly be used, we find worthy of reference the opinion of it expressed by Judge Amidon in Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Brosseau, D.C.1923, 286 F. 414, 416: "The experience both upon the hearings as to whether a preliminary injunction should issue, and upon the contempt proceedings, have convinced me that affidavits are an untrustworthy guide for judicial action.

That is the case in all legal proceedings, but it is peculiarly true of litigation growing out of a strike, where feelings on both sides are necessarily wrought up, and the desire for victory is likely to obscure nice moral questions and poison the minds of men by prejudice. * * * Experience, as I have stated, has caused me to be so incredulous of affidavits that I have required in all important matters the presence of the chief witnesses upon each side at the hearing." Lastly, we note that these affidavits were filed in September, 1937; the trial at which they were adopted as testimony was held April, 1938; the findings of fact and judgment were filed February, 1941. That a judgment may be entered in which the present equities of both parties may be safeguarded, we deem it advisable that the judgment now entered be reversed, without limitation, so that a new trial may be had after the filing of amended or supplemental pleadings, if that be the desire of the parties.

The judgment, therefore, is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

Action to annul a judgment setting aside an estate to a widow. Judgment for plaintiff reversed with directions.

Action by Laura Johnson against Odeal M. Johnson to annul a decree in probate, whereby the estate of Cornelius A. Johnson, deceased, was set aside to Odeal M. Johnson as deceased's widow, on ground of fraud in procurement of the decree. From an adverse judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial and denying defendant's motion for order vacating the judgment appealed from and for the entry of new and different conclusions of law, and a new and different judgment in favor of the defendant, the defendant appeals.

Judgment reversed with directions to enter judgment for defendant and appeal from order dismissed.

Harold B. Pool and Robert G. Johnson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sylvester Isonberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

This is an appeal from a final judgment; from an order denying the motion of the defendant for a new trial and denying the motion of said defendant for an order vacating the judgment appealed from, and for the entry of new and different conclusions of law and a new and different judgment in favor of said defendant, pursuant to the provisions of sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action is one against appellant to annul a decree in probate whereby the estate of one Cornelius A. Johnson, deceased, was set aside to appellant as his widow, pursuant to the provisions of section 640 of the Probate Code. The complaint in the instant action was based upon fraud in the procurement of the decree in question, and the trial court found for the plaintiff, the mother of the deceased, and entered judgment accordingly.

The complaint herein alleges that said Cornelius A. Johnson died intestate in the city of Los Angeles on or about the 11th day of March, 1940, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property; that said deceased left no surviving spouse or widow, no children, and no father; that the plaintiff is the surviving mother of said deceased and, as such, is entitled to all of the property of decedent. That on the 11th day of June, 1940, by proceedings duly instituted and prosecuted in the Probate Department of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County appellant herein, "by pretending and falsely representing herself to be the surviving spouse or widow of said deceased and thereby deceiving said Court and this plaintiff into such belief, in her petition and showing in Case No. 194137 in the records of said Probate Court, and by her general appearances, to such effect, induced and caused said Probate Court to make and enter its decree setting apart and assigning absolutely unto said defendant (appellant) all of the aforesaid property as the surviving spouse of said deceased under section 640 of the Probate Code." The complaint then alleges that the appellant is not the surviving spouse of said deceased and was not such surviving spouse at the date of making and entering of said decree in probate, nor at any other time; and that appellant practiced deception, imposition and fraud upon the probate court and plaintiff by falsely representing herself to be the surviving spouse of said deceased. The portion of the complaint which sets forth facts relied upon to show the fraud of appellant is as follows:

"(a) That on the 20th day of October, 1930, said defendant, by and under the name of Odeal Talamon, procured and had entered an interlocutory decree of divorce from one James C. Talamon in the case entitled: 'Odeal Talamon, Plaintiff, vs. James C. Talamon, Defendant, No. D-87638,' in the records of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles; and that said defendant never did obtain a final decree of divorce in said action, but the defedant therein, James C. Talamon, did obtain such final decree of divorce on the 23rd day of May, 1941.

"(b) Plaintiff alleges on information and belief that subsequent to the entering of said interlocutory decree of divorce, and the particular date is unknown to this plaintiff, said defendant deliberately devised a scheme to defraud plaintiff of her expected right, title and interest in and to the aforesaid property and that pursuant thereto said defendant gained influence over said deceased and his confidence so as to impress him that she was an unmarried woman; that by and under the name of Odeal Pecot said defendant contracted marriage with said deceased and induced him to accompany her to the City of Santa Ana in the County of Orange in this State and then and there did go through a purported marriage ceremony under a license issued under said name of Odeal Pecot; that said deceased believed that defendant was an unmarried woman capable of contracting and entering into a valid marriage, as also did this plaintiff all time thereafter, except as hereinafter shown.

"(c) That the procurement of said interlocutory decree of divorce by defendant from said James C. Talamon on October 20, 1930, and the great lapse of time subsequent thereto and false representations of defendant as to her marital status, deceived plaintiff into the false belief that said defendant was an unmarried woman when she entered into said marriage with said deceased; that said defendant kept her failure to obtain said final decree of divorce cunningly concealed from the plaintiff and the deceased by her conduct and deportment as an unmarried woman; and that plaintiff only learned of such failure to obtain said final decree of divorce within the past thirty (30) days."

It is then alleged that because of the falsehood and deception on the part of appellant, plaintiff was deceived into the belief that appellant was the legal surviving spouse of said deceased when said decree was entered by the probate court assigning all of said property of the deceased to appellant as such; and that plaintiff was thereby prevented from presenting the proper opposition thereto, all of which deception, falsehood and fraud prevented a presentation of plaintiff's right to all of the said property of said deceased, as his only heir.

A copy of the probate decree in question is attached to the complaint as an exhibit and, with the exception of the itemized list of the property of the estate, reads as follows:

"The verified petition herein of Odeal M. Johnson, by Robert G. Johnson, her attorney, for letters of administration or to assign estate, coming on regularly this 11th day of June, 1940, for hearing by the Court, all notices of said hearing having been given as required by law, and objections having been presented, and the evidence having been heard, the Court hereby overrules the objections, and finds that the net value of the whole estate of said deceased, over and above all liens or encumbrances of record at the date of death of said deceased, does not exceed the sum of $2500.00; that the expenses of the last illness of said deceased, funeral charges and expenses of administration have been paid, and that the personal estate of the surviving spouse of said deceased does not exceed the sum of $5000.00.

"It is therefore Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed by the Court that the petition for letters of administration is hereby denied, and that the whole of the estate of said Cornelius A. Johnson, deceased, be and the same is hereby assigned to, and that the title thereof shall vest absolutely in Odeal M. Johnson, the surviving spouse of said deceased, subject to whatever mortgages, liens or encumbrances there may have been thereon at the time of the death of said deceased."

Appellant's answer denied the allegations of fraud, denied that a final decree of divorce was not obtained in the divorce action referred to in the complaint until the 23rd day of May, 1941, and specifically alleged that the parties to said divorce action were entitled to a final decree of divorce on the 21st day of October, 1930, and that the final decree of divorce in said action had been entered therein as of said date. In a second separate defense appellant claimed that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Evidence introduced at the trial reveals that appellant married Cornelius A. Johnson on November 2, 1938, which was eight years after obtaining her interlocutory decree of divorce above mentioned. The record also reveals that the final judgment of divorce in the matter referred to was entered May 23, 1941; but said final judgment was later vacated on motion of appellant and a second final judgment was entered June 17, 1941, nunc pro tunc as of October 21, 1931, on the ground that through inadvertence the first judgment has been entered as of May 23, 1941, instead of October 21, 1931. Thereafter, and on September 29, 1941, another decree was entered vacating the judgments previously entered, except the interlocutory judgment, and granting appellant a final decree of divorce as of October 21, 1931. This last decree recites that it is made because of some doubt as to the validity of the nunc pro tunc final decree entered on June 17, 1941. The record shows that the plaintiff's case rests solely upon the fact that no final decree of divorce was entered until May 23, 1941.

The trial court found that in representing herself as the surviving spouse of the deceased appellant had fraudulently induced the probate court to enter the decree setting aside the deceased's estate to her, that at the date of deceased's death the marriage of appellant with her previous husband was still in existence and undissolved; and the court concluded that appellant was not the lawful wife of deceased at the time of his death and that appellant had perpetrated a constructive fraud upon the court in applying to have deceased's estate set aside to her; and that the decree in probate setting aside the estate to appellant was void.

The complaint contains no allegation, nor was there any evidence offered or finding made to the effect that appellant knew or believed that her representation to be the wife of the deceased was false. At the trial appellant testified that at the time of her second marriage she believed herself to be a single woman; that she was under the impression that her final decree of divorce had been obtained and that it was her understanding and belief that a final decree of divorce was automatically entered one year after the entry of the interlocutory decree. She also testified that she first learned that the final decree had not been entered on June 7, 1941. There is nothing in the record to controvert her testimony in this respect.

The first final judgment appears from the record to have been entered on May 23, 1941, at the request of counsel for appellant's prior husband.

[1-3] The respective contentions of the parties need not be set forth here. The foregoing demonstrates that plaintiff and respondent's action herein to have the decree in probate vacated is unfounded, and that the findings and conclusions of the trial court are not supported by the evidence. Though respondent alleged in her complaint that appellant's fraud prevented respondent from offering proper opposition to appellant's petition to have the estate set aside, there is no evidence that appellant made any representation to respondent or did any act to prevent respondent from fully defending or asserting any right she may have had to the property of the deceased. The only proper conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that both appellant and respondent, as well as the deceased, were laboring under a misapprehension as to the entry of the decree of divorce. Such circumstances fall far short of establishing a case of extrinsic fraud, even assuming any fraud at all to have been proven. It is well established, upon abundant authority, that to constitute grounds for equitable relief from a judgment, the fraud shown must be extrinsic or collateral to the question examined and determined in the proceedings resulting in the judgment or order. 15 Cal. Jur. 14, § 123, and cases cited.

"When the alleged fraud or coercion is of such nature that it may reasonably be presented to the court at the trial so as to afford full and fair protection to the rights of the interested parties and they fail or neglect to avail themselves of that opportunity, a court of equity will not disturb the judgment rendered under such circumstances, but will leave the parties in the position in which they placed themselves." Godfrey v. Godfrey, 30 Cal.App.2d 370, 379, 86 P.2d 357, 362. Any failure of respondent to have presented any defense or objection to appellant's petition in the probate court was not shown here to have been caused by any act or representation of appellant. It should be noted that the judgment of the trial court was merely based upon a finding of "constructive" fraud. Moreover, it does not appear from the evidence presented that at the hearing in probate, upon appellant's said petition, the court was not fully apprised of the circumstances of which respondent now complains, except for the testimony of appellant in the instant case to the effect that at the time of her petition to the probate court she was not aware that her final decree of divorce had not been entered.

It is not necessary here to pass upon the question of the effect of the entry nunc pro tunc of the final judgment of divorce. It should be noted, however, that section 133 of the Civil Code, as amended, (Stats. 1941, chap. 995, p. 2632, in effect on the ninety-first day after June 14, 1941), reads: "Whenever either of the parties in a divorce action is, under the law, entitled to a final judgment, but by mistake, negligence or inadvertence the same has not been signed, filed or entered, if no appeal has been taken from the interlocutory judgment or motion for a new trial made, the court, on the motion of either party thereto or upon its own motion, may cause a final judgment to be signed, dated, filed and entered therein granting the divorce as of the date when the same could have been given or made by the court if applied for. The court may cause such final judgment to be signed, dated, filed and entered nunc pro tunc as aforesaid, even though a final judgment may have been previously entered where by mistake, negligence or inadvertence the same has not been signed, filed or entered as soon as it could have been entered under the law if applied for. Upon the filing of such final judgment, the parties to such action shall be deemed to have been restored to the status of single persons as of the date affixed to such judgment, and any marriage of either of such parties subsequent to one year after the granting of the interlocutory judgment as shown by the minutes of the court, and after the final judgment could have been entered under the law if applied for, shall be valid for all purposes as of the date affixed to such final judgment, upon the filing thereof."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of defendant and appellant. The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial and denying motion of defendant for an order vacating the judgment appealed from and for the entry of a new and different judgment is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Gordon Thompson, Judge.

Action by Harriett E. Pease against the San Diego Unified School District and others to recover for personal injuries. The defendant Salvation Army, a corporation, filed motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. From a judgment for defendant Salvation Army so entered, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Hervey & Holt, of San Diego, and Henry F. Walker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred O. Reed, Henry E. Kappler, and Marvin Wellins, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages on account of injuries received by the plaintiff on May 7, 1941, as the result of a fall on an arcade walk between the main school building and the school auditorium on the San Diego High School grounds.

On this occasion the Salvation Army had rented the auditorium for an evening meeting. It had also secured from the defendant Stoll certain equipment for a public address system which was installed for use on this evening. As a part thereof a loud speaker was set up in front of the auditorium and connected with the rest of the system by laying an insulated wire on the ground, across this arcade walk, along the side of the building, and thence into the auditorium. The plaintiff, who had gone to the main school building in connection with the night school which was being held there, caught her foot on this wire as she was leaving and while passing over the arcade walk on her way to the street. There is evidence that the lights over this arcade walk near the place in question were not turned on at the time of the accident.

The plaintiff brought this action against the school district, Stoll, and the Salvation

Army. The court directed a verdict in favor of the school district and a judgment in favor of that defendant has become final. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, as against Stoll and the Salvation Army. The Salvation Army moved for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which motion was granted, and the plaintiff has appealed from the judgment then entered in favor of that defendant.

[1] While there is some contention that no act of negligence appears, the evidence, while conflicting, is sufficient to sustain the implied finding that this wire was laid across this walk in a negligent manner. The main controversy here is as to whether or not the person who placed the wire in that position was an agent or employee of this respondent. Respondent contends that Stoll was an independent contractor; that he was in charge of the installation of this equipment; and that the respondent had nothing to do therewith.

[2] There is evidence that some days before this meeting was to be held the secretary of respondent's advisory board, which was in charge of the arrangement for the meeting, telephoned to Stoll, who was in the business of supplying sound equipment for temporary use, with reference to having such equipment furnished on this occasion. Stoll testified that he told the person who telephoned that the price would be $15 with an extra charge of $2.50 if an additional loud speaker was desired on the outside of the building, and that he told this person that this price "doesn't cover the cost of the installation, it doesn't cover the installation because that is under the jurisdiction of the local Stage Hands' Union which has to be done by them." He further testified that he told this person that he "rented" the equipment "but the installation was under their jurisdiction"; that he offered to arrange for the man from the union to make the installation if this was desired or to let them talk to the man direct; that he gave the speaker the telephone number of Mr. Callahan, the business representative of the Stage Hands' Union; and that a day or two later the same person called back "to verify the agreement and the arrangements on this date set." Mr. Callahan testified that a man, who identified himself as Major Taylor and stated that he was speaking for the Salvation Army, telephoned to him and asked to have a man sent to the auditorium on the evening in question, and that he sent a stage hand by the name of Noble. Noble is the man who laid the wire in the position where it caused the trouble. There is some evidence that after he arrived on the scene Noble was directed by a representative of the Salvation Army to put a loud speaker in front of the building, and that he was told by a representative of Stoll to run the wire along the side of the building for the purpose of connecting it up, although there is no evidence that he was directed to lay the wire in the exact manner in which this was done. Later, the respondent paid Stoll with a check for $18 and gave another check for $8 to Callahan to pay for the service rendered by Noble. While there is other conflicting evidence, we think the evidence to which we have referred, with the reasonable inferences therefrom, is sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that Noble was acting as an employee and agent of the respondent.

[3] The respondent contends that the school district was in control of the arcade walk where the accident occurred; that the appellant was not the invitee of the respondent; that as to the respondent the appellant was a mere licensee; and that the only duty it owed to the appellant was to refrain from wilful harm or wilful entrapment. Both the appellant and the respondent were invitees of the owner of the premises and as such each was under the duty of using ordinary care with respect to matters which affected the safety of the other. Perry v. D. J. & T. Sullivan, Inc., 219 Cal. 384, 26 P.2d 485; Hall v. Barber Door Co., 218 Cal. 412, 23 P.2d 279; Koppelman v. Ambassador Hotel Co., 35 Cal.App.2d 537, 96 P.2d 196; Yamauchi v. O'Neill, 38 Cal.App.2d 703, 102 P.2d 365.

[4] The respondent contends that a recovery could not be had against it because the defendant school district was exonerated and the complaint in effect charges joint negligence against all of the defendants. This contention is without merit. Shea v. City of San Bernardino, 7 Cal.2d 688, 62 P.2d 365; Gritsch v. Pickwick Stages System, 27 Cal.App.2d 494, 81 P.2d 257.

[5] The evidence with the inferences which may reasonably be drawn therefrom is sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the appellant and under well settled rules a judgment notwithstanding the verdict may not be granted under such circumstances.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

Action by the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association against Moore & Harrah, a co-partnership consisting of John S. Moore and John Harrah, and John Harrah. From an order and judgment of dismissal, the plaintiff appeals.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

The complaint in this action was filed on September 24, 1935; on September 18, 1941, on motion of defendants the action was dismissed on the ground that it had not been brought to trial within five years as required by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff appeals from the dismissal order and judgment as to the defendant Harrah and urges three grounds for reversal: (1) That this case is exempted from the operation of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure because it was once on the court's trial calendar within the five-year period and was put off calendar on motion of the defendant Harrah; (2) that defendant waived his right to a dismissal by his motion to place the case off calendar; (3) that section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a statute of limitations and its operation was suspended by subdivision f, of section 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Act, sec. 29, sub. f, Title 11, U.S.C.A., upon the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by defendant Harrah. We find none of plaintiff's points tenable but, after a necessary resume of facts, discuss them in the order in which they are presented.

Adjudication of bankruptcy of Defendant Harrah	April 13, 1937
Trial set for May 5, 1937, on	April 26, 1937
Case ordered off calendar by minute order of reading "This case is ordered off calendar." [Note: the record is silent as to any event on May 5, 1937; it is not, however, contended that trial was entered upon.]	May 6, 1937
Notice of trial (set for September 18, 1941) served and filed by Plaintiff	July 24, 1941
Notice of motion to dismiss for lack of prosecution (Code Civ. Proc., § 583), with memorandum of points and authorities, and affidavit, filed by Defendants	September 12, 1941
Affidavit opposing above motion served by Plaintiff	September 18, 1941
Minute order granting motion to dismiss, made	September 18, 1941

The pertinent statutory provisions are as follows:

Section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "* * * Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff or by the court upon its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the plaintiff has filed his action, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended. * * *"

Section 29, Title 11, of the United States Code Annotated: "a. A suit which is founded upon a claim from which a discharge would be a release, and which is pending against a person at the time of the filing of a petition by or against him, shall be stayed until an adjudication or the dismissal of the petition; if such person is adjudged a bankrupt, such action may be further stayed until the question of his discharge is determined by the court after a hearing, or by the bankrupt's filing a waiver of, or having lost, his right to a discharge. * * *

"f. The operation of any statute of limitations of the United States or of any State, affecting the debts of a bankrupt provable under this title, shall be suspended during the period from the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy (1) until the expiration of thirty days after the date of the entry of an order denying his discharge; or (2) if he has waived or lost his right to a discharge, then until the expiration of thirty days after the filing of such waiver or loss of such right * * *; or (3) until thirty days after the dismissal of the bankruptcy proceedings, whichever may first occur."

In opposition to defendants' motion to dismiss, one of plaintiff's counsel filed an affidavit in which it is averred that the action had been set for trial on May 6, 1937 (rather than May 5 as indicated by the copy of the court record) and "That on May 6, 1937, affiant appeared * * * with the necessary witnesses ready for the trial in said action. At that time, John Harrah appeared and moved the court to place said trial off calendar on the ground that he had filed a petition in bankruptcy, * * * in the local United States District Court on April 13, 1937, and that he should be given time within which to procure discharge to enterpose as a defense. That thereupon and by reason of said defendant's motion, the trial of said action was placed off calendar.

"That this affiant is informed and believes that on February 15, 1938, John Harrah filed his application for a discharge in bankruptcy covering the debts listed in his schedule, which included the debt sued on in this action. That thereafter various objections to the discharge of John Harrah were filed and a hearing of said objections was held on May 2, 1938, and for some days thereafter. * * * Thereafter on or about August 11, 1939, said Referee * * * rendered a decision and reported to the District Court that he sustained the objections to the application of John Harrah for a discharge in bankruptcy.

"This affiant * * * is advised that the United States District Court has never made any order either granting or denying the application for discharge of John Harrah. * * *

"That this affiant believes that under the Federal Bankruptcy Act all statutes of limitation, including the right of dismissal under section 583, C.C.P., has been stayed against the claim sued on in this action and that the five year period prescribed by section 583, C.C.P. has not yet expired. * * *"

We note that under the pertinent provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, subdivision a of section 29, Title 11, of the United States Code Annotated, plaintiff's action herein is of a type which could have been stayed until the question of the bankrupt's right to a discharge had been determined, but we also observe that it is not claimed that the action was in fact stayed for any period whatsoever. The automatic or mandatory stay "until an adjudication or the dismissal of the petition" is inconsequential since the adjudication here was approximately simultaneous with the filing of the petition. The action of the trial court, therefore, in putting the case off its trial calendar was purely discretionary and the case could have been reset and placed on trial at any time.

[1] Plaintiff now urges that such action of the trial court in placing the case off its trial calendar brings the matter within the purview of such cases as Christin v. Superior Court (1937), 9 Cal.2d 526, at page 530, 71 P.2d 205, at page 207, 112 A.L.R. 1153, wherein it is stated, that "despite the mandatory language of the statute, implied exceptions have been recognized where it was not possible to bring the cause to trial." The obvious weakness in plaintiff's position is that the record does not show that plaintiff could not have brought the action to trial within the five-year period. Upon the showing made on defendants' motion to dismiss, the trial court must have concluded that this was not a case where plaintiff had been precluded by means beyond its control from bringing the case to trial but rather that plaintiff had deliberately chosen not to make any effort to bring on the hearing as to either defendant pending some development as to the likelihood of defendant Harrah's receiving or being denied a discharge. Furthermore the fact that over two years was allowed to elapse after the rendition of the referee's report (August 11, 1939) sustaining objections to Harrah's application for a discharge, before the case was brought up for trial (September 18, 1941) is not at all consistent with a diligent effort on plaintiff's part to expedite the trial, and, finally, the fact that plaintiff apparently was able to have the case placed on the trial calendar for September 18, 1941, without any showing whatsoever of any change in its status from that which existed on May 6, 1937, when it went off calendar, suggests a further basis for conclusion by the trial court that plaintiff was not precluded by means beyond its control from bringing the case to trial at any time during a period of more than five years prior to September 18, 1941. There is no showing that plaintiff resisted defendants' motion to put the case off calendar or that it ever sought to have the trial reset for a date earlier than September 18, 1941. There is no occasion for us to devote space to an analysis of the cases cited by plaintiff in support of its first proposition; none of those cases is at all persuasive when applied to the above recited factual situation. The fact that the case was on the calendar for trial on May 5 or 6, 1937, and that plaintiff appeared on that day by its counsel with witnesses ready to proceed and that the trial was postponed on defendant Harrah's motion did not interrupt the operation of section 583. (Ravn v. Planz (1918), 37 Cal. App. 735, 736, 174 P. 690; Cruse v. Superior Court (1929), 102 Cal.App. 290, 294, 283 P. 73; Miller & Lux, Inc., v. Superior Court (1923), 192 Cal. 333, 341, 219 P. 1006; Holt v. Miller (1932) 214 Cal. 558, 561, 6 P.2d 937, 79 A.L.R. 844). The case of Mazitelli v. Crane (1917), 35 Cal.App. 264, 169 P. 721, in which a contrary rule had been declared, was expressly overruled by the decisions above cited.

[2] As its second proposition plaintiff invokes the doctrine of equitable estoppel to preclude defendant Harrah from seeking dismissal of the action the trial of which was delayed on his own motion. The argument is ingenious but to support it we should have to join plaintiff's able counsel in skipping over the lack of certain factual elements essential to its foundation, and, further, we should have to judicially write into section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure provisions which the legislature did not put there. The doctrine of equitable estoppel is recognized by statute in this state by the declaration in subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

[3] It does not appear to us that a mere motion to place a case "off calendar on the ground that he [defendant] had filed a petition in bankruptcy * * * and that he should be given time within which to procure a discharge to enterpose as a defense" can be construed as constituting either a factual basis for operation of the equitable principles above quoted or as the equivalent of a stipulation in writing (required by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure) that the time might be extended.

[4] The statute has the very salutary purpose of expediting trials. Its language is clear and definite and the integrity of its meaning has generally been upheld by the courts in a plenitude of decisions. In the several legislative amendments to which it has been subjected the legislature has not seen fit to temper the rigor of the language or its forthright construction and support by the courts; the tendency, rather, has been to extend and make more certain its operation. With respect to the invoked doctrine of estoppel we observe that the Supreme Court in Miller & Lux, Inc., v. Superior Court (1923), supra, 192 Cal. 333, at page 339, 219 P. 1006, at page 1008, said "While there is language in several of the cases construing section 583 which seems to recognize the possibility of a waiver by estoppel, it is to be noted that without exception these cases hold that a written stipulation is required. * * * The statute provides that the time for trial may be extended by written stipulation. It does not provide that it may be extended by a written stipulation 'or its equivalent.'" Regardless of the propriety or impropriety of the alternative holding in the later case of Govea v. Superior Court (1938), 26 Cal.App.2d 27, 78 P.2d 433 (which perhaps could be supported solely on the ground that a stipulation entered in the minutes of the court is a stipulation in writing [see Cox v. Tyrone Power, etc., Inc. (1942), 49 Cal.App.2d 383, 393, 121 P.2d 829]), with respect to a stipulation stated orally in open court and entered in the minutes "that if such a stipulation * * * does not literally comply with the language of section 583, supra, it does estop the petitioner from thereafter making a motion to dismiss the cause for want of prosecution under said section; that a party to an action cannot be allowed in such manner to play fast and loose with the court," [26 Cal. App.2d 27, 78 P.2d 434] we have no such factual situation here and are not disposed to judicially add any new exceptions to the single one stated by the statute. We are in accord with the principle, which we find pertinent here, as it is stated in Christin v. Superior Court (1937), supra, 9 Cal.2d 526, 529, 71 P.2d 205, 207, 112 A.L.R. 1153, that "estoppel resulting from such conduct does not appear to be a proper ground for creating an exception to the terms of the statute." To the same effect see, also, Elmhurst Packers v. Superior Court (1941), 46 Cal. App.2d 648, 650, 116 P.2d 487.

[5] Plaintiff's last contention is that section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a statute of limitations and that its operation was suspended, on filing of the petition in bankruptcy, by the provisions of subdivision "f" of section 29, Title 11, of the United States Code Annotated, hereinabove quoted. In support of its contention as to the character of section 583 plaintiff quotes from Andersen v. Superior court (1921), 187 Cal. 95, at page 101, 200 P. 963, at page 965, in which, apropos of the proposition that "where a cause of action arises in the lifetime of a person entitled to sue, his death does not interrupt the running of the statute of limitations in the absence of some statutory provision to the contrary," the court said, "No reason is suggested, and we can think of none, why this rule should not extend in like manner to this provision of section 583. It is in effect a statute of limitation upon the time for bringing a cause to trial." We are unable to agree with plaintiff in its view that the language of subdivision "f" of section 29, Title 11, of the United States Code Annotated, "The operation of any statute of limitations of the United States or of any State, affecting the debts of a bankrupt provable under this title, shall be suspended," etc., is applicable to the operation of section 583. A limitation upon the time within which an action pending in a state court must be brought to trial therein, is not in our opinion a statute of limitation "affecting the debts of a bankrupt provable under" Title 11 of the United States Code Annotated. Congress in enacting section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, sec. 29, Title 11, U.S.C.A., apparently had in mind the preservation of a distinction, to be operative on the filing of any petition in bankruptcy, between provable debts as such, which might, but had not yet, become the subject of state court actions, and pending suits. The provisions as to provable debts are set forth in subdivision "f." In subdivision "a," we find different provisions expressly applicable to pending actions: "A suit which is founded upon a claim from which a discharge would be a release, and which is pending against a person at the time of the filing of a petition by or against him, shall be stayed until an adjudication or the dismissal of the petition; if such person is adjudged a bankrupt, such action may be further stayed until the question of his discharge is determined." Certainly if the United States District Court, in which the bankruptcy proceeding was pending, had exercised the power contemplated by subdivision "a" of section 29 by actually staying the trial of the action in the state court, then we should have had a case in which the entire duration of the stay would have been excluded in computing the five-year period fixed by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the state court trial. During such stay it would not have been possible for plaintiff to have brought the action to trial and the case would be clearly within the doctrine recognized by Christin v. Superior Court (1937), supra, 9 Cal.2d 526, 71 P.2d 205, 112 A.L.R. 1153, and all other relevant decisions. But there was no such stay and we perceive no tenable reason for applying subdivision f of section 29, Title 11, of the United States Code Annotated to the operation of the state law regulating trials in state courts. If subdivision "f" has any significance here it would seem to us to strengthen rather than weaken our conclusion. Since by it the operation of all statutes of limitation as to the initiation of actions on provable claims is interrupted, there appears no good reason why actions already pending should not be either tried promptly, or dismissed. It should be desirable in the administration of the bankrupt's estate to have pending actions in state courts, which may affect the federal administration, promptly determined, whether by final judgment or dismissal. If the plaintiff therein recovers judgment he certainly is not prejudiced by obtaining it promptly and if he fails to bring his action to trial and suffers a dismissal the detriment thereof is minimized through the fact that the statute limiting the time for filing a new action is being suspended by subdivision "f" above quoted.

Upon the record we find no basis for holding that the trial court erred or abused its discretion. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

AMERICAN-HAWAIIAN S. S. CO. et al. v. CALIFORNIA EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 12068.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 13, 1942.

Hearing Granted Oct. 8, 1942.

1. Statutes 🔑184

In the interpretation of an act, it is first important to look to the purpose of the legislature.

2. Master and servant 🔑78

Under the statute making an individual ineligible for unemployment compensation insurance if he left his work because of a trade dispute or without good cause refused to accept suitable employment when offered, the clear meaning of the statute is that if the applicants for unemployment insurance have refused to accept suitable employment they are not "persons unemployed through no fault of their own", within the statute, the disqualification for benefits under the statute depending upon the fact of voluntary action and not the motives which led to it. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, § 56.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Persons Unemployed Through no Fault of Their Own".

3. Master and servant 🔑78

"Dock checkers", who perform intermittent clerical services in connection with the handling of cargoes, were not "persons unemployed through no fault of their own" within meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to be entitled to unemployment benefits, where the checkers went on strike against companies operating terminal facilities or transporting freight by water, though at beginning of strike they were either not actually at work or were working for an employer not subject to the strike. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, § 1; Gen. Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 13(b), and § 56(a).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Dock Checker".

4. Mandamus 🔑176

Where there was no substantial dispute in the facts in mandamus proceeding against the Employment Commission to compel the commission to vacate its order of payment of unemployment benefits, court could set aside an erroneous conclusion of law on the part of the commission, based on such facts. Gen.Laws 1937, and Supp.1939, 1941, Act 8780d.

5. Mandamus 🔑81

Mandamus is the proper remedy to relieve a party beneficially interested in the acts and decisions of administrative body, where the acts and decisions are shown to have been arbitrary, capricious, or in violation of law.

6. Mandamus 🔑3(8)

Employers who had been ordered to pay unemployment benefits to striking employees were not barred from maintaining a mandamus proceeding against the Employment Commission to compel it to vacate an order of payment of the benefits on the ground that they had failed to exhaust their remedies under the act where it was alleged that the commission had violated the act in ordering payment of benefits. Gen.Laws Supp. 1941, Act 8780d, § 41.1(d); Gen.Laws Supp. 1939, Act 8780d, § 45.10.

◆

Mandamus proceeding by the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company and others, comprising an association known as the Dock Checkers Employers' Association of San Francisco, against the California Employment Commission and others, to require the California Employment Commission to vacate its order of payment of unemployment benefits, and to refrain from charging the petitioners' accounts with such payments.

Peremptory writ issued.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., John J. Dailey, Deputy Atty. Gen., Maurice P. McCaffrey and Glenn V. Walls, both of Sacramento, and Gladstein, Grossman, Margolis & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The group of petitioners, all engaged in the business of operating terminal facilities or transporting freight by water to and from ports on San Francisco bay, comprise an association known as the Dock Checkers Employers' Association of San Francisco, and as such were parties to a written contract covering terms and conditions of employment with the Ship Clerks' Association, Local 38-90, International Longshoremen's Association. This contract was in full force and operation on November 10, 1939, when the union called a strike against all members of the employers' association. The strike continued until January 3, 1940, and thereafter approximately one hundred and twenty-five of the employees who had been on strike applied for and were granted unemployment benefits by the respondent commission. The petitioners pursued all the statutory remedies before the commission for a proper adjustment of the controversy, but the commission by a vote of three members to two, ordered that these benefits be paid. Each of the petitioners has at all times been an employer under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, Stats.1935, p. 1226; as amended, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937 and Supps. 1939, 1941 Act No. 8780d, and as such employer has been required to pay to the respondent commission his employer contributions to the unemployment insurance fund administered by the commission. After pleading their beneficial interest in the administration of the fund the petitioners alleged that they have exhausted all their administrative remedies to no avail and that the respondent commission threatens to pay the benefits to the employees named, and to charge petitioners' accounts in the unemployment fund with such deductions. Alleging that all these payments are in violation of the plain terms of the Unemployment Act, and that they have no other remedy, the petitioners seek this writ of mandate to require the respondent commission to vacate its order of payment of such benefits, and to refrain from charging their accounts with such payments.

The respondent commission appeared generally with all other respondents by demurrer and answer, and thereafter, by stipulation of the parties, the individual employees affected by the controversy appeared by demurrer, answer, and other pleas which do not require consideration. The cause was fully argued and briefed and settles down to the simple question of law—whether the order and award of the commission was within the terms of the statute.

There is no substantial or real controversy as to the facts. Whatever denials were made in the answers were submitted without proof. By stipulation the entire record of the proceedings before the commission was received in evidence, with the reservation of the right to try before the court the question whether the trial of this proceeding was to be confined to such record or whether the parties should have the right to try the whole controversy de novo. This issue was not argued, however, and though the right to a trial de novo was sustained in Laisne v. California State Bd. of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 123 P.2d 457, the parties did not avail themselves of that privilege. However, the record of the proceedings before the commission does not controvert any of the material facts upon which the controversy rests and we may treat the proceedings now as though submitted on the demurrers to the petition.

A brief statement of these facts will suffice to lay the background for the question of law upon which the whole controversy rests. The petitioners employ a number of men known as dock checkers to perform clerical services in connection with the handling of cargoes. The checkers involved here, known as "casual daily checkers" work on an hourly basis for various employers as their services are required. They are all dispatched to work through the joint hiring halls maintained by the union and the employers' association. An employer can obtain checkers only through these halls, and when the men finish a job they report to the hall for the next assignment. Some of the checkers have a preference, but otherwise they are dispatched in turn in an effort to equalize earnings. The volume of work during the periods herein mentioned was normally sufficient to furnish full employment to all checkers available, though there was not sufficient work to require the services of each checker on each day, and on most days there were some checkers who did not perform a full day's work because they had completed the work to which they had been last dispatched and were awaiting a new assignment. On November 10, 1939, at 6 p. m., the checkers involved went on strike against petitioners, and remained on strike until January 3, 1940. When the strike began they were either not actually at work or were working for an employer not subject to the strike. They applied for unemployment insurance benefits for the period from November 10, 1939, to January 3, 1940, and respondent commission affirmed an award of a referee totaling in excess of $13,000.

Petitioners argue that the claimants left their work because of a trade dispute within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, section 56(a), which provides that an individual is not eligible for unemployment benefits "If he left his work because of a trade dispute and for the period during which he continues out of work by reason of the fact that the trade dispute is still in active progress in the establishment in which he was employed." They contend that any unemployment of the claimants during the period in question was due to their refusal to work for petitioners after their union had called a strike; and that to hold that a man employed on an hourly or daily basis who is not actually on the job at the moment a strike begins is not covered by the statute would defeat its purpose, that if he has actual employment, under a rotational or some other system of employment, and goes on strike, he is disqualified.

The respondents seek to support the award upon the ground that, because of the casual nature of the employment, there was no legal relation of employer and employee existing at the time the strike became effective at the close of the working day of November 10th, and that a checker was not an employee who "left his work because of a trade dispute" within the terms of section 56(a) of the act.

[1] In the interpretation of an act of this character it is first important to look to the purpose and intention of the Legislature in enacting the legislation. Here the purpose is expressly declared in section 1 of the act, as amended in 1939, Gen.Laws Supp.1939 Act 8780d, to be the "compulsory setting aside of funds to be used for a system of unemployment insurance providing benefits for persons unemployed through no fault of their own, and to reduce involuntary unemployment and the suffering caused thereby to a minimum." (Emphasis ours.) This section was enacted as a "Declaration of state policy" opening with the clause reading, "As a guide to the interpretation and application of this act the public policy of this State is declared as follows:"

Section 56 of the act reads: "An individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment, and no such benefit shall be payable to him under any of the following conditions:

"(a) If he left his work because of a trade dispute and for the period during which he continues out of work by reason of the fact that the trade dispute is still in active progress in the establishment in which he was employed.

"(b) If without good cause he has refused to accept suitable employment when offered to him, or failed to apply for suitable employment when notified by the district public employment office."

[2] The clear meaning of section 56 is that if the applicants have refused to accept suitable employment they are not "persons unemployed through no fault of their own" just as one who has left his work because of a trade dispute is beyond the contemplation of the act. The clear meaning of the first section of the act as applied to conditions arising under section 56(a) is stated in Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Com., 17 Cal.2d 321, at page 328, 109 P.2d 935, at page 940, where the Supreme Court said: "In brief, disqualification under the act depends upon the fact of voluntary action, and not the motives which led to it. The legislature did not seek to interfere with union principles or practices. The act merely sets up certain conditions as a prerequisite to the right to receive compensation, and declares that in certain situations the worker shall be ineligible to receive compensation. Fairly interpreted, it was intended to disqualify those workers who voluntarily leave their work because of a trade dispute. Co-respondents in this proceeding in fact 'left their work because of a trade dispute' and are consequently ineligible to receive benefit payments. It follows that the Commission's decision was erroneous as a matter of law and should be annulled."

[3] Section 13(b) of the act provides that employment is not "suitable" if the position offered is "vacant due directly to a strike, lockout, or other labor dispute." But this clause is limited by the preceding clause to one "refusing new work" under these conditions. Here the undisputed evidence is that the claimants were not offered "new" work after the strike, but that they refused to accept assignments to the same "work" or jobs, in which they had been employed for many years. The whole story is that they voluntarily refused to cross the picket lines.

Upon the conclusion of the hearings before the commission three members gave a decision in favor of the employees, and two members dissented. The majority based their ruling upon the expressed view that "There was no legal relationship of employer and employee existing between the claimant and any employer at the time of the commencement of the trade disputes. * * *" The two dissenting members—Henry F. Grady and Ansley K. Salz—filed a minority opinion in which they called for a fair and impartial adherence to the statute. They pointed out that the basis of the trade dispute was the failure to reach a new contract, as a result of which the checkers' union called a strike and picketed the docks; and that the failure of the employees to secure employment during the period of the strike was of their own choosing. The peculiar nature of the employer-employee relationship in this case, and the speciousness of the grounds upon which the majority based its findings is covered by the portion of the minority opinion from which we quote: "It is pertinent to point out that the employer-employee relationship in this case is more complicated than in ordinary industries, due inherently to the intermittent nature of the work to be performed, and due to the contractual regulation for rotation and equalization of work assignments from many shipping concerns among a limited group of employees. The true situation herein is clear enough for applying the plain intent of the Legislature, and the guide to interpretation of the act set up in section 1 thereof.

"If the decision of the majority in this case stands, then it follows that if the union herein were to declare a strike at a time when practically all job assignments were completed, it could be assured of benefits being paid to all members of the union not on actual job assignments at the moment, thus assuring it of strike benefits to a large proportion of the registered union checkers. This would circumvent the provisions of 56(a) and be contrary to the plain intent of the act, and an injustice to all other individuals having an interest in the California State Unemployment Compensation Trust Fund who would be unable to obtain such benefits.

"A new technique in strikes on the San Francisco waterfront or other harbors where similar working conditions prevail would naturally follow the majority decision; thus,

"1. The waterfront unions are principally industrial unions.

"2. The Supreme Court has ruled that failure to cross a picket line because of union principles is a disqualifying act under Section 56(a).

"3. If one local union in an industrial union establishes a picket line, no other local will cross it; thus, they will be disqualified.

"4. Therefore, if instead of a local union striking, the industrial union comprising all the locals strikes as a body at a moment when longshore work is at a minimum, the disqualification set up in Section 56(a) will apply only to the few employees who happen to be engaged on job assignments. In this manner, large sums of money could be drawn from the California State Unemployment Compensation Insurance Fund during a trade dispute by a group of individuals who, in furtherance of a trade dispute, had voted not to perform their usual work, but who could not under the Act be said to have left their work, because the words 'left their work' were so narrowly construed as to mean only actually leaving job assignments on which they happened to be engaged at the moment.

"Such a narrow interpretation, which follows the decision of the majority in this case, would be ruinous to the Fund and contrary to the basic intent and principle of the Act as set forth by the Legislature of the State of California."

As to respondents' argument that the petitioners are not entitled to relief in these proceedings and that the court is without power to review the proceedings before the commission little need be said. The same point was raised in the Bodinson case, supra, 17 Cal.2d page 330, 109 P.2d 935, page 941, and decided adversely to respondents. There the court said: "Indeed, it seems to us that elemental principles of justice require that parties to the administrative proceeding be permitted to retain their status as such throughout the final judicial review by a court of law, for the fundamental issues in litigation remain essentially the same. * * * Furthermore, it seems apparent that the employer whose reserve account is affected is the only person having sufficient incentive to challenge a decision awarding benefits. Action by this employer provides the only procedural guarantee that the Commission can be held by legal process to comply with the requirements of the statute under which it operates." And in Laisne v. California State Board of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 844, 123 P.2d 457, 465, where the same question was raised, the court said: "In regard to the numerous cases containing language to the effect that administrative agencies may make findings of fact and the reasons of expediency given therefor, it must again be pointed out that it is not the fact-finding power alone that is involved in the present situation. It is the facts found plus the order based thereon depriving a person of a property right which is the full exercise of the judicial power." But a clearer statement of the principle here involved is found in the dissenting opinion in the Laisne case from which we quote, page 868 of 19 Cal.2d, page 477 of 123 P.2d: "A review upon the issues of law would, of course, include such questions as whether the agency has regularly pursued the authority vested in it, whether it has acted arbitrarily and whether there is substantial evidence to support its determinations of fact. Our decisions have recognized that administrative rulings on questions of law cannot be accorded finality. Such questions may be determined conclusively only by a court exercising constitutional judicial power."

[4, 5] Here the real issue is whether, when there is no substantial dispute in the facts, a court may by proceedings in mandamus, set aside an erroneous conclusion of law based upon such facts. The rule has always been accepted in this state that mandamus is the proper remedy to relieve the party beneficially interested in the acts and decisions of administrative bodies which are shown to have been arbitrary, capricious, or in violation of law. This rule is adhered to in the Bodinson case, supra, and by both the majority and minority in the Laisne case, supra.

[6] Respondents contend that the writ should not issue because petitioners have failed to exhaust the administrative remedies provided in the act and cite Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, 17 Cal.2d 280, 109 P.2d 942, 132 A.L.R. 715, as authority. The petitioners do not quarrel with the rule of the case cited but contend that it is not applicable here because they have exhausted all these remedies. The respondents rest their argument on section 41.1 of the act which was added by Stats. 1941, p. 2535; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1941 Supp., Act 8780d, and which provides that the commission shall furnish each employer with itemized statements showing the charges to his account and his contribution rate for the succeeding rating period, and gives the employer sixty days to protest any of these items. Subdivision (d) provides: "In the event that the determination in any protest proceeding is rendered against the employer" (Italics ours.) he may bring an action to recover the amount claimed as an overpayment. Section 45.10, which was added in 1939, and upon which respondents also rely, is similar to section 41.1 in that the right of action therein referred to is expressly limited to the adjustment of contributions paid under protest. Neither section has any relation to a proceeding such as we have here to determine the right of an employee to be paid benefits under the terms of the act and thus deplete the trust fund to which the petitioners have made their statutory contributions. The right of the employer-contributor to test the validity of payment of benefits by mandamus is expressly confirmed in the Bodinson case, supra, where at page 325 of 17 Cal.2d, page 938 of 109 P.2d the supreme court said: "The statute does not provide its own procedure for testing whether a particular decision of the Commission awarding benefits is consistent with the authority delegated to the Commission under the act. The only express provision for court review is made by section 45.10, * * * which permits an employer to contest the legality of the contribution sought to be enforced against him by paying it under protest and then suing to recover the amount so paid. It does not follow from this, however, that the courts are without power to review a decision awarding unemployment benefits when it is alleged that the Commission has violated the plain provisions of the statute under which it functions."

For the reasons given the order or award of the respondent commission should be vacated and annulled and the accounts of the petitioners should be relieved of charges for the benefits included in that award.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

A controversy over working conditions under the terms of an employer-employee contract is a "trade dispute" within meaning of that provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act that an individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment if he left his work because of a trade dispute. Where longshoremen refused to pass picket lines of dock checkers' union, and refused to work in the absence of checkers, except where it had not been customary to use checkers, the longshoremen were engaged in a "trade dispute" within meaning of provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act that an individual is not eligible for benefits for unemployment if he left his work because of a trade dispute. Gen.Laws Supp.1939, Act 8780d, § 56(a).

3. Mandamus ⚷143(2)

Where Employment Commission's decision granting unemployment benefits was dated April 3, 1940, but was not released until May, 1941, and request for rehearing was denied July 19, 1941, mandamus proceedings against the commission in February, 1942, were not barred by "laches".

It is not the lapse of time so much as it is the consequences of the delay which goes to make up the defense of "laches", and unless prejudice results from the delay, the defense is not established, but if prejudice has resulted, the one whose prompt action would have forestalled it can avoid the responsibility only by showing that he sought his remedy promptly.

5. Mandamus ⚷3(8)

Employers who had been ordered by the Employment Commission to make payments of unemployment benefits to striking employees were not barred from seeking mandamus to compel the commission to vacate its order for payment of benefits on the ground that they had not exhausted their statutory remedies, where the commission had resisted the efforts of the employers to pursue their statutory remedies on technical grounds, and the employers had no other remedy to enforce a compliance by the commission with the express terms of the Act. NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Petitioners seek to review by proceedings in mandamus an order, or award, of the respondent commission directing payments of benefits for unemployment.

Petitioners, employer-contributors under the Unemployment Insurance Act (Stats. 1935, p. 1226, Deering's Gen.Laws Supp. 1939, Act No. 8780d), are engaged in unloading and discharging vessels at ports on the San Francisco Bay. They employ longshoremen, members of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, to perform this work and they belong to the Waterfront Employers' Association of San Francisco which represents the employers in their labor relations with the longshoremen. Petitioners are also members of the Dock Checkers Employers' Association of San Francisco which represents the employers in their labor relations with the checkers, who are employed to keep a clerical record of the cargo. On June 14, 1939, the checkers' local union called a strike against the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company, one of the petitioners herein. On June 17, 1939, the Dock Checkers Employers' Association severed relations with the checkers' local union and its members refused to employ any checkers until termination of the strike against the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company. The strike was terminated on June 27, 1939. During the ten-day period between June 17 and June 27, 1939, the longshoremen refused to pass the picket lines of the checkers' union, and refused to work upon any job in the absence of checkers, except where it had not been customary to use checkers. Subsequent to the strike the longshoremen claimed unemployment benefits for the period during which they had not worked; they contended that an agreement between the longshoremen's union and the Waterfront Employers' Association required the use of checkers and that they had stopped work to enforce this right. Petitioners, on the other hand, claimed that the longshoremen stopped work to aid the checkers in their dispute with the employers. Respondent, California Employment Commission, found in accord with the contention of the longshoremen and concluded that section 56(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act did not apply; the commission, one member dissenting, rendered a decision awarding the longshoremen unemployment benefits. Under this decision respondent commission has paid benefits to the claimants and threatens to continue to make further payments, all of which, the petitioners allege, has been charged or will be charged to the account maintained by the Waterfront Employers' Association and to the accounts maintained by the individual petitioners as required by the Unemployment Insurance Act; and that this will damage the petitioners by decreasing their reserve and thereby increasing the contribution rate required to be paid by them. Petitioners therefore apply for a writ of mandate compelling respondent commission to vacate its decision and to correct its records by removing therefrom all charges made against petitioners' accounts by reason of the payment of such benefits.

Petitioners contend that if the respondent commission had found that the longshoremen had left their work to aid the checkers it would have been forced to conclude that the longshoremen made the dispute their own and hence were disqualified from receiving unemployment benefits under section 56(a) of the act, citing Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Comm., 17 Cal.2d 321, 109 P.2d 935. However, accepting the commission's finding that the longshoremen left work to enforce their own agreement the petitioners contend that the unemployment was the result of a trade dispute within the meaning of section 56(a), and the longshoremen are thereby disqualified from receiving benefits.

Petitioners further argue that mandate is the proper remedy to compel respondent to rectify its decision and that petitioners are the proper parties to obtain that remedy, citing Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Comm., supra.

The longshoremen, as the real parties in interest, have filed points and authorities in opposition to the issuance of the alternative writ of mandate, and have raised special grounds upon which they contend that the alternative writ should not be granted because: (1) the petitioners have failed to establish the necessity for a speedy determination of the issue and hence this court should not accept jurisdiction prior to an application having been made to the superior court; (2) petitioners have failed to exhaust their administrative remedies and have a plain, speedy and adequate remedy at law which they have pursued by actions filed in the superior court under section 45.10 of the act; and (3) the proceeding is barred by the statute of limitations. Some of these arguments are repeated in briefs filed after the alternative writ was issued. All the respondents seek to sustain the action of the commission not so much upon the grounds upon which the commission based its action as upon the grounds that the longshoremen were casual employees working from day to day, and that they did not leave their work when they refused employment.

[1, 2] The ground last mentioned is fully covered in American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. California E. Comm., Cal.App., 128 P.2d 627, this day decided, and it would serve no purpose to repeat what was said in that case. The ground upon which the commission based its action is equally untenable. The majority of the commission found that the employees did not leave their work because of a trade dispute, but because the existing contract between the employers and the employees called for a continuation of the "present practices" and conditions of employment, that these "present practices" required the presence of checkers in the places where longshoremen were employed, and that the respondents had therefore merely refused to work because the employers had breached these terms of the contract. It is too manifest to require elaboration that a controversy over working conditions under the terms of an employer-employee contract is a "trade dispute" and the ground upon which the commission based its action cannot be sustained. It may be added that the parties themselves deemed this to be a trade dispute, that it was submitted to arbitration under the terms of the contract, and that the arbitrator ruled adversely to the longshoremen's contention.

[3, 4] The special pleas of the individual respondents relating to procedure are not sound. The question whether this court should assume jurisdiction to hear and determine this proceeding instead of relegating the petitioners to the superior court was determined upon the issuance of the alternative writ. The question whether the petitioners have exhausted their administrative remedies is answered in the American-Hawaiian case and does not require further discussion. The plea of the statute of limitations rests upon the provisions of section 45.10 authorizing a suit to recover contributions paid under protest. No evidence was offered in support of this special plea, but the parties have stipulated that actions pending in the superior court involve contributions assessed to the petitioners in part because of payments inadvertently made prior to the commission's decision. We find nothing in the record of the proceedings before the commission indicating that any of the contributions here involved were paid under protest, or that they are the subject of other proceedings pending. The proceedings here were instituted to seek a legal determination of the single question whether the employees were covered by section 56 of the act. It is alleged and not denied that a large number of the employees have filed claims for benefits under the act and that their claims have been allowed but that some have not been paid. The decision of the commission was dated April 3, 1940, but not released until May, 1941. A request for a rehearing was denied July 19, 1941, and these proceedings were commenced in February, 1942. It is conceded that there is no statute of limitations which directly applies here. It is reasoned that the court should apply its own limitation by analogy to the time fixed for suits to recover overpayments. This is in effect an argument that petitioners are barred by laches. But the essential elements of laches are not present. "It is not the lapse of time so much as it is the consequences of the delay which goes to make up the defense of laches. Unless prejudice results from the delay the defense is not established, but if prejudice has resulted, the one whose prompt action would have forestalled it can avoid the responsibility only by showing that he sought his remedy promptly." Hayman v. City of Los Angeles, 17 Cal.App.2d 674, 680, 62 P.2d 1047, 1050.

[5] The petitioners have shown that they have exhausted all their statutory remedies in an effort to obtain from the commission a fair and impartial ruling in accordance with the express terms of the statute; that the respondents have resisted those efforts upon grounds which are technical and unreasonable; and that petitioners have no other remedy to enforce a compliance by the commission with the express terms of the act.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

Mandamus proceeding by Matson Terminals, Inc., and others, petitioners, against the California Employment Commission and others, to compel respondents to deny payments of unemployment benefits to certain claimants and to vacate the order of the California Employment Commission awarding such benefits.

Peremptory writ issued.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., John J. Dailey, Deputy Atty. Gen., Maurice P. McCaffrey, of San Francisco, Leonard M. Friedman, of Sacramento, and Gladstein, Grossman, Margolis & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

[1] The petitioners, as employer-contributors under the Unemployment Insurance Act (Stats.1935, p. 1226, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937 and Supp.1939, Act No. 8780d) have applied for a writ of mandate to compel respondents to deny payments of unemployment benefits to certain claimants and to vacate the order of the respondent commission awarding such benefits. An alternative writ and order to show cause was issued. The respondent commission filed a demurrer and answer by way of return. The employees affected by the decision, as the real parties in interest, filed a demurrer and answer together with a number of special pleas and motions. The order to show cause was submitted upon the demurrers and the record of the proceedings before the commission. No other evidence was offered and nothing in that record creates a conflict which is material to a decision of the controversy. The questions here involved are purely questions of law relating to the interpretation of the act. We may therefore treat the matter as though submitted upon the demurrers and deny all the pleas and motions of the respondents which do not go to the merits of the controversy.

All the petitioners are members of Waterfront Employers' Association of San Francisco, a corporation organized primarily for the purpose of representing petitioners in their labor relations with employees engaged generally in loading and discharging vessels at ports on San Francisco Bay. Many of the petitioners are also members of the Dock Checkers Employers' Association of San Francisco, an organization maintained primarily to represent the employers in their labor relations with dock checkers. These employees are all members of the same labor union—International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, District No. 1. The longshoremen belong to one local of this union, the dock checkers belong to another.

On November 10, 1939, the dock checkers' local branch of this union called a strike commencing at six p. m. of that day, that being the time when both checkers and longshoremen regularly left their employment for the day. Picket lines were maintained at all the docks affected by the strike; throughout the period of the strike both longshoremen and checkers refused to cross these picket lines; the strike continued from November 10, 1939, to January 3, 1940, during which time all these employees refused to work upon the docks, except to handle United States mail and some perishable goods under the permission of the officials of the union. The strike was the same as that involved in American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. v. California Employment Comm., Cal.App., 128 P.2d 627, hereafter referred to.

The longshoremen who were unemployed during the period of the strike filed claims with the respondent commission and, after hearings before the referee and before the commission, claims were allowed to approximately 4,500 longshoremen awarding benefits amounting to over $400,000.

The issues involved in this proceeding are so much like those involved in American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. v. California Employment Commission, supra, and W. R. Grace & Company v. California Employment Commission, Cal.App., 128 P.2d 632. this day decided, that there is no need for an elaboration of the views therein expressed. The commission based its ruling upon the ground that the claimants did not leave their work because of a "labor dispute," but because they believed their employers had breached their collective bargaining contracts. The respondents do not now rely upon this clear evasion of the act, but rest their case mainly upon the ground that the employees did not leave their work because at 6 p. m. there was no work to do—that to refuse to return the following morning was not a leaving of work since there was then no employer-employee relation. It is also argued that the claimants did not refuse "suitable employment" within the meaning of section 56(b) of the act. These arguments were answered in the American-Hawaiian case (supra) and do not require extended discussion here.

In its decision the respondent commission divided the claimants into five groups —those who had not completed their work at 6 p. m., November 10th, and were ordered to report the following morning; (these men, numbering above five hundred, were denied compensation benefits); those who had not been working on the day the strike was called and who had not thereafter been dispatched; those who had been working on a job that was not struck, but who had refused to work on another job; 36 carmen who were unemployed during the period of the strike because, pursuant to a ruling of the longshoremen's union the work which was usually performed by the carmen was performed by registered longshoremen during the period; and claimants who had finished their previous work assignments and were awaiting dispatchment from the hiring hall at 6 p. m., November 10th.

We will not assume the burden of considering separately the status of each of the large number of claimants involved. The principles of law involved are fully considered in the two cases this day filed. Referring to the claimants by the groupings made by the commission—those in the first group left their work because of the labor dispute and are not entitled to benefits; those in the second group "refused to accept suitable employment" within the provisions of section 56(b) of the act and are not entitled to benefits during the period in which they were voluntarily unemployed; those in the third group are covered by the same ruling as that applied to the second; those in the fourth group were unemployed by reason of a ruling of the local longshoremen's union and hence are entitled to the benefits since their unemployment was not of their own choosing; those in the fifth group were found to have been unemployed either because they refused to accept assignments and cross the picket lines or because the local dispatcher, at the instigation of the union which he represented, declined to make any further assignments to "unfair" jobs, that is, places on the waterfront which were covered by the checkers' strike.

[2] In all these cases, except the carmen, as to whom the parties stipulated at the time of the oral argument that no contention is made, the claimants voluntarily made the labor dispute of the checkers their labor controversy and no specious reasoning can alter the conclusion that they either left their work because of that dispute or that they refused suitable employment because of it. In either case the provisions of section 56 of the act apply.

[3] All the parties argue the case upon section 56(a) of the act and overlook the equally important provisions of section 56(b). It is therein declared that an employee is not entitled to benefits "If without good cause he has refused to accept suitable employment when offered to him * * *." Now "suitable employment" is defined in section 13 of the act as "work in the individual's usual occupation or for which he is reasonably fitted * * *." (Italics ours.) Subdivision (b) of this section declares that an employee shall not be denied benefits when otherwise eligible "for refusing new work * * *. If the position offered is vacant due directly to a strike, lockout, or other labor dispute." (Italics ours.) We have emphasized the words "usual" and "new" and in reading the two sections together we are compelled to conclude that the Legislature intended to deny benefits to those employees who voluntarily refused to accept employment in work of their "usual occupation" where such work is available, but that benefits should not be denied to those who refuse to accept employment in a "new" job which has become vacant because of a strike or labor dispute. The clear purpose of these provisions is to excuse those employees who refuse new employment as "strike breakers" where their union principles, or fear of violence, compels them to refuse to assume a "new" position which is beyond the scope of their "usual occupation."

This situation does not confront us here. No one of the claimants was asked to accept a "new" job, and no one was offered employment outside of his "usual occupation." All voluntarily refused to accept employment in the jobs which they had occupied for many years before the strike was called. There was no shortage of employment. To the contrary, the commission found that when the strike was called on November 10th the hiring hall dispatcher had "an abnormally large number of orders and a consequent shortage of available men." It is undisputed that the refusal of these men to accept assignments, and the failure of the dispatcher to make further assignments, were both due to the deliberate action of members of the longshoremen's union who announced that they would not work on "struck" jobs while the checkers' strike was in progress. All the longshoremen who are claimants in this proceeding voluntarily refused to perform their customary work because their own union branded their places of employment "unfair," and it must be inferred that, as members of the union, they joined in this inhibition. There is no evidence that any of them were forceably restrained from pursuing their customary calling. Their situation is the same as that referred to in Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Comm., 17 Cal.2d 321, 327, 328, 109 P.2d 935, 940, where the court said: "They were unemployed solely because, in accordance with their union principles, they did not choose to work in a plant where certain of their fellow employees were on strike. Their own consciences and faith in their union principles dictated their action. This choice is one which members of organized labor are frequently called upon to make, and in the eyes of the law this kind of choice has never been deemed involuntary."

[4] Respondents argue that, because of the provisions of section 67 of the act, that "such benefits shall be paid regardless of any appeal which may thereafter be taken," no proceeding to review the award of the commission should be permitted to stay the payment of these benefits. The argument is that after a "double affirmance" of the award the payments must be made and that the commission is without power to withhold. The question is not before us in this proceeding. A restraining order was issued with the order to show cause on the alternative writ of mandate. If this were improper the question is now moot, because all preliminary orders fall with the peremptory writ. The restraining order was the customary order made in these cases to continue the status quo of the controversy until the matter is determined. Of course, it is inconceivable that the commission would pay from the trust fund any benefits which are known to be prohibited by the act, but, if valid payments were restrained, then the rights of the parties under section 67 of the act would become a subject of controversy. Until a final decision is reached it is to the interest of all parties that nothing be done which would entail a multiplicity of litigation.

Other questions raised by these respondents do not require consideration.

As to all respondents other than the carmen the allowance of their claims was improper and in violation of the act. These claims should be denied and the award should be vacated and annulled.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

The fundamental canon of construction applicable to contracts generally is the ascertainment of the intention of the parties. Civ.Code, § 1636.

2. Contracts 🔑147(3)

The language of contract, if clear and not conducive to an absurd result, governs its interpretation, but a portion only of written instrument, although clear, may not be selected as furnishing conclusive evidence of intention of the parties. Civ.Code, §§ 1636, 1638, 1641.

3. Evidence 🔑450(8)

Language of written contract for sale of feed pellet press providing for return of machine if unsatisfactory and limiting seller's liability to accepting return and refunding payments made and providing that in consideration of purchase and demonstration and advertising, buyer should receive 20 per cent. of gross proceeds of future sales and an interest in any patents or improvements thereon, when construed with provision that agreement should remain in effect for 17 years and inure to benefit of successors and assignees of the parties, created an "ambiguity" which must be resolved in accordance with recognized standards of interpretation. Civ.Code, §§ 1636–1638, 1641.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ambiguity".

4. Contracts 🔑169

Trial court, as an aid in discovering the intention of the parties to contract, may look to circumstances surrounding making of agreement including subject matter and object matter of writing, preliminary negotiations, and then place itself in the same situation in which the parties found themselves at the time of contracting. Where written contract, whereby feed pellet manufacturer and machine manufacturer undertook to develop a more efficient pellet press and machine manufacturer sold to pellet manufacturer a new type press recognized as imperfect, provided that on all future sales of presses based upon the press sold buyer should receive 20 per cent. of gross proceeds and should have an interest in any patent or improvements thereon, technical rules governing patent infringements holding that improvements include only improvements to the particular machine secured by the patent were not applicable in determining intention of the parties as to meaning of phrases "based upon" and "improvements thereon".

14. Joint adventures ⚷2

Where written contract whereby feed pellet manufacturer and machine manufacturer undertook to develop a more efficient pellet press and machine manufacturer sold to feed manufacturer a press utilizing horizontal worm in casing to force mash through die-plate, provided that buyer should receive percentage of gross proceeds of all further sales of presses based upon the press sold and an interest in any patent and "improvements thereon", a new type press subsequently developed and marketed by seller utilizing vertical roller instead of a worm was properly treated as an improvement "based upon" original model sold so as to entitle buyer to royalty interest therein under contract.

15. Joint adventures ⚷2

Under written contract providing that pellet press manufacturer in consideration of purchase of press and the demonstration and advertising thereof by pellet feed manufacturer would give the latter a percentage of gross proceeds of further sales of presses and that buyer was not required to pay for press unless it operated properly, buyer's obligation to purchase was conditional and its rejection of press and failure to pay price therefor did not constitute "failure of consideration" barring participation under royalty agreement in proceeds of sales of improved press.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Failure of Consideration".

16. Sales ⚷197

The words "purchase" and "sale" in a contract do not necessarily connote an executed or consummated purchase or sale but are frequently used in the sense of an agreement to buy or sell, the interpretation of the words in any particular case being controlled by the context of the writing necessitating an examination of the entire instrument.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Purchase" and "Sale".

17. Appeal and error ⚷1008(3)

Trial court's finding that parties in using the word "purchase" in contract for royalty payments meant an agreement to purchase would not be disturbed by Supreme Court where such finding was consistent with the surrounding circumstances and other provisions of the contract evidencing intention of the parties.

18. Contracts ⚷10(1)

Where pellet press manufacturer agreed to give feed pellet manufacturer a percentage of gross proceeds of further sales of presses in consideration of purchase of pellet press and the advantages to be derived from demonstration and advertising by buyer and buyer did its best to promote sales of the press, there was such "mutuality of remedy" as to justify action by buyer to recover its percentage of proceeds of sales, regardless of whether there was mutuality of obligation in the first instance in that buyer was not required to keep and pay for press unless it operated satisfactorily.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mutuality of Remedy".

19. Joint adventures 🔑2

Where machine manufacturer and feed pellet manufacturer undertook to develop a more efficient pellet press under contract providing that feed manufacturer should receive a percentage of gross proceeds, contract provision that buyer should be under no obligation to pay for press unless it operated properly and that liability of seller should be limited to accepting return of press and refunding payments made, limited seller's liability only as respects liability for damages due to failure of press to operate properly and did not provide for a "forfeiture" of buyer's royalty rights upon return of the press for unsatisfactory operation.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Forfeiture".

20. Contracts 🔑169

"Liability" is frequently construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances to determine if it refers to all obligations accrued and contingent or only to some particular liability which parties to contract had in mind.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the Universal Sales Corporation, Limited, against the California Press Manufacturing Company, on a written contract relating to the development and marketing of a machine manufactured by defendant and for accounting of profits on sales of similar machines in which action defendant filed a cross complaint against San Francisco Milling Company, Limited. From certain parts of a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is an appeal by the defendant, California Press Manufacturing Company, from certain parts of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Universal Sales Corporation, Ltd.

The action is based on a written contract dated March 2, 1931, between the plaintiff, a subsidiary of the San Francisco Milling Co., a producer and distributor of poultry and animal feed, and the defendant, a manufacturer of various types of presses. Since the questions presented upon this appeal concern primarily the scope of this contract and the legal rights and duties of the respective parties thereunder, it is essential in the disposition of this cause that the more important provisions of this writing be recited in some detail.

The contract contains three introductory "Whereas" clauses which state that the defendant has manufactured and has for sale a certain pellet press; that the defendant believes that it has manufactured a machine which will produce the results of a cuber press now operated by the plaintiff, and with a like or greater capacity; and that the defendant desires the plaintiff to purchase and operate the machine so as to be able to demonstrate its advantages. [The cuber press mentioned is an English pellet-making machine which at that time was being used by the plaintiff to produce feed pellets.]

It is then agreed that the defendant shall sell and the plaintiff shall purchase the machine for $2,000, payable $500 "upon delivery and test" and the balance in installments of $500 per month. This language is followed by the proviso that if the machine does not operate properly or with sufficient capacity, the plaintiff shall be under no obligation to pay for it, but the defendant shall not be liable for consequential damages, and the liability of the defendant shall be exclusively limited to accepting from the plaintiff the return of the machine and refunding the payments made. In this connection it is stated that before rejection of the machine the defendant shall have the privilege, should it so desire, of making such adjustments as will enable it to make the machine operate satisfactorily.

The contract further provides that in consideration of the purchase of the machine and the advantages of demonstration and advertising that the defendant will derive from the use of the machine by the plaintiff, the defendant agrees that as to all further sales of presses made by it, based upon the press sold to the plaintiff, and whether such sales be negotiated by the plaintiff or otherwise, twenty per cent of the gross selling price shall belong to the plaintiff and be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff when and as the said selling price is received by the defendant. In this part of the contract the plaintiff agrees to foster the sale of the manufactured machines. Then follows a stipulation that the agreement shall remain in effect for seventeen years from its date. It is further stated that the defendant agrees "to endeavor to patent said machine, or the improvements thereon"; and in the event of success in that regard, the defendant agrees that the plaintiff shall have "a twenty per cent interest in such patent or patents and in any improvements thereon that may be thereafter made by either party; the expense in prosecuting said patents to be borne twenty per cent by" the plaintiff "and eighty per cent by" the defendant.

The record discloses that the plaintiff operated the machine intermittently until December, 1931, and that it never did function with steady efficiency and sufficient capacity to satisfy the plaintiff. During this period of operation a great deal of effort was exerted by the officers and employees of each of the companies both in repair work and in attempts to increase the productive capacity of the machine, but apparently with only ephemeral success. Without endeavoring to describe in detail the mechanism of the press delivered to the plaintiff, it is sufficient to state that the meal, after being mixed and heated, is fed to a die-plate, through the holes of which the material is extruded in solid form by pressure. The prepared mash is fed to and pressed through the perforated die-plate by means of a worm laid horizontally and enclosed in casing. The principal difficulty encountered by the parties in the operation of this press was the tendency of the mash to solidify into a hard cake, which would not pass properly or uniformly through the holes of the die, so that the frequent clogging of the machine necessitated the removal of the die and its cleaning numerous times daily.

Sometime in the fall of 1931 and without the knowledge of the plaintiff, the defendant began to develop a variant form of press, featuring a roller mechanism, standing vertically and without casing, in place of the horizontal, encased worm or screw. Coincident with its progress with this change of construction, the defendant lost interest in making further adjustments on the screw-type press furnished to the plaintiff as specified in the agreement. Meanwhile the plaintiff, encouraged by the intermittent successful operation of the contract machine and convinced that its perfection would involve only a few minor alterations, was instrumental in interesting several milling companies in the trade in the outcome of the joint experimental efforts of the respective parties with the original pellet-producing device. Upon learning of the defendant's activity in connection with the manufacture and marketing of the roller-type press, the plaintiff advised the defendant that it considered the newly-developed machine to be within the purview of the contract and that it would insist upon the recognition of its rights thereunder. The defendant dissented from this version of the scope of the agreement between the parties. In view of the defendant's determined stand on the matter, as well as its disinclination to do any more repair work on the original pellet press, the plaintiff in July, 1932, notified the defendant of its desire to return this machine and requested the refund of two installments, amounting to $1,000, which had been paid on account of the purchase price. At the same time the plaintiff made specific demand for its proportionate share of the receipts collected by the defendant as the result of the sale of these later-developed presses to various milling companies. The defendant refused to comply with the plaintiff's terms as to both matters, although after the suit was commenced and by way of an amended answer, the defendant did alter its position to the extent of conceding the plaintiff's right under the contract to return the machine and its own liability for the $1,000, with interest.

On September 14, 1932, the plaintiff instituted this action and, by way of an amended complaint, recited the contract and many of the facts above related. In particular, the plaintiff alleged that subsequent to the date of the contract the defendant had manufactured and sold eight presses under the trade name of California Pellet Mill; that such presses were merely improvements on and were based on the pellet press sold to the plaintiff; and that plaintiff had demanded twenty per cent of the gross selling price of the pellet mill presses and a twenty per cent interest in patents obtained thereon, and improvements thereon. In a supplemental complaint the plaintiff alleged further sales by the defendant of the pellet mill presses and asked for an accounting. The plaintiff also claimed to have performed all conditions by it to be performed under the contract. The defendant by its denials put all controverted matters in issue, and in addition pleaded certain affirmative defenses to which reference will be made later in this opinion.

After an extended hearing the trial court found, among other things, that the contract was a mutual agreement of the parties to cooperate and work together and pool their inventive ideas in an endeavor to perfect the pellet press agreed to be sold and the improvements thereon and to manufacture, market and introduce it into general use; that in the dealings of the parties under the contract they did so practically construe it in their operations and transactions thereunder; that with the exception of failure on the part of the defendant to disclose to the plaintiff the defendant's ideas and plans with reference to certain improvements in substituting roller pressure for screw pressure in extruding the feed through the die, the plaintiff and the defendant freely exchanged, for their mutual benefit, their ideas and plans with reference to the "pellet press" pursuant to the provisions of the contract, and the above-mentioned ideas and plans were the result of said cooperation and working together of the plaintiff and the defendant and of the demonstration of needful changes by the plaintiff's use of the "pellet press," delivered to the plaintiff for the purposes of the contract; that the "pellet mill press" was based on the "pellet press" originally furnished to the plaintiff and any changes were merely improvements on the "pellet press" within the meaning of the term as used in the contract. The court further found that the plaintiff fully performed all matters and conditions to be performed by it under the contract; that the plaintiff at all times acted in accordance with and insisted upon its rights under the terms of the contract; that the plaintiff kept the "pellet press" in operation and demonstration at its plant as long as any benefit to the parties could result from such activity; that the plaintiff did not fail, refuse or neglect to foster the sale of similar machines; that the plaintiff did not abandon or waive any of its rights or privileges under the contract by its offer to return the "pellet press" to the defendant and its demand for a refund of the installments paid; and that the defendant's concealment of its activities in connection with the manufacture and marketing of the "pellet mill press" was a breach of its legal duty and a violation of the contract both in letter and in spirit.

The defendant appeals from such portions of the judgment as declare that the plaintiff is entitled to a twenty per cent interest (1) in a so-called "pellet press," (2) in a so-called "pellet mill press," (3) in any patents heretofore or hereafter obtained by the defendant thereon, (4) in any patents heretofore or hereafter obtained by the defendant on any improvements thereon, (5) in the gross selling price of any and all future sales of both pellet presses or pellet mill presses, and (6) from such portion thereof as awards judgment against the defendant for $24,884.70, and interest in the sum of $5,665.69. The former figure represents twenty per cent of the gross proceeds of the "pellet mill presses" sold plus the $1,000 paid by the plaintiff upon the purchase price of the "pellet press" delivered to it.

[1, 2] The principal problem presented on this appeal consists of a determination of whether or not the language of the contract is sufficiently certain and definite to render unnecessary a resort to extraneous evidence respecting the circumstances surrounding the execution of the instrument, the situation of the parties, and their intention in executing it. It is the defendant's contention that under the plain terms of the agreement the plaintiff's offer to return the pellet press and its demand for the refund of the two installments paid on account of the purchase price constituted a rejection of the machine and cancelled the contract. In this connection controlling importance is assigned to the provision that upon the failure of the machine to operate properly or with sufficient capacity, the obligation of the plaintiff as purchaser to pay for it was removed and the liability of the defendant as seller should be exclusively limited to accepting the return of the press and refunding the payments made thereon. It must be conceded that if this language upon which the defendant relies with so much assurance is regarded as the sole measure of the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract, the defendant's contention is tenable. However, there are other provisions in the instrument which must also be taken into consideration. The fundamental canon of construction which is applicable to contracts generally is the ascertainment of the intention of the parties (Civ.Code, § 1636), and in accordance with section 1638 of the Civil Code, the language of the agreement, if clear and explicit and not conducive to an absurd result, must govern its interpretation. But this does not mean that a portion only of a written instrument, although it is clear and explicit, may be selected as furnishing conclusive evidence of the intentions of the parties. Section 1641 of the Civil Code embraces the true rule in providing that "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other."

[3] Application of the principle announced in the last-mentioned section makes it necessary, therefore, to consider the import of that part of the document referable to the plaintiff's share in the benefits to be derived from the development and sales promotion of the press and of machines based thereon, as well as its interest in the defendant's prosecution of patent applications covering the pellet-producing device or "any improvements thereon that may be thereafter made by either party." Other significant phraseology appearing in this connection is the stipulation that "This agreement shall remain in effect for seventeen years from date hereof and shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of the successors and assigns of the parties hereto." The correlation of this express reference to the duration of the agreement pursuant to the scheme for the marketing of the presses with the language measuring the rights, duties and obligations of the parties with respect to the agreed terms of sale and purchase contained in the forepart of the document creates an ambiguity upon the face of the contract as to the nature and scope of the transaction which the parties intended to cover. Such uncertainty in terminology must be resolved in accordance with recognized standards of interpretation. Civ. Code, § 1637; Restatement, Contracts, §§ 235-236.

[4-7] As an aid in discovering the all-important element of intent of the parties to the contract, the trial court may look to the circumstances surrounding the making of the agreement (Civ.Code, § 1647; Smith v. Carlston, 205 Cal. 541, 550, 271 P. 1091; Katz v. People's Finance & Thrift Co., 101 Cal.App. 552, 558, 281 P. 1097; Meyers v. Nolan, 18 Cal.App.2d 319, 322, 63 P.2d 1216; 12 Am.Jur. 784, § 247), including the object, nature and subject matter of the writing (First National Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 262, 74 P. 856;

Weaver v. Grunbaum, 31 Cal.App.2d 42, 48, 87 P.2d 406; 12 Am.Jur. 776, § 242), and the preliminary negotiations between the parties (Balfour v. Fresno Canal & Irr. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 226, 41 P. 876; 12 Am.Jur. 757, § 234), and thus place itself in the same situation in which the parties found themselves at the time of contracting. Code Civ.Proc., § 1860; Tennant v. Wilde, 98 Cal.App. 437, 445, 277 P. 137; Pacific Indemnity Co. v. California Electric Works, Ltd., 29 Cal.App.2d 260, 272, 84 P.2d 313; 17 C.J.S., Contracts, p. 744, § 321. Also applicable here is the familiar rule that when a contract is ambiguous, a construction given to it by the acts and conduct of the parties with knowledge of its terms, before any controversy has arisen as to its meaning, is entitled to great weight, and will, when reasonable, be adopted and enforced by the court. Work v. Associated Almond Growers, 102 Cal. App. 232, 235, 282 P. 965; 6 Cal.Jur. 304, § 184. The reason underlying the rule is that it is the duty of the court to give effect to the intention of the parties where it is not wholly at variance with the correct legal interpretation of the terms of the contract, and a practical construction placed by the parties upon the instrument is the best evidence of their intention. 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1537; 12 Am.Jur. 787, § 249. As was said in Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 14, 84 P. 145, 150, 6 L.R.A., N.S., 275: "It is to be assumed that parties to a contract best know what was meant by its terms, and are the least liable to be mistaken as to its intention; that each party is alert to his own interests, and to insistence on his rights, and that whatever is done by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the contract is done under its terms as they understood and intended it should be. Parties are far less liable to have been mistaken as to the intention of their contract during the period while harmonious and practical construction reflects that intention, than they are when subsequent differences have impelled them to resort to law, and one of them then seeks a construction at variance with the practical construction they have placed upon it. * * * In its execution, every executory contract requires more or less of a practical construction to be given it by the parties, and when this has been given, the law, in any subsequent litigation which involves the construction of the contract, adopts the practical construction of the parties as the true construction, and as the safest rule to be applied in the solution of the difficulty. [Citing cases.]"

[8] Measured in the light of these well-established principles of interpretation, the record reveals ample evidence in support of the findings in favor of the plaintiff as to the scope and purpose of the contract in controversy. It appears that in connection with its business operations, the San Francisco Milling Company (the plaintiff's parent company) had been using an English machine called a "cuber press" for the production of certain poultry feed in pellet form. Unsatisfied with the output of the English press, the superintendent of the Milling Company in November, 1930, conceived the idea of interesting the defendant, an established machinery manufacturing company, in the development of a pellet-making machine of greater efficiency, and he so expressed himself to the defendant's president. As a result of many conferences between the representatives of the respective companies and in January, 1931, a pellet press was completed by the defendant, and installed in the plant of the Milling Company, where it was initially operated on February 15, 1931. Meanwhile, the plaintiff corporation was organized for commercial exploitation of the new machine when perfected. Many defects appeared in the press during the following months of experimentation and numerous changes in construction were made by the defendant in response to suggestions of the representatives of the respective companies as to the improvement of the mechanism. While the machine was still in its imperfect state insofar as commercial operation was concerned, the contract in suit, dated March 2, 1931, was executed on April 30, 1931. The relationship between the parties did not change upon the signing of the agreement, and they persisted in their cooperative efforts to develop and market an efficient press. The parties continued to share in the expense attendant upon experimentation with the suggested improvements—such as the plaintiff's idea for the multiple extrusion of pellets involving the addition of a double worm and double knife to the original machine, and the defendant's frequent recommendations for alterations of the die in respect to various features of drilling and thickness—the plaintiff undertaking to demonstrate the working processes of the press through its operation at a cost differential of $4 to $6 per ton on all pellets manufactured and the defendant making the necessary mechanical adjustments free of charge.

During this period the plaintiff, convinced of the ultimate success of the pellet-producing mechanism, began a selling and advertising campaign to create a market for the machine, interested several other milling companies as prospective purchasers and referred their inquiries to the defendant for appropriate consideration. Moreover, as evidence of its sincerity in this regard, the plaintiff took an option on two more of the pellet worm-type presses, and its parent company, the San Francisco Milling Company, purchased one of these machines. It was not until December, 1931, and following its manufacture of a press utilizing roller instead of screw pressure as the medium of force and its sale of several of these variant forms to milling companies previously recommended by the plaintiff, that the defendant manifested a change of attitude in its relation with the plaintiff by refusing to proceed further with repair work on the model delivered to the plaintiff. Learning of this marketing activity by the defendant and realizing the futility of attempting to cope longer with the defective features of the original press in view of the defendant's confessed lack of interest in that design and its refusal to recognize the plaintiff's assertion of certain rights in the new machine under the terms of the contract, the plaintiff, in July, 1932, offered to return the experimental press to the defendant and demanded both a refund of the installments paid on the original model and its proportionate share of the gross proceeds received by the defendant from the sales of the pellet mill presses, as contemplated by the agreement. Unable to prevail upon the defendant in either respect, the plaintiff in September, 1932, instituted the present litigation seeking a declaration of the rights and duties of the parties under the contract.

[9, 10] Upon the basis of these facts the trial court found that "under the terms of the said contract it was the mutual agreement of plaintiff and defendant to cooperate and work together and pool their inventive ideas in an endeavor to perfect the 'pellet press' agreed to be sold and the improvements thereon and to manufacture, market and introduce it into general use." The contract bears evidence that the parties did not regard the press supplied to the plaintiff as a pattern of perfection, for particular reference is made to the "testing" of it at the mill and the defendant's privilege of adjusting the machine if it should so desire. In other words, the defendant, having the facilities for the manufacture of machinery, desired the benefit to be derived in experimentation with the press incident to continuous milling operations and the plaintiff undertook to contribute to the venture practical demonstration of the mechanism under the direction of experienced employees, and to do advertising and promotion work for the purpose of creating a market for an efficient pellet-producing machine. This cooperation promotive of the common enterprise and involving the combination of the skill and efforts of both the plaintiff and the defendant suggests that the parties intended to establish a contractual relationship between themselves akin to that of joint adventurers. Further indication of this purpose is the royalty clause of the agreement referable to the plaintiff's share of the gross proceeds of sales of presses based upon the original model, whether such sales be negotiated by the plaintiff or the defendant, and the clause relating to the respective interests of the parties in any patent of the machine and "any improvements thereon that may be thereafter made by either party." While in a technical joint venture there is usually a sharing of profits and losses in the prosecution of the common enterprise (2 Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, § 975; 33 C.J. 841, § 2), the mode of participating in the fruits of the undertaking may be left to the agreement of the parties. Hamer v. MacClatchie, 220 Cal. 720, 32 P.2d 620. Whether the parties to a particular contract have thereby created, as between themselves, the strict relation of joint adventurers or some other relation involving cooperative effort, depends upon their actual intention, which is determined in accordance with the ordinary rules governing the interpretation and construction of contracts. 33 C.J. 845, § 16. Such a contract need not be express; it may be implied from the conduct of the parties. 2 Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, § 976. The acts and conduct of the parties engaged in the accomplishment of the apparent purposes may speak above the expressed declarations of the parties to the contrary. O. K. Boiler & Welding Co. v. Minnetonka Lumber Co., 103 Okl. 226, 228, 229 P. 1045. In the present case the trial court's interpretation of the parties' agreement as expressive of their intention to engage in a cooperative scheme calling for the pooling of inventive ideas in promotion of the common enterprise is consistent with the language of the contract as well as with the foregoing evidence showing that until the defendant refused to work further with the plaintiff, the plans and ideas of the parties were freely exchanged for their mutual benefit. It necessarily follows from such state of the record that the court was warranted in making the above-quoted finding referable to the cooperative undertaking of the parties.

The next point to be considered is whether, within the meaning of the contract, the new model is "based upon" the press made for the plaintiff so as to be treated as an "improvement thereon," as urged by the plaintiff, or embodies, as the defendant contends, a new invention which in no way concerns the plaintiff. The principal difference between the "pellet press" originally delivered to the plaintiff and the "pellet mill press" subsequently developed and sold to others by the defendant lies essentially in the means used to force the mash through the perforations in the die-plate. As previously stated, in the press furnished to the plaintiff the prepared material was fed to and forced through the perforated die-plate by means of a worm laid horizontally and enclosed in casing. In the new type of press a roller mechanism, standing vertically and without casing, supplants the horizontal, encased worm. The mash is then fed by gravity and forced into the die-plate by rotary action of the roller, which exerts its form of pressure without actual contact with the face of the die. The roller takes the place of the worm and the casing is no longer necessary. The plaintiff concedes that the "pellet mill press" embraces an improved extruding mechanism, but it attributes its annexation and efficacy to the demonstration of needful changes in the course of the many months of experimental operation of the original model as pursued by the plaintiff and the defendant at the mill of the San Francisco Milling Company.

[11, 12] At the trial avail was made of experts in patent law by both parties, and as would be inferred, those witnesses differed sharply in their opinions as to the equivalence of the roller and the worm as physical agencies for establishing, conjointly with other common factors, the functional relationship essential to commercial productivity. Based upon its consideration and evaluation of these conflicting views as well as the information gained from a visual inspection of the characteristic features of the two machines, which is proper evidence in a case (Ethel D. Company v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 219 Cal. 699, 704, 28 P.2d 919; Vaughan v. Tulare County, 56 Cal.App. 261, 265, 205 P. 21; MacPherson v. West Coast Transit Co., 94 Cal.App. 463, 466, 271 P. 509; 24 Cal.Jur. 752, § 34), the court found that "none of said differences changed the essential nature of said 'pellet press' and each difference was the substitution of a generic equivalent." It is well settled that the relative weight to be given opinion testimony and factual evidence is for the trial court. Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 469, 191 P. 913; Ross v. Hieronymus, 2 Cal.App.2d 258, 265, 37 P.2d 837; Shaw v. Owl Drug Co., 4 Cal.App.2d 191, 196, 40 P.2d 588.

[13] In considering whether under the language of the contract the plaintiff can be said to have any rights in the new press, the following phraseology is significant: "of all further sales of presses * * * based upon the press sold to the party of the first part (plaintiff) * * * twenty per cent of the gross selling price thereof shall belong to the party of the first part (plaintiff) and be paid by the party of the second part (defendant)." The broad scope of this clause predicate of the plaintiff's right to royalty payments, when related to the above-noted covenant embracing improvements, reasonably suggests that the parties did not intend to limit their agreement within the narrow confines and technical provisions of the patent law, but that it was their understanding to associate themselves in a common venture for the development of a marketable pellet machine, with the original model as a provisional rather than a perfected structure, and in contemplation of "improvements thereon" as the result of further operative experience. Consistent with this observation, the defendant's citation of cases turning on the refinements of the law governing patent infringement and holding that a contract to assign improvements included only improvements to the particular machine secured by the patent, is of no avail here. McAuley v. Chaplin-Fulton Mfg. Co., 217 Pa. 477, 66 A. 750; Stitzer v. Withers, 122 Ky. 181, 91 S.W. 277; Allison Bros. Co. v. Allison, 144 N.Y. 21, 38 N.E. 956. Parenthetically it might be noted that it appears from the record that the machine as to which the parties were contracting was not patented, in recognition, no doubt, of the existence of certain defects in its then state of operative efficiency.

[14] The comprehensive character of the words "improvements thereon" as used by the parties should not be overlooked. In American Cone & Wafer Co. v. Consolidated Wafer Co., 2 Cir., 247 F. 335, 336, 159 C.C.A. 429, wherein was considered an assignment of a patent for a device for making ice-cream cones, "as well as all improvements that may be made thereto or thereunder," Judge Learned Hand, in taking occasion to draw a distinction between an "improvement to" and an "improvement upon" a machine, said at page 336 of 247 F.: "Every more efficient machine would be an improvement 'upon' it, in common speech, but not 'to' it. We attach significance to the word 'thereto', and we should attach an added significance as well to 'thereunder,' if we could find any meaning for it. * * * Groset [the patentee] was free to make a new cone baker, which might successfully compete with the plaintiff, so long as it was not an improvement 'to' the disclosure of his first patent." In similar vein in West Disinfecting Co. v. United States Paper Mills, Inc., 3 Cir., 44 F.2d 803, affirmed 3 Cir., 62 F.2d 1086, certiorari denied 283 U.S. 836, 51 S.Ct. 485, 75 L.Ed. 1448, the court with reference to the expression "improvements thereon or variations thereof" stated at page 804 of 44 F.2d: "From the foregoing it seems clear to us that what the parties had in view when this contract was made was not the technical provisions of the patent law but the improvement of a folding machine such as it was then using. To effect such improvement the contract provided for the plaintiffs obtaining not only the then discovered improvement Winter had made on the old folding machine and which was embodied in his patent application therefor, but it also contemplated that Winter might make 'improvements thereon,' or 'variations thereof,' or improvements 'affecting said folding machine.'" As was aptly noted by Judge Hand in the American Cone case, supra, 247 F. at page 337: "We must try rather to assume the posture of the parties at the time, and consider what most men would have thought such language covered." In this regard it must be borne in mind that what the parties had before them and what constituted the subject matter of the contract was a commercially impractical pellet press, so that their employment of the words "based upon" and "improvements thereon" in connection with their joint undertaking for the development and promotion of a marketable machine, strongly suggests that they were then contemplating the accomplishment of a specific result even though effected by some substitution for the original functional mechanism. Accordingly, whether the roller is a mechanical equivalent of the worm in the screw-type press under the canons of patent law is not a matter for determination in this case. The function which the roller performs as a compressing device is so similar to that of the worm that within the scope of the contract the new model as a unitary structure may well be treated as an improvement based upon the old, and the trial court's finding in harmony with this construction will not be disturbed.

[15-17] Nor is there any merit to the defendant's claim that the plaintiff's failure to pay the full price for the original machine indisputably constitutes a bar to its participation in the benefits attendant upon the development and sale of the improved press. In this connection the defendant refers to that portion of the contract wherein the defendant agrees to pay the plaintiff twenty per cent of the gross selling price of further sales of presses "in consideration of the purchase of said machine and the advantages of demonstration and advertising" that the defendant "will derive from the use of said machine" by the plaintiff. The words "purchase" and "sale" in a contract do not necessarily connote an executed or consummated purchase or sale, but are frequently used in the sense of an agreement to buy or sell. 23 R.C.L. 1347, § 171. The interpretation of these terms in any particular case is controlled by the context of the writing, and the whole instrument must be examined. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 218, 18 P. 248, 9 Am.St.Rep. 199; Walti v. Gaba, 160 Cal. 324, 116 P. 963; In re Estate of Goetz, 13 Cal.App. 198, 201, 109 P. 145; MacRae

v. Heath, 60 Cal.App. 64, 68, 212 P. 228. Here the plaintiff was not required to keep and pay for the machine unless it operated "properly and with sufficient capacity," and the defendant reserved the privilege of making adjustments to enable the machine "to operate satisfactorily." Thus, it is apparent the plaintiff's obligation to purchase was not absolute but was subject to the foregoing qualifications and conditions. It therefore would appear that the contract was open to construction on this point, and the trial court's finding that the parties meant "an agreement to purchase" by the plaintiff to serve as part of the consideration for the royalty payments will not be disturbed where such view is consistent with the surrounding circumstances and other provisions of the contract evidencing the intention of the parties. Katz v. People's Finance & Thrift Co., supra, 101 Cal.App. at page 557, 281 P. 1097. Moreover, the defendant did derive the advantages of demonstration and advertising from the plaintiff's use of the original machine in the working laboratory, as above stated; and undeniably the plaintiff did foster the sales effected by the defendant prior to the rupture of their relationship in July, 1932. Although the machines sold were the improved presses, yet the trial court's finding based upon substantial evidence that the "improvements" resulted from the experimental operation of the original model in the workshop furnished by the plaintiff in accordance with the parties' understanding effectively establishes that the plaintiff should not be deprived of the fruits of the valuable services rendered by reason of the defendant's secretiveness as to the development and marketing of the roller mechanism. In such circumstances there was no failure of consideration upon the plaintiff's part.

[18] Moreover, the above recital of the plaintiff's performance within the purport of the parties' understanding as found by the trial court furnishes a complete answer to the defendant's charge of lack of mutuality as to the respective promises or obligations of the parties under the contract. As stated, the plaintiff did with the press furnished to it whatever could be done in demonstrating the machine, advertising it and fostering sales thereof, and the record discloses ample evidence that the defendant has enjoyed the fruits of the plaintiff's missionary activities. In such situation and apart from any question of mutuality of obligation in the first instance, this performance by the plaintiff prior to institution of this action was sufficient to create a mutuality of remedy so as to justify its seeking appropriate relief in this litigation for the failure of the defendant to conform with the terms of the agreement. Thurber v. Meves, 119 Cal. 35, 37-39, 50 P. 1063, 51 P. 536; Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 548, 51 P. 853, 52 P. 44; Wheat v. Thomas, 209 Cal. 306, 314, 287 P. 102; Gosnell v. Lloyd, 215 Cal. 244, 253, 10 P.2d 45; 23 Cal.Jur. 450, § 22.

[19-22] Likewise without force is the defendant's argument that the plaintiff's offer to return the machine coupled with its demand for a refund of the installments paid constituted a termination of the contract. The provision on which the defendant relies in this connection reads as follows: "In the event that said machine shall not operate properly or with sufficient capacity, first party (plaintiff) shall be under no obligation to pay for same, but second party (defendant) shall not be liable for consequential damages, and the liability of second party shall be exclusively limited to accepting from the party of the first part the return of said machine and refund payments made thereon." If by this language specifically restricted to the measure of the defendant's liability upon the plaintiff's return of the machine, the parties contemplated a stipulation for termination of the contract, necessarily involving the forfeiture of the plaintiff's rights thereunder, it would have been a simple matter to have so provided in plain terms. Instead the parties in a subsequent clause of their agreement expressly stated "This agreement shall remain in effect for seventeen years from date hereof." Settlement of such uncertainty existing on the face of the instrument as to the parties' intent with respect to the duration of their agreement calls for the trial court's application of the familiar rules of interpretation, as above stated. Pacific Indemnity Co. v. California Electric Works, Ltd., supra. "Liability" is a term which is frequently construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances to determine if it refers to all obligations accrued and contingent or only to some particular liability which the parties had in mind. Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 153 P. 939; Rowell v. Western Motor Transport Co., 94 Cal. App. 12, 270 P. 400. Relevant to the consideration of the parties' purpose in thus incorporating in their contract a provision manifestly susceptible of varied shades of meaning is the apt observation of Mr. Justice Holmes: "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged, it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used." Towne v. Eisner, 245 U.S. 418, 425, 38 S.Ct. 158, 159, 62 L.Ed. 372, L.R.A. 1918D, 254. In rejecting the defendant's theory that the provision in question embraced a scheme for the defendant's release from all liability under the contract, the trial court found in substance that the "liability" so prescribed meant only liability for damages due to failure of the machine to operate properly, and not a forfeiture of all rights under the agreement. This construction is not only consistent with the scope of the language in relation to the court's determination as to the purpose of the enterprise envisaged by the writing, but it likewise is in harmony with the settled policy of the law not to enforce a forfeiture in the absence of a clear statement to that effect. The principles governing this point are well stated in Nelson v. Schoettgen, 1 Cal.App.2d 418, 423, 36 P.2d 665, 667; "Forfeitures are not favored by the courts, and, if an agreement can be reasonably interpreted so as to avoid a forfeiture, it is the duty of the court to avoid it. The burden is upon the party claiming a forfeiture to show that such was the unmistakable intention of the instrument. Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285, 60 P. 855; McNeece v. Wood, 204 Cal. 280, 267 P. 877; 6 Cal.Jur. 362. 'A contract is not to be construed to provide a forfeiture, unless no other interpretation is reasonably possible.' McPherson v. Empire Gas & Fuel Co., 122 Cal.App. 466, 10 P.2d 146, 148; Hansen v. D'Artenay, 121 Cal.App. 746, 9 P.2d 889; Booth v. Los Angeles County, 124 Cal.App. 259, 12 P.2d 72."

[23-26] A further matter to be considered in connection with the trial court's findings, as above recited, is the relationship existing between the parties pursuant to their agreement regarding their cooperative undertaking. In every contract there is an implied covenant that neither party shall do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract, which means that in every contract there exists an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. 17 C.J.S., Contracts, p. 778, § 328. Within the purport of this equitable principle, the defendant's conduct in withholding information regarding the fabrication of the roller-type press, its sale to the public and the application for a patent is a violation of the contract in letter and spirit. Since according to the evidence, the cooperative arrangement of the parties partook of the nature of a joint venture, the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty of fair, open, honest disclosure, and it cannot by connivance, deceit or suppression of facts within the right or to the advantage of the plaintiff to know, secure or accept secret gains. 33 C.J. 851, § 36; 15 R.C.L. 501, § 3. Accordingly, it is unconscionable for the defendant to suggest that because its president made individual application for letters patent covering the improved machine—a corporation not being able to file for patents, that being a personal privilege (35 U.S.C.A. § 33)—he may keep for himself the benefits flowing therefrom and the plaintiff's rights to the fruits of the contract are destroyed. The defendant's president executed the agreement on behalf of the defendant, with full knowledge of the implications therein contained, and accepted all the advantages attendant upon the plaintiff's demonstration and use of the original press. Such situation compels the conclusion that the defendant may not evade its contractual obligations by reason of a technicality in the patent law. Analogous in principle is the case of Hamer v. MacClatchie, 220 Cal. 720, 32 P.2d 620, an action for accounting and for recovery of unpaid royalties on certain patents. It was there said at page 724 of 220 Cal., at page 622 of 32 P.2d: "Furthermore, the evidence shows that the plans and ideas of these parties were freely exchanged for their mutual benefit. It fully justifies the finding that, under the terms of the agreement, the patent issued to defendant was held in trust by him for the benefit of both parties." In like manner the record here establishes the equities of the plaintiff's claim to participate in proportion to its agreed interest in the gains incident to the development of the improved press.

[27] In summation of this branch of the case, it need only be said that the construction given the contract in suit by the trial court appears to be consistent with the true intent of the parties and where that is so, the appellate court will not substitute another interpretation though it seem equally tenable. Adams v. Petroleum Midway Co., Ltd., 205 Cal. 221, 224, 270 P. 668; Kautz v. Zurich Gen. A. & L. Ins. Co., Ltd., 212 Cal. 576, 582, 300 P. 34; McNeny v. Touchstone, 7 Cal.2d 429, 435, 60 P.2d 986; Slama Tire Protector Co. v. Ritchie, 31 Cal.App. 555, 562, 161 P. 25.

[28, 29] The remaining points presented for consideration upon this appeal require but brief comment. First to be noted is the defendant's challenge of the sufficiency of the amended complaint's plea of performance by reason of the omission of the word 'duly" in the allegation "That plaintiff has performed all conditions by it to be performed under said contract." Code Civ. Proc. § 457. In this connection the defendant urges that the strict rule of pleading followed with respect to a party's assertion of the bar of the statute of limitations according to the specific section and subdivision of the code (Code Civ Proc. § 458; Overton v. White, 18 Cal. App.2d 567, 64 P.2d 758, 65 P.2d 99) necessitates a like exactitude in the statement of the general allegation of performance permitted by the code. However, adoption of the defendant's theory as to the similarity of the statutory requirement regulating the method of pleading these respective matters as legal conclusions would not lend force to its present argument. The rule as to the proper plea of the statute of limitations is not self-operating but depends for its enforcement on the diligence of the plaintiff in objecting to the insufficiency of the plea either by demurrer to the answer or by timely objection at the trial. Churchill v. Woodworth, 148 Cal. 669, 84 P. 155, 113 Am.St.Rep. 324, approved but distinguished on this ground in Overton v. White, supra, in affirming a judgment on the pleadings in favor of plaintiff. On a like basis the defendant's charge of inadequacy of the amended complaint to raise the issue of performance is of no avail here where the record shows that the parties, pursuant to their respective positions, exhaustively litigated this subject during the course of the main trial, the court properly made specific findings on the matter, and the defendant did not urge the point of defective pleading until after the trial had been completed as to all questions except the supplemental accounting aspect of the case. Code Civ.Proc. § 475.

[30-32] The defendant next contends that the terms of the judgment are so broad as to amount to a decree of specific performance rather than a declaration of the rights and duties of the parties under the contract. Particular objection is made to the recognition accorded the plaintiff's claim to the royalty payments and patent interests stipulated in the agreement. The defendant urges that such adjudication, operating in futuro and contemplating the continuance of a personalized relationship between the parties for the stated time, contravenes the settled principle of equity that a contract for personal services extending over a long period will not be specifically enforced. Civ.Code, § 3390; Poultry Producers of Southern California, Inc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93. But the defendant mistakes the scope of the judgment rendered under authority of the declaratory relief act of this state, Code of Civil Procedure, sections 1060–1062a. Blakeslee v. Wilson, 190 Cal. 479, 213 P. 495. The present case, involving an actual controversy between the parties, is the precise type of situation that the statutory remedy in question was designed to meet and accommodate. The judgment simply declares the rights and duties of the parties under the terms of the contract and limits the money award in favor of the plaintiff to the sum to which it was entitled as of the date of the hearing on the supplemental complaint in 1935. The fact that considerations of personal service are involved in the contract does not render the agreement an improper subject for declaratory relief (Blakeslee v. Wilson, supra; Lane Mortgage Company v. Crenshaw, 93 Cal.App. 411, 269 P. 672; Herrlein v. Tocchini, 128 Cal.App. 612, 18 P.2d 73; Holley v. Hunt, 13 Cal.App.2d 335, 56 P.2d 1240) nor establish that such suit is governed by the rules relating to actions for specific performance. Lane Mortgage Co. v. Crenshaw, supra, 93 Cal.App. at page 433, 269 P. 672. The defendant's citation of Coykendall v. Jackson, 17 Cal.App.2d 729, 62 P.2d 746, does not strengthen its argument. That case merely decided that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining without leave to amend a demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint for declaratory relief. Consistent with the precise limitations of the question there presented for consideration, it is manifest that any language of that opinion purporting to intimate that a contract involving personal services because not specifically enforceable is likewise not a proper matter for declaratory relief is dicta and not controlling of the point here involved in view of the well-settled law on the subject of this statutory remedy, as above noted. It follows therefore that the trial court's treatment of the present case as one correctly brought under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the form of its judgment determinative of the points in litigation are unassailable.

[33] The defendant finally complains of the excessiveness of the judgment in the following respects: (1) its designation of the press as a unitary structure rather than the pellet-making mechanism thereof as the basis for computation of the commission payments due the plaintiff from sales of the machine; (2) its declaration in the conjunctive rather than in the disjunctive of the plaintiff's right to a twenty per cent interest in all patents obtained upon the "pellet press," the "pellet mill press," and improvements on either. The first charge of error predicated upon the claim that the term "press," as used in the contract, meant only the extruding mechanism of the machine sold and did not embrace the "accessories"—the mixer, the heater, the feeder and the motor—is nullified by the testimony of the defendant's president. He stated that the entire machine was considered the press and sold as a unit, that the specifications in the advertising literature he authorized for circulation to various milling companies included the so-called "accessories" as integral parts of the press offered for sale to the public. In view of this evidence in support of the plaintiff's claim that the parties used the word "press" in reference to the whole machine, the fact that some essential operative part thereof was purchased by the defendant from an outside source rather than manufactured by it would not serve to defeat the plaintiff's right to the royalty payments stipulated in the contract. Consequently the defendant's objection to this feature of the judgment cannot be sustained.

[34-36] As to the second charge of error—the declaration of the plaintiff's interest in the patents on the respective machines and improvements of either—the following quotation from the case of Homer Laughlin Engineers Corporation v. J. W. Leavitt & Co., 116 Cal.App. 197, 200, 201, 2 P.2d 511, 512, furnishes a complete answer: "We are of the opinion that it was within the province of the trial court to construe the contract from a reading of the whole thereof, and, where any word or phrase was subject to different meanings, then such meaning should be given as would harmonize with the provisions of the instrument in its entirety, and, in arriving at a true construction of the instrument, all of the surrounding circumstances should be considered. * * * And there is almost an unanimity of holding to the effect that the terms 'and' and 'or' may be construed as interchangeable when necessary to effect the apparent meaning of the parties. Arnold v. Hopkins, 203 Cal. [553], 563, 265 P. 223; Willis v. Robinson, 291 Mo. 650, 237 S.W. 1030, 1033; Poehlman v. Leinweber, 288 Ill. 58, 122 N.E. 834; Kales v. Houghton, 190 Cal. 294–298, 212 P. 21."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

TRAYNOR, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment. I do not agree with the premise implicit in the majority opinion that parol evidence as to the meaning of the contract was admissible only because the contract is ambiguous on its face. Words are used in an endless variety of contexts. Their meaning is not subsequently attached to them by the reader but is formulated by the writer and can only be found by interpretation in the light of all the circumstances that reveal the sense in which the writer used the words. The exclusion of parol evidence regarding such circumstances merely because the words do not appear ambiguous to the reader can easily lead to the attribution to a written instrument of a meaning that was never intended. Prohibition lies to restrain one court from assuming jurisdiction over controversy where another tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction has assumed and is exercising control over the same action.

2. Prohibition ⚿10(2)

The fact that second action in respondent superior court was based on the same written sales contract as action in another superior court which had previously acquired jurisdiction did not warrant issuance of writ of prohibition against respondent superior court on ground that it had no jurisdiction, where the second action was directed to an accounting for sales made subsequent to the filing of the first action.

Proceeding in prohibition by the California Press Manufacturing Company and others against the Superior Court of Santa Clara County and others to restrain respondent superior court from taking any further action in the cause entitled, Universal Sales Corporation, Ltd., against California Press Manufacturing Company, California Pellet Mill Company and others, on the ground that another tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction had assumed and was exercising control over the same action.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is a proceeding in prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from taking any further action in that cause entitled "Universal Sales Corporation, Ltd., a corporation, Plaintiff, v. California Press Manufacturing Co., a corporation, California Pellet Mill Company, a corporation, et al., Defendants," filed in the Superior Court of Santa Clara County on January 31, 1941. This latter suit and another similar suit filed on February 2, 1938, in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, are both based on a contract involved in a previously instituted declaratory relief action now on appeal to this court—Universal Sales Corporation, Ltd., a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. California Press Manufacturing Company, a Corporation, Defendant, S. F. No. 15988, 128 P.2d 665. Disposition of this latter cause was made in an opinion filed today and reference is made thereto for a full discussion of the provisions and effect of the mentioned contract.

While the main case [S. F. No. 15988] was pending in this court and while the second San Francisco action apparently was being held in abeyance until final decision by this court on the appeal before it, the plaintiff in the action before the Santa Clara court secured an order therein for the taking of the depositions of certain officers of the defendant companies. The defendants filed objections to the jurisdiction of that court to proceed in the case with the taking of the depositions or in any other manner. Following that tribunal's overruling of the objections, the defendants sought relief in this court and an alternative writ of prohibition was issued.

[1, 2] Petitioners' application for the issuance of a peremptory writ is based on the premise that prohibition will lie to restrain one court [Santa Clara Superior Court] from assuming jurisdiction over a controversy when another tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction [San Francisco Superior Court] has assumed and is exercising control over the same matter. While this proposition is fundamentally sound, it is not applicable here for the reason that although the Santa Clara action is based on the same contract, it is directed to an accounting for sales made subsequent to the filing of the second San Francisco action. The Santa Clara Superior Court therefore has jurisdiction to proceed in the action pending before it.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged and the petition for a peremptory writ of prohibition is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge.

Action by Marie L. McCarthy against James Mitchell and others to recover real property sold in a probate proceeding and to quiet title thereto. From an adverse judgment plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Jesse George, of San Diego, for appellant.

Wright, Thomas & Dorman and Leroy A. Wright, II, all of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to recover four parcels of real property which had been sold to certain of the defendants in a probate proceeding and to quiet title thereto in the plaintiff. From an adverse judgment the plaintiff has appealed. The appellant is the sole devisee and legatee under the will of W. O. Mitchell. He died in San Diego on January 23, 1927, leaving as a part of his estate the real property in question. On February 11, 1927, the public administrator was appointed as administrator of his estate. In the process of such administration he sold these parcels of real property to various of these defendants, the sales being made on November 23, 1927, November 25, 1927, March 2, 1928, and on September 14, 1928, respectively.

In the meantime, the appellant petitioned for the probate of a lost will of the deceased, which was denied on June 5, 1928. The last will of the deceased was not found until January 10, 1929. A petition for its probate was filed on January 12, 1929, and denied on September 5, 1929, on the ground it should have been filed in the original case. On December 31, 1929, appellant filed another petition for the probate of this will which was denied on January 22, 1930. That order was reversed on appeal on July 16, 1931. In re Estate of Mitchell, 115 Cal.App. 348, 1 P.2d 536. The will was finally admitted to probate on September 25, 1931, and this appellant was appointed administratrix with the will annexed. However, the public administrator having filed his final account and petition therefor, distribution had been ordered to an alleged brother of the deceased on May 10, 1929, at which time the first petition for the probate of the will was still pending. Apparently, no appeal was taken from that decree of distribution. The administrator was discharged on January 24, 1930.

The present action to set aside these probate sales was not filed until September 15, 1941. The above facts are alleged in the complaint and it is further alleged that at the time the probate sales were made the respective purchasers knew that the deceased "had executed the aforesaid will to and in favor of plaintiff and that plaintiff was seeking said will and intended to have it presented for probate." A demurrer was filed to the second amended complaint setting up, among other things, that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and that it appears on the face of the complaint that the action is barred by the provisions of section 793 of the Probate Code, and by laches. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and this appeal followed.

It is not contended that these probate sales were not duly and regularly made. The appellant contends, however, that since it is alleged that the respective purchasers had knowledge of the fact that the appellant claimed that a will existed in which the property was devised to her and that she was searching for it and would present it for probate if and when it should be found, it must be held that in purchasing the properties they took title thereto in trust for her. The properties were sold in probate proceedings before the will was discovered, two of the sales being made after the court had denied a petition to admit a supposedly lost will to probate. While it is alleged that the purchasers knew that the deceased had executed a will in favor of this appellant, it is not alleged that they knew that this will was still in existence or that it would later be found. In many cases where it is known that a will had been executed at some former time no will is ever found. Not only were these probate sales regular in all respects, but they were not directly affected by the existence or non-existence of a will. There is nothing in the situation which appears to take this case out of the usual rule. Section 510 of the Probate Code provides for the revocation of letters of administration issued on the ground of intestacy, upon the admission to probate of a will of the deceased. The effect of section 525 is to confirm and make valid the acts of the administrator prior to the time his letters are revoked. Similar provisions were in effect at the times here in question.

[1, 2] While the appellant was entitled to follow the proceeds of these sales in the hands of those to whom these proceeds were distributed, the sales were valid and she cannot take the property from purchasers who bought it in good faith and for value from the administrator, who sold it at regular probate sales at a time when such proceedings appeared to be and were valid. Thompson v. Samson, 64 Cal. 330, 30 P. 980. So far as disclosed by the complaint these sales would have been perfectly good even if the will had been admitted to probate before distribution was ordered. There may have been undue haste in making distribution after discovery of the will, as the appellant claims. Her real grievance is not that there was anything wrong with the sales of the property, but that the proceeds of those sales were distributed to the wrong person. With this error or wrongful act, whichever it was, the purchasers at these probate sales had nothing to do. It follows that no sufficient reason for setting aside these sales is alleged in the complaint.

A further consideration is that this action was barred by the provisions of section 793 of the Probate Code, which provides that no action for the recovery of property sold by an administrator can be maintained unless it is commenced within three years after the settlement of the final account of the administrator or within three years after the discovery of any fraud. The complaint alleges that after the appellant was appointed administratrix with the will annexed in September, 1931, she made a search for the person to whom the balance of the estate had been distributed but could not find him at his address in Denver, Colorado, from which he had disappeared. It is further alleged that she thereafter prosecuted an action against this person and others "without success." It is argued that these efforts and the consequent delay explain the tardy filing of this suit.

[3] It is argued that "the respondents became trustees of plaintiff and appellant under section 2224 of the Civil Code" and that "an element of fraud, actual or constructive, is the basis upon which the trust here is founded." If this be true it would seem equally true that the appellant discovered this element of fraud when she found the will, or at least when the will was admitted to probate. However, this action was not brought until ten years later.

It is further argued that any settling of the account of the public administrator was interlocutory in character, that no right of action accrued in appellant's favor until April 12, 1940, when distribution was finally made to her, and that the three-year period did not begin to run until that date, when her final account as administratrix was settled.

[4] It seems to follow from the language used in section 793 that the settlement of the final account referred to as starting the running of the period is that of the administrator who made the sale which it is sought to set aside. In Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 39, 54 P. 378, 380, 68 Am.St.Rep. 17, where it was claimed the administratrix who made the sale had never qualified and that no final account had been approved, the court said: "Our whole scheme for settling the estates of decedents 'looks to a speedy close of administration.' * * * In our opinion, the administratrix was allowed, under the amendment of 1880, a reasonable time in which to obtain settlement of her final account, and that, failing in this, the statute began to run * * *." It is hardly thinkable that in thus limiting the time for bringing such an action, which affects third persons and the title to lands, it should have been intended to make the starting of the period dependent upon the act of some future administrator who might not even be appointed until many years later, and then possibly to finally wind up some forgotten matter in the estate.

[5] It appears from this complaint that the public administrator filed his final account with a petition for distribution, and that distribution was ordered on May 10, 1929. It not only inferentially appears that this final account was approved, since the public administrator was discharged on January 24, 1930, but as has been held under section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the predecessor of section 793 of the Probate Code, the three-year statute began to run after a reasonable time in which to obtain a settlement of that account had elapsed. Dennis v. Bint, supra; In re Estate of Bryan, 99 Cal.App. 113, 277 P. 1068. The appellant had a right of action at least upon her appointment as administratrix, no reason appears for the delay of more than ten years, and it also appears that the purchasers at these sales have been prejudiced by such delay in bringing this action. We think the court was justified in holding that the action was barred both by this statute and by laches.

The judgment is affirmed.

CEDZO v. BERGEN et al.

Civ. 13057.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 29, 1942.

Hearing Denied Sept. 24, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⚷244(36)

In action against motorist for injuries sustained by passenger in another automobile in collision at street intersection, evidence sustained finding implied in verdict for defendant motorist that defendant was not guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the collision.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1064(1)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision wherein jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant, the fact that evidence would have amply supported a contrary verdict made it necessary for District Court of Appeal to give careful consideration to asserted errors in law relative to instructions.

3. Negligence ⚷93(1)

Evidence from which it could be deduced that driver of colliding automobile in which passenger was riding had failed to make boulevard stop, which on account of intervening street car tracks he was required to make 180 or 140 feet from extended curb-line of intersecting street would not warrant charging passenger with responsibility for negligence of the driver so as to render passenger guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery.

4. Appeal and error 🔑382(12)

Where pleadings in action against motorist for injuries sustained by passenger in another automobile raised issue as to passenger's contributory negligence, passenger did not request an instruction that evidence was insufficient to support a verdict against him on such issue but did request an instruction that driver's negligence was not imputable to passenger, passenger was "estopped" from asserting error in the giving on court's own motion of instructions submitting issue of passenger's contributory negligence notwithstanding there was no evidence thereof.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop".

5. Trial 🔑203(1)

Generally it is proper for court to state to jury issues raised by pleadings.

6. Appeal and error 🔑882(12)

A party is "estopped" from asserting error in an instruction requested by him or by an adversary, if the instruction requested by adversary merely invokes the same proposition that has been asserted by party complaining.

7. Trial 🔑296(4)

In automobile passenger's action for injuries sustained in collision, an erroneous instruction relative to negligence of driver of automobile in which passenger was riding in failing to stop before entering intersection was not prejudicial to passenger in view of other instructions that driver's negligence was not imputable to passenger.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)

Where question of defendant motorist's negligence was substantially the same whether automobile in which plaintiff was riding was required to stop at stop sign or stop line, which due to intervening street car tracks alongside highway were placed some distance from intersection, or at curb line of highway, error in giving instruction in terms of statute as amended after collision, from which it might be inferred that stop at curb line was required, was not prejudicial to plaintiff. Vehicle Code §§ 82.5, 577, St.1937, p. 413, St.1935, p. 190, St.1939, p. 1608; Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by Stephen Cedzo against Robert Bergen and another for injuries sustained in an automobile collision at street intersection. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Lawrence E. Drumm and H. Spencer St. Clair, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Spray, Davis & Gould, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

This case arises out of a collision of automobiles at an intersection of highways, the configuration of which presents a situation of particular difficulty for vehicular traffic and is of basic importance in determining this appeal. The intersection is that of Redondo Boulevard and Florence Avenue in the city of Inglewood. Both thoroughfares are broad, paved highways, the Florence Avenue roadway being 40 feet in width and Redondo Boulevard being 50 feet wide. Redondo Boulevard is signposted as a through highway. Florence Avenue runs approximately east and west and converges with Redondo Boulevard, which latter highway continues westerly almost directly in line with the extended lines of Florence. At the intersection, Redondo Boulevard curves slightly (about 19 degrees) toward the north and continues in a general east northeasterly direction. Complicating the problems of the intersection is the fact that throughout the area in question double streetcar tracks of the Los Angeles Railway (on its private right of way) parallel Redondo Boulevard adjacent to it on the southerly side. Apparently to avoid the hazard of stopping motor vehicles on the street railway company's right of way as it crosses Florence Avenue, the stop sign and white line marker controlling traffic on Florence Avenue approaching the intersection from the east are placed east of the streetcar tracks. Thus vehicles on Florence Avenue traveling west are required to make the boulevard stop for Redondo Boulevard at a point considerably east of the actual position of the extended easterly curb line of the through highway. According to unchallenged statements in respondents' brief (assertedly based on a diagram in evidence) the stop sign is 180 feet east, and a white line marker on the roadway with the word "Stop" painted in front of it, is 140 feet east, of the extended easterly curb line of Redondo Boulevard. It must also be noted that according to an unchallenged statement in appellant's opening brief (likewise assertedly based on the diagram in evidence) the easterly car track paralleling Redondo Boulevard is approximately 80 feet west of a point in the center of the north half of Florence Avenue, opposite the stop sign. The intersection is open and unimpeded so far as visibility is concerned. Comprehension of all of the foregoing locale facts is essential to intelligent consideration of the reciprocal rights and duties of the parties to this action and the rules regulating their conduct in the premises.

On July 9, 1939, at approximately 2:25 a.m., plaintiff was a guest in a Ford coach which was being driven in a westerly direction on Florence Avenue by one Roberts. It is undisputed that the night was clear and the visibility good. According to testimony of the plaintiff and the driver Roberts a stop was made either at the stop sign or at the white line in the roadway. Plaintiff fixed the stopping point as just in front of the white line on the roadway while Roberts, the driver of the Ford, testified that he stopped at the flashing stop sign. As previously noted, the stop sign was approximately 40 feet east of the white line, about 80 feet east of the easterly car track, and about 180 feet east of the extended southeasterly curb line of Redondo Boulevard. Both plaintiff and the driver said that while stopped they saw defendants' automobile about 600 or 700 feet away, traveling east (toward them) on Redondo Boulevard. The lights on the car in which plaintiff was riding were burning and at least one head lamp on defendants' car was lighted. The Ford (plaintiff's car) then started up, according to plaintiff's evidence, and proceeded (at a speed not exceeding 20 miles per hour) across the street railway tracks to the point of collision, which, likewise according to plaintiff's evidence, was about 90 feet beyond the tracks (west thereof) and near the center of Redondo Boulevard. Defendants' evidence placed the point of collision at about the same point as did plaintiff's evidence so far as the east-west direction was concerned, but some 10 feet south of the center line of Redondo Boulevard. Defendant Bergen, who was the operator of the automobile owned by defendant Enochs, testified that he did not see the Ford until it was "just about" to the railway tracks, that it was then traveling about 40 miles per hour, and that the distance between the two automobiles, when he first saw the Ford, was about 200 feet. He said that he was traveling about 30 miles per hour in his right hand (the southerly) lane of traffic and that he did not slow up when he first saw the Ford but "When the cars were about 50 feet apart, I saw he was not going to stop at all, so I stepped on the brake and swerved to the left." Defendant driver also stated that his car traversed about 80 feet from the point where he first saw the Ford to the point of impact. At 40 miles per hour it would require about one and one-half seconds to travel 80 feet. It is undisputed that plaintiff received severe injuries in the collision, that he was a guest in the Ford, and that negligence of the Ford driver, Roberts, is not imputable to him.

The verdict of the jury was for defendants and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, contending (1) that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment in that defendants' own evidence establishes that the defendant driver Bergen was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in failing to see the approaching Ford until it was approximately at the railway tracks (within 200 feet of the defendants' car) and in failing, after seeing it, to take any action to avoid the collision until the two automobiles were within 50 feet of each other; (2) that the trial court erred to the prejudice of plaintiff in instructing the jury, of its own motion, and contrary to an instruction requested by both plaintiff and defendants, that contributory negligence of plaintiff was an issue in the case; (3) that the trial court erred prejudicially to plaintiff in giving on its own motion an instruction based on a section of the Vehicle Code as amended subsequent to the accident. None of these contentions can be sustained.

[1, 2] On plaintiff's first point we are not disposed to hold that the implied finding of the jury that defendant driver was not guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the accident is as a matter of law untenable. The evidence in this regard is more thoroughly discussed later on in this opinion. Certainly, however, we must recognize that the evidence would amply support a contrary verdict. This latter fact makes it necessary for us to give careful consideration to the two asserted errors in law occurring at the trial.

Defendant pleaded contributory negligence as a defense, in the following language: "That plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to and caused the happening of the accident in question, in this: That at said time and place he was riding in an automobile which he knew was being driven, or as a reasonable and prudent person should have known was being driven, in a careless, reckless, negligent and unlawful manner."

[3] At the trial no evidence was elicited which could support a finding that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injuries. There is no evidence of any lack of ordinary care by the driver of the Ford prior to the time that the boulevard stop was made on approaching the Redondo Boulevard intersection and the events thereafter disclose no negligent act or omission on the part of plaintiff. Neither defendant driver nor his witnesses claimed to have seen the Ford until it was approximately at the railway tracks—about 80 feet beyond (west of) the point where it was required to make the boulevard stop—but even if we could deduce from the evidence of defendants as to the rate of speed of the Ford at the car tracks that it had failed to make the boulevard stop we should still lack a reasonable basis for charging plaintiff with personal responsibility for such negligence of the driver Roberts (see Chapman v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. (1927), 85 Cal.App. 69, 74, 258 P. 1006).

Plaintiff urges that the case was tried by both parties on the theory that contributory negligence of the plaintiff was not in issue and points out that both plaintiff and defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as to the issues to be determined, as follows: "Issues to be Determined. The issues to be determined by you in this case are these:

"First: Was the defendant negligent?

"If you answer that question in the negative, you will return a verdict for the defendant. If you answer it in the affirmative, you have a second issue to determine, namely:

"Was that negligence the proximate cause of any injury to the plaintiff?

"If you answer that question in the negative, plaintiff is not entitled to recover, but if you answer it in the affirmative, you then will find what damage plaintiff has suffered and return a verdict in his favor for the amount thereof.

"As indicated in this instruction, you should first determine the question of liability.

"Requested by Plaintiff. Requested by Defendant."

The above quoted requested instruction, however, was refused and the court of its own motion gave an instruction reading as follows: "By The Court No. 1. The issues to be determined by you in this case are these:

"First: Was the defendant negligent?

"If you answer that question in the negative, you will return a verdict for the defendant. If you answer it in the affirmative, you have a second issue to determine, namely:

"Was that negligence a proximate cause of any injury to the plaintiff?

"If you answer that question in the negative, plaintiff is not entitled to recover, but if you answer it in the affirmative, you then must find on a third question:

"Was the plaintiff negligent?

"If you find that he was not, after having found in plaintiff's favor on the other two issues, you then must fix the amount of plaintiff's damages and return a verdict in his favor.

"If you find that plaintiff was negligent, you then must determine a fourth issue, namely:

"Did that negligence contribute in any degree as a proximate cause of the accident?

"If you find that it did, your verdict must be for the defendant, but if you find that it did not, and you previously have found that there was negligence on defendant's part which proximately caused plaintiff injury, you then must fix the amount of plaintiff's damages and return a verdict in his favor.

"As indicated in this instruction, you should first determine the question of liability." It will be noted that by this instruction the jurors were told that plaintiff's negligence was an issue to be determined by them and that if they found that plaintiff was negligent and that his negligence contributed in any degree as a proximate cause of the accident "your verdict must be for the defendant." Appellant further urges that the impropriety of the above quoted instruction was aggravated by the court through its giving, likewise of its own motion, an instruction defining contributory negligence as follows: "Contributory Negligence—Definition. Contributory negligence is negligence on the part of a person injured which, cooperating in some degree with the negligence of another, helps in proximately causing the injury of which the former complains.

"One who is guilty of contributory negligence may not recover from another for the injury suffered. (The reason for this rule of law is not that the fault of one justifies the fault of another, but simply that there can be no apportionment of blame and damages among the participating agents of causation." (Italics added.) It is argued, in effect, that the definition quoted coupled with the fact that there was no evidence which justified submitting the issue to the jurors, would reasonably tend to confuse them.

[4-6] If the matter stood just as above delineated the error would be apparent, but in fairness to the trial court it must also be noted that the issue as to plaintiff's contributory negligence was raised by the pleading, that the plaintiff did not request an instruction that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict against the plaintiff on the issues so raised, and on the contrary plaintiff did request the following instruction (which was given): "Direction Against Imputation As to a Plaintiff—Contributory Negligence. You are reminded of the fact that the vehicle in which plaintiff Stephen Cedzo was riding at the time of the accident in question was then being operated by Melbourne T. Roberts. I instruct you that the driver's negligence, if any, may not be imputed to the plaintiff and that, therefore, you shall find that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff Stephen Cedzo unless you find that there was personal negligence on his part—that is, some negligent conduct of his own, which contributed as a proximate cause to his injury." Plaintiff's request for that instruction was impliedly a request that the issues on plaintiff's contributory negligence be submitted to the jury and having requested such instruction the plaintiff cannot complain either that it was given or that the court gave the other two instructions above quoted. The first one merely told the jury that the issue was before them—as plaintiff impliedly requested—and the other defined the term. While the definition is vague there is no contention that it is prejudicial in form; the objection is to the fact that it was given at all, not to its form or substance as such. As a general rule it is proper for the court to state to the jury the issues raised by the pleadings (24 Cal.Jur. 825) and it is also true that a party is estopped to assert error in an instruction requested by him. The same rule prevails as to instructions requested by an adversary if they merely invoke the same proposition which has been asserted by the party complaining (Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Hudson (1920), 182 Cal. 48, 51, 186 P. 772; Vickerson v. Standard Auto Sales Co. (1923), 64 Cal.App. 287, 290, 221 P. 392; Hunt v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co. (1924), 66 Cal.App. 363, 369, 225 P. 884; Chase v. Southern Pac. Co. (1931), 119 Cal.App. 341, 345, 6 P.2d 540; Musante v. Guerrini (1932), 125 Cal.App. 556, 562, 13 P.2d 965). We hold that this rule likewise governs instructions given by the court of its own motion under the circumstances shown here.

Plaintiff's third point presents a more serious problem but one which upon analysis appears not to be prejudicial. At the time the accident occurred, July 9, 1939, section 577 of the Vehicle Code provided that "The driver of any vehicle upon approaching any entrance of a highway or intersection signposted with a stop-sign as provided in this code shall stop at such sign before entering or crossing such highway or intersection." St.1935, p. 190. (Italics added.) In 1939, but effective after the date of the accident in question, that section was amended to read, "The driver of any vehicle upon approaching any entrance of a highway or intersection signposted with a stop sign as provided in this code, except as otherwise permitted or directed in this code, shall stop before entering the nearest crosswalk or, if none, then at a limit line when marked, otherwise before entering such highway or intersection." (Stats.1939, ch. 320, p. 1608, sec. 5.) It was in this last quoted form that the section was read to the jury as an instruction by the court of its own motion. The instruction as given included the heading, "Vehicles Must Stop at Through Highways." Plaintiff also quotes another instruction, given at the defendants' request (modified by the court in a portion not material here), reading as follows: "I instruct you that as a matter of law Redondo Boulevard at the place where this accident occurred was outside a residential or business district*;* ~~and was what is commonly known as 'a through highway'~~ ; and in this connection I further instruct you that if you find that Redondo Boulevard was a through highway and that the defendant Mr. Bergen was exercising ordinary care, he had a right to assume that other drivers would obey the law and before crossing Redondo Boulevard at Florence Avenue would bring their cars to a stop before entering or crossing Redondo.

"You are further instructed that if Mr. Bergen was exercising ordinary care he had a right to further assume that any driver about to cross Redondo Boulevard which had brought his car to a stop as is required at the entrance to a through highway, would yield the right of way to him or any other cars traveling on Redondo Boulevard which were approaching so closely thereto as to constitute an immediate hazard." In this connection plaintiff contends that "The natural effect of the erroneous instruction complained of [section 577 as amended in 1939] together with the last quoted instruction, would be to inform the jury that the Ford automobile in which appellant was riding should have come to a stop before it entered Redondo Boulevard at the line drawn on the Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, [a map of the locale] indicating the prolongation of the southerly curb line of Redondo Boulevard which said prolongation was placed thereon by respondents' attorney." Plaintiff also calls attention to the fact that the jury were instructed that a violation of section 577 of the Vehicle Code would be negligence per se and urges that the effect of that instruction, coupled with the other two instructions last mentioned, was to inform the jury that the driver of the car in which plaintiff was a guest was guilty of negligence on his own testimony in failing to stop again precisely at the entrance (curb line prolongation) to Redondo Boulevard even if he had already stopped at the stop sign.

[7] We do not find such contention reasonable. Examination of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 discloses that it portrays the position of the stop sign, the white line painted on the roadway, and other topographical features, as well as a dotted line indicative of the prolongation of the southerly curb of Redondo Boulevard. There is no justification for inferring that such dotted line on the diagram could have been construed by the jury as indicating a "limit line" marked on the roadway. It appears to us that the jury most probably would have construed the words "limit line" as used in section 577 as denoting the white line painted on the roadway and depicted on Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1. It is true that there was a conflict in the testimony of plaintiff and the driver Roberts as to whether the Ford stopped at the stop sign or at the stop line. But it was plaintiff himself who testified that the stop was made at the white line. If the jury believed plaintiff's testimony in that respect they must have concluded that the law as erroneously stated in the instruction being discussed was complied with by Roberts. If they believed Roberts' testimony that the stop was made at the stop sign and concluded that the law was violated by him in not stopping at the white line, they still could not, under the instructions given, have imputed Roberts' negligence to plaintiff. In either event the stop would have been made before the defendant Bergen saw the Ford and the question as to whether Bergen was or was not negligent in failing to see the Ford sooner or, after seeing it, in failing to take some action sooner to avoid the collision, would have been substantially the same. The very fact that the stop sign and the stop line were placed at such a considerable distance back from the curb line (extended) of Redondo Boulevard obviously placed on the driver of the car in which plaintiff was riding the responsibility of recognizing that a car approaching from the west on Redondo Boulevard, even though a considerable distance away from the actual intersection, might constitute an immediate hazard to a car attempting to cross such intersection from a start on Florence Avenue at either the stop sign or the stop line.

As to the right of way rule the jury were correctly instructed that "The driver of any vehicle which has stopped as required by this code at the entrance to a through highway shall yield the right of way to other vehicles which have entered the intersection from the through highway or which are approaching so closely on the through highway as to constitute an immediate hazard, but said driver having so yielded may proceed and the drivers of all other vehicles approaching the intersection on the through highway shall yield the right of way to the vehicle so about to enter or cross the through highway." The phrase "at the entrance to a through highway" cannot be narrowly construed to mean precisely at the extended curb line. In many instances it would be impracticable, if not impossible, to erect stop signs exactly "at the entrance" to the highway if such a narrow construction were placed on those words. Section 82.5 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 413, defines "through highway" as "a highway or portion thereof at the entrance to which vehicular traffic from intersecting highways is required by law to stop before entering or crossing the same, and when stop signs are erected as provided in this code." (Italics added.) In the case before us it is obvious that in the liberal view both the stop sign and the stop line must be regarded as being "at the entrance" to the through highway even though they are a substantial distance from the extended curb line bounding the limit of the intersection.

It is apparent that the jury, in the light of all the circumstances depicted in evidence, must have concluded that defendants' car constituted an immediate hazard to the one in which plaintiff was riding at the time the latter made its stop, if it did stop, and that defendant Bergen was not negligent either in failing to see Roberts' car sooner or in failing to stop or turn sooner than he did. It is to be recognized that according to defendant Bergen's evidence the Ford car was approximately at the railway tracks when he first saw it, that the cars were then about 200 feet apart, that the Ford car was traveling at 40 miles per hour and defendants' car at about 30 miles per hour. The cars were therefore approaching each other at a combined speed of about 70 miles per hour (102.66 feet per second) which means that only two seconds would have been consumed in reaching the point of impact if neither slowed down. The fact that during the last few moments each did perhaps decrease its speed would add but little to the seconds separating them. If we accept the witness Roberts' testimony that defendants' car was traveling at 50 miles per hour and was 600 feet away at the time he stopped at the stop sign and deduct the approximately 200 feet which Roberts' car traversed from the stop sign to the point of impact we have 400 feet left for defendants' car to travel which, at 50 miles per hour (73.33 feet per second) would have consumed less than five and one-half seconds. We cannot hold that it was unreasonable for the jury to conclude that a car approaching at 50 miles per hour on a through highway so close to an intersection as to reach approximately its center in less than five and one-half seconds was an immediate hazard to a car which had stopped at a stop sign or line 180 to 140 feet back of the extended curb line of that intersection. If the jury believed that the Ford car was stopped at either the stop sign or the stop line but notwithstanding such fact had attained a speed of 40 miles per hour by the time it reached the railway tracks (a distance of 40 to 80 feet) they may also have inferred that the driver Roberts was hurrying in an effort to beat defendants' car across the intersection.

[8] The jury apparently believed that it was the duty of the Ford driver to yield the right of way and that defendant driver had a right to, and did, in the exercise of ordinary care, assume that he would do so. The result of failure to yield such right of way would be the same whether the failure be regarded as coming from not stopping or from not slowing down. In view of the fact that defendants' approaching car did constitute an immediate hazard to the Ford driver and that the latter did not yield the right of way, we cannot say that it is probable (Cal.Const. Art. VI. § 4½) that a different conclusion as to defendants' negligence would have been reached without the reading of section 577 as amended in 1939 and other instructions on the same subject.

From the foregoing discussion we believe it adequately appears (1) that the evidence is sufficient to support the jury's verdict, (2) that the act of the court in instructing the jury that contributory negligence was an issue in the case was invited by the plaintiff and hence cannot be availed of by him as prejudicial error, and (3) that the error in instructing the jury in the language of section 577 of the Vehicle Code as amended after the accident was not prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENDLAGE v. KOHLSAAT et al.
Civ. 12035.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
Aug. 24, 1942.

1. Judgment 🔑564(1)

An erroneous judgment, from which no appeal had been taken within time in which the right to appeal must be exercised, was "final".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Final Judgment".

2. Appeal and error 🔑870(3)

On plaintiff's appeal from adverse judgment after demurrer had been sustained without leave to amend by reason of judgment in former action between the parties, where trial court had jurisdiction of former action and judgment was substantially in conformity with the findings but was erroneous, appellate court was without power to correct the alleged errors in such judgment.

3. Judgment 🔑576(1)

A judgment in a former action between the same parties involving the same issues is, though erroneous, a bar to a subsequent proceeding. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1908, 1962.

4. Judgment 🔑720

In seller's action to enforce sales contract brought after former action on same contract against same defendant upon the matters pleaded and previously adjudicated, the first judgment was "res judicata". Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1908, 1962.

5. Appeal and error 🔑770(1)

Where respondents filed no brief on appeal and did not otherwise acquaint court with grounds, if any, different from those previously litigated upon which judgment could have been sustained, District Court of Appeal could assume that point made by appellant for reversal was meritorious.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Theodore J. Bendlage against Deitrich Kohlsaat and others upon a contract of sale of personal property. From a judgment following an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed with directions.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for appellant.

WARD, Justice.

Appeal from a judgment following an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend.

From the demurrer, both general and special, and its accompanying memorandum of points and authorities, it appears that the question involved is the effect of a judgment rendered in a prior action between the same parties; in addition, the inadequacy of consideration paid following an alleged wrongful and fraudulent levy of execution, which will be hereafter referred to.

The complaint, cross-complaint, findings and judgment in the former action are annexed to the amended complaint herein and give in detail a history of the case. The answer and the answer to the cross-complaint do not appear.

In the amended complaint in the present action it is alleged that on April 20, 1937, plaintiff and defendants, Kohlsaat and Krieger, entered into a contract whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter agreed to purchase, personal property, consisting of formulae for the manufacture of medicinal remedies, a stock of merchandise, office and other equipment used in the manufacture and sale of the remedies, and the exclusive right to the use of the trade names "Vesodyne" and "Anthony Lily Company"; that the contract in addition to other considerations provided for the payment of a royalty based upon sales, with a provision for reconveyance for breach of this obligation.

The finding in the former case on the question of possession of the property conveyed was not outside the issues since plaintiff prayed for possession.

In that action the court found that the formulae were not secret, and that plaintiff did not and could not make delivery thereof in accordance with his representations. There is no finding that the formulae were valueless or that the products, valueless or otherwise, were sold to the public. The judgment does not rescind the contract but provides that defendant Anthony Lily Company shall retain the property, evidently upon the theory that it should be retained until formulae conforming to the representations made should be delivered, and awards monetary relief. It is not explicit as to whether sales might continue without liability or subject to royalty payments. The trial court found that defendants were not indebted to plaintiff in any amount. However, the judgment is not in excess of the court's jurisdiction and is not so irregular in matter or form that it can be said that justice was denied. The parties, the subject matter, etc., were all before the court subject to the right of the trial court to determine the question of its jurisdiction. Refraining from passing upon the form and substance of the particular judgment presented, we may adopt appellant's second theory on appeal, that the judgment was erroneous.

[1] There must be an end to litigation. In the task which has fallen to human agency to wisely and justly determine controversies, it has been found necessary to adopt certain rules to which all litigants must conform. Among these rules is one prescribing the time in which the right to appeal must be exercised. Under that rule the judgment in the first action has become final.

[2] This is not a summary proceeding. Concluding that the trial court had jurisdiction of the first action, but assuming, as appellant contends, that the judgment is erroneous, we are powerless in the present proceeding to correct the alleged errors. The judgment is substantially in conformity with the findings. On appeal, or on motion before the trial court, the judgment might have been set aside.

[3, 4] A former judgment between the same parties involving the same issues is, though erroneous, a bar to a subsequent proceeding. Edmonds v. Glenn-Colusa Irr. Dist., 217 Cal. 436, 19 P.2d 502. "If the court finds contrary to the evidence or misapplies the law—in all of these cases the judgment, until corrected or vacated in some appropriate manner, is as conclusive upon the parties as though it had settled the controversy in accordance with the principles of abstract justice." Freeman on Judgments, 4th Ed., § 260, quoted in Estate of Harrington, 147 Cal. 124, 81 P. 546, 548, 109 Am.St.Rep. 118. The former judgment between the same parties upon the same subject, if introduced in evidence herein, would have been conclusive (Hamilton v. Carpenter, 15 Cal.2d 130, 98 P.2d 1027), or, if pleaded, as in the present amended complaint, would be conclusive as to the condition and relation of the parties upon the matters directly adjudged. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1908, 1962. We must conclude that upon the matters pleaded and previously adjudicated, the first judgment is res judicata.

The amended complaint herein, in addition to a recital of the success of the defendants and cross-complainants in the previous litigation, alleges that, notwithstanding money had accumulated under the contract between the parties in excess of the amount of the judgment in that case, a writ of execution was wrongfully and fraudulently levied against plaintiff's title and interest in the royalties, and, in pursuance of the writ, all property and credits due under the contract were sold to plaintiff, and the original judgment credited in the sum of five cents. Plaintiff prays that the "pretended sale under execution * * * be declared of no force and effect."

[5] Respondents failed to file a brief herein, nor have they otherwise acquainted the court with the grounds, if any, different from those previously litigated upon which the demurrer could have been sustained. It may be assumed, therefore, that the point made by appellant for reversal is meritorious. Zeigler v. Bonnell, 52 Cal.App.2d 217, 126 P.2d 118; Duisenberg-Wichman & Co. v. Johnson, 123 Cal.App. 125, 128, 10 P.2d 1010. On appeal no attention has been given by them to the following question raised by appellant: "Does inadequacy of consideration paid under sheriff's sale, accompanied with unfairness, authorize the court to set aside a sale under an execution?"

[6] We assume it is respondents' theory that the prior judgment adjudicated the question of appellant's right to royalties, a position somewhat inconsistent with the return on execution which shows that included in the sale was "All right, title and interest of Theodore J. Bendlage in and to that certain contract entered into on or about April 21, 1937, by and between Theodore J. Bendlage, party of the first part, and Deitrich Kohlsaat and Mendel Krieger, parties of the second part, together with all rights or claims of whatever nature which defendant Theodore J. Bendlage, may have as against Deitrich Kohlsaat, Mendel Krieger or Anthony Lily Company, Inc." Eliminating this phase of the matter, still the amended complaint herein—possibly subject to special demurrer—raises the question of inadequacy of consideration. Five cents is the amount evidently credited upon a judgment totaling upon its face a sum in excess of $5,500. Inadequacy of consideration is a question of fact. Assuming that the complaint is insufficient in this respect, it could possibly be amended. On this latter point alone, the judgment should be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer, to afford plaintiff an opportunity to amend, and to take further proceedings in the cause in accordance with the views herein expressed.

It is so ordered.

CHILBERG et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

Civ. 12034.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 19, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 15, 1942.

1. Pleading 🔑87

The defense of laches must be raised by answer except when laches is apparent on the face of the complaint when defense may be raised by demurrer.

2. Action 🔑63

The application of the doctrine of "laches" is not dependent upon a delay of sufficient duration to call into operation the statute of limitations.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Laches".

3. Cancellation of Instruments 🔑34(1)

An action for rescission may be maintained only when filed with reasonable diligence, and when the subject of the controversy has been appropriated to the public use, greater diligence is required as a matter of protection of the public interest.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑742(3)

Where a municipal project for the use of water, land, power, etc., by the public has matured to the extent of having been put into service and its benefits enjoyed, any attempt to interfere with such vested public use by means of injunction, ejectment or a suit to quiet title is not approved.

5. Cancellation of instruments 🔑34(1)

Where complaint for rescission of deed to city for fraud disclosed that a public use in land had matured by erection of high tension power lines by city, cause of action based on fraud was barred by "laches" and plaintiff was relegated to an action for damages only. Civ.Code, § 1691.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑1025

Where plaintiff's only claim against City of Los Angeles was notice of rescission of deed filed more than two years after execution of deed and seven months after alleged ascertainment of true facts, action against city for damages for fraudulent representations in obtaining deed was barred by charter requirement that claims for damages be filed within six months of occurrence from which damages arose or after the claim accrued.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑1008

Under Los Angeles charter requirement that claims for damages be filed within six months of occurrence from which damages arose, filing of a claim with a department not authorized to order its payment, or a claim that does not set forth a demand for compensation, is futile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Suit by A. Eugene Chilberg and others against the City of Los Angeles and others for rescission, cancellation of a deed, and damages. From a judgment for defendants, dismissing the suit following the sustaining of their demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., S. B. Robinson, Chief Asst. City Atty., and Russell B. Jarvis, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of defendants dismissing the action following the sustaining of their demurrer without leave to amend.

On October 31, 1938, plaintiffs executed a deed to the city of Los Angeles conveying an easement of right of way for an electric transmission line across a half section of land owned by them in consideration of a payment of $50. Plaintiffs claim they were induced to sign the deed through misrepresentation, fraud and deceit; that had they known the real facts they would not have done so; that they were inexperienced in business and legal transactions and believed the right of way was for the privilege of erecting a few poles for electric wires and that such installation would not impair their use and enjoyment of the land, nor diminish its value; that they were altogether unaware that defendants contemplated the construction of high tension electric light, heat and power lines consisting of steel towers, supporting insulators and cables, which when in operation, would carry heavy charges of electrical current and energy and would be dangerous, unsightly and injurious; that it was their understanding that the deed would not convey any interest in the land but would simply be a privilege granted for the purpose above stated; that they were unaware the contemplated installation would require a private and permanent roadway running approximately through the center of their property and containing an area of about twenty-two acres. They further claim that it had been fraudulently represented to them that similar documents and deeds were being executed by others without any compensation, and that the greatest amount defendants would pay for the desired privilege was the sum of $50.

Plaintiffs contend that they ascertained the true facts in the month of June, 1940, and that they served written notice of rescission on the defendants City of Los Angeles and Department of Water and Power of the City of Los Angeles on January 6, 1941. The notice, dated November 25, 1940, set forth the matters above enumerated, was accompanied by a tender of the consideration paid, and a demand for the cancellation and redelivery of their deed. This being refused by the defendants, the complaint in the present action was filed on March 17, 1941.

The complaint sets forth in a single count a claim for cancellation, rescission, a reconveyance of the easement of right of way, for $2,500 damages and for other relief.

There are sixteen grounds of special demurrer many of which overlap those of general demurrer. The respondents, in urging that the demurrer was properly sustained without leave to amend, advance a number of grounds, namely, (1) The facts alleged in the complaint are not sufficient to show fraud; and in this behalf they argue (a) that it was the duty of appellants to read the deed, which would have fully informed them of what they were conveying thereby, and the burden is on them to overcome the presumption that the written instrument correctly expresses the intention of the parties; (b) if they did not read the deed before signing it they have not shown such a clear and convincing case of fraud as to satisfactorily explain their failure to do so; (c) the matters alleged to have been misrepresented were all disclosed to one reading the deed; and moreover were either true, or matters of opinion, or were not material facts. (2) Appellant's right to rescind is barred by laches, and their right to recover damages is barred by their failure to file a claim within six months, as required by the charter of the city of Los Angeles.

[1, 2] The main question for decision is—does the complaint state a cause of action based on fraud not barred by laches? Unless the complaint shows laches as a matter of law this defense should be raised by answer. However, the defense of laches "may be raised by demurrer, where laches is apparent upon the face of the complaint." Garrity v. Miller, 204 Cal. 454, 455, 268 P. 622; Goodfellow v. Barritt, 130 Cal.App. 548, 20 P.2d 740; Livermore v. Beal, 18 Cal.App.2d 535, 64 P.2d 987. "The application of the doctrine of laches is not dependent upon a delay of sufficient duration to call into operation the statute of limitations." Warfield v. Anglo & London Paris Nat. Bank, 202 Cal. 345, 356, 357, 260 P. 881, 885. "If, in the course of an inexcusable delay in the assertion of a right, changes occur in the subject matter of the transaction in suit or in the relative positions of the parties thereto, as a result of which it is impossible to place the parties in statu quo, and the enforcement of the right would work inequity, relief will be denied because of laches. Prejudice to defendant may prevent relief whether the change in circumstances is the result of the delay itself, or is due to the voluntary act of defendant." 30 C.J.S., Equity, § 118, p. 540. Warfield v. Anglo & London Paris Nat. Bank, supra; Stevenson v. Boyd, 153 Cal. 630, 96 P. 284, 19 L.R.A., N.S., 525; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516; Beck v. Cagle, 46 Cal. App.2d 152, 115 P.2d 613.

[3-5] An action for rescission may be maintained only when filed with reasonable diligence. Toomey v. Toomey, 13 Cal.2d 317, 320, 89 P.2d 634; Hellman Commercial T. & S. Bk. v. Alden, 206 Cal. 592, 275 P. 794; Stevens v. Bryson, 135 Cal. App. 684, 27 P.2d 932. When the subject of the controversy, as in the present case—land—has been appropriated to public use greater diligence is required as a matter of protection of the public interest. In Hillside Water Co. v. Los Angeles, 10 Cal.2d 677, at page 688, 76 P.2d 681, at page 687, a proceeding in which it was sought to enjoin the defendant city from flowing, pumping or otherwise exporting water from certain wells, the court said: "When a public use has attached a prohibitory injunction should be granted only in the event that no other relief is adequate. Montecito Valley Water Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 77 P. 1113. In such cases compensation in lieu of injunction is preferred. Newport v. Temescal Water Co., 149 Cal. 531, 538, 87 P. 372, 6 L.R.A., N.S., 1098. The doctrine that intervention of a public use will foreclose the right to an injunction rests not only on estoppel. The doctrine may be applicable even though the aggrieved party be in ignorance of the violation of his rights. In other words, implied dedication to public use is not essential to the operation of the doctrine. Public policy in favor of a continuance of the public use may also be invoked to prevent a prohibitive injunction. Peabody v. Vallejo, supra, 2 Cal.2d 351 at page 378, 40 P.2d 486. When public use has attached for any recognized reason, reverse condemnation proceedings may be invoked and applied." When a project for the use of water, land, power, etc., by the public has matured to the extent of having been put into service and its benefits enjoyed, any attempt to interfere with such vested public use by means of injunction, ejectment or a suit to quiet title is not approved. "Under such circumstances, his remedy will be confined to a mere right to recoup adequate damages to compensate him for the loss of his property on account of such appropriation. This remedy is based on the theory that although the intervening public rights prevent interference with the use and control of the property on the part of the owner, he is, nevertheless, entitled to compensation on the principle applicable to a proceeding in reverse condemnation. Private property may not be taken, even for the benefit of the public, without just compensation. That principle has been frequently announced by the decisions of our courts. Gurnsey v. Northern California Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 117 P. 906, 36 L.R.A., N.S., 185; Collier v. Merced Irr. District, 213 Cal. 554, 563, 2 P.2d 790; Peabody v. City of Vallejo, 2 Cal.2d 351, 377, 40 P.2d 486; Hillside Water Co. v. Los Angeles, 10 Cal. 2d 677, 688, 76 P.2d 681." Peckwith v. Lavezzola, 50 Cal.App.2d 211, 218, 122 P.2d 678, 682. This rule is equally applicable to a remedy by rescission. Civ.Code, § 1691. In the present case, the complaint alleged the erection and maintenance of high tension electric light, heat and power lines, which consist "of steel towers, supporting insulators and cables, and [defendants] did construct and now maintain a private and exclusive permanent roadway with 'no trespassing' signs thereon, all of which runs approximately through the middle of plaintiffs' property and has taken approximately twenty-two acres thereof." Upon the allegations as they appear in the complaint, a public use having matured, plaintiff is relegated to an action for damages. Williams v. Merced Irr. Dist., 4 Cal.2d 238, 48 P.2d 664; Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Long Beach, 128 Cal.App. 427, 17 P.2d 1061.

[6, 7] The complaint alleged that the deed was executed October 31, 1938, and that "in the month of June, 1940, plaintiffs ascertained and learned the fact and truth," etc. The "complaint on rejected claim for cancellation, rescission and damages" was filed March 17, 1941. It appears that approximately two years, two months and four days expired from the date of the execution of the deed to the date of service of written notice of rescission, and that over seven months passed between the alleged ascertainment of the "truth" and the service of the notice of rescission.

The complaint does not allege that a claim for damages was filed with the city within six months after the occurrence from which the alleged damages arose, or within a similar time after the claim accrued. Los Angeles Charter, § 376. Such a claim is a condition precedent to suit. The claim filed was in the form of a notice of rescission directed to the city of Los Angeles and the Department of Water and Power of the city of Los Angeles. The only claim filed, assuming that it could be construed as a claim for damages, was not within the six months' period after accrual. It is unnecessary therefore to discuss the form, etc., of the claim as the remedy of damages is barred by failure to file the claim contemplated by the provisions of the charter. The filing of a claim with a department not authorized to order its payment, or a claim that does not set forth a demand for compensation, is futile. Continental Ins. Co. v. Los Angeles, 92 Cal.App. 585, 268 P. 920; Haigh v. City of Los Angeles, 139 Cal.App. 595, 34 P.2d 779; Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Long Beach, supra; Chapman v. City of Fullerton, 90 Cal.App. 463, 265 P. 1035; Crescent Wharf, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 207 Cal. 430, 278 P. 1028; Bancroft v. City of San Diego, 120 Cal. 432, 52 P. 712; Chesney v. Byram, 15 Cal.2d 460, 101 P.2d 1106; Douglass v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 123, 53 P.2d 353; Skinner v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 317, 54 P.2d 446; Wilkes v. City, etc., of San Francisco, 44 Cal.App.2d 393, 112 P.2d 759.

For the reasons stated, it is not necessary to consider the other grounds of demurrer. In view of the fact that the complaint can not be amended to state a cause of action, the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO UNIFIED SCHOOL DIST. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO (BUSH et al., Interveners).

Civ. 12174.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 20, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 15, 1942.

1. Schools and school districts 🔑64

The legislature had power to designate school districts as successors in title to school boards which had theretofore held property in trust for school purposes, since public schools are matters of state concern, and the legislature has control over the management and title to school property, at least so long as it is not diverted from school purposes. School Code, §§ 2.140, 2.141.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑64

The purpose and effect of statutes providing that every school district must be designated by the name and style of the district and of the county, and in that name the trustees may sue and be sued, and hold and convey property for the use and benefit of such district, was to designate the school districts as successors in title to school boards which had theretofore held property in trust for school purposes. School Code, §§ 2.140, 2.141.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑41(1)

Where realty in the City of San Francisco was originally conveyed to the Board of Education of the city and county of San Francisco in 1858 by the commissioners of the funded debt of the City of San Francisco, pursuant to statute enacted earlier in the same year, and subsequently the San Francisco unified school district was created, title to the realty passed under statute to the district. St.1858, p. 341; School Code, §§ 2.140, 2.141; School Code, § 2.2120, as added by St. 1935, p. 2160.

4. Schools and school districts ⚷22

A trust created by conveyance of realty in 1858 to the Board of Education of the city and county of San Francisco by the commissioners of the funded debt of the City of San Francisco, pursuant to statute enacted earlier in the same year, was not revoked by an implied repeal by enactment of subsequent statutes authorizing board of supervisors of city and county to lease the realty for term of 20 years by public bid, and to use the rentals solely for paying school bonds. St.1858, p. 341; St.1873-4, p. 848, §§ 1–5, 6–8.

5. Statutes ⚷158

Repeals of statute by implication are not favored.

6. Statutes ⚷159

The legislature will not be presumed to have intended by a later act to repeal a former one if by a fair and reasonable construction, effect can be given to both, and to overcome that presumption the two acts must be so inconsistent that they cannot have concurrent operation.

7. Records ⚷18(1)

Under the McEnerney Act providing that an action to quiet title may be brought if public records be lost or destroyed by any person who claims an estate in realty and who is by himself or his tenant, or other person, holding under him, in actual and peaceable possession of any realty, possession so required of a plaintiff is essential to give the court jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1026, § 1.

8. Judgment ⚷499

Where jurisdictional defect was admitted by a stipulation of the parties, that defect could be taken advantage of by collateral attack though the defect did not appear on the face of the judgment roll.

9. Judgment ⚷499

Though judgment is valid on its face, if the party in favor of whom the judgment runs admits facts showing its invalidity, or, without objection on his part, evidence is admitted which clearly shows the existence of such facts, it is court's duty to declare the judgment void.

10. Records ⚷18(10)

Where city and county did not have actual and peaceable possession of realty at time of action to quiet title under the McEnerney Act, decree establishing title in city and county was void for want of jurisdiction, and that decree was no defense to city and county in subsequent action to quiet title by school district against city and county. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1026, § 1.

11. Limitation of actions ⚷44(2)

Where school district not only was seized and possessed of realty through its tenant within five years of commencement of suit to quiet title, but still had seisin and possession up to time of the institution of the action, the suit was not barred by limitations. Code Civ.Proc. § 318.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Everett C. McKeage, Judge.

Suit by the San Francisco Unified School District against the City and County of San Francisco to quiet title to certain realty in the City of San Francisco, wherein Philip L. Bush and others, constituting the Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco, intervened. From a decree in favor of the plaintiff, the City and County of San Francisco and the interveners appeal.

Affirmed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for defendant and appellant.

Norman J. Hearn, of San Francisco, for interveners and appellants.

Cooper, White & Cooper and Irving G. Breyer, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

From a decree quieting the title of San Francisco Unified School District to a parcel of land at the corner of Fifth and Market Streets in San Francisco, defendant City and County of San Francisco and plaintiffs in intervention constituting the Board of Education of the city and county both appeal.

The lot in question was originally conveyed in 1858 to the Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco by the Commissioners of the Funded Debt of the City of San Francisco, pursuant to a statute enacted earlier in the same year. Stats.1858, p. 341. In 1908 the Board of Education executed a lease of this property to a private corporation for a term of thirty-five years. With the end of this term drawing near a controversy arose as to whether title to this lot was vested in San Francisco Unified School District or in the City and County of San Francisco, and the suit now before us on appeal was commenced to determine this controversy.

A preliminary question is presented as to whether title, if it has not become vested in appellant city and county, is now in respondent San Francisco Unified School District or in its Board of Education. This question hardly passes beyond the academic since, to protect the school district in any event, the Board of Education filed a complaint in intervention asserting title in itself and the board, as noted, has taken an appeal from the judgment.

Under the statute of 1858 above referred to, and the deed made by the Commissioners of the Funded Debt to the Board of Education pursuant to its terms, title to the property vested in the grantees and "their successors in office." Without pursuing the subsequent statutory history further back than 1872, with the adoption of the Political Code in that year, the Legislature incorporated into that code section 1575 reading as follows:

> "Every school district must be designated by the name and style of '——— district (using the name of the district), of ——— county' (using the name of the county in which such district is situated); and in that name the trustees may sue and be sued, and hold and convey property for the use and benefit of such district." (Italics ours.)

[1-3] This section remained in full force and unamended from 1872 until the adoption of the School Code in 1929 when its provisions were reenacted in sections 2.140 and 2.141, School Code, and have been in effect as so enacted ever since. During this seventy-year period appellants have not called to our attention any legislative enactment purporting to authorize Boards of Education or of School Trustees to hold school property in their names and during that entire period the legislative intention as expressed in the sections above quoted has apparently been that school property should be held in the names of the school districts and not in the names of their governing boards. Since the public schools are a matter of state concern (Butterworth v. Boyd, 12 Cal.2d 140, 152, 82 P.2d 434, 126 A.L.R. 838; Esberg v. Badaracco, 202 Cal. 110, 115, 259 P. 730) and the Legislature has control over the management and title to school property, at least so long as it is not diverted from school purposes (Pass School District v. Hollywood City School District, 156 Cal. 416, 105 P. 122, 26 L.R.A.,N.S., 485, 20 Ann.Cas. 87), we must hold that the Legislature had power to designate the school districts as successors in title to school boards which had theretofore held property in trust for school purposes, and we are satisfied that such was the purpose and effect of Political Code, section 1575. Upon the creation of the San Francisco Unified School District the title to this property passed to it under School Code, section 2.2120, as added by St. 1935, p. 2160.

[4] Appellant city and county calls attention to statutes 1873–4, page 848, and bases upon its provisions a claim that the trust created by the deed of 1858 from the Commissioners of the Funded Debt to the Board of Education was revoked as to the lot in question by an implied repeal. The statute of 1858 above referred to, under which the deed was executed, provides in section 7:

> "This trust may, at any time, be revoked by the Legislature of this state." Stats. 1858, p. 342.

In considering the effect of this statute of 1873-4 it must be borne in mind that under the statute of 1858 the lot in question had been conveyed to the Board of Education "in trust for said city and county * * * for the use and benefit of the school department of said city and county * * *" (Stats.1858, p. 341, § 1) and that the Legislature of the State had plenary power over its disposition so long as it was not diverted from the purposes of such trust. Pass School District v. Hollywood City School District, supra. It was also true, of course, that prior to 1879 the Legislature was not prohibited from the enactment of special legislation dealing with this particular lot. Nevada School District v. Shoecraft, 88 Cal. 372, 26 P. 211.

By section 1 of this statute of 1873-4 "the Board of Supervisors of the City and County is hereby authorized to lease, for a term of twenty years" the lot here in suit by public bid under certain provisions therein set out. By section 2 the rentals from the lot were to be used solely for the purpose of paying the principal and interest of the school bonds authorized to be issued under section 3 of the act. The proceeds of the sale of such bonds by section 5 were authorized to be expended "for the sole purpose of purchasing school sites and erecting school buildings." Section 6 imposed the duty on the Board of Supervisors to pay any deficiency of principal and interest of such bonds, if any occurred, from the general fund. Section 7 provided for the retirement of the bonds and section 8 read:

"All Acts and parts of Acts, so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, are, for the purposes of this Act, hereby repealed."

It will be noted that rather than diverting the property from the purposes of the trust to which it was devoted under the statute of 1858, this statute was in furtherance of that trust: "for the use and benefit of the school department of said city and county." The unusual form of the repealing section is also enlightening. By its terms inconsistent acts are not absolutely repealed. They are repealed only "for the purposes of this Act." It is a fair construction of this statute that it was the purpose of the Legislature in its enactment not to repeal the trust as to this lot created under the statute of 1858, but only to grant certain special powers to the Board of Supervisors over the lot for a limited period in furtherance of that trust; and not to divest the title of the school district to this lot, but to repeal its powers over it only so far as inconsistent with the carrying out of the purposes of the act, i.e., the making of a lease of the lot for a period of twenty years by the Board of Supervisors in the manner therein provided for the benefit of the public schools of San Francisco. Ample reason for this special procedure is to be found in the fact that by section 6 the full faith and credit of the city and county were placed behind the bonds authorized to be issued and paid from the proceeds of the leasing of the lot.

[5, 6] This construction comports with the settled rule that repeals by implication are not favored; that it will be presumed that the Legislature did not intend by a later act to repeal a former one, if by a fair and reasonable construction effect can be given to both; and that to overcome this presumption the two acts must be so inconsistent that they cannot have concurrent operation. Boyd v. Huntington, 215 Cal. 473, 482, 11 P.2d 383; Penziner v. West American Fin. Co., 10 Cal.2d 160, 176, 74 P.2d 252; Fay v. District Court of Appeal, 200 Cal. 522, 538, 254 P. 896; Railroad Comm. v. Riley, 192 Cal. 54, 57, 218 P. 415; 23 Cal.Jur. 694.

It is inconceivable to us that merely as an incident to a statute by which a valuable parcel of land devoted to school purposes was made the means of financing a twenty-year bond issue also for school purposes it was the legislative intent that at the expiration of the twenty-year period the land should no longer be devoted to the purposes of public education. The unwisdom of killing the fabled goose to get the golden eggs is classic in our literature.

While the record is silent on the subsequent history of this lot between the time that the bonds authorized by the statute of 1873-4 were retired and 1908, in that year it was the Board of Education and not the City and County of San Francisco which executed the lease to a private party, and we are entitled to assume that in the interim the title of the school district to the lot had been unquestioned, thus adding the weight of contemporaneous construction to our conclusion that the statute of 1873-4 did not impliedly repeal the trust in this lot for the benefit of the public schools of San Francisco.

It is next claimed by appellant city and county that title is vested in it by reason of a McEnerney decree made and entered in 1916, by which title was established in the City and County of San Francisco. The trial court found that insofar as it purported to adjudicate title to this lot this decree was beyond the jurisdiction of the court and void.

With a fairness to be highly commended in a public official appearing in a proceeding affecting the rights of the public, as involved in a controversy between two public agencies both set up for the furtherance of the public good, the city attorney of the appellant City and County of San Francisco stood on no narrow technical ground in the trial court and entered into a stipulation fully and fairly stating the facts underlying the controversy between the City and County of San Francisco on the one hand and the San Francisco Unified School District and its Board of Education on the other. From this stipulation it appears that in 1908 a lease of this property was made and executed to Wise Realty Company for a term of 35 years "by the Board of Education of said City and County," that on July 1, 1908, the Board of Education consented to the assignment of this lease to Lincoln Realty Company and that "the Board of Education, or said plaintiff herein, as its successor in interest, has at all times since the execution of said lease received for its own uses and purposes all rentals paid for the lease and use of said property, and said plaintiff school district is now receiving the same."

It thus appears from the facts so stipulated that at the time of the commencement of the McEnerney suit relied upon by appellant city and county as a source of title herein the city and county did not have actual and peaceable possession of the property here in litigation, but that such actual and peaceable possession was then and at all times since has been in the lessor school district through its lessee in possession under the aforesaid lease.

[7] The McEnerney Act provides that an action may be brought under it by any person who claims an estate in real property and "who is by himself or his tenant, or other person, holding under him, in the actual and peaceable possession of any real property." Deering's Gen.Laws 1937, Act 1026, § 1. In one of the earliest decisions of our Supreme Court construing the provisions of this statute it was determined that the possession so required of a plaintiff is essential to give the court jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action. Lofstad v. Murasky, 152 Cal. 64, 70, 91 P. 1008. The rule so established has never been questioned or departed from by our courts and was expressly reaffirmed over twenty years later in Stanley v. Westover, 93 Cal.App. 97, 105, 269 P. 468.

[8, 9] It is true that this jurisdictional defect is not shown to appear on the face of the judgment roll and ordinarily could not be taken advantage of by way of collateral attack for that reason. But the stipulation of the parties brings the case within the exception to that rule recently reaffirmed in Thompson v. Cook, 20 Cal.2d 564, 127 P.2d 909. In that case our Supreme Court reviews the previous authorities and announces the exception in the following language at page 569 of 20 Cal. 2d, at page 912 of 127 P.2d: "* * * although the judgment or order is valid on its face, if the party in favor of whom the judgment or order runs admits facts showing its invalidity, or, without objection on his part, evidence is admitted which clearly shows the existence of such facts, then it is the duty of the court to declare the judgment or order void."

In the case last quoted from and in those cited therein the lack of jurisdiction shown was of the person of the defendant. However, a judgment void for lack of jurisdiction of the subject matter is equally subject to collateral attack when that fact appears on the face of the judgment roll. (Capital Bond & Investment Co. v. Hood, 218 Cal. 729, 24 P.2d 765) and equally subject to the rule as quoted in Thompson v. Cook, supra, from Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 191, 21 P. 728:

"If the party, however, should admit the facts which show the judgment to be void * * * then, as a question of law upon such facts, we do not see why the case is not like that where a judgment is void upon its face."

[10] We arrive at this conclusion the more readily because to hold otherwise would be to deprive an agency of the state, created by the State Legislature for the purpose of carrying out the important governmental duty of public education under the mandate of our Constitution, of title to public property expressly vested in that agency as a public trust under legislative authority. It strikes us that were that problem before us a serious question of public policy would be presented as to whether by mere inaction or failure to assert its rights against another agency of the state such a public agency could legally allow the legislative trust so created to be destroyed by transfer of title to the other. Our conclusion that the McEnerney decree on the record before us is void for want of jurisdiction of the subject matter makes it unnecessary for us to explore this larger question.

[11] From what has been said regarding the possession of this property during the entire period of the present thirty-five-year lease it is clear that the action is not barred by the Code of Civil Procedure, section 318, since plaintiff not only has been seised and possessed of this property through its tenant, within five years of the commencement of this action, but still has such seisin and possession.

The judgment appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 18, 1942.

Hearing Granted Oct. 15, 1942.

1. Workmen's compensation 🔑1430

Where a domestic servant, in home occupied by a son, his wife and his mother, had been interviewed and employed by the son, that in the interview son used the words "we" and "us" with reference to the work and that the mother frequently gave orders as to what was to be done, was insufficient to show that son also acted as mother's "agent" and that servant was also employed by the mother so as to justify compensation award to servant for injuries sustained while accompanying the mother on a pleasure trip.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent".

2. Workmen's compensation 🔑597

In order for injury to be compensable as being "proximately caused" by the employment, there must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that by reason of the employment there was an unusual or additional exposure of the employee to the kind or character of hazard or danger which caused the injury. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600(c).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proximate Cause".

3. Workmen's compensation 🔑664

Where a domestic servant engaged by son to work in home occupied by son, his wife and his mother, was invited by the mother and her daughter to accompany them on a ride in mother's automobile during a time when the domestic's services were not required at the home, an injury sustained by servant in an accident occurring on the trip was not compensable as one "arising out of employment" and was not "proximately caused" by the employment. St.1937, p. 269, § 3600(c).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Arising Out of Employment".

4. Workmen's compensation 🔑1172

In proceeding by domestic servant to recover workmen's compensation for injuries sustained in automobile accident, while accompanying employer's mother on an automobile trip, on ground that injury arose out of employment, in that servant was ordered to make the trip, where servant had previously made an affidavit that she had not been ordered to make trip and it was stipulated that the statements made in such affidavit were true, the facts so recited were conclusive.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Nellie Rockwell, claimant, opposed by Viola W. Cock, and another, as alleged employers. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, the alleged employers bring certiorari.

Award annulled.

Head, Wellington & Jacobs and Winthrop O. Gordon, all of Santa Ana, for petitioners.

Everett A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

Petitioners seek to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Nellie Rockwell on account of injuries sustained in an automobile collision. The commission found that the injury occurred in the course of and arose out of the applicant's employment by both of the petitioners.

L. Andrew Cox is the son of Viola W. Cock. He and his wife and Mrs. Cock lived in a house in Tustin which belonged to some trust created in connection with the estate of Mrs. Cock's deceased husband. At the time in question Mrs. Cock's daughter, Mrs. Elmslie, was also staying in the home, having come to care for her mother, who was quite elderly, while Mrs. Cox was in the hospital. Shortly before May 3, 1941, Cox interviewed the applicant with the idea of engaging her as a domestic servant. The applicant testified that at this conversation "he used the word 'we' or 'us' and he told me what they wanted in the way of a worker"; that he told her they wanted someone to keep the house, buy the food, cook the meals, be company for his mother, play rummy with her, help her with her flowers, "in fact, anything that she might desire"; that he said they would pay $26 a month with board and room and she agreed to work for that. She went to work on May 3, 1941, and worked until May 10, 1941, when the accident happened. She testified that during this time she cleaned the house, bought the groceries, cooked the meals and did the washing. She testified that she did not assist Mrs. Cock with her flowers and that she spent a part of one evening with her playing rummy. On the afternoon of May 10, 1941, she accompanied Mrs. Cock and Mrs. Elmslie on a trip to Huntington Beach. The car was owned by Mrs. Cock and driven by Mrs. Elmslie. While on this trip a collision occurred between that car and another automobile, causing the injuries in question.

[1] It is admitted that the applicant was the employee of Mr. Cox and the first question presented is whether an employment relationship also existed as between her and Mrs. Cock. Mr. Cox hired her and he is the person who made the agreement to pay her, although the accident happened before a cash payment became due or was paid. The respondents argue that Cox's use of the words "we," "us" and "they" in his first conversation with the applicant indicates that in hiring her he was acting both for himself and for his mother. Aside from the rather unusual circumstance of having two employers in one small family, Mr. Cox had told the applicant how particular his wife was about the house work and it would be as reasonable to suppose that in using the plural he was referring to himself and his wife as to suppose that he was referring to his mother in the sense of purporting to act for her in making a contract of employment. If it be inferred that he had reference to his mother it would also be reasonable to infer that he was speaking of her merely as a member of the family. If it be inferred that he was speaking for his mother in hiring the applicant, it would be necessary to further infer that he was authorized to thus act and that he intended to act both as principal and as agent at the same time.

Mr. Cox told the applicant the time at which he desired his meals on several occasions but apparently gave no other specific instructions after the first interview. The applicant testified that Mrs. Cock and Mrs. Elmslie gave her orders from time to time as to what they wanted done, what she should cook, and the like. Mrs. Elmslie gave most of these orders, as Mrs. Cock was hard of hearing. It is not contended that Mrs. Elmslie was also an employer of the applicant and for the purpose of establishing the employment relationship here in question it seems to have been inferred throughout that she acted as the agent of her mother but was not acting as the agent of Mr. Cox. At the same time, for the purpose of showing that the accident occurred within the scope of the applicant's employment, it is inferred not only that the sister was the agent of the mother but that she was also the agent of the son in giving the orders in connection with taking this trip, so as to bind him also.

The giving of these orders, with inferences from inferences thus based upon other inferences, is cited as sufficient to show an employment of the applicant by both the son and his mother. It has been frequently pointed out, in connection with matters relating to the course of employment, that the status of a domestic servant, with indefinite hours and being somewhat subject to call at all times, is quite different from that of the ordinary employee who works certain fixed hours in a business location. It is equally true, with respect to the question as to who is the employer, that the value and effect of evidence as to who gives the orders, directions or suggestions, is quite different in the two situations. That various members of a family or household may make suggestions or give instructions to a servant, with respect to things that it is desired to have done, is in accord with common experience, but that the giving of such "orders" indicates an employment relationship and makes such persons also the employers of the servant, in a legal sense, seems both an unusual and somewhat tenuous conclusion. The evidence relied upon by the respondents to establish an employment insofar as Mrs. Cock is concerned is unsatisfactory, to say the least.

[2] The next question presented is whether there is substantial evidence to support the finding that the applicant was acting within the scope of her employment in going upon this trip, or whether it was a mere pleasure excursion unconnected with her duties. One of the conditions for imposing liability for compensation upon an employer is that the injury in question be one which "is proximately caused by the employment." Labor Code, § 3600, subd. (c), St.1937, p. 269. "There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that, by reason of the employment, there was an unusual or additional exposure of the injured party to the kind or character of hazard and danger * * * which caused the injury. The injury must have its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and must have flowed from that source as a rational and natural course." Lumbermen's M. C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 134 Cal.App. 131, 25 P.2d 22, 23.

[3] Disregarding the evidence on behalf of the petitioners, the applicant's testimony in this connection may be briefly summarized as follows: On the morning of May 10, "they" had mentioned that they were going to Huntington Beach that afternoon to get some dahlias "and said if it didn't interfere with my work, they would take me with them." That morning Mr. Cox had said that he wanted his dinner about four o'clock that afternoon. About noon she "practically aside from the meals had completed the day's work" and Mrs. Cock told her she might go and visit her sister until time to prepare the four o'clock dinner. She did so and returned about 3:30. She then found that Mr. Cox had returned early, had eaten his meal and gone, and that a meal would not be required at that time. She testified: "And they told me they were ready to go, and I was tired—I had had an exceptionally hard week and a hard day, and I asked to be excused, and said that I had some work of my own to do. As a matter of fact, it was some letters I was going to write, but they told me I could do that some other time, and that I could prepare their meal after our return." She was then asked: "Then what was done?" She replied: "Well, it rather left me without a choice." She was then asked: "Anyway you were requested to go with them?" and she answered: "Yes, it amounted to a request." She further testified that Mrs. Elmslie was the one who did the talking and when asked to tell what was said she replied "She said they were ready to go on this trip." When asked if anyone had ordered or instructed her to go she replied: "No, but they argued that I should go." When asked if Mrs. Elmslie had not given her permission to decide whether or not she wanted to go, she replied: "Well, I wanted to keep my job."

The applicant's contention was and is that in her own mind she construed Mrs. Elmslie's statement that they were ready to go as amounting to a request to her that she accompany them and that she considered this necessary in order to keep her job. That she had no reasonable grounds to fear the loss of a job appears from her own testimony as to the manner in which the request or invitation came about and was made, and from the further fact that a day or two earlier Mrs. Cock had expressed both satisfaction with her work and a desire to take her with her when she later moved to a house in Santa Ana which she had purchased.

It appears without contradiction that Mrs. Cock said nothing to the applicant about her going just before they started on this trip and that she did not tell anyone else to do so. Mr. Cox knew nothing either about the trip or about the applicant's participation therein. The fact that the mother and daughter had mentioned the trip that morning, and had said that they would take her with them if it did not interfere with her work, strongly indicates an intention on their part that her going was to be something apart from her work and that she was to be given the pleasure of the trip only in the event that this could be done without interference with her duties. At that time they all expected Mr. Cox to come for his meal about 4 o'clock and the preparation and serving of this meal might well have interfered with her going. When she returned to the house about 3:30 o'clock it had developed that such service was not needed and there was nothing for her to do for a few hours. She had completed all of her work with the exception of that in connection with the evening meal, she had already been off duty since noon, and that all parties concerned had it in mind that this situation was to continue for several hours more is rather strongly indicated by the fact that they had previously told her they would take her on this trip only if it did not interfere with her work and by her testimony that when they said they were ready to go she demurred saying she was tired, that she told them she had some letters to write, and that Mrs. Elmslie replied "You can write letters any time, and you can prepare what Mother and I want for dinner after our return." While the applicant testified that "they argued that I should go" an argument of the nature which here appears is quite different from express, or even implied, instructions to a servant as to service required of her and the evidence in its entirety quite clearly suggests that this was an accepted invitation for a pleasure trip during a time when the applicant's services were not required, rather than an act done in the course of and within the scope of her employment.

Considering this portion of the evidence and viewing it in the light most favorable to the applicant it seems almost unbelievable that she could have regarded the suggestion that she accompany the others on this trip as a request amounting to an order, rather than as a mere invitation or friendly courtesy intended to contribute to her pleasure, which left her free to accept or not without endangering or affecting the security of her employment.

[4] If we assume, however, that a contrary inference could be drawn by the finder of fact and further assume that thus far there is some evidence which is sufficiently substantial to support the finding made in this connection, we are confronted by the fact that the applicant had theretofore sworn to an affidavit in which she said: "That Viola Cock and Mrs. Elmslie then invited affiant to go on an automobile drive with them, which she did, and on this trip the accident occurred. The affiant was not ordered or instructed to go on said drive, but was permitted to decide for herself whether or not she wanted to go." That affidavit was prepared by applicant's counsel in connection with a damage action which he stated to the referee he contemplated bringing. Apparently, it was desired in that action to establish the fact that this applicant was a guest of Mrs. Cock and Mrs. Elmslie. At the hearing in this matter this evidence was produced and it was stipulated that the statements made by the applicant in that affidavit were true. Counsel for the respondents now argues that a conflict exists between what the applicant had said in this affidavit and what she said as a witness in this proceeding, and that the referee was free to accept her present testimony as true. Passing over the question whether the applicant's testimony in this proceeding was substantially in conflict with what she had said in the affidavit, and disregarding other considerations which seem obvious, a situation is here presented which differs materially from a mere conflict in the evidence. The stipulation was not merely that the witness had made these other statements which were somewhat at variance with the state of facts which she was seeking here to inferentially establish, although she was apparently careful not to directly testify to such a state of facts. The stipulation was that the statements she had made to the effect she was invited to go on this trip, that she was not ordered or instructed to do so, and that she had been left free to decide whether or not she wanted to go, were true statements. As a result of this stipulation these became established facts in this case and no longer did any conflict exist with respect to the facts in that regard. Regardless of any possible but doubtful inferences from other portions of the evidence the essential facts that the applicant was not instructed to go on this trip but that she exercised her own choice and accepted an invitation tendered to her were thus established. Those matters were conclusive, under the circumstances which here appear, upon the question of whether the making of this trip was an act within the scope of the applicant's employment. It follows that the finding that the injury here in question was one "arising out of and occurring in the course of said employment" is not sustained by any substantial evidence.

The award is annulled.

David L. Sefman, Leonard Wilson, and Nat A. Rosenstein, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff instituted the instant litigation against the defendants above named to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him as a result of the alleged malpractice of defendants in examining, treating and X-raying him after he had sustained a broken back in an accident. Defendant corporation in its answer admitted that Dr. Metzinger was its employee and denied that Dr. Joyant was its agent or employee. By way of affirmative defenses, said corporation pleaded unavoidable accident and contributory negligence.

When the cause came on for trial and before the jury was drawn, plaintiff dismissed the action as to defendant Dr. Charles Henry Wood. At the conclusion of the trial, the jury brought in its verdict for plaintiff and against defendants Dr. C. J. Joyant and Los Angeles College of Chiropractic, assessing plaintiff's damages at $3,500. Thereafter the trial court denied defendant corporation's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial, whereupon defendant corporation took this appeal from the judgment as well as from the order denying said judgment.

A brief résumé of the facts disclosed by the evidence, in the aspect most favorable to respondent, follows:

Between 9:30 and 10:00 in the morning of March 13, 1940, respondent, then aged 63 years and retired, sustained a broken back in an accident which occurred in the cellar of his home. When respondent attempted to move a water heater six feet high, two feet in diameter, and weighing three hundred fifty pounds, it swung off balance knocking him flat on his face upon a hard dirt and cement floor and fell with crushing force on the lower portion of his back. His associate removed the heater from respondent's back, and after remaining on the floor screaming with pain for about five minutes, respondent was taken by George K. Phoenix in the latter's automobile to the Los Angeles College of Chiropractic which was located two blocks away. Respondent had never before been treated at said institution and knew no one connected therewith. Defendant Dr. Metzinger was called into the clinic room by Mr. Phoenix, who was a former student of the college. After questioning respondent regarding his injury, Dr. Metzinger placed him on a chiropractic adjustment table for examination, during which time respondent was lying on his face supported by his face and knees with a hassock or cushion underneath his abdomen. At the conclusion of such examination, defendant Dr. Metzinger told respondent there were no bones broken; that he had a bad sprain and should rest at home for a few days; also, that he should have some X-ray pictures taken. Respondent in company with Mr. Phoenix was taken into the X-ray laboratory operated by the defendant Dr. Joyant which occupied space on the ground floor of the building which housed the college. Mr. Phoenix explained to Dr. Joyant, according to the latter's testimony, that respondent had been in an accident and that Dr. Metzinger had examined him, had found no bones broken but had suggested X-ray pictures; and that he (Phoenix) would like Dr. Joyant to make an anterior-posterior X-ray of respondent's pelvis, including the lumbar vertebrae and the lower dorsal vertebrae. Because respondent was suffering excruciating pain, it was impossible to get him to lie flat on the table, so Dr. Joyant placed a pillow about four inches thick under respondent's body. When the pictures were taken respondent was propped up with his buttocks flat on the table and his feet and knees folded up because he could not straighten his legs. Respondent remained in the laboratory while Dr. Joyant developed the X-rays at which time the latter advised respondent, "Well, this confirms the doctor's diagnosis. There are no bones broken." Respondent was then taken home where he remained in bed suffering great pain for three days. On the fourth day another doctor was called who examined respondent and had him removed to the General Hospital where both lateral and anterior-posterior X-rays were taken and several doctors examined him, it being discovered that he had sustained a compression fracture of the twelfth dorsal vertebra.

Dr. Marianne Scarborough, a doctor of medicine connected with the General Hospital, who personally attended and rendered medical services to respondent from March 29, 1940 to November 1, 1940, testified that the accepted practice in this community, insofar as taking X-rays for a possible spinal injury is concerned, where the patient to be X-rayed is in great pain, is always to take both lateral and anterior-posterior views. This testimony was corroborated by other doctors who testified at the trial herein.

Appellant urges (1) that there is no evidence that Dr. Joyant was an employee or agent of appellant on March 13, 1940; (2) that the trial court committed prejudicial error in its instructions to the jury; (3) that Dr. Joyant was not negligent and that his negligence, if any, did not proximately cause damage to respondent; (4) the verdict is excessive and patently the result of passion and prejudice; and (5) the trial court erred in denying appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

Appellant denied in its answer to the complaint herein that Dr. Joyant was either its agent or its employee at the time respondent was treated in its institution. Upon the issue thus created, the following testimony was presented at the trial:

Defendant Dr. Charles Henry Wood, who had been the president and a director of appellant college for twenty-eight years, testified that the college was housed in two buildings at 920 Venice Boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, one of which was a three-story building containing 17,000 square feet; that there were three store rooms on the ground floor of said building facing on Venice Boulevard; that as one faced said building the store room on the left was occupied by the Los Angeles X-ray Laboratory; that the middle store room served as a waiting room for the college, and the store room on the right was occupied by a chemical laboratory; that on March 13, 1940, the equipment in the X-ray laboratory personally belonged to the witness, who had owned the laboratory for many years. On March 13, 1940, the said X-ray laboratory was operated by Dr. Joyant who had complete control of it; that said witness together with Dr. Royce "founded that laboratory and operated it, and I made an arrangement with Dr. Joyant that in return for doing my work on my patients—I have quite a large clientele—and in return for doing the work for me and doing the teaching X-ray analysis and diagnosis to the student body, that he would not be compelled to pay any rent or any telephone service, or any janitor service, but there were no fees collected from Dr. Joyant for the college. That was just an understanding that in return for teaching these subjects, and he did that for a considerable time, but was not at the time you mentioned." Further, that no portion of the fees collected by Dr. Joyant was received by the college; that when patients of the clinic of the college had X-rays taken at the Los Angeles X-ray Laboratory, they paid Dr. Joyant whatever fee he exacted; that there was "just an oral agreement" between Dr. Joyant and the witness with regard to the X-ray laboratory, which could be cancelled at will by either party.

Dr. Wilma Churchill von Walden testified she was the secretary and treasurer and a director of the Los Angeles College of Chiropractic; had charge and control of the faculty of the college; that on March 13, 1940, Dr. Joyant operated an X-ray laboratory in a portion of the building occupied by the college; that he taught X-ray analysis at the college when that subject appeared in the school curriculum; that the name of Dr. Joyant's laboratory appeared on the front window thereof as follows: "Los Angeles X-ray Laboratory."

Dr. Clement J. Joyant testified that he was a doctor of chiropractic and an X-ray technician and on March 13, 1940, operated the laboratory known as "Los Angeles X-ray Laboratory" at 918½ Venice Boulevard, occupying space on the ground floor of a building which also housed the Los Angeles College of Chiropractic, the entrance to the latter being at 920 Venice Boulevard; that on his laboratory door facing Venice Boulevard was this sign: "Entrance, Los Angeles X-ray," and on the front window facing Venice Boulevard was the sign reading: "The Los Angeles X-ray Laboratory—Clement J. Joyant"; that he had operated said laboratory continuously from 1930; that he had an agreement with Dr. Wood that whenever the X-ray course appeared in the college curriculum he would teach it for the use of the space occupied by his laboratory, light, gas and telephone service; that said agreement was made in 1929 and continued in force and effect through March, 1940; that he made X-rays for any of the doctors in the field who referred their patients to him; that the college did not prescribe the charges he made for X-rays, nor did it dictate or prescribe rules for him relating to the conduct of his X-ray business, nor the hours during which the laboratory was to be open for business.

Respondent Stanhope testified that prior to March 13, 1940, he had never been treated at the Los Angeles College of Chiropractic and did not know anyone connected with said institution; that after Dr. Metzinger had treated him he was carried into an X-ray room; that he had never been in the building before and was not acquainted with the premises; that when they arrived in the X-ray room, "I don't think anybody was in there because I saw within a few seconds, ten or fifteen seconds, maybe, I saw a doctor come out of an inside room." When he was leaving Dr. Joyant told respondent that the usual charge would be $15 and respondent thought it included both the X-rays and the examination made by Dr. Metzinger. "I didn't know whether I had to pay Dr. Metzinger or pay Dr. Joyant or pay a cashier, or what. He (Joyant) simply asked me for $15.00, or said the charges would be $15.00. * * * But owing to Mr. Phoenix's connection with the college, that they were going to cut it in two, fifty per cent. My bill would be $7.50."

[1] "An agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him." § 2300, Civ.Code. In this connection it is urged by appellant that 'before a recovery can be had against a principal for the alleged acts of an ostensible agent, three things must be proved, to-wit" (quoting from Hill v. Citizens Nat. Tr. & Sav. Bank, 9 Cal.2d 172, 176, 69 P.2d 853, 855): "[First] The person dealing with the agent must do so with belief in the agent's authority and this belief must be a reasonable one; [second] such belief must be generated by some act or neglect of the principal sought to be charged; [third] and the third person in relying on the agent's apparent authority must not be guilty of negligence. 1 Cal.Jur. 739; Weintraub v. Weingart, 98 Cal.App. 690, 277 P. 752."

[2, 3] An examination of the evidence hereinbefore referred to which was produced on the issue of agency convinces us that respondent has met the requirements enumerated in the Hill case. So far as the record reveals appellant did nothing to put respondent on notice that the X-ray laboratory was not an integral part of appellant institution, and it cannot seriously be contended that respondent, when he was being carried from room to room suffering excruciating pain, should have inquired whether the individual doctors who examined him were employees of the college or were independent contractors. Agency is always a question of fact for the jury. The evidence produced on this issue is sufficient to support the jury's implied finding that Dr. Joyant was the ostensible agent of appellant college.

Appellant complains of error in the giving of certain instructions to the jury, on the general ground that "There was no evidence that Dr. Joyant was an employee of the college, so it was error to submit that issue to the jury."

[4] Without discussing each of the instructions objected to, suffice to say that this court has examined the fifty or more instructions given and is convinced that the jury was fully and impartially informed as to the principles of law applicable to the facts established by the evidence without resulting prejudice to appellant. § 4½, art. VI, Cal. Const. Moreover, as heretofore stated, the evidence was sufficient on the question of agency to present that issue to the jury.

Appellant urges that "there can be no recovery against an X-ray technician unless two facts are established:

"(a) Negligence on the part of the technician;

"(b) Evidence that the pictures were used by physicians in treating plaintiff or as a diagnostic aid."

[5] The record herein reveals that Dr. Joyant did not follow the accepted practice of skillful roentgenologists in this community of taking a lateral X-ray wherever an injury to the spine is indicated. Additionally, he developed and read the X-rays immediately after he took them while respondent was still in the room, at which time he made the positive statement, "Well, this confirms the doctor's diagnosis. There are no bones broken." Therefore, it must be assumed that the X-rays were taken as a diagnostic aid and that if Dr. Joyant had discovered through that medium that respondent's back was broken, he would have made known that fact so that appellant's doctors could have given further attention to respondent's injury.

Dr. Scarborough testified that in her opinion, as an expert, the period of respondent's convalescence was greatly lengthened because of the lack of care received by him at the hands of defendants; that the average case of spinal fracture with a compression such as respondent suffered, and for a man of his age, would require the back to be placed in a cast for four months and that such patient is usually back at work in six months, whereas respondent was still convalescing from his injury at the expiration of one year and eight months.

The evidence adduced at the trial herein amply supports the judgment based on the jury's verdict that Dr. Joyant was negligent and that such negligence proximately caused damage to respondent.

[6, 7] The assessment of damages is first of all the province of the jury, and secondly, that of the trial court when passing upon a motion for a new trial, therefore, an appellate court will not disturb the verdict unless it is so grossly excessive as to immediately suggest that it was the result of passion, prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. Peckham v. Warner Bros. Pictures, 42 Cal.App.2d 187, 108 P.2d 699; Loeb v. Kimmerle, 215 Cal. 143, 9 P.2d 199. Moreover, the jury's award of damages cannot be set aside on appeal where there is nothing to suggest that the jury acted through passion, prejudice or corruption. Osrowitz v. Market Investment Co., 40 Cal.App.2d 179, 104 P. 2d 681.

From what has been said, it follows that there was no error in the denial of appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

The judgment and order appealed from are, and each of them is, affirmed.

RAINE v. SPRECKELS et al.

Civ. 12170.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 26, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 25, 1942.

1. Fraud ⚷50

In actions based upon fraud, where the evidence is equally balanced, there is a presumption against fraud approximating in strength that of innocence of crime.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⚷299(12)

In action to set aside conveyance by husband to wife as a fraud on husband's creditors, where undisputed evidence established a state of facts from which conflicting inferences could be drawn, one in favor of fair dealing and one in favor of fraud, trial court properly applied presumption against fraud, and upheld the conveyance.

3. Fraud ⚷58(1)

When a plaintiff's case goes no further than to establish a state of facts from which the inference of fraud may or may not be reasonably drawn, he has failed to establish his charge by a "preponderance of evidence", since indirect evidence and inference of fraud to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy court or jury that fraud was designed and accomplished.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Judge.

Action by B. F. Raine against Rudolph Spreckels and others to set aside a conveyance of real estate by named defendant to his wife as a fraud on creditors. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, Louis Ferrari, and George D. Schilling, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, L. S. Mana, and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

On June 17, 1930, Rudolph Spreckels sold to his wife Eleanor their residence in Hillsborough for the sum of $100,000, which was paid to him in cash out of the separate funds of Mrs. Spreckels. The entire sum was deposited in Mr. Spreckels' account in the Bank of America and used by him to pay existing obligations. On November 9, 1936, the plaintiff, as assignee of the Bank of America, commenced this action to set aside the sale upon the grounds that the transaction was made without consideration and with the intent to defraud the creditors of the grantor. A trial was had before the court and judgment followed for the defendants. Plaintiff's appeal from this judgment, in the final analysis, raises the single question whether the findings of the trial court are supported by substantial evidence.

In the year 1928 Mr. Spreckels had a net taxable income of over $13,000,000, on which he owed a federal income tax of over $2,000,000. In September, 1929, he borrowed from the Bank of America $500,000 to pay the third instalment of this tax. In December, 1930, this indebtedness was paid by a substituted note of a corporation which was guaranteed by Mr. Spreckels. Execution on a judgment based upon this note was returned unsatisfied, and in November, 1936, this action was commenced. The answers denied the allegations of fraud and alleged that Mrs. Spreckels had purchased the property for cash paid out of her separate property, that the sum paid was not less than the market value of the property, that the proceeds of the sale were used by Mr. Spreckels in paying various obligations, including interest paid to the Bank of America on the existing indebtedness, and that Mr. Spreckels was not insolvent at the time of the sale.

The trial court found that the property, consisting of 20.65 acres, was sold as alleged for the sum of $100,000 which was paid in cash out of the separate property of the grantee, that "the said sum of $100,000 was a substantial and valuable consideration for said purchase and represented the fair and reasonable market value of said property for cash at said time; that defendant Rudolph Spreckels in making said sale and defendant Eleanor J. Spreckels in making such purchase dealt at arm's length.

"V That said sum of $100,000 was received by said defendant Rudolph Spreckels, and was deposited in the Bank of America of California, predecessor in interest of said Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association, and became part of the estate of said Rudolph Spreckels, and was disbursed by him in the payment of then existing and subsequently accruing debts and obligations, and in part upon obligations owing to said Bank of America of California.

"VI That at the time of the sale of said property, towit, on the 17th day of June, 1930, the defendant Rudolph Spreckels was insolvent, but the defendant Eleanor J. Spreckels neither knew nor had reason to believe that defendant Rudolph Spreckels was insolvent.

"VII That in selling said property and in making and delivering the said deed defendant Rudolph Spreckels did not nor did defendant Eleanor J. Spreckels, in buying said property and accepting said deed, have or entertain any intent to defraud the then existing or future creditors of defendant Rudolph Spreckels, including plaintiff and plaintiff's assignor; that said sale was not made up on any secret or other trust, but was an outright sale for cash, and said Rudolph Spreckels by said sale parted with all interest and ownership in said property, and said defendant Eleanor J. Spreckels thereupon became the sole and absolute owner thereof."

In support of these findings the respondents refer to the undisputed evidence (appellant concedes that these essential facts are not disputed) that, upon their marriage in 1895 the respondents moved to a home in San Francisco which Mr. Spreckels presented to his wife as her separate property In 1925 Mrs. Spreckels sold the place for $90,000. In 1922 Mr. Spreckels purchased the 20.65 acres here involved for $82,000. They also owned a home in Sonoma County which had cost them over $300,000. This was sold in 1934 for $118,000. In 1927 Mr. Spreckels became heavily involved in financial transactions in the east and moved to the city of New York. Mrs. Spreckels continued to maintain the family home in Hillsborough. She testified that during this period she had no knowledge that Mr. Spreckels was insolvent or in financial difficulties, that she merely assumed that he wanted some ready money, that he never discussed his business affairs with her. and that "I knew nothing about his business affairs. I knew he was a rich man, but beyond that I did not know what he had."

The circumstances of the sale are that Mr. Spreckels, while in New York, notified his son, who was his attorney in fact in San Francisco, to sell the residence. The son notified his mother who offered to pay $50,000 in cash and give a mortgage in a like sum. Mr. Spreckels replied that this was not acceptable and that he wanted the full sum in cash. The son consulted Mr. Wheeler, who was Mr. Spreckels' attorney and who prepared the deed and the escrow instructions. But Mr. Wheeler advised that Mrs. Spreckels should have independent legal advise and upon her request he suggested that she consult Mr. Sidney Ehrman. Mrs. Spreckels went to Mr. Ehrman's office, but, not finding him in, she consulted Mr. Jerome White who acted for her throughout the transaction. Mrs. Spreckels borrowed $50,000 from one bank on securities which she owned and raised the balance on loans upon her personal savings accounts. On June 12, 1930, $50,000 was paid, the papers were placed in escrow pending search of title, and on June 17 the final payment was made and the deed then recorded. Mrs. Spreckels has lived in the house continuously since it was built, but in November, 1930, Mr. Spreckels discontinued an allowance of $2,500 a month which he had paid her from the time of their marriage, and in August, 1931, she sold fourteen acres of the property to Thomas Fortune Ryan III for $144,000.

It is appellant's theory that "all these unusual and excessive motions" preceding the sale were taken because the parties feared it might subsequently be questioned by creditors, that the employment of separate counsel for Mrs. Spreckels was done "to give the transaction the outward appearance of a bona fide sale in case it was later questioned." In support of this theory appellant refers to the failure to offer the property for sale in the open market, the "unusual and excessive" efforts to give the transaction appearance of fairness by employing counsel of high reputation and integrity, the personal interest of Mrs. Spreckels in saving her home property, her failure to inquire about her husband's financial condition, and her failure to pay an adequate consideration for the property.

All these references present a combination of circumstances upon which the conjecture of fraud in the transaction is based. It would serve no purpose to lengthen the opinion by a recital of the evidence relating to each item. It is sufficient to say that the trial court had all the witnesses for observation, that evidence was taken showing the unusual financial conditions of the period, the sudden changes from affluence to poverty, and the recurrent difficulties of those in this class to maintain large and expensive homes. As to the value of the property at the time of the sale an expert witness testified "There was no market value for the property in 1930, if you speak of market value from the standpoint of selling. There was just no purchasers for that type of property in June, 1930."

[1-3] The rule of law which governs here, as in any case where the evidence is equally balanced, rests upon the sound principle that "The presumption is always against fraud,—a presumption approximating in strength to that of innocence of crime; and it should not be deemed overcome, even prima facie upon a showing so intangible and shadowy." Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26, 29. It is stated more at length in 10 Cal.Jur. 741, as follows: "If there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the duty of court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing. Fraud must always be proved, so that when a plaintiff's case goes no further than to establish a state of facts from which the inference of fraud may or may not be reasonably drawn, he has failed to establish his charge by a preponderance of the evidence. This does not, of course, mean that fraud must be proved by direct evidence. This is not always nor even often possible. But it does mean that the indirect evidence and the inference to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy court or jury that fraud was designed and accomplished." The trial court applied this doctrine to its judgment and found that the appellant had failed to prove fraud in the transaction and our examination of the record satisfies us that these findings should not be disturbed. The judgment is affirmed.

BROOKS et al. v. FIDELITY SAVINGS & LOAN ASS'N et al.

Civ. 13575.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 21, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1099(3)

Decision on former appeal, that creditor's agreement, during general business depression, to accept $10,000 cash to be borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in full settlement of $11,000 note and trust deed was supported by sufficient consideration where debtor expended time and money in procuring loan, became the "law of the case".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Law of the Case".

2. Specific performance 🔑121(8, 11)

In suit for specific performance of creditor's agreement, made during general business depression, to accept $10,000 to be obtained by loan from Reconstruction Finance Corporation in satisfaction of $11,000 note and deed of trust, evidence supported finding that agreement was supported by valuable consideration, that it was fair and equitable, that plaintiffs were able and willing to perform and that tender of performance by plaintiffs was refused without just cause.

3. Mortgages ⚿303

Where a creditor, during general business depression, agreed to accept $10,000 cash to be procured by Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan, in satisfaction of $11,000 note and deed of trust, but no time for the payment of the money was specified, a reasonable time must be allowed within which to complete the loan.

4. Mortgages ⚿303

Where a creditor, during general business depression, agreed to accept $10,000 cash in satisfaction of $11,000 note and deed of trust and the parties thereto contemplated that such funds should be raised by a loan through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation but no time was specified when the money should be paid, completion of the loan and tender of the money within four months was within a "reasonable time".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Reasonable Time".

5. Interest ⚿50

Where creditor after agreeing to accept $10,000 cash in satisfaction of $11,000 note and deed of trust, refused to accept plaintiff's tender of the money and took title to the property under foreclosure sale, in suit for specific performance of the contract and for an accounting of all moneys collected by creditor in use of property, a judgment requiring creditor to account for all moneys so received without charging plaintiff with interest upon the $10,000 was proper, as the tender stopped the running of interest.

6. Specific performance ⚿130

In suit for specific performance of creditor's agreement to accept $10,000 for $11,000 note secured by deed of trust on bungalow court property and for an accounting for all moneys received by creditor for use of property after foreclosure sale, trial court improperly refused creditor allowances for salary of the manager of the property, for social security, workmen's compensation, fire insurance and bond premiums paid, which expenditures were necessary in the operation of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Roy V. Rhodes, Judge.

Suit by George W. Brooks and others against Fidelity Savings and Loan Association and others for specific performance of a contract and for an accounting. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

George S. Dennison, of Los Angeles, and W. G. Harmon, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles R. Holton, of Whittier, Paul G. McIver, of Montebello, and Burke, Hickson, Burke & Marshall, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GOULD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs on or about February 3, 1928, borrowed from Fidelity Savings & Loan Association $15,000, payable at the rate of $210 per month with interest at 8.4 per cent per annum, secured by deed of trust upon a 13-unit bungalow court property owned by them at Montebello, California. Soon thereafter an additional borrowing of $1,500, secured by the same trust deed, increased the indebtedness to a total of $16,500. In June, 1935, the unpaid principal balance upon the indebtedness amounted to $11,118.56, and interest was owing from December 5, 1934. Before that date Fidelity assets were transferred to defendant Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, and negotiations hereinafter referred to for the settlement of said indebtedness were had between plaintiffs and officers or agents of defendant Pacific States Company.

In the early months of 1935 several proposals back and forth, looking to the settlement of the indebtedness, were submitted, and finally on June 25, 1935, it is alleged and so found by the trial court to be a fact, Pacific States accepted a proposition made by the owners to take the sum of $10,000 cash in full payment and settlement of the entire obligation, then amounting to more than $12,500. A letter to this effect was written by Pacific States, and plaintiffs proceeded to open an escrow to complete negotiations theretofore pending to borrow $7,500 upon the same property from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to raise an additional $2,500 by borrowings upon life insurance policies and from other sources, as well as to expend money in surveys, insurance policies, escrow fees and other necessary disbursements for refinancing said property.

The loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was approved by that agency September 27, 1935, and, so plaintiffs alleged, they were ready, able and willing to complete the transaction and to carry out their contract with Pacific States by paying the $10,000 to satisfy the note and trust deed held by the latter. Pacific States, however, never became a party to the escrow, but by a letter dated October 23, 1935, refused to proceed unless plaintiffs would pay $11,000. Plaintiffs did not acquiesce in this demand for $1,000 additional, and Pacific States thereupon proceeded with the foreclosure of its trust deed, and pursuant to a sale had in such proceedings purported to bid in said property and take title thereto, at the same time foreclosing a chattel mortgage upon the furniture and furnishings of said bungalow court, held as additional security for said indebtedness. After the sale Pacific States took possession of the property and proceeded to administer it as its own, placing a manager in charge, renting and collecting rents, paying expenses of upkeep, taxes, insurance and other costs.

The present litigation was initiated by a complaint filed November 14, 1935, asking that defendants be required to specifically perform the contract of June 25, 1935, by which it was charged they agreed to accept the sum of $10,000 for their liens, and also that the foreclosure sale, then pending, be enjoined. Demurrer was filed and sustained. An amended complaint was filed, to which a demurrer alleging failure of consideration for said alleged contract of June 25 was sustained, and, plaintiffs refusing to amend, the court entered an order dismissing the complaint. Upon appeal the district court of appeal, in Brooks v. Fidelity, etc., Ass'n, 26 Cal.App.2d 114, 78 P.2d 1175, 1177 (hearing denied by the Supreme Court), reversed the judgment of dismissal, holding that the facts alleged in the amended complaint did constitute sufficient consideration for the agreement sought to be specifically enforced, and that said complaint did state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As stated by the court in that case: "Under the facts pleaded in the complaint, it would appear that the respondents had considerable time to act during which they had the right of election of availing themselves of selling the property, or of accepting the sum of $10,000 in full satisfaction. Weighing all of the conditions then existing—a depressed market for real property, the value of ready cash, the scarcity of bidders at foreclosure sales due to financial conditions which then existed in the general business depression—defendants may have preferred an agreement for the payment of $10,000 in cash rather than to take over the real property on foreclosure. It is also alleged that plaintiffs expended money and time in procuring the consent of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance the money, something plaintiffs were not called upon to do by the terms of their note. We believe that sufficient consideration did exist for the execution of the agreement, and on that issue the complaint stated a cause of action."

Upon return to the superior court pleadings were brought down to date by amended and supplemental complaints, in which the State Building and Loan Commissioner, who had taken charge of defendant Pacific States, was made a party defendant, and in which accounting was asked of defendants for their administration of the property during the several years they had held it after the foreclosure sale. Issue finally was joined upon a third amended and supplemental complaint and answers thereto. Upon trial plaintiffs prevailed. The trial court ordered that the property be returned to plaintiffs upon their payment of the agreed $10,000, and against this sum credit was allowed in the amount of $9,829.04, which it was found represented the rents, issues and profits received by defendants from the operation of the bungalow court during their long period of possession, less certain sums allowed for operating and maintenance expenditures. As a net result it was decreed that plaintiffs recover back their property, free from any lien or claim of defendants, upon the payment to defendants of the sum of $170.96, less plaintiffs' trial costs and such sums as might become due between the date of judgment and the final delivery of the property to plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

[1,2] Most of the questions involved herein are disposed of by the determination of the former appeal, coupled with the findings of the court upon the trial presently appealed from. In the former appeal it was held—and this must be accepted as the law of the case—that a consideration was pleaded sufficient, if found to be true, to uphold a judgment decreeing specific performance. Upon the trial of the instant action the court, upon abundant evidence, found favorably to respondents in every particular—that "there was a good, sufficient, valuable, adequate and valid consideration," and that "the contract * * * was fair, adequate, just, equitable and reasonable." It was further found that respondents were ready, able and willing to comply with said agreement for the payment of $10,000, and so notified appellants within a reasonable time; that respondents duly tendered said money to appellants about October 15, 1935, but that such tender was refused "without just or lawful reason or excuse."

[3, 4] While no time for the payment of the $10,000 was indicated in the writing or agreement of June 25, 1935, appellants contend that they were justified in withdrawing their offer and proceeding with the foreclosure after waiting six weeks. No time being specified, it follows that a reasonable time must be allowed. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. v. Abner Doble Co., 162 Cal. 497, 123 P. 290. It was known to appellants that the money to pay them would be obtained from a new loan to be placed on the property by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the delays in dealing with that agency were known to all parties equally well. It was with knowledge of the proposed source of the money to pay off appellants that the contract was entered into, all details of the negotiations as they progressed were disclosed to appellants, and it must be held that the contract was entered into in contemplation of the facts within the knowledge of the parties existing at the date of the agreement. Giberson v. Fink, 28 Cal.App. 25, 151 P. 371. The court found that respondents proceeded diligently and in good faith, and its conclusion that the time elapsed was reasonable appears to be justified and to be amply supported by the record.

[5] When an accounting was undertaken between the parties for the time during which the property was in the possession of appellants, respondents, as was their right, chose to require appellants to account for the actual money received in the use of the property, rather than to recover for the fair value of its use for that period. Although respondents never paid the $10,000 to appellants nor deposited it to the latter's credit, and in fact never suffered any loss or detriment in connection therewith except the preliminary incidental expenditures in soliciting the loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the court refused to charge them with any interest upon the $10,000, although appellants were required to account for the rents, issues and profits of the bungalow court during the entire period. The court's action must be sustained as proper in the circumstances. Having determined that there was a valid tender made in good faith on October 15, 1935, such tender, under well established law, when unjustifiably refused, placed appellants in default, permitted respondents to exercise their remedies for breach of contract, stopped interest running—in fact, stopped all the incidents of the original obligation—and left only the original obligation itself, shorn of all its incidental burdens. Civ.Code, § 1504; Walker v. Houston, 215 Cal. 742, 12 P.2d 952, 87 A.L.R. 937; Lockhart v. J. H. McDougall Co., 190 Cal. 308, 212 P. 1. Appellants call our attention to decisions holding a contrary doctrine in other states, but there can be no doubt that in California it is settled that a valid tender stops the running of interest upon the debt.

[6] There remains for consideration the allowance or disallowance of various specific items in the accounting. Without reviewing the entire accounting in detail it is sufficient to say that generally the court's findings are to be approved. The total receipts from the operation of the bungalow court from December 14, 1935, when appellants took possession, until February 28, 1941, amounted to $21,147.04. Against this the court allowed expenditures in maintenance, operation and upkeep and payment of necessary charges against the property totalling $11,318, all of which in our opinion were proper deductions. Certain other items for which credit was asked by appellants were, we believe, improperly disallowed by the court. These were as follows:

Salary of apartment house manager........	$1,072.83
Social Security for employees..................	102.17
Workmen's Compensation......................	21.13
Fire insurance premiums......................	469.27
Bond premiums.................................	40.12
	$1,705.52

We see no valid reason why these expenditures, proper and necessary in the operation of the property, were not allowed as credits to appellants.

The judgment and findings are therefore modified to provide such additional credits to appellants and to decree that the amount to be paid by respondents to appellants shall be changed by the addition thereto of said sum of $1,705.52, said amount being fixed at $1,876.45 instead of $170.96. Otherwise the judgment is in all respects affirmed. Appellants to recover costs.

A passenger who took a position between the rails of parallel street car systems at the invitation of the motorman of a municipal street car, and who was struck by such car when she was unable to board the car of the other system due to its crowded condition, was not contributorily negligent so as to prevent recovery against the city street railroad, since she could assume from the motorman's signal that he would not start the municipal car while she was in a position of danger.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Everett C. McKeage, Judge.

Action by Ada Curry against the City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, and another, for injuries sustained when plaintiff was run over by a street car operated by named defendant. From an adverse judgment, named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

John G. Reisner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, as a result of a trial by jury, was awarded damages in the sum of $8,500 against the two defendants. A new trial was granted to the Market Street Railway Company and denied to the defendant city and county. The latter appeals from the adverse judgment. The only question raised by the appeal is whether the verdict is sustained by the evidence as to the negligence of this defendant and as to the absence of contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

The two defendants operate independent street railways on Market Street in San Francisco. The lines of rails run parallel with a distance of six feet between the inner rails, which, with an overhang of two feet upon each car, left a clearance of two feet between the cars of the respective lines. At the intersection of Market Street and Van Ness Avenue a long safety zone is maintained for the protection of passengers using the two lines. On a rainy day in February, 1941, during the peak of traffic congestion at about 5:15 p. m. the plaintiff left this safety zone for the purpose of boarding a westbound car No. 17 operated by the defendant Market Street Railway Co. To reach her destination it was necessary to pass in front of a car standing on the outer or northerly rails and she waited until she received a signal to pass from the motorman operating that car, which was an "N" operated by the city and county, and hereafter referred to as the municipal car. At that time the No. 17 car had stopped in the safety zone with the front end opposite the extreme westerly end of the zone. The municipal car had stopped with the front end opposite the rear steps of the No. 17 car upon which passengers boarded. When the plaintiff reached these steps she found them crowded with passengers; she was unable to board the car, and was left standing with four others between the two cars. At this time the municipal car started forward; something struck one of those standing at the steps of No. 17; then the latter car also started forward and these expectant passengers were thrown to the ground. There was some evidence that one of these persons was struck by the municipal car and that he caused the others to fall. There was also evidence that some of them were struck by the passengers standing on the steps of car No. 17. The plaintiff was thrown in such a position that a wheel of the municipal car passed over her foot causing the injuries for which she recovered damages.

[1-3] Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to respondent, the negligence of the operator of the municipal car is not open to question. He saw or had reason to see this group of persons standing between the rails; he knew they were intending to board car No. 17 and must have seen the crowded condition of that car. It was his duty to wait until the other car cleared the zone or until those standing in the street had a chance to reach a place of safety. These two street railway lines are maintained and operated for the service and benefit of the public; they are the only means of travel provided for a large number of people and their operation is a joint invitation to the public to accept a reasonably safe and efficient service from both of the competing lines. When a passenger seeks to enter a car operated upon the inner rails he is entitled to assume that those operating cars on the outer rails will exercise care to see that he may do so safely.

Whether such care has been exercised is a question of fact to be determined by the jury under the circumstances of each case. It was so held in Pevonak v. City and County of San Francisco, 206 Cal. 648, 275 P. 785, a case very much like this in its facts, with the exception that both cars were moving through the loading zone at the same time. On reversing a judgment upon directed verdict for the two railways the court said: (206 Cal. page 651, 275 P. page 786) "In other words, it is our view that it was a question of fact for the jury whether or not these two cars should have simultaneously traversed their respective tracks when a group of ten or twelve persons were crouched together in such a narrow space, there being also ample evidence that the crowd had been placed in this position without fault upon their part, having crossed said municipal tracks for the purpose of boarding a car which the agent of respondent Market Street Company did not allow to stop and having been prevented from retracing their steps to a place of safety by the oncoming of the two other cars."

[4] The case is also authority in answer to appellant's argument that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. She took the position between the rails at the invitation of appellant's motorman. She could assume from his signal to her to pass in front of the municipal car that he knew she intended to board car No. 17 and that he would not start the municipal car while he knew she was in a position of danger until she had either boarded the car or had been able to retrace her steps to a place of safety.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Minerva Lesoine Gove against Lakeshore Homes Association, and others, to recover damages for injuries to city residential property allegedly caused by the negligent construction and maintenance by the city of a storm water drainage system. From a judgment of nonsuit as against defendant City of Oakland, plaintiff appeals.

Cornish & Cornish, of Berkeley, for appellant.

Hagar, Crosby & Crosby and F. Bert Fernhoff, both of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit in an action to recover damages for injury to residential property in the city of Oakland. Lakeshore Homes Association, a corporation, East Bay Municipal Utility District, and the city of Oakland were joined as parties defendant; but the association's demurrer to the complaint was sustained and no appeal was taken from the trial court's ruling, nor from the judgment of nonsuit in favor of the utility district. The appeal is narrowed down, therefore, to the question of the liability of the city of Oakland.

The evidence introduced by plaintiff shows that her home was practically destroyed by the earth sliding from beneath the concrete foundations, and that the sliding thereof was proximately caused by the negligent construction and maintenance by the city of a portion of the storm water drainage system it had built on and across lands adjoining plaintiff's property; and the evidence shows also that the department of the city government having charge of the drainage system was given notice and had actual knowledge of the dangerous and defective condition prior to the injury to plaintiff's property, but failed and neglected to take the necessary action to protect the surrounding property from the apparent danger. The city contends that since it was within the power of the city to construct a storm water drainage system to take care of the water that fell within the watershed in which plaintiff's property was situate, and since at no time it diverted any water from outside the natural watershed into the system so constructed, the case is one of damnum absque injuria, and that therefore even though the damage to plaintiff's property was proximately caused by the negligent construction and maintenance of any portion of said system, plaintiff is not entitled to be compensated therefor. The city's contention cannot be sustained.

The legislative act of 1923 (Stats.1923, p. 675, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 5619, § 2) imposing liability upon municipalities for the payment of damages for injuries to property declares: "* * * municipalities * * * shall be liable for injuries to * * * property resulting from the dangerous or defective condition of * * * works and property in all cases where the * * * officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice * * * and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition or * * * take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public * * *." The facts of the present case, which bring it within the provisions of the foregoing statute, may be stated as follows: Plaintiff purchased the land in 1924 for $1,850, and erected a dwelling thereon at a cost of more than $10,000, and which at the time of the damage thereto was reasonably worth $7,900. The property is described on the official map as Lot 11, Block 6, South Lakeshore Glen, and is known as 794 Brookwood Road. It fronts south on Brookwood Road and is bounded on the east by the lands of the Lakeshore Homes Association through which runs Trestle Glen Creek. The north boundary of plaintiff's property lies within several feet of the south bank of the creek, but no part of her property is riparian thereto. The southerly two-thirds of her property, fronting on Brookwood Road, is fairly level, and it was on that portion that she built her dwelling. The northerly third slopes rather sharply toward the creek bank; and the contour of the Lakeshore Homes Association's property to the east is steep throughout. The property on the southerly side of Brookwood Road is also steep, and is occupied by dwellings.

Trestle Glen Creek is approximately three miles long and its course is circuitous. Included in its watershed are 649 acres. Starting in the foothills above the city of Piedmont, it flows through a portion of that city, then into and through a portion of the city of Oakland and empties into Lake Merritt. Upon reaching the vicinity here involved, it flows through the north portion of the property of said association, takes a sharp bend to the north, and continues on westerly but does not touch plaintiff's property. It passes through the property of said association about 50 feet from and runs on a line approximately parallel with Brookwood Road, and is about 32 feet lower than the level of the road. As the land in the watershed in this particular locality became gradually utilized for residential purposes and streets were laid out and paved, less of the rain water that fell seeped into the ground, and in order to take care of the surplus water the city of Oakland in 1931 constructed certain conduits, storm drains and culverts whereby the water was collected on Brookwood Road, then conveyed across the lands of the association to Trestle Glen Creek, and a short distance below, the waters of the creek are picked up in a concrete culvert and carried half a mile to Lake Merritt. That is to say, two storm water inlets were built on Brookwood Road, one on each side, just east of the easterly line of plaintiff's property and in front of that of the association; and from said inlets and connected therewith there was laid underground and across the association's property a ten-inch concrete pipe or conduit to Trestle Glen Creek, so that all storm waters falling upon said road and those drained to it by means of gutters and drains from the sides of the canyon in that locality were concentrated in said storm water inlets and then passed through said ten-inch pipe or conduit and discharged into Trestle Glen Creek at the point of the bend on the association's property. But nothing whatever was done to fortify or protect the banks of the creek at the end of the ten-inch pipe against erosion by the increased and intensified volume of water thus thrown into the creek at this point; and soon after that part of the drainage system was completed the surface strata of the soil of the association's property started to slip downward toward the creek. This caused the sidewalk on the north side of Brookwood Road to subside and the ten-inch pipe to separate from the storm water inlets. The city engineer caused repairs to be made to the pipe and the inlets, but nothing was done at the other end of the pipe to fortify the banks of the creek or to prevent erosion. Thereafter there was a settling of the pavement of Brookwood Road which the city repaired from time to time. But during January and February of 1938 there was a heavy rainfall, which greatly increased the flow of water through the ten-inch pipe into the creek, and the banks not being protected at that point, the increased water gradually washed away the south bank. This took away the lateral support for the land above, and the earth started slipping toward the creek. The concrete pipe across the association's land was laid parallel with and close to a ten-inch water main installed by the utility district in 1924; and on February 12, 1938, on account of the earth slippage, a blow-off valve on the water main broke. This was repaired immediately; but the earth slippage continued. On February 16, 1938, the water main again broke, and was thereupon abandoned. On February 21, 1938, Ernest Held, the owner of the property across the street from plaintiff, notified the city engineer that the earth was slipping toward Trestle Glen Creek and that something besides patchwork to the pavement of Brookwood Road should be done to prevent a disaster. On March 2, 1938, the city engineer replied that he was watching the situation and would undertake a survey to see what should be done. But nothing was done, and on March 14th an extensive land crack opened. It was "V" shaped, and had its apex at the storm water inlet on Brookwood Road. Its east arm extended along the north edge of Brookwood Road and thence northeasterly to the creek through the property of the association. Its west arm followed a distance along the edge of Brookwood Road, thence bent northwesterly across the association's property and entered plaintiff's property about 25 feet north of the road. It ran thence northwesterly to the east side of plaintiff's house, followed along the east side of the house, cut just under the northeast corner of the house, and thence to the creek. The crack when it first appeared was about half an inch wide; but from day to day the inside of the "V" lowered and the crack became wider. Nothing was done by the city authorities; but plaintiff, in order to prevent her house from slipping with the earth's surface, installed a cement pillar 12 feet deep under the northeast corner. As the slide continued, more lateral support was washed away by the waters of the creek, and in April, 1938, a second crack appeared. It paralleled the first crack generally, but crossed to plaintiff's land about 10 feet north of the north edge of Brookwood Road, ran under the southeast corner of plaintiff's house and came out about the middle of the rear, and from there ran down to the creek. It increased in intensity, the earth to the northeast slipping until it had dropped from 2 to 3½ feet. As the earth continued to slip the ground beneath the foundations of plaintiff's house slid away, and finally the plumbing was torn loose, the water pipes were broken, and the house settled and slid and was badly cracked and twisted; so that in May, 1938, plaintiff was forced to vacate.

The evidence definitely shows that the slides were due to the removal of the lateral support on the association's property by erosion of the banks of the creek where the ten-inch pipe emptied into the stream, and that had the city fortified and protected the banks from erosion at that point and constructed a culvert along a portion of the creek bed, the slippage of earth would have been prevented. But as stated, at no time, even after the slipping started in February, 1938, were any protective structures whatever placed in or along the banks of the creek; consequently the second slide took place, as the result of which plaintiff's residence was practically destroyed. Within ninety days after the damage occurred and in conformity with statutory requirements, plaintiff filed her verified claim with the city, but the claim was rejected, and thereupon she brought this action.

[1, 2] A nonsuit may be granted only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff if such a judgment were given. In re Estate of Lances, 216 Cal. 397, 14 P.2d 768, citing cases. The same rule relating to evidentiary matters governs reviewing courts in the consideration of appeals from judgments of nonsuit. Montgomery v. Nelson, 211 Cal. 497, 295 P. 1034; Harper v. Northwestern Pacific Ry. Co., 34 Cal.App.2d 451, 93 P.2d 821. Applying the foregoing rules to the situation here presented, it is apparent that the evidence above narrated would have been amply sufficient upon which to base a judgment for damages in plaintiff's favor under the provisions of the 1923 municipal liability act, if such a judgment were given; and that being so, it must be held that the trial court's order granting the motion for nonsuit was erroneous.

[3] As supporting its contention that the injury done plaintiff's property is damnum absque injuria, the city cites and relies on two cases: San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. Los Angeles County, 182 Cal. 392, 188 P. 554, 9 A.L.R. 1200, and Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 119 P.2d 1. But an analysis of those cases demonstrates that for several reasons neither is here controlling. The appeal in the San Gabriel case was taken from a judgment based on findings of fact after trial on the merits, and was decided in 1919, several years before the 1923 municipal liability act was enacted, and the controversy did not concern surface waters. As stated therein, the waters causing the damage had already been gathered into a definite body and flowed as a stream in a natural watercourse. Moreover, the action was brought by a property owner whose land was riparian to the stream of water which caused the damage to its property, and the issue of negligence was not involved. Summarized, the facts of that case were these:

The county of Los Angeles constructed artificial conduits or drains in the natural channel of a watercourse which, to the extent of their length, but no further, acted as, and only as, a substitute for the natural channel which continued down to and through plaintiff's land a mile or so below. The conduits or drains added no water to that already in the channel and that which would come to it on the way, but merely served to pass such waters more completely and more speedily from one point in the channel to another, all entirely above plaintiff's land. Following the construction of the conduits or drains, extraordinary rains occurred in the region and a great volume of water was passed through the conduits or drains and emptied into the wash below and continued down the channel a mile or more through plaintiff's land, causing substantial damage thereto. The precise question presented in that case, as it was stated by the court [182 Cal. 392, 188 P. 556, 9 A.L.R. 1200], was: "Has the owner of land through which a natural water channel runs a right to complain of an improvement of that channel above his land (for the substitute conduit is but that) and has no other effect, when the improvement is a reasonable one for the benefit of the upper land through which the channel runs and is not constructed in an unreasonable manner?" Answering the question in the negative, the court went on to say that if the plaintiff's land is riparian to the natural watercourse the burden is on him to protect his land by erecting bulkheads or other structures along the banks of the watercourse against overflow or from being washed away, and that this is so even though the burden he is necessarily under of protecting his land against the stream is thereby increased and his land is injured because of his failure to meet such increased burden; moreover, that the rule stated is not subject to the limitation that the increased volume must not be such as to make the stream exceed the capacity of the channel. To quote further from the opinion: "The plaintiff's complaint is solely that the drains increased the volume and speed of the water in passing its land. No complaint is made of the manner in which the drains are constructed, or that they are not reasonable improvements for the district they are designed to protect, or that they are unnecessarily injurious to the plaintiff, or that they bring into the channel water for which it is not the natural drainage outlet, or, in a word, that there has been any wrong committed into which there enters any factor other than simply an increase in the volume of the stream and consequent increase of speed and height produced by artificial means." (Italics ours.)

Thus it will be seen that the factual situation and the legal problems there involved were entirely different fron those here prescribed. Here the issue was negligence—the defective construction and maintenance of a portion of the drainage system on and over lands not belonging to plaintiff; and obviously plaintiff could not have protected her property from the apparent danger by erecting bulkheads or other structures along the banks of Trestle Glen Creek, because no portion of her property was riparian thereto.

The city calls attention to an allegation in plaintiff's complaint to the effect that the association refused to give the city permission to enter upon the association's lands to make improvements to prevent the washing away of the banks. But it appears that in its answer to the complaint the city denied that allegation; and at the trial no testimony was elicited on that question. In any event the city in the exercise of its municipal power had or could have acquired the unobstructed right of control over its entire drainage system for the purpose of maintaining the system in a proper and safe condition; and obviously the pipe line it laid across the association's lands and the portion of the open channel of Trestle Glen Creek it used as a conduit to convey the waters to the intake of the concrete conduit in the channel below which picked up the waters in the channel and carried them on to Lake Merritt, formed two important links in the entire system. Kramer v. City of Los Angeles, 147 Cal. 668, 82 P. 334.

In the Archer case the right of recovery was based solely on article I, section 14 of the state Constitution, which requires the payment of just compensation for private property taken or damaged for public use. The municipal liability act of 1923 here invoked, which imposes liability upon a municipality for injury to property resulting from a "dangerous or defective condition" of its works or property, was nowhere there involved; furthermore, the factual situation out of which the consolidated actions there arose was entirely different from the one upon which the plaintiff herein claims the right of recovery. As set forth in the majority opinion in the Archer case, the essential facts thereof were these: Surface waters from an area covering some 134 square miles drained into a stream known as La Ballona Creek, which flowed down a natural watercourse into La Ballona Lagoon. The lagoon was about two miles long and two miles wide, and the waters therefrom emptied through a natural outlet into the Pacific Ocean. As the area drained by the creek urbanized, improved drainage increased the volume of water in the creek; consequently the watercourse was artificially straightened, widened and deepened. The improvements to the drainage system and the watercourse was done by the municipal authorities. A heavy rainstorm, lasting two days, occurred at the end of 1933 and the waters swept down La Ballona Creek, overflowed the banks of the lagoon and flooded plaintiff's property located "near" the lagoon. (In the dissenting opinion [19 Cal.2d 19, 119 P.2d 8] it is stated they were "located some three miles north of the lagoon" and that they were not riparian to the lagoon or the creek.)

It was claimed by the plaintiffs that the flooding of their lands was due to two causes for which the defendants were responsible: draining into the creek by means of artificial means greater quantities of surface waters, without artificially enlarging the outlet from the lagoon to the ocean; and obstructing the flow of the water through the lagoon by the building of a bridge across the lagoon which caught debris swept down the creek. On the appeal the majority of the court held that plaintiffs failed to show that the obstruction of the bridge contributed to the damage caused by the overflow; that the state or its subdivisions may take or damage private property without compensation if such action is essential to safeguard public health, safety or morals; that the defendants acted within the limitation of their power in draining the increased surface waters in the La Ballona Creek watershed into said creek, even though the volume of water in the creek was increased thereby; and that there was no duty imposed upon them to improve the outlet to the lagoon into which the creek emptied, even though by so doing the flooding of the nearby lands would have been prevented; that therefore the injury to the plaintiffs' lands caused by the overflow of the lagoon was damnum absque injuria.

The present case is fundamentally different. Plaintiff's property was not damaged by surface waters, stream waters, or flood waters. The damage was directly caused by landslides brought about, according to the evidence adduced at the trial, by a dangerous and defective condition of a portion of the public works of the municipality—a condition of which, so the evidence shows, the city officers having the authority to fix had notice and actual knowledge, but which they failed to remedy; and the plaintiff is seeking compensation for the damage under a special statute covering such case and affording such remedy. It is true, plaintiff's theory of her right to recover damages was based also on two additional legal grounds, to-wit: that the city was liable because it discharged increased surface waters with concentrated and destructive force into the stream; and that irrespective of the question of negligence or liability for dumping the increased surface waters it was liable under article I, section 14 of the state Constitution. And it may be well here to state that a considerable portion of her brief has been devoted to a discussion of those two additional theories. But in view of the conclusion we have reached that plaintiff is given a complete remedy for the recovery of damages for the alleged injury to her property under the 1923 municipal liability act, it becomes unnecessary to inquire into the merits of the remaining two grounds urged by her in support of the appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

WARD, J., concurred.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

I concur. I agree with the reasoning and conclusions contained in the main opinion. There can be no doubt but that the complaint alleges, and the evidence shows, a good cause of action under the municipal liability act. However, I am also of the opinion that, independent of that act, a good cause of action has been stated and proved. There is no sound legal theory to justify the conclusion that a municipality, without liability, can collect all of the surface waters from a large drainage area, and discharge such waters into a stream with concentrated and destructive force to the damage of lower owners, where the municipality knows or should know that the stream cannot carry the increased burden. Under such circumstances, the municipality is liable under the eminent domain provisions of the Constitution. Such damage cannot be justified either under the police power or under any theory of exercising a riparian right. Although there is language in the majority opinion in the case of Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 119 P.2d 1, that sustains respondent's position in the instant case, I do not believe that the Supreme Court intended by that case to overrule well settled principles to the contrary.

Hearing Denied Oct. 22, 1942.

1. Contracts 🔑108(2)

It is not against "public policy" for an employer to be a party to an agreement under which a wife is to resign a position in order that her husband may secure employment which he could not otherwise obtain.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Public Policy".

2. Schools and school districts 🔑139

Where it did not appear that qualifications of husband of teacher having permanent tenure were not considered and it was arranged that teacher should retain her status with permanent tenure by taking annual leaves of absence until husband had proved that his qualifications justified his retention long enough for him to acquire tenure, teacher's resignation under agreement that husband would be employed as a teacher long enough for him to acquire tenure was not against "public policy" on ground that teacher's qualifications or those of her husband had not been considered by the board. 3. Mandamus 🔑168(4)

In teacher's mandamus proceeding to compel board of education to recognize her alleged status as a permanent teacher and to pay her salary for a period during which she had not been assigned to a position, evidence sustained finding that board had established a policy of not employing, initially, both a husband and wife as teachers, precluding recovery because of agreement that teacher would take annual leaves of absence for a time, and then resign to permit employment of her husband long enough for him to acquire tenure. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Mandamus by the People of the State of California on the relation of Marjorie S. French against the Board of Education of the Unified School District of the City of San Diego, to compel respondent to recognize petitioner's alleged status as a permanent teacher and to pay her salary for a period of time within the school year 1941-1942, during which she had not been assigned to a teaching position. From an adverse judgment, petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for appellant.

Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and Bertram McLees, Jr., Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The petitioner applied for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to recognize her alleged status as a permanent teacher and to pay her salary for a period of time within the school year 1941-1942 during which she had not been assigned to a teaching position. Respondent's answer admitted that she had formerly held permanent status as a teacher in said district and alleged that this status had been terminated by her resignation. After a trial the court found in favor of the respondent finding, among other things, that petitioner's permanent status had been terminated by her resignation, which was voluntary and not procured by fraud, coercion or duress. From the judgment which followed the petitioner has appealed.

There is no dispute as to the material facts. In 1934, the appellant was and for some years had been a teacher in respondent district with permanent tenure. She and her husband were living in San Diego but during the preceding school year her husband had been employed as a teacher at Lakeside, some 21 miles from San Diego. During the summer of 1934, appellant and her husband approached the respondent with the request that the husband be given work as a probationary teacher in respondent district. They were informed that it was the policy of the respondent board not to give initial employment as teachers to a husband and wife at the same time. After some discussion, an understanding was arrived at between the parties for the purpose of enabling the husband to substitute himself for the appellant as the member of the family having permanent status in said district. To this end, and in order to maintain her permanent status until her husband acquired tenure, it was understood and agreed that the husband would be employed on the condition that the appellant would take annual leaves of absence during his probationary period, and that she would resign her position as a permanent teacher if and when he acquired tenure. Incidentally, it appears that the appellant was suffering from tuberculosis for several years from and after 1934, although she testified that she did not know that she had this disease until December of that year.

Pursuant to this agreement, the terms of which were set forth in letters exchanged between the parties, the husband taught in this district the next three years, and each year the appellant was granted a leave of absence upon her written application in which she mentioned the understanding. For some reason which does not appear in the record the husband was not reemployed for the school year 1937-1938. During that year the appellant was assigned to a half-time teaching position upon her written request in which she said: "My physician says that it must be in the morning as he would like me to rest in the afternoons." Beginning with the next year, however, the understanding previously arrived at was reinstated by mutual consent and the appellant took annual leaves of absence and her husband was employed as a probationary teacher for the three school years between July, 1938 and June, 1941.

In March, 1941, the respondent's superintendent wrote to the appellant notifying her that her leave of absence would soon expire and requesting information as to whether or not she was planning to teach the next year. She called on the superintendent and was told by him that she would have to resign because her husband was on the list to be made permanent and that if she did not resign he would not hire her husband. She replied that she did not want to resign and was told that she could either go back to teaching or that she could resign and that her husband would be employed. Some days later, after further discussions with her and with her husband, she sent in her written resignation to take effect "at such time as my husband is made permanent" and in which she also said: "I am resigning because my husband would not become permanent unless I resign." This was accompanied by a letter to the respondent board in which she stated that she was tendering her resignation as a teacher; that she was resigning "to insure my husband's permanent status, upon request of the superintendent"; that "I wish my resignation to become effective at such time as my husband is made permanent"; and that "I do not want to sever relationships with the schools and I hope the board will reconsider my reemployment as a teacher."

After discussing this resignation the board instructed one of its members to talk the matter over with Mr. and Mrs. French and her father. This he did and at this conversation this board member asked the appellant if she really intended to resign and if there were any strings attached to the resignation. She replied that she wanted to resign, that she wanted to be sure that her husband would get tenure, and that she intended to stop teaching at any rate upon her husband's getting tenure. When the board member asked her why she sent the resignation in in that form she replied: "I wanted to be sure my husband will have permanent status." After some further discussion along this line she expressed a desire to occasionally do some work if called upon and this board member told her that he did not see why this could not be done after a time although, as he testified, he made no promises to her.

Her written resignation was dated April 28, 1941, and it was accepted by the respondent at a board meeting on May 6, 1941, and at the same meeting the appellant's husband was employed for the next year and he began his work in September, 1941, thus attaining permanent status. On September 10, 1941, the appellant wrote to the respondent stating that she was in good health and requesting an assignment to teach, naming her preference as to schools. She was not assigned as such teacher and this proceeding followed.

The appellant contends that the findings to the effect that she had resigned her position are not supported by the evidence for the reason that the evidence discloses that the purported resignation was void and ineffectual for any such purpose. No cases are cited which are particularly helpful. The appellant cites Dutart v. Woodward, 99 Cal.App. 736, 279 P. 493, and states that the facts therein cannot be distinguished from those in the instant case. In that case it was held that a teacher with a permanent status could not be penalized for marrying by transferring her to a position in a distant tuberculosis sanitarium. We see no similarity, factually or with respect to the principles involved, between the two cases.

[1, 2] The first point specifically presented is that "the resignation was invalid as against public policy." It is first argued that appellant's resignation was based wholly upon the consideration that her husband be employed as a teacher; that the qualifications of the appellant or of her husband played no part in the matter; that teachers are supposed to be selected wholly upon their qualifications; and that the respondent board acted contrary to our educational ideals and violated its duty to the public in thus making a "deal" for the employment of a teacher without regard to his qualifications. It in no way appears that the husband's qualifications were not considered, and it was arranged so that the appellant could retain her status until he proved that his qualifications justified his being retained long enough for him to acquire tenure. The appellant states that she does not argue that the policy of not employing two members of the same family is against public policy, but that she "does argue that a resignation is a contract and the compelling of the resignation under the circumstances here involved constitutes the resignation a contract in violation of public policy." Just what it is that the appellant contends is against public policy is not very clear. While we have been developing a new double standard in this country in the sense of permitting, and even encouraging, both husband and wife to become full time wage earners it can hardly be said, thus far, that it is against public policy for an employer to be a party to an agreement under which a wife is to resign a position in order that her husband may secure an employment which he could not otherwise obtain. The real question in this case is not one of public policy in the sense contended for, but is as to whether or not the appellant's resignation was given as a result of an unlawful coercion or compulsion.

[3] Some contention is made that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that the respondent board had established a policy of not employing, initially, both a husband and wife as teachers. It is argued that the evidence shows that no resolution to that effect was ever adopted by the board, and that certain testimony shows that the policy followed was merely not to encourage such employment. The minutes of the board show that this matter had been rather extensively discussed; at least three witnesses testified that such a policy had been and was being followed; it clearly appears that the appellant was advised of the situation and that such a policy was carried out insofar as her husband is concerned; and that he would not have been given employment in the first place or allowed to obtain permanent status except for the agreement made. The evidence is sufficient to support the finding.

Appellant's main contention is that her resignation was and is void because it was given under compulsion. It is argued in this connection that throughout the controversy the respondent has overlooked the fact that both appellant and her husband have "vested rights" to their status under the teacher's tenure act, School Code, § 5.500, as amended by St.1941, p. 1936; that both "are entitled to permanent status"; that the respondent could not "arbitrarily deprive" either of them of their permanent tenure; and that, therefore, appellant's resignation was secured by compulsion and coercion and is ineffective. In effect, it is contended that she has been deprived of her tenure without her real consent since her resignation was not necessary in order to enable her husband to secure tenure, as he was also entitled to tenure, with a vested right thereto.

The fallacy in this part of the argument lies in the assumption that her husband was entitled to tenure without regard to whether or not she resigned. It clearly appears that he would not have been originally employed but for this agreement between the parties; that he would not have been reemployed each year but for her continued compliance with its terms; and that he would not have been retained after the completion of his probationary period had she not resigned. Had he not been reemployed for the year 1941-1942 he would not have acquired tenure or become entitled thereto. He did not acquire his right to tenure until after she resigned and he was then permitted to acquire tenure only because of her resignation.

[4] There was no conpulsion here in either a legal or equitable sense. The appellant was free to make her own choice, which she did. She fully understood the matter from the beginning and not only chose at that time, but probably then intended to follow it to completion, the course which she pursued to the desired final conclusion. Toward the end, while she did not regret the choice she had made and still wanted to abide by it if necessary in order to gain permanent status for her husband, she desired, if possible, to secure an additional benefit with a resulting elimination of all element of choice, past or present. When she found that she could not get this additional benefit, to which she was not entitled as a matter of right, she resigned in order to accomplish her main purpose. The respondent took rather unusual precautions to make sure that she desired and intended to exercise her choice in that manner. It clearly appears that she very much preferred to secure tenure for her husband, rather than keep it for herself, if only one of them was to be allowed to have tenure. The respondent was under no obligation to take the remaining step which would enable her husband to acquire tenure. It is not claimed that anything was at any time misrepresented to her. With full knowledge she exercised a free choice between two situations either of which, but only one of which, was available to her. The only element of compulsion assigned to respondent is its refusal to do something it was under no obligation to do unless she did something which she had agreed to do. Even in this regard the appellant was given the opportunity to abandon the agreement and to retain her own tenure if she so desired. She was left free to choose which course she desired to pursue, she voluntarily chose the benefit and course which she at all times had most desired, and no coercion or compulsion appears.

[5, 6] No evasion of the tenure act here appears. For her own purposes and of her own volition the appellant was allowed to substitute tenure in her husband for her own tenure rights, which she gave up to that end. We are not impressed with the argument that the equities of the case are entirely in favor of the appellant. If there was anything wrong with the making and performing of this agreement the most equitable thing to do would be to put the parties back where they were, restoring her tenure and taking away his. Not only is this not now possible since the husband's employment has been continued beyond the probationary stage, but this is exactly what she does not want and what she most wants to avoid. He has now acquired tenure because of the respondent's reliance upon her agreement and her performance of its terms. She expressed no dissatisfaction with the arrangement for seven years. She confirmed her resignation when the respondent investigated before accepting it. She was careful not to withdraw her resignation until it had enabled her husband to acquire a position which he would have been otherwise unable to obtain and which cannot now be changed, and she not only desires to keep what she obtained through the agreement but she now seeks to repudiate the same in order to gain a further benefit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence L. Kincaid, Judge.

William Seymour was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and R. S. McLaughlin, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was adjudged guilty of grand theft of one star sapphire diamond clip. Trial was by the court, a jury having been waived.

Defendant appeals on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence and that the court erred in certain rulings.

On April 11, 1940, appellant and Franchot Tone, residents of California, were in New York City and appellant, who conducted a jewelry store in California, made a sale of certain jewelry to Tone. During the course of that transaction, appellant showed Tone a star sapphire jewel which he then had on consignment from a wholesaler. The wholesale price was $14,000; appellant and Tone agreed that it should retail for considerably more and Tone purchased the jewel by paying appellant $14,000, evidenced by his check payable to appellant and indorsed by him. The jewel remained in appellant's possession pursuant to the terms of the following written instrument, dated April 12, 1940:

"The property described below is the sole property of Franchot Tone and is received by the undersigned at the risk of the undersigned for inspection only with the understanding that title is to remain with Franchot Tone and that the undersigned, William Seymour, will return said property on demand. Before any sale can take place and title pass the sum of $14,000.00 must be paid to Franchot Tone and all profits above the amount of $14,000.00 is to be divided between Franchot Tone and William Seymour equally. It being the understanding herein that in event said property is damaged, lost or stolen or destroyed before such sale, that the undersigned William Seymour, will be responsible therefor, whether caused by the undersigned or by another over whom the undersigned has no control. The agreement and memorandum is to be in effect for ninety days from above date and at the end of this period Franchot Tone is to receive $14,000.00 in currency of the United States or has the right to demand his above property from William Seymour in the same condition as when taken by William Seymour. If above property is sold all monies received by William Seymour are to be paid at once to Franchot Tone and before any profit is received by William Seymour Franchot Tone is to have been paid in full." (There followed a description of the jewel and the signatures of appellant and Tone.)

After the said transaction, Tone did not see appellant until about Christmas, 1940, at appellant's jewelry shop in Beverly Hills. At that time appellant told him he had a prospective purchaser. Tone next saw appellant in March of 1941, when appellant told him that he had given the "stone" to a prospective purchaser on approval and that all that remained to be done was to work out the details of payment and he then asked Tone if he desired cash or if he would be willing to take notes in payment thereof. The next time Tone talked with appellant about the jewel was in June, 1941, when appellant told him that he was going to either get the jewel back or collect the money for it. The following week appellant went to Tone's home and agreed to get the jewel and deliver it to Tone's business manager so that he could put it in Tone's safety deposit box. Thereafter a week passed and Tone, not having heard from appellant, went to his residence and there appellant told him that he had borrowed $1,000 on the jewel from Mrs. Flatto, that he was paying the sum back and would then be able to recover the "stone." Tone testified that during their conversations up to June, 1941, he continued demanding either the return of the jewel or $14,000, but that in June, 1941, he demanded the return of the jewel. In July, 1941, Tone turned the matter over to his attorney who testified that he first talked with appellant, by telephone, early in July, 1941, and demanded that he return the jewel; that appellant told him he had already given his attorney $500, which was all that was needed to get the jewel and "clear up the transaction," and that it would be delivered to Tone's business manager the next day at 11:00 o'clock. The next day appellant said he had had some trouble with his attorney and would investigate and see why he had not obtained the jewel. A series of telephone calls ensued and Tone's attorney finally told appellant he didn't believe his story and wanted the truth; that appellant said the truth of the matter was that he borrowed $1,000 on the jewel, had paid back $500 and there was still $500 due which he hadn't been able to "raise." To this Tone's attorney replied that because the stone was of such great value and he didn't want anything to happen to it, he would give appellant $500 and go with him to get the jewel back. Appellant agreed to call Tone's attorney as soon as he completed arrangements but, hearing nothing more from appellant for a day or two and being unable to contact him in the usual manner, Tone's attorney sent appellant a telegram on July 28, 1941, in which he demanded return of the jewel. On this same day, these two parties had a telephone conversation in which appellant said that he had borrowed $5,000 from Mrs. Flatto, had paid back $4,000 and needed $1,000 to get the jewel back. Tone's attorney testified that he replied: "Immediately make arrangements to repay the $1000.00, and meet me, and I will give it to you so we can get the stone back." The next morning, July 31, 1941, appellant called him and stated that he was unable to communicate with Mrs. Flatto. Appellant then went to the office of Tone's attorney and said that the loan from Mrs. Flatto on the jewel was $11,000. While there, appellant wrote a letter to Mrs. Flatto in which he stated that the $11,000 was a loan by her on the jewel; that she was quite aware of the circumstances, "the saving of the business," and that he had promised her a bonus of $1,500 only because of the importance of the loan. He further stated that he thought she should help him straighten the matter up as she knew he was not the owner and "simply held it as a consignee for sale."

Appellant delivered the jewel to Mrs. Flatto in November, 1940, and in return received the sum of $11,000 from her. He also executed a bill of sale therefor to Mrs. Flatto, dated November 14, 1940, in which he stated, "I hereby certify that I have full and complete title to the—Star Sapphire Diamond Clip." Appellant testified that Mrs. Flatto agreed to return the jewel to him provided he paid her the sum of $12,500 on or before January 15, 1941, and that if he did not make such payment within that time, the jewel then "belonged to" Mrs. Flatto. Mrs. Flatto testified that the transaction was a sale to her; that there was something said about appellant repurchasing the jewel in January but that she "just bought it and that was the end of it" so far as she was concerned. No part of the money was repaid to Mrs. Flatto by appellant and Mrs. Flatto retained the jewel.

[1] Appellant contends that the document above set forth was a contract of sale or return; that title to the jewel vested in him upon delivery; and that the case presented is therefore one of a civil rather than a criminal nature. The respondent contends that the said document created an agency; that title to the jewel remained at all times in Tone; and that appellant by his act of delivering the jewel to one Mrs. Flatto in consideration of $11,000, whether under a contract of sale or a pledge, converted it to his own use.

Section 1739 of the Civil Code provides in part as follows: "Unless a different intention appears, the following are rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer. * * * Rule 3. * * * When goods are delivered to the buyer 'on sale or return,' or on other terms indicating an intention to make a present sale, but to give the buyer an option to return the goods instead of paying the price, the property passes to the buyer on delivery, * * *." The agreement expressly provided, "The property described below is the sole property of Franchot Tone * * " (italics added), and that the jewel was received by appellant, " * * for inspection only with the understanding that title is to remain with Franchot Tone. * * *" These provisions are not in accord with a sale or return contract; that title was to remain in Tone seems to have been emphasized in the agreement, especially in the light of the next statement, "Before any sale can take place and title pass the sum of $14,000.00 must be paid to Franchot Tone. * * *" In other words, the payment of $14,000 to Tone was a condition precedent to the passing of title to the jewel. It should also be noted that the provision, "The agreement and memorandum is to be in effect for ninety days from above date and at the end of this period Franchot Tone is to receive $14,000.00 * * * or has the right to demand his above property from William Seymour. * * *" (italics added), did not say Tone was entitled to receive the $14,000 at the expiration of the ninety-day period, or that he had a right to demand it, but that he "is to receive" that amount or he had the right to demand his property back. The use of the word "his" in this connection is inconsistent with appellant's contention that title passed. On the contrary, it indicated that the parties intended that title should remain in Tone unless Tone received $14,000.

Furthermore, the provision that, "* * * all profits above the amount of $14,000.00 is to be divided between Franchot Tone and William Seymour equally," did not indicate that any present sale was contemplated at the time of entering into the transaction, but it did indicate an intention that the jewel was to remain the property of Tone. The fact that Tone was to receive half of the profits is opposed to appellant's contention that Tone parted with title.

[2, 3] Under the terms of the agreement, appellant assumed the entire risk for damage or loss. Appellant urges that, "It is an almost invariable rule that ownership and the unconditional assumption of all risk for loss or injury go hand in hand." Intention of the parties controls as to the one upon whom risk shall be placed and, in the absence of an express agreement, risk generally follows ownership. Section 1742 of the Civil Code reads, "Unless otherwise agreed, * * * when the property therein is transferred to the buyer the goods are at the buyer's risk * * *." There was, however, a provision in the agreement that the risk should be on appellant and the fact that the risk was assumed expressly by appellant signified an intention that it should not follow the general rule.

In People v. Baker, 1923, 64 Cal.App. 336, at page 341, 221 P. 654, at page 656, it was stated: "One of the principal tests by which to determine whether any particular contract creates a mere bailment or is a sale on credit is this: Was there a binding promise on the part of the person to whom the possession was given to pay for the article? If there was such promise, then the contract is ordinarily held to be one of sale and not of bailment; and, conversely, if there was no such binding promise to purchase on terms agreed upon, then the transaction is ordinarily held not to be a sale." An analysis of the instrument which appellant claims was a sale or return agreement, reveals no binding promise on his part to pay for the jewel. It was agreed that Tone should receive $14,000 before title would pass but there was no binding promise that a sale would be made or that appellant would pay the $14,000.

[4, 5] Appellant further states that the first part of the agreement, providing that the jewel was the sole property of Tone and that appellant received it for inspection only with the understanding that title was to remain in Tone, merely described the "right of the parties as between each other" and that it is the "premise on which the transaction proper rests."; that the next two sentences (relating to title not passing until $14,000 was paid, sharing profits and the assumption of risk), taken in connection with the stipulation that the agreement should remain in effect for ninety days, make a sale on a condition subsequent in the form of a contract of sale or return. One of the most important rules in interpreting contracts is that the whole contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part. Civ.Code, § 1641; Code Civ.Proc., § 1858. As was stated in Monroe v. Grolier Society, 1929, 208 Cal. 447, at page 451, 281 P. 604, at page 605, 65 A.L.R. 989: " 'A contract must be construed as a whole, and the intention of the parties is to be collected from the entire instrument, and not from detached portions, it being necessary to consider all of its parts in order to determine the meaning of any particular part, as well as of the whole. Individual clauses and particular words must be considered in connection with the rest of the agreement, and all parts of the writing, and every word in it, will, if possible, be given effect.' " 13 C.J. 525, § 486; 17 C.J.S., Contracts, § 297. Considering the present contract as a whole, such contention that it was a sale on a condition subsequent cannot be sustained.

Appellant contends further that title passes in transactions of this kind according to custom and usage in the jewelry business. He testified, "The interpretation I have is that it is the same type of memorandum * * * that jewelers use. It is a universal memorandum all over the United States, whereby jewelers take merchandise from other jewelers, and if they do not demand it back in a specified time the jeweler then has possession * * *, and ownership, and owes the party who owned the piece at that time the amount of money for the piece. This is a regular jewelers memorandum."

[6, 7] A usage is operative upon parties to a transaction where and only where they manifest an assent to each other that it shall be operative, or where one of the parties knows or has reason to know that the other party intends to be governed by the usage, or where the usage exists in such transactions and is generally known by persons under similar circumstances. Rest., Contracts, § 247. It does not appear that either party manifested an intention to be governed by this alleged usage. No evidence was introduced to show that the alleged usage was so generally known that Tone would be charged with knowledge thereof and no evidence, except appellant's testimony, was offered to prove that there was in fact such a usage. Tone is an actor and, while he testified that he had purchased jewelry on various occasions, it does not follow that he was familiar with the custom of dealers in the jewelry business. In Latta v. Da Roza, 1929, 100 Cal. App. 606, at page 609, 280 P. 711, at page 712, 281 P. 655, it was stated, 'To bind one who is not engaged in the trade or occupation which employs the usage relied upon, proof of his actual knowledge of the usage is necessary, unless it is so commonly accepted that the public is presumed to recognize its existence." The trial court may well have concluded that the evidence was insufficient, not only to establish knowledge on the part of Tone, but to establish such a custom.

Appellant asserts that the instrument was clear and unambiguous in its terms; that the respondent used admissions, made by appellant in the letter to Mrs. Flatto, to show that the written agreement was not what it purported to be and that the corpus delicti may not thus be established.

[8-11] It is well settled, as appellant contends, that the corpus delicti must be proved by evidence outside of the extrajudicial admissions of defendant. People v. Hudson, 1934, 139 Cal.App. 543, 544, 34 P.2d 741. It is also well settled that slight or prima facie proof of the corpus delicti is all that is necessary. People v. McWilliams, 1931, 117 Cal.App. 732, 736, 4 P.2d 601; People v. Bollinger, 1925, 196 Cal. 191, 200, 237 P. 25. It may be proved by circumstances shown in evidence or by inferences drawn from facts shown. People v. Vicunia, 1930, 105 Cal.App. 145, 147, 286 P. 1061. The rule requiring proof of the corpus delicti before the admission of extrajudicial confessions is thus stated in 8 Cal.Jur., section 303, page 235: "To authorize the reception and consideration * * * of evidence of an extrajudicial confession or admission of a defendant, the people need not establish the corpus delicti by proof of the clear and convincing character required to support a conviction. It is sufficient if there is some proof, or prima facie proof, or even slight proof of the corpus delicti. The uncorroborated testimony of a witness is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti for this purpose, * * *." It follows that Tone's testimony, having been introduced into evidence prior to the letter, sufficiently established the corpus delicti. Irrespective of this fact, there would have been no error since order of proof is discretionary with the court and. where corpus delicti is finally established, a mere variation in the order of proof cannot be said to result in any prejudice to the defendant's rights. People v. Clark, 1925, 70 Cal.App. 531, 546, 233 P. 980; 8 Cal.Jur., § 303, p. 235.

[12] Appellant contends that the respondent introduced extrinsic evidence in an attempt to prove that the contract was other than its language legally implied. There is no merit in this contention. An examination of the record fails to disclose that any evidence was either offered or received for the purpose of varying the terms of the contract. Under the circumstances here presented it was proper, in construing the contract, for the court to look to the language employed, the subject-matter, and the surrounding circumstances. Palma v. Leslie, 1935, 6 Cal.App. 2d 702, 707, 45 P.2d 391.

Appellant argues that one year and three months having elapsed between the date of the transaction and Tone's demand for the jewel, during which time appellant had given no notice of rejection, the sale became complete. Since, as above shown, the parties did not intend their agreement to be one of sale at the time of the transaction, the mere passage of time would not operate to transfer title.

[13] Appellant states as one of his grounds of appeal that the court was without jurisdiction of the offense charged; however, this point was not urged in his briefs and it is not clear in what particular he challenges its jurisdiction. His acts, allegedly constituting the crime of embezzlement, were committed in Los Angeles County; clearly, the superior court of such county would have jurisdiction.

[14] A further point urged by appellant is that under section 511 of the Penal Code it is a sufficient defense that property is appropriated openly and avowedly and under a claim of title preferred in good faith, even though such claim is untenable. In view of the evidence adduced at the trial and the construction placed upon the contract by the trial court, it appears that appellant did not act in good faith and, therefore, was not entitled to the benefits of that code provision. It was stated in Payne v. Pathe Studios, Inc., 1935, 6 Cal.App.2d 136, at page 140, 44 P.

2d 598, at page 600, "And if the construction placed upon it [the contract] by the trial court, * * * is reasonable and sustainable by the language of the instrument, and appears to be consistent with the true intent of the parties, an appellate court will not substitute another interpretation though it seem equally tenable."

[15] At the trial Tone and appellant disagreed as to what was intended by that portion of the agreement which provided that it was to remain in effect for ninety days and at the end of that time Tone was to receive $14,000 or had the right to demand his property from appellant. Tone testified that he understood it to mean that appellant had ninety days in which to sell the "stone" and that he (Tone) could not demand it back before ninety days but, upon the expiration of that time, he had the right to demand either the stone or $14,000. Appellant testified that he understood it to mean if Tone did not demand the jewel back within ninety days after the date of the agreement, the jewel became his property and he became indebted to Tone for $14,000. The conduct of appellant in making the several false statements to Tone and his attorney, regarding the prospective purchasers, the whereabouts of the jewel, the sale or pledge thereof to Mrs. Flatto, the amounts borrowed and the sums repaid thereon, is not at all in harmony with the actions of one who believed the contract had the meaning which appellant ascribed to it at the trial. If appellant did in good faith understand that he had title to the jewel under the terms of the contract, and believed that he acted innocently in delivering the jewel to Mrs. Flatto, it is hardly to be supposed that he would seek to conceal the transaction as defendant did by resorting to such extensive fiction when inquiries were directed to him concerning the jewel.

For the foregoing reasons, appellant's act in selling or pledging the jewel to Mrs. Flatto was sufficient to warrant the trial court in finding that he converted it to his own use in a manner and for a purpose inconsistent with the owner's rights and inconsistent with the nature and purposes of the contract, and, in so doing, he was guilty as charged.

[16] If the circumstances shown in evidence reasonably justify the finding of the trial court that defendant was guilty, a reviewing court is not warranted in disturbing the finding, even though those circumstances also might be reconciled reasonably with the innocence of defendant. People v. Newland, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 678, 681, 104 P.2d 778.

Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied by the trial court, probation was granted and imposition of sentence was suspended.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

WEST PUB. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

S. F. 16692.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 19, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1942.

1. Corporations 🔑668(12)

Regardless of the form of statute authorizing service of process upon agent of foreign corporation which has not complied with the qualifying laws of state, the corporation must be doing business in the jurisdiction where the service is made to sustain its validity, since a foreign corporation is amenable to process, in the absence of consent, only if it is doing business within the state in such manner as to warrant the inference that it is present there.

2. Corporations 🔑642(6)

Isolated business transactions by foreign corporation, mere solicitation of business, advertising or demonstrating products, listing of name of corporation in telephone directory or having its name on door of an office or presence of a corporation official on personal business will not amount to "doing business" so as to make foreign corporation amenable to process in state.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Doing Business".

3. Corporations 🔑642(1)

It is not any activity of a corporation in a state other than that of its residence which will justify the conclusion that it is "doing business" there, so as to make it amenable to process but it is the combination of local activities conducted by such corporation, their manner, extent and character, which becomes determinative of the jurisdictional question.

4. Corporations 🔑642(4½)

Where foreign company had never qualified to do intrastate business, kept no bank account and no stock of books in the state, for filling of its California orders, and all shipments were made directly from its plant in Minnesota, and it rented no offices and made no allowances to any of its resident salesmen for such purpose, but company kept a substantial number of books in the state and permitted its salesmen to use them as a means of paying office rent, and as result of salesmen's activities from these locations, a systematic flow of books into the state occurred, the company was a "retailer" "maintaining places of business" in the state within the Use Tax Act and was "doing business" within the state so as to be amenable to service of process even though all its sales were in interstate commerce. The Use Tax Act requiring retailer, maintaining place of business in state and making sales of tangible personal property, to collect use tax from purchaser does not constitute a direct burden on "interstate commerce" and does not deny "due process of law" as applied to foreign corporation conducting interstate business but maintaining places of business and doing business within state. Prohibition proceeding by the West Publishing Company against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco to restrain the court from proceeding further in an action against the petitioner.

CURTIS, Justice.

An action was commenced by the state against the West Publishing Company, a Minnesota corporation, whose business is the publication of law books and legal periodicals and their sale to persons in various parts of the country, for the recovery of taxes levied upon the company under the California Use Tax Act. Stats. 1935, ch. 361, p. 1297, as amended by Stats. 1937, ch. 401, 671, 683, pp. 1327, 1874, 1935; Stats.1939, ch. 677, p. 2154; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 8495a. The state alleged that the company failed to file returns with reference to its California business for the period extending from July 1, 1935, to December 31, 1939; that thereupon, under authority of section 10 of the Use Tax Act, an estimate of $900,000 was made as the amount of total sales price of the tangible personal property sold by the company during this time "for storage, use or other consumption in the state of California"; and that upon this basis the company's liability was determined to aggregate $36,922.50—consisting of $27,000 for use taxes, interest amounting to $4,522.50 and penalties in the sum of $5,400. Personal service of process was made upon three of the company's salesmen operating in this state and a copy of the complaint and summons was sent by registered mail to the company's home office in St. Paul, Minnesota. The company appeared specially in the action and moved to quash the service of summons therein on the ground that it is a foreign corporation engaged exclusively in interstate commerce and is not doing business in this state so as to be amenable to its process. In this connection the company also challenged the constitutionality of the Use Tax Act as applied to its local activities claiming that its subjection to the requirements of the state tax would constitute a regulation and direct burden upon interstate commerce and would deprive it of its property without due process, in contravention of article 1, section 8, of the United States Constitution and section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to said Constitution. The motion was heard upon affidavits and oral testimony touching the conduct of the company's business affairs in this state, and was denied. The company now seeks a writ of prohibition to restrain the trial court from proceeding further in the action.

The petitioner's method of doing business with respect to California purchasers is substantially as follows:

Pursuant to a separate contract made with each, the exclusive right to solicit orders for its publications in California is granted by the petitioner to four salesmen, each of whom is allotted a separate section of the state and is of equal standing and authority. Under this contract the salesman must devote his entire time and attention to "the work of selling books and collecting and reporting upon accounts for" the petitioner, and as compensation for his services he is paid a salary and traveling expenses. All orders taken are subject to acceptance or rejection by the petitioner at its home office in St. Paul, Minnesota. The petitioner's instructions to its salesmen recommend that each order be accompanied by the customer's check for the initial payment specified in the governing price list. However, where the particular circumstances suggest a different procedure, the salesman, guided by his information as to the customer's credit rating as furnished by the petitioner or obtained from an independent source, may exercise his judgment in the matter of arranging the sale on terms of a sight draft, bill of lading attached, C. O. D. or cash basis. Such deviation from the routine type of time transaction, with "title of books to remain in West Publishing Co. until paid for," is submitted to the petitioner for confirmation when the order is transmitted. If the petitioner accepts the order, it ships the books from its plant at St. Paul, Minnesota, direct to the purchaser, charges prepaid; if it rejects the order, it returns the advance payment to the salesman with instructions that he rewrite the contract on different terms or refuse it altogether. As part of his duties in the solicitation and transmission of orders, the salesman is required to send to the petitioner a daily report of his activities, including information as to financial rating and credit standing of prospective purchasers. Also the salesman must return once a year to the petitioner's home office in St. Paul, Minnesota, to receive instructions in his work and to report on conditions in his district.

If the sale is made on the installment basis as is the usual case, the customer, in response to periodic statements sent to him by the petitioner, forwards all remittances to the Minnesota office. The salesman keeps no record of these subsequent payments or of the status of the particular account. However, when he is so requested by the petitioner's credit department, the salesman assists in the collection of delinquent amounts. In this connection he is expressly authorized, if unable to obtain payment, to "endeavor to line up the account with advance checks dated at thirty day intervals." If the overdue account is not so referred to the salesman for attention, it is handled by a local attorney employed by the petitioner for such purpose or by the petitioner's traveling collector sent from the home office. Other than the post-dated check arrangement specified to be within the authority of the salesman to negotiate, any compromise of claims or an adjustment involving the repossession of books is subject to the petitioner's approval. All routine complaints made to the petitioner relative to the prompt delivery of books and their condition upon arrival are referred to the salesman for settlement with the customer. With respect to such matters the salesman acts as "trouble shooter" for the petitioner in his assigned territory.

In addition to the orders obtained through the efforts of its salesmen—about 60 per cent of its total sales—the petitioner does a certain amount of business here in response to mail orders forwarded directly to the petitioner's home office from persons resident in this state. A further contributing factor to the petitioner's volume of sales in California is its practice of selecting a particular series of its law books supplementary to an earlier publication and sending it without previous order to all its established customers who are already owners of the prior edition. In so doing the petitioner anticipates that the customer will accept the later volumes thus forwarded to him and will pay for them in the course of direct negotiation with the petitioner at its home office. However, if the customer registers with the petitioner an objection to such method of sales promotion, it is the policy of the petitioner to refer the matter to the salesman operating in the district wherein the complaining customer is located. In such case the salesman attempts to adjust any misunderstanding which may have arisen and to persuade the customer to retain and pay for the later publication pursuant to the petitioner's statement of account.

The petitioner keeps here no bank account and no stock of books for the filling of its California orders; all shipments are made directly from the petitioner's plant at St. Paul, Minnesota, to the purchasers in this state, via a common carrier. The petitioner rents no office here and it makes no allowance to any of its resident salesmen for such purpose. However, each salesman has established headquarters with a law firm centrally situated in relation to his district: the focal points are Sacramento, San Francisco and Los Angeles—the law office in the latter city accommodates two salesmen while each of the other locations serves but one. The arrangement is substantially the same in each place. The salesman is allotted a section of the firm's library for shelving the books furnished him by the petitioner for use and display in the solicitation of orders, and certain desk space for the storage of his order blanks and writing materials. In the room assigned to him as his workshop he attends to all his business correspondence and prepares his daily reports for transmittal to the home office, receives his mail and telephone calls and makes appointments for interviewing customers there or elsewhere. He usually spends a part of each day at his city headquarters. In exchange for these office conveniences and services accorded to the salesman the members of the law firm involved enjoy practically unrestricted use of the petitioner's books so placed in their library. The various sets are kept up to date by the petitioner and constitute a sizeable and representative collection of law books—approximately 2,000 and 1,500 volumes being deposited in the San Francisco and Los Angeles offices, respectively. While the petitioner has not affirmatively undertaken to negotiate any office accommodations for its salesmen in this state, it has acquiesced in the arrangements made in the three localities mentioned for the display of its books and the centralization of its business operations. Moreover, the San Francisco and Los Angeles headquarters are listed in the respective telephone and building directories as addresses of the West Publishing Company. Such listings, while made at the instance of the lessee of the law suit concerned, are recognized by the petitioner in its extensive state advertising. For example, through various articles published in California legal journals and periodicals the petitioner for the past several years has advertised these locations as its "San Francisco office" and its "Los Angeles office," has invited prospective customers to inquire at these addresses "for full details," and has referred to its San Francisco and Los Angeles salesmen as its "local representatives." The petitioner has never qualified to do intrastate business in this state.

The single controversial issue to be decided in this proceeding is the question of jurisdiction of the respondent court to proceed with the trial of the action instituted by the state aaginst the petitioner for the recovery of the use taxes for the period above mentioned. In determining the validity of the service of process in that suit, the legal significance which should be given to the above-recited facts relative to the petitioner's local activities is of controlling importance.

Relevant to the consideration of the present factual situation are the following sections of the Use Tax Act:

Section 3 (Stats.1937, p. 1937) imposes an excise tax "on the storage, use or other consumption in this State of tangible personal property purchased from a retailer on or after July 1, 1935, for storage, use or other consumption in this State at the rate of three per cent of the sales price of such property." (This exaction is complementary to the California Retail Sales Tax (Stats.1933, ch. 1020, p. 2599, as amended, Stats.1935, ch. 351, 355, 357, pp. 1225, 1252, 1256; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 8493), which is a levy at the same rate upon the gross receipts of California retailers from sales of tangible personal property.)

Section 2, subdivision (b) (Stats.1939, p. 2154) defines the word "use" as including "the exercise of any right or power over tangible personal property incident to the ownership of that property, except that it shall not include the sale of that property in the regular course of business."

Subdivision (f) of the same section defines "retailer" as including "every person engaged in the business of making sales for storage, use or other consumption * * *."

Section 6 (Stats.1937, p. 1938) directs "every retailer maintaining a place of business in this State and making sales of tangible personal property for storage, use or other consumption in this State [not exempted under the law] * * *." to collect the tax imposed by the act from the purchaser, and specifies such tax "shall constitute a debt owed by the retailer to this State."

Section 24 (Stats.1937, p. 1944) provides that "In any action brought under the provisions of this act process may be served according to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and the Civil Code of this State or may be served upon any agent or clerk in this State employed by any retailer in a place of business maintained by such retailer in this State, in which case a copy of the process shall forthwith be sent by registered mail to the retailer at his principal or home office."

[1] Whatever the form of a particular statute authorizing service of process upon the agent of a foreign corporation which has not complied with the qualifying laws of a state, it is a fundamental requisite under the federal Constitution that the corporation shall be "doing business" in the jurisdiction where the service is made to sustain its validity. Riverside, etc., Mills v. Menefee, 237 U.S. 189, 35 S.Ct. 579, 59 L.Ed. 910; People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U.S. 79, 38 S.Ct. 233, 62 L.Ed. 587, Ann.Cas.1918C, 537. Formerly the theory upon which the courts of a state assumed jurisdiction of a foreign corporation carrying on business within its borders was that of implied consent to such jurisdiction. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 15 L.Ed. 451; St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U.S. 350, 1 S.Ct. 354, 27 L.Ed. 222. The abandonment of this "consent theory" in favor of the "corporate presence theory" was foreshadowed in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Alexander, 227 U.S. 218, 33 S.Ct. 245, 57 L.Ed. 486, Ann.Cas.1915B, 77. The latter doctrine was summarized by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Philadelphia & Reading R. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U.S. 264, 37 S.Ct. 280, 61 L.Ed. 710, as follows: "A foreign corporation is amenable to process to enforce a personal liability, in the absence of consent, only if it is doing business within the state in such manner and to such extent as to warrant the inference that it is present there. And even if it is doing business within the state, the process will be valid only if served upon some authorized agent." The determination of this jurisdictional question "is often a matter of great difficulty and extreme nicety. No all-embracing rule as to what is doing business has been laid down." Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, Permanent Edition, Vol. 18, § 8733. In Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co., 220 N.Y. 259, 115 N.E. 915, 917, 918, the late Judge Cardozo commented upon the criterion of corporate presence in this connection as follows: "If in fact it [the corporation] is here, if it is here, not occasionally or casually, but with a fair measure of permanence and continuity, then, whether its business is interstate or local, it is within the jurisdiction of our courts," citing International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U.S. 579, 34 S.Ct. 944, 58 L.Ed. 1479. "But there is no precise test of the nature or extent of the business that must be done. All that is requisite is that enough be done to enable us to say that the corporation is here." As was said in International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, supra, each case must depend upon its own facts.

[2, 3] While it is clear from these general observations that the application of a practical test is necessary to determine the validity of the service of jurisdictional process upon a foreign corporation, certain fundamentals have been settled establishing that neither isolated business transactions (Hunter v. Mutual Reserve Life Ins. Co., 218 U.S. 573, 31 S.Ct. 127, 54 L.Ed. 1155, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 686), nor the mere solicitation of business (Green v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry., 205 U.S. 530, 27 S.Ct. 595, 51 L.Ed. 916), nor holding stock in subsidiary corporations (Peterson v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pac. Ry., 205 U.S. 364, 27 S.Ct. 513, 51 L.Ed. 841; People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U.S. 79, 38 S.Ct. 233, 62 L.Ed. 587, Ann.Cas.1918C, 537), even to the point of complete control (Cannon Manufacturing Co. v. Cudahy Packing Co., 267 U.S. 333, 45 S.Ct. 250, 69 L.Ed. 634), nor advertising or demonstrating products (Harrell v. Peters Cartridge Co., 36 Okl. 684, 129 P. 872, 44 L.R.A.,N.S., 1094), nor its listing in the telephone directory or having its name on the door of an office (Philadelphia & Reading R. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U.S. 264, 37 S.Ct. 280, 61 L.Ed. 710), nor the presence of a corporation official on personal business (Riverside & Dan River Cotton Mills v. Menefee, 237 U.S. 189, 35 S.Ct. 579, 59 L.Ed. 910) will amount to the presence of the corporation. It is thus apparent that it is not any activity of a corporation in a state other than that of its residence which will justify the conclusion that it is "doing business" there, so as to make it amenable to process there, but it is the combination of local activities conducted by such foreign corporation—their manner, extent and character—which becomes determinative of the jurisdictional question. The term "doing business" within a state foreign to the one in which the corporation is organized and has its principal place of business is substantially defined by the Supreme Court of the United States as follows: "The general rule deducible from all our decisions is that the business must be of such a nature and character as to warrant the inference that the corporation has subjected itself to the local jurisdiction, and is by its duly authorized officers or agents present within the state or district where service is attempted." People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., supra [246 U.S. 79, 38 S.Ct. 235, 62 L.Ed. 587, Ann.Cas.1918C, 537]; see, also, Green v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry., supra; International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, supra. A leading and oft-cited authority upon the question of the jurisdictional service of process is the case of International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U.S. 579, 34 S.Ct. 944, 946, 58 L.Ed. 1479. In that case the State of Kentucky had instituted a criminal proceeding in its own courts against the Harvester Company for a violation of a Kentucky anti-trust law. The precise point involved was whether or not the state court had jurisdiction, and it was held that it had irrespective of the fact that the company's local business was purely of an interstate character. The opinion in that case discloses the following facts: The company had sales agents within the state, soliciting orders which were sent to the home office in another state for approval and in response to which the machines of the Harvester Company were delivered in Kentucky. There was a continuous course of shipment of machines into Kentucky. All deliveries were made f. o. b. at some point outside of Kentucky. The agents had authority to receive money, check or draft in payment of debts due the company and to take notes payable at local banks. They were not permitted to have any headquarters or place of business within the state, though they were allowed to reside there. They likewise were prohibited from making contracts or settlements and from engaging in other transactions not specifically authorized. The court expressly distinguished this factual situation as constituting "something more than mere solicitation" of patronage, which circumstance in the ticket agency case of Green v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry. Co., 205 U.S. 530, 27 S.Ct. 595, 51 L.Ed. 916, was deemed insufficient to bring the railroad corporation within the state for the service of process. The Supreme Court in the International Harvester Co. case said at p. 585 of 234 U.S., at page 946 of 34 S.Ct., 58 L.Ed. 1479: "Here was a continuous course of business in the solicitation of orders which were sent to another state, and in response to which the machines of the Harvester Company were delivered within the state of Kentucky. This was a course of business, not a single transaction. The agents not only solicited such orders in Kentucky, but might there receive payment in money, checks or drafts. They might take notes of customers, which notes were made payable, and doubtless were collected, at any bank in Kentucky. This course of conduct of authorized agents within the state in our judgment constituted a doing of business there in such wise that the Harvester Company might be fairly said to have been there, doing business, and amenable to the process of the courts of the state." (Italics ours.)

The adjudicated cases since the Harvester Company decision are not in complete agreement as to the precise factors additional to "mere solicitation" which motivated the court in that instance to sustain the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court. In the consideration of the question in People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U.S. 79, 38 S.Ct. 233, 62 L.Ed. 587, Ann.Cas.1918C, 537, the authority of the agents in the Harvester Company case to receive payments in Kentucky was stressed as determinative of the amenability of the corporation to service there. Other leading authorities have viewed the quantity and continuity of the solicitation of business in Kentucky as the controlling feature of the decision, rather than the mere additional circumstance of collecting money. Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co., 220 N.Y. 259, 115 N.E. 915; American Asphalt Roof Corp. v. Shankland, 205 Iowa 862, 219 N.W. 28, 60 A.L.R. 986. In so holding, these last-mentioned cases emphasize the import of the italicized language in the above quotation from the Harvester Company opinion. In this connection the court in the Shankland case made the following observation at page 870 of 205 Iowa, at page 31 of 219 N.W.:

"* * * The continuous course of business referred to was the solicitation of orders which were sent to another state, and in response to which the machines of the Harvester Company were delivered within the state of Kentucky. The court said, 'This was a course of business, not a single transaction.' It is true that the above language is followed by a reference to the fact that the agents were authorized to receive notes, drafts, checks, money, etc., and transmit the same to the Harvester Company. Such transactions were, however, merely formal acts and involved the exercise of no discretion on the part of the agent, and were always referable to transactions closed by the approval of the order, and, no doubt, generally by the delivery of the machines. These transactions are not given significance in what the court terms a continuous course of business.

"The present Chief Justice of the New York Court of Appeals [the late Judge Cardozo], in an able opinion in Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co., 220 N.Y. 259, 115 N.E. 915, refers to and quotes the identical language from the opinion of Justice Day in the International Harvester Co. case. The writer of the opinion in the New York case points out the difference in the facts in the International Harvester Co. and Green cases, and distinguishes them by saying that in the latter case the orders taken did not result in a continuous course of shipments from Illinois to Pennsylvania, the states referred to in the opinion."

[4] These principles relative to observable presence of a corporation furnish a firm basis for holding that the petitioner under the facts presented by the record is "doing business" within this state in such manner and to such degree as to be amenable to the service of judicial process. A recapitulation of the salient features of the petitioner's local activities will illustrate the factual foundation for this conclusion—and irrespective of which interpretation of the Harvester Company case is followed. While the petitioner does not lease offices here, it has kept several thousand volumes of law books in this state continuously over a period of years and permitted its salesmen to use them as a means of paying office rent. As a result of this practice it enjoys the advantages attendant upon the establishment of a fixed and local habitation for the conduct of its business and the display of its publications. Through extensive advertising of these locations as its local addresses the petitioner indicates that it regards those places as its points of contact with the public here. At these headquarters the petitioner's salesmen receive necessary office accommodations for the effective prosecution of their work. For many years in response to the petitioner's continuous solicitation of orders there has been a systematic and regular flow of its law books into this state—with respect to the period of time here involved the petitioner concedes that its California sales amount to $160,000 annually, a "substantial" volume of business. The powers of the petitioner's salesmen are varied in nature and exceptionally broad in some instances, as will be noted. In addition to taking orders, they receive initial payments upon installment contracts and they make collections on delinquent accounts incident to the exercise of a limited discretion in negotiating a postdated check arrangement for the settlement of such matters. Of significance at this point of review is the activity of the salesmen in connection with the petitioner's practice of sending to its customers in this state as to whose credit rating it is satisfied, selected sets of books without prior order. Frequently sales of such unordered merchandise are in fact consummated by the salesmen here when they persuade these persons to retain these publications and to pay therefor in accordance with the petitioner's statements of account. This last-mentioned line of duty in particular emphasizes the responsibility of the salesmen for the conduct of the petitioner's local affairs.

Regarding the petitioner's method of doing business in California as an integrated whole and coordinated with the establishment of local headquarters in the manner above outlined as pivotal points of operation, it cannot be gainsaid that the petitioner "maintains" places of business and makes "sales of tangible personal property for storage, use or other consumption in this State." The petitioner's reference to numerous patent infringement cases (Weller v. Pennsylvania R. Co., C.C., 113 F. 502; General Electric Co. v. Best Electric Co., D.C., 220 F. 347; American Electric Welding Co. v. Lalance & Grosjean Mfg. Co., 1 Cir., 249 F. 968, 162 C.C.A. 166; Winterbottom v. Casey, D.C., 283 F. 518; Zimmers v. Dodge Brothers, D.C., 21 F.2d 152; Elevator Supplies Co. v. Wagner Mfg. Co., D.C., 54 F.2d 937; Wilson v. McKinney Mfg. Co., 9 Cir., 59 F.2d 332; New Wrinkle, Inc., v. Fritz, D.C., 30 F.Supp. 89) as a guide for interpretation of the term "place of business" is of no avail here, for the jurisdictional elements entering into the determination of the validity of service of process in such cases have a special and restricted meaning under the terms of section 48 of the Judicial Code, 28 U.S.C.A. § 109. That statute provides that suits for patent infringement may be brought "in the district of which the defendant is an inhabitant, or in any district in which the defendant * * * shall have committed acts of infringement and have a regular and established place of business." The requisite acts of infringement contemplate the defendant's "making, selling or using of the infringing product" (New Wrinkle, Inc., v. Fritz, supra) and, in addition, "the defendant in the suit must have a regular and established place of business,—probably with reference to the acts of infringement." Weller v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra [113 F. 506]. That a great deal more than the maintenance of a "place of business" is encompassed by the phrase "a regular and established place of business," as defined in these patent infringement cases, is illustrated by the federal court's reference in Winterbottom v. Casey, supra [283 F. 521], to the jurisdictional words of section 48 as meaning "a place where the same kind of business, in kind, if not in degree, is carried on as is done at the home office or principal place of business of the person or company involved—a place where the manufacturing or selling or other acts constituting the activities of the business are made or done, respectively, in the usual course, and contracts or deliveries are made to the general public; where orders of customers are received and attended to continuously at a fixed, permanent, 'regular,' 'established' place; in short, a 'branch' of the business." These few references to the express statutory requirements determinative of the jurisdiction of the federal courts in patent infringement cases are sufficient to demonstrate the inapplicability of such cases to the consideration of a foreign corporation's liability to service of process within the state for the purposes of general suit.

[5] The petitioner's final challenge of the jurisdiction of the respondent court upon constitutional grounds is completely answered by the recent case of Felt & Tarrant Manufacturing Co. v. Gallagher, 306 U.S. 62, 59 S.Ct. 376, 83 L.Ed. 488, wherein the circumstances under which a foreign corporation engaged exclusively in interstate commerce manifests its presence in this state pursuant to the terms of the California Use Tax Act are discussed. In that case an Illinois corporation, while not qualified to do local business in California, leased offices in its own name in California, itself paying the rent, for the use of two general agents upon whom it conferred the exclusive right to solicit orders within the state subject to acceptance by the home office. The agents were prohibited from making collections, and all payments for goods ordered were made directly to the corporation. All goods delivered in California were shipped from one of the corporation's distributing points outside the state, sometimes directly to the purchasers and sometimes to the general agents, to save freight, who, in turn, delivered them to the purchasers. The corporation contended that since it did no intrastate business in California, any requirements that it act as the state's collecting agent for the use tax or that it insure payment if it failed to make collections from the users, constituted a direct burden upon interstate commerce as well as a denial of due process of law. In sustaining the state's claim that it might constitutionally apply to such nonresident corporation the provisions of the challenged statute, the Supreme Court of the United States referred to its earlier decision in Henneford v. Silas Mason Co., 300 U.S. 577, 57 S.Ct. 524, 81 L.Ed. 814, upholding the validity of similar Washington legislation as applied to goods of extra-state origin, and quoted therefrom as follows (306 U.S. 67, 59 S.Ct. 378, 83 L.Ed. 488): "The tax is not upon the operations of interstate commerce, but upon the privilege of use after commerce is at an end." Thus, it follows from this decision that the local activities of a foreign corporation may be purely interstate and yet sufficient in character to bring such corporation within the jurisdictional limits of this state and so render it liable to service of process in a suit instituted under the California Use Tax Act.

Nor is the force of the Felt & Tarrant Manufacturing decision weakened, as the petitioner urges, by the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States denied certiorari in the case of Brown v. J. B. Simpson, Inc., 314 U.S. 674, 62 S.Ct. 137, 86 L.Ed. 539 (J. B. Simpson, Inc., v. Gundry, 297 Mich. 403, 298 N.W. 81), thereby leaving unimpaired the decree of the Michigan Supreme Court that a foreign corporation qualified in Michigan and maintaining a branch office there cannot be compelled to collect the use tax on its exclusively interstate sales. Careful examination of the Michigan opinion reveals that the controlling factor was not lack of jurisdiction over the seller corporation, but the express language of the governing statute determining its non-applicability to an out-of-state corporation wholly engaged in the interstate business of selling in Michigan. Insofar as the distinction between these two cases is pertinent to the jurisdictional question raised in this proceeding, it is sufficient simply to note here the limited scope of section 5 of the Michigan Use Tax Act, Pub.Acts 1937, No. 94, applying only to "every seller of tangible personal property for storage, use or other consumption in this state, engaged in the business of selling at retail in this state," in contrast to the broad terms of section 6 of the California Use Tax Act, requiring compliance by "Every retailer maintaining a place of business in this State and making sales of tanglible personal property for storage, use or other consumption in this State." (Italics ours.)

In line with our conclusion that the nature and range of the petitioner's local activities classify it as a retailer maintaining places of business and doing business within this state "in such manner and to such extent as to warrant the inference that it is present" here for purposes of suit, the binding force of the service of process upon the petitioner is not open to question. The provisions of section 24 of the California Use Tax Act were strictly followed by the personal service of summons and a copy of the complaint upon each of three of the petitioner's resident agents, and a copy of the summons and complaint was sent by registered mail to the petitioner's home office in St. Paul, Minnesota.

For the foregoing reasons the alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued is discharged and the petition for a peremptory writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence L. Kincaid, Judge.

Henry Miller was convicted of robbery, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

George Stahlman and Harry Duckett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

[1] We accept as a proper statement of the one problem presented by this appeal that which is expressed in defendant-appellant Miller's closing brief in these words: "The only question in this case as appellant sees it, is the question as to the sufficiency of the corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice Jacoby." The answer which we are giving to this question is that the corroboration is sufficient, amply so.

The appellant was charged with having committed the crime of robbery. The evidence that a robbery took place in which some $70,000 worth of furs were stolen, is complete and from witnesses who were not accomplices. According to their account one Jacoby was an active participant in the actual holdup. Jacoby testified that appellant's connection with the crime was that of the master mind, the one who planned the affair and took charge of the booty after his plans had been successfully carried out. According to appellant's own testimony he had known Jacoby some time before the robbery, having already received and sold a batch of stolen furs delivered to him by Jacoby. The defendant further testified before the jury which convicted him that some ten days before the event took place Jacoby told him to expect some more furs, and according to schedule the furs were delivered and by Jacoby and the appellant taken up to an unfurnished room which the appellant had rented before the robbery but after he had been told more furs were to be expected. Some of the furs were found in this room, others at another location to which the appellant directed the police, after first denying that he knew where any more could be located.

After his arrest appellant made a statement to an officer, in which, according to the officer and according to the appellant, he answered that he recalled September 25th, the date of the Gailland-Cohen robbery, the one of which he was found guilty; that he had no personal knowledge "as to who might have perpetrated it"; but that a few days before it was perpetrated he knew that it was going to be; that he had talked it over with Jacoby and another, who wanted to know if he (Miller) would be ready for them. "Were they to be paid for the furs taken?" "Yes." "How much?" "$5,000.00." There are further questions and answers from which it could be inferred that appellant did not know that the robbery which was to take place was this particular one, but appellant's statements also warranted the inference which the jury may well have drawn, that the appellant was getting ready to receive the spoils from a robbery of whose identity and size he was well aware, as Jacoby had witnessed.

[2-6] This evidence furnishes ample corroboration for Jacoby's testimony. "The law does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative testimony is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded on the testimony of an accomplice. Even though circumstantial and slight, the evidence is, nevertheless, sufficient if it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense. People v. Martin, 19 Cal.App. 295, 125 P. 919. The defendant's own statements and admissions, made in connection with other testimony, may afford corroboratory proof sufficient to sustain a verdict. People v. Armstrong, 114 Cal. 570, 46 P. 611; People v. Sullivan, 144 Cal. 471, 473, 77 P. 1000. It is not necessary that the corroborating evidence should go so far as to establish by itself, and without the aid of the testimony of an accomplice, that the defendant committed the offense charged. People v. Solomon, 6 Cal.Unrep. 305, 58 P. 55. It is not necessary to cite the great number of authorities which sustain these fundamental principles of law relating to the testimony of an accomplice." People v. Negra, 1929, 208 Cal. 64, 69, 70, 280 P. 354, 356, 357. The "unexplained" possession of stolen goods soon after a theft, burglary or robbery has many times been held to be sufficient corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, and it is evident from the fact that in each of the following cases the defendant gave an explanation that by "unexplained" is meant the absence of an explanation sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt. People v. Haughey, 1926, 79 Cal.App. 541, 543, 250 P. 406, 407; People v. Melson, 1927, 84 Cal.App. 10, 16, 257 P. 555, 557. The principle applicable is also stated more generally as in this quotation from People v. Rice, 1938, 29 Cal.App.2d 614, 620, 85 P.2d 215, 218: "It is well established that possession of stolen property may be sufficient corroboration to warrant a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice" (citing cases).

The judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial, from which the defendant appealed, are affirmed.

[1] No opinion filed.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

This is one of a group of three actions brought by the plaintiff, the divorced wife of Joseph H. Plante, now deceased, against her successor as the consort of Mr. Plante. In such actions plaintiff has sought respectively, (1) to control disposition of the remains of Mr. Plante, on the theory that his divorce from her was void and that she, and not defendant Pearl A. Plante whom he subsequently married, is the lawful widow; (2) to set aside or to prevent probate of Mr. Plante's last will, on the theory that in executing it he acted under the duress and undue influence of defendant Pearl A. Plante; (3) for declaratory relief and specific performance, according to plaintiff's construction, of a contract executed by plaintiff and Mr. Plante at a time when they were living apart, but previous to their divorce. In the (this) action to control disposition of the decedent's remains the Forest Lawn Memorial Park Association is also made a party defendant and in the suit for declaratory relief and specific performance the special administrator of Mr. Plante's estate is joined as a defendant. The three actions were consolidated for trial and in all three judgment was rendered for defendants. It is conceded that there was a total failure of proof of any undue influence in the will contest phase of this litigation and no appeal is prosecuted in that respect, but in the suits seeking control of Mr. Plante's remains and specific performance of the property settlement contract according to plaintiff's interpretation of it, appeals are taken severally but on a single reporter's transcript. We are filing a separate opinion in each appeal but we do not repeat in the opinion in the specific performance case the facts which are set out here, which are brought up in the one transcript, and which are common to all the litigation instituted by plaintiff against the defendant Pearl A. Plante.

The material facts are that plaintiff and Joseph H. Plante intermarried in the year 1904, at San Francisco, California. They moved to Los Angeles in 1925 and in 1933 they separated and entered into the property settlement agreement which is the subject of plaintiff's action for declaration of rights and specific performance. They resumed matrimonial cohabitation for a period but in 1938 again separated and on or about October 9, 1939, Mr. Plante left California and took up his abode at Las Vegas, Nevada. There, on November 22, 1939, he filed suit for divorce and on December 28, 1939, he was awarded a decree from plaintiff on the ground of extreme cruelty. Later, on the same day, he and defendant Pearl A. Plante intermarried at Kingman, Arizona. They came to Los Angeles on January 1, 1940, and from that date until Mr. Plante's death on April 19, 1940, resided in a house in Los Angeles owned by the defendant wife. There was testimony showing that they had intended to sojourn but briefly in California and then proceed to Indianapolis, Indiana, where defendant wife owned other property and had maintained her domicile for many years. Their plans in this regard apparently were cut short by Mr. Plante's death.

Section 7100 of the Health and Safety Code, St.1939, p. 673, provides that "The right to control the disposition of the remains of a deceased person, unless other directions have been given by the decedent, vests in * * * the following in the order named: (a) The surviving spouse. * * *" It thus appears that this action for control of the remains of Mr. Plante provides a medium by which plaintiff seeks to have it decreed that Mr. Plante's Nevada divorce was void, that his marriage to defendant Pearl A. Plante was likewise void, and that she, the plaintiff, is the surviving spouse, with such burdens and rights as may be incident to such relationship.

The gravamen of plaintiff's charge in her complaint and of her argument upon this appeal is that Mr. Plante's residence in Nevada was but simulated and hence that the Nevada court had no jurisdiction over his matrimonial status. Plaintiff specifically alleged, "That in his verified complaint for divorce above-mentioned, Joseph H. Plante, deceased, alleges that for more than six weeks last past, immediately preceding the filing of this action for divorce, that he had been a bona fide resident of the County of Clark, State of Nevada, and had continuously resided and been physically present and domiciled during all of said period in said County of Clark. * * *" and also "that the said Joseph H. Plante, deceased, was seen by her [plaintiff] in the City of Los Angeles, State of California, upon three different and separate occasions, during the alleged six week residence in the State of Nevada; that the sole and only purpose for which he went to Nevada to procure a divorce was to circumvent and avoid the laws of the State of California; that said alleged residence in Nevada was never intended to be a bona fide residence." The answer of the defendant wife, for want of information and belief denied plaintiff's allegations relative to seeing Mr. Plante in California during the period alleged and upon the same ground denied that his purpose was to circumvent or avoid the laws of California and that his residence in Nevada was not bona fide. Among the findings of fact made by the trial court are the following:

"2. It is true that during the month of October, 1939, the said Joseph H. Plante, deceased, left the City of Los Angeles, California, and established his residence in Las Vegas, Nevada. It is not true that the said Joseph H. Plante, deceased, could not get a divorce from the plaintiff in California. * * *

"4. It is true that in said verified complaint for divorce the said Joseph H. Plante, deceased, alleged that for more than six (6) weeks last past immediately preceding the filing of his said action for divorce against the plaintiff Mary Elizabeth Plante, he had been a bona fide resident of the County of Clark, State of Nevada, and had continuously resided and had been physically present and domiciled during all of said period in said County of Clark. * * * It is true that the said decedent, Joseph A. Plante, did for more than six (6) weeks immediately preceding the filing of said divorce action against the plaintiff, Mary Elizabeth Plante, was a bona fide resident of the County of Clark, State of Nevada, and did continuously reside and was physically present and domiciled during all of said period in the County of Clark, State of Nevada.

"3. It is not true that the said Joseph H. Plante, deceased, was seen by the plaintiff in the City of Los Angeles, State of California, upon three (3) different occasions, or at any occasion, during the six (6) weeks' residence of said Joseph H. Plante, the deceased, in the State of Nevada. It is not true that the sole and only purpose for which the deceased, Joseph H. Plante, went to Nevada was to procure said divorce or to circumvent and/or avoid the laws of the State of California. It is not true that said alleged residence of Nevada was never intended to be a bona fide residence."

The fundamental question necessary for us to determine on this appeal is: Does the evidence support the foregoing quoted findings of fact? We are satisfied that it does.

Plaintiff, in her argument that the evidence fails to support the trial court's finding, places great emphasis upon the statements contained in Mr. Plante's "Affidavit for Marriage License," which was a form filled out by him or under his direction in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Mohave County, Arizona, on December 28, 1939, following the rendition of the divorce decree earlier that day in Clark County, Nevada. The affidavit, in material part, is as follows: "Joseph H. Plante, being first duly sworn upon his oath, does declare, depose and certify: That Joseph H. is his true (First name in full) name; that his age is 66 years ; that (Last Birthday)
he is a resident of Los Angeles, Los Angeles, (Town, County and California that he is of the Caucasian
State) (Caucasian, race; and that he Mongolian, Negro, or Indians) is not related Pearl A. Cook and that he (Name of female) has not been divorced by an Arizona court within the past year."

The reporter's transcript of Mr. Plante's testimony given earlier the same day in the Nevada court shows the following:

"Q. Where do you live, Mr. De La Plant? [The name De La Plant was apparently used interchangeably with Plante.] A. On Second Street in Las Vegas.

"Q. How long have you been a resident of Las Vegas, Clark County, Nevada? A. Since October, 1939.

"Q. What date? A. The 11th.

"Q. Have you been present in the City of Las Vegas, Clark County, Nevada every day from and including October 11th of this year to and including November 22nd of this year? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When you came here, did you come with the intention of making Clark County, Nevada your permanent place of residence? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you retained that intention ever since? A. Yes.

"Q. And you have it now? A. Yes."

[1, 2] The statements above quoted from the affidavit submitted by Mr. Plante in applying for his marriage license, which seemingly are inconsistent with his divorce suit testimony, likewise above quoted, coupled with the fact that his place of residence in Las Vegas was a rooming house and that he did not engage in business in that city or, so far as appears, make arrangements to stay there permanently, considered with his personal movements before, during, and after his stay in Nevada, obviously would have supported a finding that his residence there was not bona fide. But the trial court has found to the contrary and such finding is entitled to our support if it has evidentiary support. We are satisfied that it does.

[3] Before going to Nevada Mr. Plante had been living apart from plaintiff because her treatment of him made cohabitation intolerable. That Mr. Plante was the innocent party and that plaintiff here was the offending spouse was amply established. These facts justified Mr. Plante in acquiring a new domicile and constituted, in law, a consent by plaintiff to have her interest in the marriage status determined in the state where her non-offending spouse was domiciled. (Delanoy v. Delanoy, (1932) 216 Cal. 27, 38, 13 P.2d 719, 86 A.L.R. 1321.) It was established by overwhelming testimony that Mr. Plante was continuously present in Nevada from October 9 or 11 until November 25, 1939, and that plaintiff's assertion that she had seen him in Los Angeles on three occasions during that period was not true. The fact, commented on in plaintiff's brief, that Mr. Plante lived in a rooming house in Las Vegas loses its significance when it is observed that the evidence also shows that Mr. Plante lived in a rooming house in Los Angeles before he went to Las Vegas. Also the fact that he did not engage in business in Nevada is of little importance in view of the further fact that he was not engaged in business in any other state. The assertion is also made in plaintiff's brief that Mr. Plante went to Las Vegas as a "sojourner * * * for a mere forty-five (45) days, the time required to get his divorce started, and without any intention of making Nevada his permanent and fixed home, but only intent upon getting a quick divorce in order to marry again." But the fact is that upon the evidence Mr. Plante had not proposed marriage to defendant Pearl A. Plante at the time he went to Nevada and did not propose to her until subsequent to the establishment of his residence there.

Upon the evidence it is reasonable to infer that the trial court concluded that Mr. Plante told the truth when he testified in the Nevada court as to his intentions with respect to residence. The woman he subsequently married (defendant Pearl A. Plante) was a resident of Indianapolis, Indiana; she owned property there and also in Los Angeles, California; she made a practice of sojourning for a part of each year in California but she maintained her domicile in Indiana. Mr. Plante had an interest in real property in Los Angeles. It was not unnatural or necessarily inconsistent with domicile in Nevada for him to visit the situs of his property between December 3 and December 26, 1939. Likewise, when on December 28, 1939, he found himself to be a bridegroom, it was not unnatural that he should accompany his bride to her periodic dwelling house in Los Angeles, intending also to accompany her a few months later to her place of permanent domicile in Indianapolis. His intentions with respect to making Nevada a place of residence for himself may well have been altered after his marriage.

[4] The statement as to residence in the affidavit for marriage license may or may not have been true. Mr. Plante before going to Nevada had been a resident of California for many years. Perhaps the trial court concluded that Mr. Plante, on December 28, 1939, was an excited and somewhat confused prospective bridegroom, and that he inadvertently filled in the name of the place of his former, instead of that of his present, residence. Mr. Plante could not be present at the trial in this case to defend the woman whom he wed on December 28, 1939, and who apparently gave him the happiness during the latter months of his life which he had been denied previously, but from all the evidence in the record it is reasonable to believe that the trial court concluded that Mr. Plante was confused and mistaken when he gave Los Angeles as his residence in the affidavit for marriage license. Upon that record, and the facts as found by the court, it would seem that either Las Vegas, Nevada, or Indianapolis, Indiana, would have been a more consistent answer to the form question. But questions of consistency and weight of evidence were primarily for the trial court.

The statements in the marriage license application certainly do not preclude the finding which the trial court made.

[5, 6] It is to be remembered that the Nevada decree, which is regular on its face, is entitled to a presumption of validity (Delanoy v. Delanoy, supra, (1932) 216 Cal. 27, 37, 13 P.2d 719, 86 A.L.R. 1321; Cardinale v. Cardinale, (1937) 8 Cal.2d 762, 767, 68 P.2d 351). It is also not without significance that the plaintiff here was personally served in California with the summons and copy of complaint from the Nevada Court. She knew of the action Mr. Plante was taking; she made no contest to the proceedings; she had in fact informally consented to or approved of his obtaining a divorce. A letter written by her to Mr. Plante reads in part: "Harry, Got your letter, am glad you are away as I am happy without you bot*e*ring me and interfering with the property get your divorce will not contest if you get incom*p*tability and don't try to bring lot of scandal. * * *" The evidence shows that after the property settlement agreement was executed in 1933, by which plaintiff was given the primary right to manage the operation of income property belonging in part to her and in part to Mr. Plante (the interest of each being separate property) she deliberately mismanaged such property and withheld from Mr. Plante income belonging to him. The trial court, in this equitable suit, had a right to consider that all of the facts shown, taken together, tended to negative fraud and establish bona fides on the part of Mr. Plante.

[7] It is held in this state that "a foreign divorce decree is subject to collateral attack upon three recognized jurisdictional grounds, i. e., (1) that it was procured upon a fraudulent domicile or residence; (2) that the laws of the state granting the decree were not complied with, and (3) that the spouse, who was domiciled in the foreign state, which was not the matrimonial domicile, and who procured the divorce, was the wrongdoer, whereas the other spouse, a citizen of this state, who was neither personally served nor appeared in the foreign action, was the innocent party. If any one of these jurisdictional defects is established as a matter of fact, the foreign decree will not be recognized as valid in this state. However, the foreign decree, regular on its face, is entitled to a presumption of validity, and the burden is upon the party attacking it." (Cardinale v. Cardinale, supra, (1937) 8 Cal.2d 762, 766, 68 P.2d 351, 353.) Plaintiff here does not claim that she established either of the last two grounds. As to the first the preceding discussion and resume of evidence make apparent our view that the finding of the trial court is not without legal support.

The judgment is affirmed.

PLANTE v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N et al.

Civ. 13501.

District Court of Appeal; Second District, Division 3, California.

Sept. 3, 1942.

1. Husband and wife ⇨279(1)

The court could not permit equitable considerations or possible apparent injustice to the widow of deceased to influence it to write into property settlement agreement entered into between deceased and former wife, provisions which are not there or to delete any which the parties placed there.

2. Husband and wife ⇨279(1)

A settlement agreement vesting in the parties an undivided one-half interest in the property of either or both, and providing that in event of the death of either, deceased's right in the property should vest in the survivor, and that parties agreed to keep in force a will containing necessary provisions to carry out the separation agreement, when considered with other instruments contemporaneously executed, showed that parties intended that survivor should be entitled to succeed to the ownership of whatever interest of deceased in what had been their community property, as was possessed by deceased at deceased's death.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1176(3)

Where there was substantial evidence in suit for specific performance of settlement agreement of husband and wife that wife violated the terms of the agreement on various occasions, and also evidence that after execution of the agreement but prior to procurement of decree of divorce, husband and wife became reconciled and resumed cohabitation, District Court of Appeal in reversing a judgment adverse to the wife, would not direct judgment for the wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Mary Elizabeth Plante against the Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association, and Pearl A. Plante, also known as Pearl Abbott, for a declaratory judgment construing a property settlement agreement and for specific performance of the agreement according to plaintiff's interpretation of it. From a judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Ernest P. Morgan, of Los Angeles, V. A. Morgan, of Alhambra, and H. M. Lineman and Mab Copland Lineman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. H. Phillips, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

This appeal is taken upon the same reporter's transcript as that filed in Plante v. Plante, opinion in which has been this day filed and which is reported in 128 P.2d at page 787. Reference is made to that opinion for the facts showing the relationship of the parties and the basis of this litigation generally. In this case the appeal is taken from a judgment for defendants declaring a construction adverse to plaintiff of the property settlement agreement executed by plaintiff and her former husband, Joseph H. Plante, now deceased, and denying to plaintiff specific performance of the agreement according to her interpretation of it.

The agreement was executed May 12, 1933, by plaintiff and her then husband while they were living separate and apart. It provides, in part, as follows: "1. That all property of any kind or description now owned and possessed by the parties hereto, or either of them, is community property, and it is agreed that concurrently with the execution of this agreement the title thereto shall, by proper conveyance, be vested in the parties as their sole and separate property, respectively, each to receive and have an undivided one-half interest therein, except as is herein otherwise specifically provided.

"2. That First Party shall relinquish to Second Party all management and control over the community property herein set out as follows, to-wit:

"18-Unit Bungalow Court at 650-686 Echo Park Avenue, Los Angeles, California.

"2-Unit Property, located at 632 Echo Park Avenue, Los Angeles, California.

"4-Flat Building, located at 656-658 LaVita Terrace, Los Angeles, California.

"* * * Second Party shall manage said property to the best of her ability and with due regard to the careful and prudent control and direction thereof, and shall receive therefor the sum of Fifty Dollars ($50.00) per month. * * *

"4. That the income derived from said property shall be disbursed as follows, in the order herein set forth, to-wit:

"(a) A competent bookkeeper approved by both parties shall be employed, whose salary shall be paid therefrom.

"(b) Maintenance and other incidental upkeep necessary for the proper preservation and management of said property.

"(c) The sum of Fifty Dollars ($50.00) per month as salary to Second Party, or her successor, as aforesaid.

"(d) The sum of Seventy-five Dollars ($75.00) per month to First Party for his maintenance and support to be deposited to his credit in such place in Los Angeles as he may direct, said sum to be paid to First Party so long as he lives, or until said property is sold, or until such time as by mutual consent this Agreement is terminated.

"(e) The necessary premiums to keep in force that certain Life Insurance Policy now carried by First Party upon the life of his father. In this connection it is agreed that all sums derived from said insurance policy shall be deemed to be the community property of the parties hereto and shall be disposed of and distributed in like manner as is herein provided for disbursement of proceeds from the sale of real property.

"(f) Sinking fund necessary to pay all interest charges, taxes or assessments against said property in a total sum of not less than an average of not less than Three Hundred Forty-one Dollars ($341.00) per month, provided such sum is available over and above the foregoing items.

"(g) The sum of Seventy-five Dollars ($75.00) per month to Second Party for her maintenance and support. If sufficient funds are not available for payment of this amount, then second party shall be credited with the difference between the amount actually received and the sum of Seventy-Five Dollars ($75.00) per month, the difference to be paid when sufficient funds are available, and in any event to be ultimately paid from the proceeds of the sale of said property.

"(h) The remaining income, if any, to be divided equally between the parties hereto. * * *

"7. It is agreed that in the event of the sale of any or all of the said real property above mentioned is herein contemplated, that then and in that event, the proceeds of said sale shall be disbursed and distributed as follows, and in the order herein named, to-wit:

"(a) All expenses of sale shall be first paid.

"(b) All deficits or sums due or owing to either of the parties under this agreement.

"(c) The sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00) to William R. Marshall, brother of the Second Party, now due and owing to him on account of money loaned, and the sum of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000.00) to Matilda Horne, foster sister of the Second Party, now due and owing to her on account of money loaned.

"(d) All remaining sums to be divided equally between the parties hereto.

"8. It is hereby mutually agreed that in the event of the death of either party hereto, all of his or her right, title or interest in or to all of the community property of the parties shall vest in the survivor. In the event First Party survives Second Party, there shall be paid as soon as possible after the death of Second Party, the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00) in cash to William R. Marshall, the brother of the Second Party, and in the event Second Party should survive First Party, then she shall and hereby agrees to pay such sums as may be necessary for the maintenance, support and care of Moise Plante, father of First Party, during his lifetime. In order to make effective the provisions of this Agreement in this paragraph set forth, the parties and each of them agree to and shall make and keep in force and effect, a last Will and Testament, containing the necessary provisions to carry out the purpose hereof.

"9. First Party hereby agrees to quitclaim all of his right, title and interest in that certain real property situated at San Fernando, County of Los Angeles, State of California, now held in the name of the Second Party, to the Second Party, and the same shall become the sole and separate property of Second Party. * * *

"10. * * * nothing contained herein shall prejudice the rights of either party to proceed with an action for absolute divorce in the future. * * *

"13. Second party hereby transfers and assigns to First Party all of her interest in that certain automobile now possessed by the parties hereto. * * *

"14. This Agreement is complete in itself and embodies all agreements and understanding between the parties. * * *"

Apparently acting upon their understanding of the import of the agreement plaintiff and Mr. Plante contemporaneously with execution of the agreement executed deeds by which each quitclaimed to the other an undivided one-half interest in the real property described in paragraph 2 of the agreement. Such deeds contain the following clause: "This deed is given to carry out the mutual agreement of the parties hereto, that said property shall become vested in the Grantee as the grantee's sole and separate property, free from all interest, title or claim of the grantor now existing or which may hereafter exist by reason of the marital relation of said parties; and is so accepted by said grantee." There was furniture and furnishings in the buildings on the deeded premises but no bill of sale or separate conveyance thereof was made.

Likewise each of the parties to the settlement contract, under date of May 15, 1933, executed a will. The substance of plaintiff's will of that date is, "I give and beque*st* all my belongings & Real Estate I may possess to my husband Joseph H. Plante, except five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) out of my estate which I give to my brother William R. Marshall. * * *" The substance of Mr. Plante's will of the same date is, "I give and beque*st* all my belongings to my wife Mary Elizabeth Plante, except $5,000.00 Five Thousand Dollars I give to William Marshall my brother-in-law * * *, also request my wife to give my father Moise Plante, if living, a fair sum of money * * * for his living expenses * * *."

Mr. Plante secured a divorce from plaintiff in 1939 and married the defendant Pearl A. Plante. He thereafter executed a will bequeathing all of his property to his wife Pearl, the defendant herein, and such will, over plaintiff's contest, has been admitted to probate. Plaintiff, however, through the medium of this action, seeks to have it declared that by virtue of the provisions of paragraph 8 of the property settlement contract above quoted she is entitled to succeed to all the estate of the decedent and to have the contract, as so construed, specifically enforced against the surviving spouse and the special administrator.

The trial court found that the provisions of paragraph 8 were applicable only to community property of plaintiff and Mr. Plante held to be possessed by them in community interest at the time of his death. It held that the real estate which had been the subject of the quitclaim deeds not only became the separate property of the parties in undivided one-half interests as provided in the deeds, but that it was not within the category of property intended to be subject to the obligations imposed by the paragraph under discussion (No. 8). It found that only the furniture and furnishings in the buildings on the premises, so far as still owned by plaintiff and decedent, were community property of such parties and were subject to the operation of the paragraph noted. We do not find the above-mentioned holdings tenable.

[1, 2] The reasons for our conclusions become apparent upon a closer scrutiny of the material provisions of the property settlement contract. Paragraph 8 of that agreement provides the principal basis for this law suit. It is upon that paragraph that plaintiff chiefly relies for enunciation and evidence of the obligation which she says bound Mr. Plante to leave all of his property to her and which she seeks here to impose upon his estate and against his personal representative and surviving spouse. In construing the contract we cannot permit equitable considerations or possible apparent injustice to the defendant widow to cause us to write into the agreement provisions which are not there or to delete any which the parties placed there. We find that the language used in that paragraph, when considered in connection with the remainder of the document, the other instruments contemporaneously executed, and the circumstances of the parties, leaves no doubt that plaintiff and Mr. Plante intended that the survivor of them should be entitled to succeed to ownership of whatever interest of the decedent, in that which had been their community property, was retained and possessed by him or her at the time of death.

They approached their property settlement contract as marriage partners who had found at least some of the incidents and elements of that relationship intolerable. They had been man and wife for about twenty-five years but were living separate and apart; one of them had on file an action seeking a divorce from the other; they had accumulated at least three parcels of income-producing property of substantial value but they also were faced with substantial obligations respecting the same and they had had difficulties regarding the management of such property. The plaintiff here was desirous of securing the payment of certain sums to her brother and to her foster sister and Mr. Plante was concerned that his father be supported. They started their effort for contractual adjustment with the declaration of the basis that all of the property possessed by them or either of them was held in community tenure. Their first concern, as expressed in paragraph 1 of their contract, was to entirely eliminate the community character of such tenure and make their respective interests sole and separate.

There has been some discussion in the briefs as to the meaning of the exception stated in the last clause of the paragraph above mentioned, the appellant contending, in effect, that such clause modifies the words "sole and separate property" and that the import of the paragraph is that the community property interests of the parties were to become separate interests "except as is herein otherwise specifically provided."

In our opinion the provision "except as is herein otherwise specifically provided" plainly modifies the phrase "each to receive and have an undivided one-half interest." Obviously the purport of paragraph 1 is a declaration that all property then possessed by the contracting parties or either of them was, for purposes of the settlement, to be deemed community in character; that the title to all such property was to be so conveyed and vested by appropriate instruments that there would no longer be any community estate but on the contrary each party would hold his or her interest, as stated in the quitclaim deeds, "as the grantee's sole and separate property, free from all interest, title or claim of the grantor now existing or which may hereafter exist by reason of the marital relation of said parties"; that in making such adjustment and disposition of all the property of the parties the titles would be so conveyed and vested that each party would "receive and have an undivided one-half interest" in each parcel or item of property "except as is herein otherwise specifically provided." Two exceptions are specifically provided for in the agreement; i.e., a certain parcel of land in San Fernando and an automobile. Paragraph 9 obligates Mr. Plante to quitclaim "all of his right, title and interest in that certain real property situated at San Fernando * * * now held in the name of Second Party, to the Second Party, and the same shall become the sole and separate property of Second Party," and in Paragraph 13 it is provided that "Second Party hereby transfers and assigns to First Party all of her interest in that certain automobile now possessed by the parties hereto. * * *" With those two exceptions the contract plainly contemplates that the parties shall become tenants in common (or joint tenants) of all other property, both real and personal, then possessed by them or either of them. It might seem that the creation of joint tenancies with the right of survivorship would have been more convenient and expedient to the ends sought by the contract but the fact that tenancies in common were created by the deeds which were executed does not alter the meaning of the language used in the disputed paragraph.

The contract obviously was drawn while the property of the parties was community in character. It was contemplated that on execution of that contract, together also with the deeds therein called for, the property interests of the parties should become separate, but until the execution of such documents all the property possessed by the parties, or either of them, was their community property and obviously it was known to and identified by them as their community property throughout the pages of their contract. They knew what property they referred to as community property in paragraph 1 of that contract; they particularly identified certain of that same community property in paragraph 2; the same property was referred to in paragraphs 4 and 7, and we have no doubt that likewise it was the same property which they were contemplating in paragraph 8. We do not in fact view the language of that paragraph as being inconsistent with the transition of tenure called for by paragraph 1. Paragraph 1 provides that the community property shall be so conveyed that its title shall be held (with the two exceptions previously noted) in separate but undivided one-half interests. Paragraph 8 (which of course became a part of the parties' contract at the same instant as did paragraph 1) has reference to that same community property but specifically deals with the separate interests in that property which were created by the transition contemplated. Paragraph 8 does not state that the community interest of a party in any property shall vest in the survivor; it does declare that "in the event of the death of either party * * *, all of his or her right, title or interest in or to all of the community property of the parties shall vest in the survivor." It is our opinion that the words "community property of the parties" are used in that sentence to designate exactly the same property which is declared in paragraph 1 to be community property and that the phrase "all of his or her right, title or interest" was used to designate the interest in such property which would be acquired by the respective parties by operation of the contract and upon execution of the deeds pursuant to its provisions. The execution by the parties of the wills of May 15, 1933, is consistent with the view above expressed.

[3] Appellant asks that we direct the trial court to enter judgment in her favor. There is substantial evidence tending to show that plaintiff violated the terms of the settlement contract on various occasions and in grave respects. There is also evidence that subsequent to execution of the agreement but prior to procurement of the decree of divorce, plaintiff and Mr. Plante became reconciled and resumed cohabitation for a period. Whether the contract was abrogated when the parties became reconciled and resumed cohabitation (see 13 Cal.Jur. 848; Peters v. Peters, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 383, 387, 60 P.2d 313) and, if not, whether in equity plaintiff may or may not be entitled to specific performance in the light of all the evidence which may be adduced on another trial we cannot now determine. Although the construction which we place upon paragraph 8 of the contract necessitates a reversal of the judgment we find the record to be such as does not warrant a directed judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

On motion for new trial, the trial court has a discretion which will not be disturbed, except on a manifest and unmistakable abuse.

6. New trial ⇨99

Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying motion for new trial on ground of "newly discovered evidence", where there was no showing that witness who would allegedly testify to the newly discovered evidence would testify as desired, and the whereabouts of that witness were not known. Code Civ.Proc. § 657.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Irene E. Moran against Arthur R. Moran, wherein the defendant filed a cross complaint seeking to have the marriage of the parties annulled. From a judgment granting the plaintiff a divorce, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Johnson & Curtright, of Sacramento, for appellant.

McAllister & Johnson, of Sacramento, for respondent.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment granting plaintiff an interlocutory decree of divorce. The record discloses the following situation:

On September 16, 1938, respondent filed an action for divorce from appellant on the ground of extreme cruelty, and alleged that she was married to appellant in Sacramento on February 11, 1918. Appellant filed an answer admitting the marriage. The action was tried on February 23, 1939, at which time respondent offered evidence duly corroborated in support of her complaint. Appellant offered no evidence and the court granted respondent an interlocutory decree of divorce on March 3, 1939. On July 17, 1939, appellant moved the court for an order vacating and setting aside said interlocutory decree of divorce, and for leave to file a cross-complaint, raising the issue that the plaintiff at the time of marriage to defendant, was the wife of Paul R. Hendricks (then living), and praying for an annulment of the marriage. This motion was granted and the cross-complaint filed. Plaintiff filed an answer thereto, and the action was again tried on the new issues and submitted on August 30, 1939. On September 8, 1939, the trial court, on its own motion, made an order setting aside its former order which had vacated the original interlocutory decree entered on March 3, 1939, and granted defendant leave to file a cross-complaint. This latter order was held by this court to be without jurisdiction (Moran v. Superior Court, 35 Cal.App.2d 629, 96 P.2d 193) and was annulled. On March 1, 1940, the court signed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the same date entered a second interlocutory decree granting plaintiff a divorce. On March 4, 1940, appellant filed notice of intention to move for a new trial on the statutory grounds set forth in subdivisions 4, 6, and 7 of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supported by an affidavit of P. H. Johnson, attorney for defendant. Defendant also served notice of intention to move the court for an order for the issuance of a commission to take the deposition of Paul R. Hendricks. This notice was dated February 28, 1940, and time fixed for hearing said motion was March 11, 1940. The motion was duly heard at that time and was denied by the court. On petition to this court a writ of mandamus was issued ordering the court to issue the commission to take the testimony prayed for. Moran v. Superior Court, 38 Cal.App.2d 328, 100 P.2d 1096. On April 2, 1940, a motion was made for a new trial on the grounds set forth above. At this hearing evidence was taken, and on May 3, 1940, the motion was denied. An appeal was taken from the judgment, and the record, including the proceedings on the motion and order denying a new trial, is before the court on a bill of exceptions.

This court is required to consider on this appeal the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, and also whether or not the trial court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The only evidence taken at the trial on which the interlocutory decree is based bearing on the point in issue as to the validity of the second marriage, is as follows: Plaintiff's testimony that she married defendant February 11, 1918, at Sacramento; that she had been married before to Paul R. Hendricks with whom she lived two weeks; that Paul Hendricks resided at Verona or Oakmont, Pennsylvania, when they were married; that she resided at Verona; that Paul Hendricks took her to Verona, Pennsylvania, and walked out and left her; that she did not procure a divorce from him, and that he did not secure a divorce to her knowledge; that he died in 1915, after she came out to California; that she learned of his death by a letter from his mother prior to her marriage to defendant; that she did not have the letter. In addition to this, the deposition of LeRoy C. Hendricks was introduced by defendant to the effect that he was the brother of Paul Hendricks, whose full name was Paul Raymond Hendricks; that his brother was born in Mifflinburg, Pennsylvania; that he had not seen his brother for five years and did not know whether he was dead or living; that he imagined he was living, because if he were dead, he probably would have heard of his death; that he knew he was married to Esther Carlysle between 30 and 35 years ago at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; that he could not say whether he was ever divorced; that he was a barber by trade, and that the last address he heard was Waukegan, Illinois.

On motion for a new trial additional evidence was adduced. The affidavit of attorney P. H. Johnson served with notice of motion, stated that Paul R. Hendricks, "who resides in Waukegan, Illinois," had knowledge of material facts as to whether or not he is the same person who was married to plaintiff, as to whether he had ever secured any divorce from her, or any decree of annulment; that the present address of said witness and the fact that he was still alive had been discovered since the trial and were unknown at the date of the trial and could not have been discovered in time to have produced him or his deposition at such trial, but that proceedings were pending to secure his deposition. Defendant also procured a certificate of the Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of Alleghany County, Pennsylvania, to the effect that the records of such court showed no annulment or divorce of Paul R. Hendricks and plaintiff between January 1, 1900, and April 17, 1940; the affidavit and certificate of L. J. Wilmot, Clerk of the Circuit Court of the County of Lake, State of Illinois, that the records of that court showed no record of a decree of divorce or annulment of Paul R. Hendricks and the plaintiff; the marriage certificate showing the marriage of Paul Hendricks and Essie I. Carlisle, of Verona, Pennsylvania, in July, 1912; a letter from W. A. Bright, Chief of Police of Verona, Pennsylvania, stating that his information was that Paul Hendricks was in the state of Ohio; and a letter from the Adjutant General of the War Department to the effect that that office was unable to identify positively a record of the service of Paul Hendricks, a man from Ohio or Pennsylvania in the first World War; that the military records showed that a Paul R. Hendricks was inducted into the service from Rockford, Illinois, giving his place of birth as Mifflinburg, Pennsylvania; that he had last communicated with that office from Rockford, Illinois, in 1924, and that at the time of his entrance into service he stated that he was single. Counsel for defendant also offered in evidence their file of correspondence engaged in in endeavors to locate Paul R. Hendricks, for the purpose of showing diligence. Other than the foregoing there was no evidence of the residence of Paul R. Hendricks or that he was still living or had been at the time of the marriage of plaintiff and defendant.

[1, 2] Under section 61 of the Civil Code, as the evidence shows that the plaintiff's former husband left her in 1912 and was not heard from until just before her marriage in 1918, when she heard from his mother that he was dead, this second marriage is valid until its nullity is adjudged by a competent tribunal. Estate of Harrington, 140 Cal. 244, 73 P. 1000, 98 Am. St.Rep. 51; Immel v. Dowd, 6 Cal.App.2d 145, 44 P.2d 373; Marsh v. Marsh, 79 Cal. App. 560, 250 P. 411. It is also held that mere proof of a prior marriage and continued life of both spouses is not sufficient to make a case against a second ceremonial marriage; there must be a showing that the first marriage was not set aside by judicial decree. Immel v. Dowd, supra.

[3-6] Insofar as the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the granting of the divorce is concerned, there can be no question. The only question is: Did the court err in refusing to grant a new trial? Prior to 1915, an appeal was allowed from an order refusing a new trial; since that time, the ruling thereon is reviewed on an appeal from the judgment. All presumptions are in favor of the order. Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 150 P. 769. The trial court has a discretion which will not be disturbed, except upon a manifest and unmistakable abuse. Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660. An examination of the so called newly discovered evidence upon which the motion was based shows that no one knew definitely where Hendricks was then located. The affidavit of P. H. Johnson stated that he was "informed as to the facts of the said matter." It made no direct or explicit assertion that said Hendricks resided in Waukegan, Illinois. It recited that "Paul R. Hendricks, who resided in Waukegan, Illinois" was a person competent to testify; and that his "whereabouts and present residence address" and the fact that he was alive had been discovered since the trial. The army records showed Paul R. Hendricks entered service from "Rockford, Illinois." The letter from W. R. Bright stated that Paul Hendricks was in the state of Ohio. There was no showing on the motion that Paul R. Hendricks, if produced, would testify that he was the Paul Hendricks who married plaintiff herein, or that the said marriage had never been dissolved. For all that appeared on the motion for a new trial defendant and his counsel knew no more about these matters then than they did at the time of the trial of the divorce action in August, 1939, or when defendant filed his cross-complaint in July, 1939. It may be noted that in said cross-complaint which was verified by the same counsel who made the affidavit on motion for a new trial it was alleged that plaintiff had another husband, to-wit: one Paul R. Hendricks, living at the time she married defendant herein and that the prior marriage was still in full force and effect, etc. This was not proven. Defendant asked for no continuance when the case came up for trial in August, 1939, but the case having gone against him, he now wants a new trial and states he has newly discovered evidence that will change the result. This so called "newly discovered evidence" shows that no one knows definitely where Paul R. Hendricks is now, or whether or not he ever was divorced from plaintiff. A trial must end some time. We can see no error in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 11728.

As Modified Sept. 11, 1942.

Hearing Granted Oct. 26, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑917(1)

In deciding correctness of ruling sustaining demurrer to complaint for libel and slander for statement of defendant's vice president that plaintiff "had admitted he had falsified his expense account", appellate court was required to assume that the word "falsified" meant an intentional falsification without intent to defraud and that the statement was in fact uttered.

> The word "falsify" may be defined as to tamper with, to alter; to make deceptive, endow with an appearance contrary to fact or truth. It is sometimes used to characterize a criminal act involving the perpetration of fraud. It is a word of double import in that it may be used to convey two distinct meanings, either that of being intentionally or knowingly untrue, made with intent to defraud, or mistakenly and accidentally untrue. To say that an employee has falsified an account may mean that such falsification was with intent to defraud or that the falsified statement of account was mistakenly and therefore honestly made, and, if the account did not set forth the truth, it would in fact be false.

> See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Falsify".

2. Libel and slander 🔑10(6)

Employer's statement, used with reference to Labor Board's decision ordering plaintiff's reinstatement, that plaintiff had admitted that he had falsified his expense account, was not "libelous per se" in view of its susceptibility to interpretation as an intentional falsification without intent to defraud.

> See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Libelous Per Se".

3. Pleading 🔑310

In action for libel and slander for statement used in reference to Labor Board decision ordering defendant to reinstate plaintiff, where copy of decision was attached to the amended complaint as an exhibit and as part thereof and complaint alleged that statement made was a comment upon the decision, the decision became a part of the amended complaint and could be considered in determining whether it stated a cause of action.

4. Libel and slander 🔑87

Complaint for libel and slander for statement that plaintiff had admitted he had falsified his expense account, allegedly used with reference to Labor Board decision requiring plaintiff's reinstatement by defendant, when considered with board's decision that plaintiff was not dishonest, the board making no finding that plaintiff had not filed a false expense claim, established the truth of the admission and truth of the alleged falsification so that demurrer to complaint was properly sustained.

5. Pleading 🔑310

Where complaint for libel and slander alleged the statement that plaintiff had admitted that he had falsified his expense account was used with reference to Labor Board's decision ordering plaintiff's reinstatement by defendant, and the board's decision was an exhibit to the complaint, truth of the admission of the alleged falsification was required to be determined from the language used in the exhibit.

6. Libel and slander 🔑55

It is sufficient if the gist of an alleged libelous charge is justified.

7. Libel and slander 🔑83

In action for libel and slander for statement that plaintiff had admitted that he had falsified his expense account used with reference to Labor Board's decision ordering plaintiff's reinstatement by defendant, allegation of malice could be considered in determining privilege, but was not to be considered if the complaint showed the truth of the alleged libelous statements, since allegations of malice will not avail the pleader if the character of the publication complained of is inconsistent with such allegations.

8. Libel and slander 🔑15, 34, 54

Under statute defining "libel" as a false and unprivileged publication, the publication must be both false and unprivileged to constitute actionable "libel" and allegation and proof that a publication is true in the sense intended or that it is privileged upon any of the statutory grounds constitute a defense which does not depend on truth of the charges, but a publication may be privileged although untrue, and proof of truth is a complete defense without proof of any other facts and without proving absence of actual malice. Civ.Code, § 45; § 47, subd. 3.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Libel".

9. Libel and slander ⚿87

Where complaint for libel and slander for alleged statement declaring impossibility of reinstating one "who had been guilty of flagrant insubordination", allegedly made concerning Labor Board's decision ordering plaintiff's reinstatement by defendant, disclosed such insubordination in plaintiff's refusal to accept directions to report to branch offices from those for whom plaintiff had contracted to work and disclosed that language used was justified by the facts, trial court properly sustained demurrer to the complaint.

10. Appeal and error ⚿195

Where action for libel and slander was filed after the effective date of statute providing that the question whether trial court abused its discretion in sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend would be open on appeal though no request to amend was made, question whether court abused its discretion in not granting leave to amend after sustaining demurrer to complaint was open on appeal. Code Civ.Proc. § 472c.

11. Libel and slander ⚿98

Where plaintiff did not suggest amendment to complaint for libel and slander after trial court had sustained demurrer thereto and it appeared impossible to amend, trial court did not abuse discretion in not granting leave to amend. Code Civ.Proc. § 472c.

PETERS, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas M. Foley, Judge.

Action by Edward C. Washer against Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association and others for libel and slander. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 123 P.2d 575.

William H. Mackay, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari, G. D. Schilling, and Kenneth M. Johnson, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants entered after an order sustaining their general and special demurrers to the second amended complaint without leave to amend. The sole question involved is the correctness of this ruling.

The complaint consists of two counts, the first for slander and the second for libel. The first cause of action is based upon the following oral statement alleged to have been made to several newspaper reporters by a vice-president and personnel director of the respondent bank in commenting upon a decision of the National Labor Relations Board which ordered the bank to reinstate plaintiff, he having been theretofore discharged according to the bank's answer before the board so set forth in the decision, on grounds including alleged insubordination and falsification of an expense account: "We cannot see how this institution could possibly reinstate anybody who had admitted he had falsified his expense account, who has been guilty of flagrant insubordination." The second cause of action is based upon the same statement allegedly given the press in written form, with the request that it be printed. Attached to the complaint, and by reference made a part thereof is the decision of the National Labor Relations Board. The relief sought is the payment to plaintiff of $125,000 as special damages, $100,000 as general damages and $250,000 as exemplary damages.

Appellant's statement of the question involved is whether the complaint shows certain alleged defamatory statements, uttered and published by respondents, to be false and unprivileged.

In support of the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrers to the second amended complaint, the respondents urge that the complaint, taken as a whole, and including the Labor Board's decision incorporated as part thereof, shows the truth of the alleged defamatory language, or at least its substantial truth, which is all that need be shown; that it was privileged, making falsity and malice immaterial, or, at least, it was qualifiedly privileged and that malice in fact has not been pleaded. Finally, respondents contend the existence of malice is negatived by the complaint itself when considered in connection with the National Labor Board's decision.

Turning to the language charged to be slanderous and libelous, the word "falsify" may be defined as "to tamper with, to alter" (Webster's New International Dictionary (2nd Ed.)); "to make deceptive, endow with an appearance contrary to fact or truth" (Funk & Wagnall's New Standard Dictionary). The word is sometimes used to characterize a criminal act involving the perpetration of fraud. It has been said that it is a word of double import (Moulor v. American Life Ins. Co., 111 U.S. 335, 4 S.Ct. 466, 28 L.Ed. 447) in that it may be used to convey two distinct meanings—either that of being intentionally or knowingly untrue, made with intent to defraud, or mistakenly and accidentally untrue. Fouts v. State, 113 Ohio St. 450, 149 N.E. 551; North American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Tebbs, 10 Cir., 107 F.2d 853. To say that an employee has falsified an account may mean that such falsification was with intent to defraud or that the falsified statement of account was mistakenly and therefore honestly made. If the account did not set forth the truth, it would in fact be false. The complaint read in conjunction with the exhibit demonstrates a third distinct meaning, namely, not an accidental but an intentional act of falsification, without, however, an intent to defraud.

[1, 2] It should be noted that the alleged slanderous and libelous language is not a direct accusation that plaintiff was guilty of falsification, but is a statement that an employee "had admitted he had falsified his expense account." Whatever definition may be given to the word "falsified" as used under other circumstances, in view of the fact that it was used in reference to the Labor Board's decision, we must assume for the purpose of this case, that it meant an intentional falsification without intent to defraud. The language does not in fact even indirectly make an accusation, but charges only the admission of a falsification. Under such circumstances, assuming the denial by answer of the alleged slanderous and libelous language, the primary issue to determine would not be actual, intentional falsification without intent to defraud, but whether plaintiff admitted such fact. Assuming, as we must on demurrer to the complaint, that a statement in the language alleged was in fact uttered, such language may not be construed as libelous per se in view of its susceptibility to an innocent interpretation.

[3] It is of course the contention of appellant that by charging an admission of falsification as one of the grounds for his discharge, defendant in effect charged the actual falsification of the expense account to the extent of being "guilty of the crime of embezzlement." A copy of the decision of the National Labor Relations Board, as we have seen, is attached to the amended complaint as an exhibit "and made a part hereof." That complaint alleged that the statement made was a comment upon the decision. The decision by its incorporation became a part of the amended complaint and may be considered in determining whether the complaint states a cause of action. Georges v. Kessler, 131 Cal. 183, 63 P. 466; 1 Bancroft on Code Pleading, § 218; People v. Reid, 195 Cal. 249, 232 P. 457, 36 A.L.R. 1435; Holly Sugar Corp. v Johnson, 18 Cal.2d 218, 115 P.2d 8; Bashford v. A. Levy & J. Zentner Co., 123 Cal. App. 204, 11 P.2d 51; National Pavements Corp. v. Hutchinson Co., 132 Cal.App. 235, 22 P.2d 534.

[4] In setting forth the issues to be passed upon, the National Labor Relations Board noted as one of the reasons assigned by the bank for the discharge of Washer "his making a false expense claim against the respondent." Thereafter the Board found that Washer was not dishonest, but noted "that the filing of a false expense claim was not assigned * * * as a reason for Washer's discharge." The Board found, as stated, that Washer was not dishonest, but did not find that he had not filed a false expense claim. The truth of the "admission," and the truth of the alleged "falsification" may be reasonably and definitely inferred (Gallagher v. California Pac. T. & T. Co., 13 Cal.App.2d 482, 57 P.2d 195) from the contents of the exhibit. "This is not a case where the plaintiff has pleaded too little, but where he has pleaded too much" and by pleading the exhibit has refuted his own allegations. Simmons v. Peavy-Welsh Lumber Co., 5 Cir., 113 F.2d 812, 813.

The National Labor Relations Board found that upon plaintiff's presenting to the bank, his employer, an expense account in the amount of $15.12, of which $6.12 was represented to be railroad fare and $9 meals and lodgings, he was requested to itemize it. Thereupon plaintiff wrote the bank that he was "writing off as a loss the $15.12 I considered nominal." The bank in reply wrote plaintiff that there was no complaint as to the "amount" involved and requested the return of the statement. A check for the $15.12 was then sent plaintiff, together with a new statement containing a purported itemization of the expenses, which plaintiff was requested to sign and return. Plaintiff then wrote his employer stating that his failure to itemize the expenses in the first instance was due to the fact that he had stayed with friends and as a result had not incurred a hotel bill; that, however, he had thus become obligated to his friends and had reciprocated by entertaining them. He returned the bank's check with the following communication: "* * * if after reading this letter you are convinced of the fairness of the account as rendered. * * * If you do not consider the accounting satisfactory you may forget the entire matter." The account was approved by the bank and the check returned to plaintiff.

[5] From the above recital of the facts as they appear in the decision of the Board, it may be reasonably and definitely determined that by his silence in the "first instance," plaintiff attempted to deceive the bank to the extent of setting forth "meals and lodgings" instead of "entertainment." In this action for slander and libel, the truth of the admission of the alleged falsification appears in plaintiff's pleadings and must be determined from the language used in the exhibit. Mortensen v. Los Angeles Examiner, 112 Cal.App. 194, 296 P. 927; Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 54 P. 389; Noral v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 40 Cal.App.2d 348, 104 P.2d 860; Western Broadcast Co. v. Times-Mirror Co., 14 Cal.App.2d 120, 57 P.2d 977; Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 P. 150, 499.

The statement alleged in the complaint as false is in fact true as appears in the exhibit.

In Chavez v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 20, 21, 195 P. 666, 667, the court said: "As the truth of the charge is a complete defense in a civil action for damages for libel, it is plain that, if the complaint itself shows the truth of the charge, the demurrer was properly sustained." "In determining whether the publication is libelous, resort is first had to the publication itself. If it is not libelous, the fact that it is unpleasant is of no moment, and the question of libel or no libel is primarily for the court to determine. If the publication is not libelous, neither inducement nor innuendo can make it so. * * * Again, if the article published is substantially true and is inaccurate only as to details which it relates, it is not libelous." Mortensen v. Los Angeles Examiner, supra, 112 Cal.App. 202, 203, 296 P. 931. In Newby v. Times-Mirror Co., 173 Cal. 387, 160 P. 233, Ann.Cas.1917E, 186, the complaint contained six counts. The appeal was from the judgment for defendant and from the order denying plaintiff a new trial. The judgment was reversed upon the theory that certain counts set forth libelous matter, but in reference to the first count, the facts—upon which there was no substantial conflict—were that the plaintiff, an attorney, had directed the judgment-book clerk in the county clerk's office to alter a public record. The commission of such an act is a felony. Penal Code, §§ 113, 114. Plaintiff in that case was "equally responsible therefor with said deputy." Pages 392, 393 of 173 Cal., page 236 of 160 P., Ann.Cas.1917E, 186. We quote further from the case (page 393 of 173 Cal., page 236 of 160 P., Ann.Cas.1917E, 186): "It was but an irregular method of effecting a righteous result. * * * The intent is immaterial. The act itself, without intent other than that of doing it, constitutes the offense, regardless of the object. * * * Therefore, although the plaintiff was guilty of no moral wrong or bad intent in the matter, it was technically true that he was accused of the commission of a felony. * * * In so far as the publications assert that the plaintiff was accused of the commission of a felony, confined as they all are to the act of crossing out the entry of satisfaction of the judgment * * * the defense of truth is established by the evidence, although the offense was entirely technical, was without moral guilt * * . The truth of this part of the matter complained of, however, does not establish a defense to the other libelous publications concerning plaintiff" " * * the truth, whenever discovered, is a complete defense to the defendant." Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 195, 116 P. 530, 552.

[6-8] It has been held that it is sufficient if the gist of the alleged libelous charge is justified. Heuer v. Kee, 15 Cal.App.2d 710, 59 P.2d 1063; Hearne v. De Young, supra; Skrocki v. Stahl, 14 Cal.App. 1, 110 P. 957. The complaint herein alleges: "Said statement was made by Fenton [an officer of the bank and a defendant in this action] with malice, for the purpose of injuring, disgracing and defaming plaintiff, and interfering with his ability to obtain employment. It was false and known by Fenton to be false at the time it was made and Fenton did not have probable cause or any cause for believing it to be true." In so far as the truth is concerned, this allegation does not strengthen appellant's position. The allegations of malice may be considered in determination of the question of privilege, but that phase of the complaint and the demurrer thereto need not be considered if the complaint upon its face shows the truth of the alleged libelous statement. "* * * allegations of malice will not avail the pleader, if the character of the publication complained of is inconsistent with such allegations." Morcom v. San Francisco Shopping News, 4 Cal.App. 2d 284, 290, 40 P.2d 940, 942. "Since a libel is 'a false and unprivileged publication' (section 45), it follows that the publication must be both false and unprivileged in order that it shall constitute an actionable libel. The allegation and proof that it is true in the sense intended constitute one defense. Allegations and proof that it was privileged upon any of the grounds set forth in section 47 also constitute a defense. The defense of privilege under subdivision 3 of section 47 does not depend at all on the truth of the defamatory charge. With respect to that form of qualified privilege the Code does not require that the publication shall be true in order to bring it within the protection of the privilege. The language of the Code clearly implies that the publication may be privileged, although it is untrue. To hold that it is necessary to allege and prove the truth of the charge in order to establish the defense that it was privileged under this subdivision would destroy the distinction between the defense of truth and the defense of privilege, and would render the defense of privilege entirely useless, since the proof that it was true would be a complete defense without proof of any other facts, and without proving the absence of actual malice." (Second italics added.) Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 574, 198 P. 1, 4; see, also, Maher v. Devlin, 203 Cal. 270, 263 P. 812; Draper v. Hellman Com. T. & S. Bank, 203 Cal. 26, 263 P. 240.

The second part of the alleged slanderous and libelous statement declares the impossibility of the bank reinstating one "who has been guilty of flagrant insubordination." It is alleged that the statement was made "in commenting upon a decision of the National Labor Relations Board." We turn therefore to the decision. It appears therefrom that it was the intention of the bank to give plaintiff experience in branch banking. After a consideration of various of its branches, that of Chico was finally decided upon. The decision sets forth the following: "Prior to that time Washer had refused (italics added) to be transferred to branches as he did not wish to live in a small town." "Washer protested and did not conceal his dislike for his transfer to Chico, describing it as 'Siberia.' Washer told Kieferdorf [senior trust officer and executive vice-president of respondent bank] that he did not want to go there because he did not want to become a 'yokel.' Kieferdorf stated that the assignment there was only temporary and gave Washer the impression that he would be transferred to the San Francisco office before the end of the year. At Chico, Washer remained dissatisfied with his transfer. He wrote to Bardt [vice-president and trust officer of the Los Angeles main branch] that he hated 'this hell-hole' and asking for the position of assistant comptroller in the Los Angeles main office."

In company with others, plaintiff caused to be mailed to approximately 5,000 employees of respondent bank, a circular letter as to which the decision of the National Labor Relations Board states: "The latter cast aspersions upon the respondent as a bank." The decision holds: "It is true that in writing letters from which we have quoted Washer did not observe the usual business amenity." As an example, the following was addressed to a vice-president and senior trust officer of the bank: "Your letter appears to me to be one of a series of petty annoyances I expect to be subjected to because of my failure to accept your advice to resign because of my Union activity. I can see no other reason for correspondence regarding such a petty detail by the Vice President and Senior Trust Officer of one of America's largest banks. 'Kind regards' to you too."

[9] We are not concerned here in determining fair or unfair labor practices, or whether the conduct was mere or gross insubordination, or excusable conduct. In this action for damages for libel and slander, the question is, does the complaint show the truth of the alleged libel, namely, "flagrant insubordination." The perusal of the complaint and its annexed exhibit discloses insolence and flagrant insubordination in refusal to accept directions to report to designated branch offices, from those for whom plaintiff contracted to work. A careful reading of the language used by the personnel officer of the bank in each particular, and charged to be slanderous and libelous, shows that it was justified by the facts.

[10, 11] This action was brought after the effective date of section 472c, Code of Civil Procedure, and hence the question whether the court abused its discretion in not granting leave to amend is open on appeal. Appellant has not suggested any amendment, and in view of the allegations of the complaint, including the exhibit, it appears impossible to amend.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice (concurring).

It is well settled that to be actionable an alleged defamatory statement must be false, and that a showing of the truth of the alleged defamatory words is a complete defense. In the present case it definitely appears from the facts set forth in the second amended complaint that the alleged defamatory statement, upon which plaintiff bases his causes of action, was not false; and that being so the defendants were clearly entitled to have their demurrer to said complaint sustained without leave to amend. According to the allegations of the complaint the circumstances out of which the action arose were these: The plaintiff was dismissed from his employment with the defendant bank and he took the matter before the National Labor Relations Board. The proceedings before the board involved a large number of issues which are entirely foreign to the present case; and after a lengthy hearing the board ordered plaintiff reinstated in his employment. A full and comprehensive report and decision was filed by the board containing a discussion of the matters with which the board had been dealing, and its conclusions and findings. The complaint alleges on information and belief that the defendant Fenton in commenting on the report and decision of the board made the following statement, upon which the causes of action of libel and slander are based: "We cannot see how this institution could possibly reinstate anybody who had admitted he has falsified his expense account, who had been guilty of flagrant insubordination." Attached to the complaint and made part thereof is a copy of the report, decision and order of said board. It covers some 32 typewritten pages of the transcript, and it definitely appears therefrom that plaintiff admitted he had filed with the bank an expense account containing a false item. By said item he represented that he had expended a certain amount of money for meals and lodgings, and when the bank questioned the form of the expense account he admitted that he had not paid out anything for lodgings—that he had stayed at the home of friends; and he withdrew the item. It is true that the National Labor Relations Board in determining the issue before it gave it as its conclusion that plaintiff had not intended to defraud the bank, and it stated that the filing of the expense account containing the false item was not one of the reasons for plaintiff's dismissal from his employment. However, we are not here concerned with the question of whether plaintiff intended to defraud the bank or the reasons for his dismissal. The precise and only question here presented is whether it appears from the face of the complaint that the alleged defamatory words were true, and as will be seen, it does so appear.

Certain innuendoes are pleaded in the complaint concerning the meaning of the word "falsified"; but it is well established that the office of the innuendoes is merely to explain; and the authorities agree that they cannot be used to aver a fact, introduce new matter, or alter, extend or restrict the import of the language theretofore set out; and that if the words complained of are not in fact actionable, no innuendoes can make them so. Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 P. 277, Ann.Cas.1915C, 766; 33 Am.Jur. 220. It follows, therefore, in the present case that since it appears from the face of the complaint that the words claimed to be defamatory were true, they are not actionable and the innuendoes pleaded by plaintiff cannot have the effect of making them so.

As to the truth of the remaining portion of the alleged defamatory statement, I have nothing to add to the views expressed in the main opinion.

PETERS, Presiding Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

The complaint in this case charges that defendant Fenton, while acting in the course and scope of his employment as personnel director and vice-president of defendant bank, in commenting on a decision of the National Labor Relations Board ordering plaintiff reinstated in defendant bank's employ, made the following statement, both orally and in writing, of and concerning the plaintiff: "We cannot see how this institution could possibly reinstate anybody who had admitted he had falsified his expense account, who has been guilty of flagrant insubordination." The trial court sustained a demurrer without leave to amend. The main and concurring opinions hold that the complaint, as a matter of law, alleges the truth of the charges contained in the alleged slanderous and libelous statement. So far as the charge that plaintiff admitted he had falsified his expense account is concerned, the main and concurring opinions hold that the decision of the labor board, attached as an exhibit to the complaint, as a matter of law, shows that plaintiff had made such an admission. This conclusion is reached by giving the word "falsified," which admittedly has several meanings, one of which involves the intent to defraud, an interpretation most favorable to defendants, and by completely disregarding other interpretations of the term. This astonishing and erroneous rule of construction is applied although the complaint expressly charges that the defendants used the term intending to convey, and did convey, to their listeners the meaning that plaintiff had admitted committing a criminal act. This rule of construction is applied to the complaint although the opinion of the labor board demonstrates to a certainty that the bank used the term "falsified" in connection with the expense account charge in the proceedings before the board to mean that plaintiff had committed a dishonest act. The opinion of the labor board shows indisputably that the board found as a fact that plaintiff had committed no criminal or wrongful act.

As to the balance of the charge—that plaintiff, as an employee, had been guilty of flagrant insubordination—the main opinion holds that the decision of the labor board demonstrates, as a matter of law, that plaintiff had been guilty of flagrant insubordination. This conclusion is reached in spite of the fact that the labor board expressly determined on the evidence recited, as a matter of fact, that plaintiff had not been guilty of insubordination. The concurring opinion is discreetly silent on this phase of the case. Under such circumstances, there is no legal justification for the conclusions reached by the majority. In my opinion, there can be no reasonable doubt but that plaintiff has stated good causes of action.

The complaint, after setting forth the allegedly libelous and slanderous statement, alleges that the statement was made to newspaper reporters and others solely for the purpose of having it printed, and Fenton requested that it be printed; that in making such statement he "intended to convey to his listeners and all who should read the statement the idea that plaintiff was a dishonest, unsatisfactory, inefficient and insubordinate worker in his profession and trade as a bank employee, and as a lawyer, and to further convey the impression that he was guilty of the crime of embezzlement, and was dishonest, and had misappropriated and failed to properly account for funds entrusted to him. Plaintiff is informed and believes that said ideas actually were conveyed to said listeners and readers by said statement as intended by Fenton, and such ideas were reasonable conclusions to be drawn from said words"; that the "statement was made by Fenton with malice, for the purpose of injuring, disgracing and defaming plaintiff, and interfering with his ability to obtain employment. It was false and known by Fenton to be false at the time it was made"; that "Immediately prior to the making of said statement by Fenton, plaintiff had an excellent reputation in the banking business as a man of integrity, honesty and efficiency as a bank employee and as an attorney.

"Proximately because of the making of said statement, plaintiff's reputation was materially damaged, and particularly was damaged among bank and trust companies. On or about September, 1939, plaintiff applied for employment at various banks in the State of California and was refused said employment. Plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges that said refusals of employment were solely caused by and were the proximate result of the making of the said statement, and solely by reason of the making of said statement he will be unable to secure employment at his trade or profession in any bank in California or the United States, and therefore he will continue to suffer loss of earnings until an indefinite time in the future solely by reason of the making of said statement."

As already pointed out, the decision of the labor board is pleaded as an exhibit.

It shows that plaintiff was employed by the bank and then discharged by the bank because of his union activities; that plaintiff instituted an action before the labor board to secure his reinstatement; that the bank's main defense was that as a national bank it was not subject to the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., and was not engaged in interstate commerce. These contentions are found by the board, at some length, to be unsound. Then the opinion of the board states that the bank also claimed, in justification for its discharge of plaintiff, that his services were unsatisfactory and that he was not qualified for the position in question. It is held that this defense "is unsupported by the evidence," and the evidence is recited that refutes it. It is then stated that another defense of the bank was that Washer made "a false expense claim against" the bank. This defense, the board holds, "is not borne out by the evidence." The board recites the evidence, part of which is set forth in the main opinion, and states that the bank claims that this incident shows that Washer was "dishonest." The board's opinion continues: "We find no merit in this contention." It is expressly held that the evidence shows that Washer was not "dishonest." The board's opinion also states that the bank charged that Washer was guilty of "insubordination and insolence toward his superior officers," and finds that this defense "is not supported by the evidence." The opinion sets forth in detail the correspondence between Washer and Kieferdorf, some of which is summarized in the majority opinion, and also points out that the evidence shows a close friendship between the two men and holds that, properly interpreted, the letters merely showed that Washer was being familiar with Kieferdorf, in a friendly way. After a review of all the evidence, the board holds that none of the charges against Washer is supported by the evidence; that the bank unjustly and improperly discharged Washer because of his union activities and the order is that Washer should be reinstated.

It is this pleading, with its exhibit, that the main and concurring opinions hold alleges that the charges made by the bank were truthful, as a matter of law. Stated another way, the main and concurring opinions hold that the complaint and its exhibit plead, as a matter of law, that Washer had admitted that he had falsified his expense account, and the main opinion holds that the complaint shows on its face that Washer was guilty of flagrant insubordination. These conclusions are arrived at in spite of the fact that the complaint alleges that the charge that he had admitted that he had falsified his expense account was untrue, and was known by the bank to be untrue; in spite of the fact that the complaint alleges that the charge that he was guilty of flagrant insubordination was untrue and known to the bank to be untrue; and in spite of the fact that the very charges had been passed upon by the labor board and found by it to be unsupported and untrue!

The reasoning by which the main opinion arrives at its conclusion is clearly unsound. It points out that the word "falsify" has several possible meanings; that it is sometimes used 'to characterize a criminal act involving the perpetration of fraud," and sometimes used to convey the thought of being "mistakenly and accidently untrue"; that it is a word of "double import" and may convey the meaning "of being intentionally or knowingly untrue."

The opinion then creates what purports to be a third meaning—"intentional act of falsification, without, however, an intent to defraud," and holds that for the purposes of this case, this court, as a matter of law, must conclusively presume the term was so used by the bank in making the charge here involved. In this connection the main opinion states: "Whatever definition may be given to the word 'falsified' as used under other circumstances, in view of the fact that it was used in reference to the Labor Board's decision, we must assume for the purpose of this case, that it meant an intentional falsification without intent to defraud." No authority is or can be cited for such a definition. To say that a person had admitted falsifying his accounts, either means he admitted that he attempted to defraud his employer or that he accidentally or mistakenly, without intent to defraud, admitted filing an incorrect account. The evidence recited in the Labor Board's opinion demonstrates, and that court found, that, at most, Washer made an innocent mistake. That opinion clearly holds that Washer committed no dishonest act in connection with his expense account. Yet the main opinion holds that from "the above recital of the facts as they appear in the decision of the Board, it may be reasonably and definitely determined that by his silence in the 'first instance,' plaintiff attempted to deceive the bank * * *." This inference is indulged in as a matter of law in passing on the sufficiency of a pleading, although other inferences are possible, and a court—the Labor Board—has determined that such inference is not possible under the facts. The Labor Board expressly held that no dishonest intent existed.

If the main opinion is to be interpreted as meaning that Washer admitted before the Labor Board that he was guilty of a dishonest act, then the main opinion misstates the facts. The complaint and its exhibit demonstrate that he made no such admission. On the other hand, if the main opinion is to be interpreted as holding that Washer admitted before the board that he was guilty of an innocent mistake, and that the bank intended to convey that thought when they used the term "falsified" in the allegedly libelous and slanderous statement, the answer is that the board's opinion, which the main opinion holds must be read as part of the complaint (and therefore must not only be read against plaintiff but also, where proper, in his favor), holds unequivocally that before the board the bank used the word in the sense of dishonest. The board holds that Washer was not dishonest. That this holding is supported by the evidence is amply demonstrated by the facts recited in the board's opinion. Moreover, the complaint alleges that in using the term the bank intended to mean, and did convey the thought, that Washer had admitted doing a dishonest act. Under such circumstances, to hold that the bank, as a matter of law, intended to convey the thought that Washer had admitted he had been guilty of an innocent act, is not only to do violence to the obvious meaning of the term, to do violence to the board's opinion where it is disclosed how the bank used the term, to contradict directly the allegations of the complaint, but also to state a principle of law that finds no support in any decided case. Such a construction of the statement would mean that in the case of ambiguous words, as a matter of law they are not libelous if capable of an innocent meaning. That is not the law. Words are to be construed according to the meaning that they would normally convey to those to whom they are published. See cases collected 16 Cal.Jur., p. 57, § 29. The rule that, in libel or slander cases, when words have two meanings, they are to be taken in their milder sense has never been adopted by the courts of this country. See cases collected 33 Am.Jur., p. 97, § 84. A forced construction is not to be placed on words in order to relieve the defendant of liability. The effect and tendency of the language used are the criteria by which to determine the actionable quality of words. 36 Corpus Juris, p. 1153, et seq. In each case the intent with which words are used and understood are questions of fact and not questions of law

It is apparent that the main opinion must be construed to hold either of two things, both of which are wrong. If it holds that, as a matter of law, the bank used the word "falsified" to indicate that Washer had admitted that he had been guilty of an innocent mistake in filing an expense account, the holding is correct only insofar as it holds that Washer admitted such innocent mistake. It is clearly incorrect insofar as it holds that the bank, as a matter of law, used the term in its innocent sense. Such holding is contrary to the proper rule to be applied in interpreting allegedly slanderous and libelous words, contrary to the obvious meaning intended to be conveyed, contrary to the positive allegations of the complaint, and contrary to the sense in which the bank used the term in the proceedings before the board. If the main opinion is to be interpreted as meaning that the complaint shows, on its face, that Washer admitted before the board that he had been guilty of a dishonest act in filing his account, then the opinion not only is contrary to the holding of the board, but misinterprets the facts set forth in the board's opinion. In either event, the main opinion is predicated on incorrect premises and reaches an incorrect result.

So far as the second charge is concerned —that the bank could not possibly reinstate a person "who had been guilty of flagrant insubordination"—there is no justification at all for the holding in the main opinion that the pleading discloses the truth of that charge. The main opinion holds that the evidence recited in the board's decision, as a matter of law, demonstrates that Washer was guilty of flagrant insubordination, even though the board held that such evidence showed no such thing. The majority opinion necessarily holds that, as a matter of law, the board's decision was wrong. While it is true that the board's opinion is not res judicata in this proceeding, and that on the trial, if one be had, the superior court could come to a conclusion contrary to that reached by the board, the effect of the main opinion is to hold, in passing on the sufficiency of a pleading, that such pleading, as a matter of law, demonstrates the truthfulness of a charge which another court, as a matter of fact, found to be unsupported. What the main opinion has done is to take the evidence recited in the board's opinion most damaging to plaintiff and accept it as true, to disregard completely evidence favorable to plaintiff, to disregard completely reasonable inferences from that evidence favorable to plaintiff, and to indulge in unwarranted and unfavorable inferences, and to disregard completely the holding of the board. The main opinion treats the whole controversy as if it were an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant after a trial on the merits, instead of from a judgment entered after the sustaining of a demurrer without leave to amend.

There are other points urged by the appellant for a reversal. I have considered each of such points and find them to be without merit. No useful purpose would be served by discussing them in this dissent.

It is my view that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

54 Cal.App.2d 309

HOLMAN v. TOTEN.

Civ. 13463.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.
Sept. 3, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑731(5)

In the absence of specifications of particulars of insufficiency of the evidence in a bill of exceptions, its sufficiency cannot be considered on appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑907(4)

Where bill of exceptions contained only documentary evidence which failed to reveal facts necessary to support plaintiff's judgment, District Court of Appeal would presume that evidence not before it showed the existence of all such facts so far as they were embraced within findings.

3. Escrows 🔑12

Generally, title to property does not pass merely by reason of deposit of the deed in escrow where the conditions fixed for its delivery were not such as were certain to happen. Civ.Code, § 1057.

4. Escrows 🔑12

A deed deposited in escrow becomes effective to pass title as soon as the conditions of delivery were so far performed that the grantee was entitled to possession of the deed although it was not then actually delivered. Civ.Code, § 1057.

5. Appeal and error 🔑907(2)

In action to quiet title as against purchaser under mechanics' lien foreclosure, trial court's finding that plaintiff had performed all conditions of escrow so as to become entitled to possession of the deed to premises prior to time defendant brought foreclosure action must be presumed by District Court of Appeal to be supported by the evidence, where defendant's bill of exception failed to set out the evidence. Civ.Code, § 1057.

6. Judgment 🔑681

One who acquired his interest in the matters in litigation from a party before commencement of suit is not a successor in interest within meaning of rule that a judgment concludes not only the adverse party but also all those claiming under the title which he represents. Code Civ.Proc. § 1908, subd. 2.

7. Judgment 🔑682(1)

A purchaser of realty under escrow agreement whose title vested before suit was commenced for foreclosure of a mechanic's lien thereon, and who was not made a party to the suit, was not bound by judgment of foreclosure or sale thereunder. Code Civ.Proc. § 1908, subd. 2.

8. Mechanics' liens 🔑298

The provisions of Civil Code giving effect to a deed which is subsequent in execution but prior in recording, are limited to purchasers for a valuable consideration and in good faith but were not available to a purchaser of realty at mechanic's lien foreclosure sale who had both actual and constructive notice of plaintiff's deed thereto. Civ.Code, §§ 1107, 1214.

9. Mechanics' liens 🔑263(1)

The statutory provision that no person holding a conveyance from mortgagor which does not appear of record at the time of commencement of foreclosure action need be made a party to such action, applies only to foreclosure of mortgages and has no application to foreclosure of mechanics' liens. Code Civ.Proc. § 726.

10. Mechanics' liens ⚿263(1)

The Civil Code provision that no person holding a conveyance from mortgagor which does not appear of record at the time of commencement of foreclosure action need be made a party to such action, is not made applicable to foreclosure of mechanic's liens by the provision that the provisions of Part II of the Code of Civil Procedure are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in proceedings for enforcement of mechanics' liens. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 726, 1198.

11. Mechanics' liens ⚿291(7)

The provisions of Civil Code that a conveyance of real property shall be void as against any judgment affecting the title unless recorded prior to record of notice of action apply only where notice of action is recorded, and where notice of defendant's suit to foreclose mechanic's lien on property purchased by plaintiff under escrow agreement was not recorded and defendant had actual notice of plaintiff's unrecorded deed, plaintiff's deed took precedence over defendant's foreclosure judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 726.

12. Quieting title ⚿44(2)

In action to quiet title to land purchased by defendant under mechanics' lien foreclosure sale, where plaintiff was not bound by the foreclosure judgment, because lienholder had actual knowledge of plaintiff's rights under an unrecorded deed and plaintiff had not been made a party to the foreclosure, it was not error to permit plaintiff to produce evidence in contravention of judgment to show that in fact defendant had no lien on the property. Code Civ.Proc. § 726.

13. Appeal and error ⚿907(2)

In action to quiet title to land purchased by defendant under mechanic's lien foreclosure sale, where foreclosure judgment was not binding on plaintiff because defendant had actual knowledge of plaintiff's rights under an unrecorded deed and did not make plaintiff a party to foreclosure, on appeal the District Court of Appeal must presume that the trial court's finding that defendant had no lien on land was adequately supported by the evidence, where the evidence was not in the record. Code Civ.Proc. § 726.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Quiet title action by Chester Holman against Flora Toten. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Hubert W. Swender and Emanuel & Klein, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Herman G. Dobrott, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

The defendant appeals from a judgment declaring plaintiff to be the owner of a described parcel of land and quieting plaintiff's title thereto against all claims of defendant.

[1, 2] The points made by defendant on this appeal require a consideration of the evidence for their determination. Such consideration is much limited by the form of the record on appeal. The evidence is presented by a bill of exceptions, which contains only certain documentary evidence introduced by the respective parties. The bill, after stating the plaintiff's documentary evidence, declares that over defendant's objection the court received testimony—not contained in the bill—which "purported to bear on the question of the validity and sufficiency of a claim of lien filed for record by the defendant" and also recites that there was "further testimony on behalf of the plaintiff." The bill then states defendant's documentary evidence and follows it with a recital that there was "further testimony on behalf of the defendant." In neither case is the nature or purport of the "further testimony" stated. The bill contains but three specifications of insufficiency of the evidence, each of which points to a specified finding; the first two then state that "the documentary evidence adduced at the trial and attached hereto as exhibits does not support or warrant said finding," and the third declares "that the last sentence of said finding is not warranted or supported by the documentary evidence referred to herein and attached hereto as exhibits." Such specifications, being limited to the effect of the documentary evidence, while the bill shows that there was other evidence, the nature of which does not appear, are little better than no specifications at all. In the absence of specifications of particulars of insufficiency of the evidence in a bill of exceptions, its sufficiency cannot be considered on appeal. Loewenberg v. Schneider, 1939, 14 Cal.2d 305, 307, 93 P.2d 1014. Here we can consider the insufficiency of the evidence only to the extent that the documents in evidence may affirmatively show its insufficiency. Several facts which are necessary to support plaintiff's judgment do not appear from these documents, but are not negatived in them. We must presume that the evidence not before us showed the existence of all such facts, so far as they are embraced within the findings.

On November 4, 1940, plaintiff and Perry J. Holliday made an agreement, in the form of escrow instructions signed by them respectively and deposited with Bay District Bonded Escrows, for the exchange of the land here in question by Holliday for other land of plaintiff. The instructions of each party stated that such party would deposit his deed in escrow "on or before December 4th, 1940." Holliday deposited such a deed dated and acknowledged on November 4, 1940. The date of its deposit in escrow does not appear, but we presume in plaintiff's favor that it was made on November 4, and we also presume the non-appearing fact that in due time plaintiff complied with the escrow instructions.

On November 14, 1940, defendant recorded a notice of mechanic's lien against the property to be conveyed to plaintiff by Holliday, and on December 4, 1940, she began, in the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles, an action to foreclose that lien, making Holliday, but not plaintiff, a party to the action. At this time, according to a finding not objected to, defendant "had both actual and constructive knowledge that the plaintiff herein was the owner of said premises." Holliday defaulted in this action and thereupon a judgment foreclosing the mechanic's lien was entered on December 27, 1940, by which a commissioner was appointed and ordered to sell the property to satisfy the lien. Pursuant to this judgment the commissioner sold the property to defendant on February 4, 1941, delivered to the purchaser a certificate of sale, and deposited a duplicate thereof in the recorder's office. The dates of the delivery and recording of the certificate do not appear, but these acts must have occurred on or before February 7, 1941, the date of verification of the commissioner's report of sale, which recites them.

In the meantime the plaintiff, on November 26, 1940, filed in the Los Angeles County Superior Court an action against Holliday and Doe One for specific performance of the agreement of sale made by the escrow instructions above mentioned. Later plaintiff amended his complaint in that action by alleging that he had sued Doe One by a fictitious name and had discovered said defendant to be two persons doing business as "Bay District Bonded Escrows," and substituting their names for the fictitious name. The defendants all made default and on April 14, 1941, a judgment was rendered directing the defendants doing business as Bay District Bonded Escrow to deliver to plaintiff and to Holliday the deeds deposited, to each the deed deposited by the other. The plaintiff later offered Holliday's deed in evidence, so we presume it was delivered to him in accordance with this judgment.

[3-5] The trial court in this action made findings that "on the 4th day of Nov., 1940, Perry J. Holliday made, executed and delivered to the plaintiff his deed" of the property involved herein, and that "prior to said time [the date of defendant's judgment against Holliday, foreclosing her mechanic's lien] said Perry J. Holliday had conveyed away all of his right, title and interest." Both of these findings are attacked as unsupported by the evidence, the specifications of their insufficiency being the first and third of those above discussed. These findings must be upheld against this attack. It is true, Holliday's deed to plaintiff appears not to have been delivered to plaintiff from the escrow until April 14, 1941. The conditions fixed for its delivery were not such as were certain to happen, and hence title to the property did not pass to the plaintiff merely by reason of the deposit of the deed in escrow. Civ.Code, § 1057; Promis v. Duke, 1929, 208 Cal. 420, 425, 281 P. 613; Whitney v. Sherman, 1918, 178 Cal. 435, 438, 173 P. 931; Los Angeles High School Dist. v. Quinn, 1925, 195 Cal. 377, 383, 234 P. 313; In re Reed, 1928, 204 Cal. 119, 123, 266 P. 948; Feisthamel v. Campbell, 1921, 55 Cal.App. 774, 781, 205 P. 25; Brown v. Wilson, 1928, 89 Cal.App. 764, 766, 265 P. 351. But the deed did become effective to pass the title as soon as the conditions were so far performed that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the deed, although it was not then actually delivered to him. Whitney v. Sherman, supra; Cannon v. Handley, 1887, 72 Cal. 133, 140, 13 P. 315; Newport Bay Dredging Co. v. Helm, 1932, 120 Cal.App. 127, 135, 7 P.2d 1039; Law v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 1928, 91 Cal.App. 621, 628, 267 P. 565; Feisthamel v. Campbell, supra; 10 Cal.Jur. 592; 30 C.J.S., Escrows, §§ 10, 13, pp. 1209, 1216. While the time when the plaintiff had performed all the conditions of the escrow so as to become entitled to possession of Holliday's deed does not appear in the record, we must, for the reasons above stated, presume that this occurred on November 4, 1940, the day stated in the finding, which was before defendant began her lien foreclosure action. On this view of the facts and on the law just stated, both of the findings objected to are correct.

[6, 7] Defendant contends that the plaintiff is bound by the judgment foreclosing defendant's mechanic's lien. As already noted, plaintiff was not made a party to the action in which that judgment was rendered, although defendant knew of plaintiff's rights when the action was begun. The California rule is that a judgment "concludes not only the adverse party but also all those claiming under the title which he represented." Estate of Clark, 1923, 190 Cal. 354, 360, 212 P. 622, 625. But, "one who acquired his interest in the matters in litigation from a party before the commencement of the suit * * * is not a successor in interest within the meaning of the rule and is not bound by a subsequent judgment, unless, * * * a statute provides otherwise where the transfer has not been recorded as prescribed." 15 Cal.Jur. 194; see, also, to the same effect, Code Civ.Proc. § 1908, subd. 2; 34 Corpus Juris 1010–1012, 1014, 1015; Lee v. Silva, 1925, 197 Cal. 364, 373, 240 P. 1015; People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rickard, 1903, 139 Cal. 285, 296, 73 P. 858; Warnock v. Harlow, 1892, 96 Cal. 298, 307, 31 P. 166, 31 Am.St.Rep. 209; Chester v. Bakersfield T. H. Ass'n, 1883, 64 Cal. 42, 43, 27 P. 1104. This rule, although not stated in the same words, was applied to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien in Whitney v. Higgins, 1858, 10 Cal. 547, 552, 70 Am.Dec. 748; Corbett v. Chambers, 1895, 109 Cal. 178, 184, 41 P. 873, and Fly v. Cline, 1920, 49 Cal.App. 414, 424, 193 P. 615. Here, according to the finding which must be accepted as true, plaintiff's title to the property vested before defendant's suit was commenced and he is therefore not bound by the judgment, under the general rule above quoted from California Jurisprudence.

[8] Defendant has no superior right by reason of the fact that her purchase of the property at the sale under her judgment was made and the certificate thereof was recorded before plaintiff's deed was recorded—a fact which appears only on the perhaps well founded assumption that plaintiff's deed was not recorded before the rendition of the judgment requiring its delivery to him. The provisions of sections 1107 and 1214 of the Civil Code giving effect to a deed which is subsequent in execution but prior in recording are limited to purchasers for a valuable consideration and in good faith, that is, without notice of the prior, but unrecorded, deed. March v. Pantaleo, 1935, 4 Cal.2d 242, 243, 48 P.2d 29; Whitney v. Sherman, 1918, 178 Cal. 435, 439, 173 P. 931. Here the undisputed finding above mentioned shows that at the time of her purchase defendant had both actual and constructive notice of plaintiff's deed.

[9, 10] Defendant contends, however, that there is a statute which makes the plaintiff subject to the judgment, thus attempting to bring the case within the qualification of the rule from 15 Cal.Jur. 194. The statutory provision thus invoked is the part of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure reading as follows: "No person holding a conveyance from or under the mortgagor of the property mortgaged, or having a lien thereon, which conveyance or lien does not appear of record in the proper office at the time of the commencement of the action need be made a party to such action, and the judgment therein rendered, and the proceedings therein had, are as conclusive against the party holding such unrecorded conveyance or lien as if he had been a party to the action." Obviously this provision is not by its own terms applicable to the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, for the subject matter of section 726 is the foreclosure of mortgages, only, and the provision quoted speaks only of such foreclosures. But, says defendant, it is made applicable to the foreclosure of mechanic's liens by section 1198 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is part of a special chapter providing for the enforcement of mechanic's liens and reads as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the provisions of part two of this code are applicable to, and constitute the rules of practice in, the proceedings mentioned in this chapter." Looking at "part two of this code," we find that it includes section 726; hence, argues defendant, section 1198 makes the quoted provision of section 726 applicable to the foreclosure of mechanic's liens. We think the cross reference of section 1198 cannot be so broadly interpreted.

The Code of Civil Procedure is divided into four parts, of which Part II is entitled "Civil Actions." Part II is now divided into twelve "titles," of which the first nine and the last two relate to civil actions generally and have headings so indicating, except the last, which is headed "Miscellaneous Provisions." Title X of Part II is headed "Actions in Particular Cases" and consists of six chapters, entitled as follows: Chapter I. "Actions for Foreclosure of [Trust Deeds and] Mortgages." Chapter II. "Actions for Nuisance, Waste, and Willful Trespass, in Certain Cases, on Real Property." Chapter III. "Actions to Determine Conflicting Claims to Real Property, and Other Provisions Relating to Actions Concerning Real Estate." Chapter IV. "Actions for Partition of Real [and Personal] Property." Chapter V. "Actions for Usurpation of an Office or a Franchise." Chapter VI. "Actions Against Steamers, Vessels, and Boats." Section 726, which defendant claims as applicable here, is in Chapter I of Title X of Part II. Section 1198, on which defendant relies to adopt section 726, is part of a title denominated "Enforcement of Liens," and this whole title is in Part III of the Code, which is headed "Special Proceedings of a Civil Nature" and contains a variety of provisions, relating, with other matters, to writs of mandate, review and prohibition, to forcible entry and unlawful detainer proceedings, and to eminent domain. In the provisions covering the proceedings just enumerated there are sections identical with section 1198. §§ 1109, 1177, 1256. Evidently a common purpose was to be carried out by all of these sections. That purpose was to make the "rules of practice" in all of these special proceedings identical, so far as not otherwise specially provided, with those prevailing in civil actions generally. That purpose would not be furthered by applying to such special proceedings the special rules of practice found in Title X of Part II for "Actions in Particular Cases." Those rules are applicable in detail to a heterogeneous group of actions, and among them are many rules which, like section 726, could be applied to some special proceeding by merely ignoring or changing some of their words for that purpose. The general rules contained in Part II of the code need no such tailoring to fit them to any particular special proceeding and they constitute the "rules of practice" which are intended by section 1198 and its counterparts. Section 726 is not among those so adopted. The framers of the code apparently held the same view of the matter, for in the original code of 1872 section 1195 (one of the sections specially relating to the enforcement of mechanic's liens) contained a provision for the docketing of a deficiency judgment in mechanic's lien foreclosure actions "as in actions for foreclosure of mortgages." This specific reference was made although section 726, then as now, contained provision for deficiency judgments in mortgage foreclosure cases, and section 1198 read then as it does now. This special provision for deficiency judgments in mechanic's lien cases is still in the code, but by amendment made in 1874, it was moved from section 1195 to section 1194, where it now is. Code Amendments 1873–74, p. 412. We have assumed, for the purpose of this discussion, that plaintiff's deed from Holliday was not recorded before defendant's foreclosure action was begun. There is no direct evidence on the subject, but from the fact that plaintiff sought and obtained, long after the foreclosure suit was begun, a judgment for the delivery of the deed to him, the inference seems strong that up to the time of that judgment the deed had not been delivered or recorded.

[11] The provision of section 1214 of the Civil Code making a conveyance of real property void "as against any judgment affecting the title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action" is not operative here. It is limited by its terms to cases where a notice of action is recorded (see Moore v. Schneider, 1925, 196 Cal. 380, 392, 238 P. 81; Taylor v. Chapman, 1936, 17 Cal.App.2d 31, 61 P.2d 476) and the record here does not show the recording of such a notice by defendant. Hence the case remains subject to the rule that "an unrecorded deed takes precedence over a subsequent judgment against the grantor." Davis v. Perry, 1932, 120 Cal.App. 670, 676, 8 P.2d 514, 517.

[12, 13] Since plaintiff was not bound by defendant's foreclosure judgment, the court did not err in permitting plaintiff to produce evidence in contravention of the judgment to show that in fact defendant had no lien on the property. Fly v. Cline, supra, 1920, 49 Cal.App. 414, 424, 193 P. 615. That evidence is not in the record and we must therefore presume that the finding showing that she had no lien was adequately supported thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Contracts 🔑111

An agreement between a divorced woman and a married man whereby the woman agreed to forego marrying any other person, and to accept employment as a companion to the man, and to maintain a home for him and at which she would remain, that he would purchase a home for her, furnish it and pay taxes and insurance on it, and support her for the remainder of her life and provide in his will for her lifelong care, was void as contrary to the statute prohibiting "contracts in restraint of marriage". 3. Contracts 🔑143

Courts may not, under the guise of judicial construction, rewrite a contract for the parties.

4. Contracts 🔑111

The statute declaring void every "contract in restraint of marriage" applies in cases of divorcees and widows. Civ.Code, § 1676.

5. Contracts 🔑111

The statute declaring void every contract in restraint of the marriage of any person other than a minor is part of the law of contracts of the state of California, since it is placed among other code sections under the sub-title "unlawful contracts". Civ. Code, § 1667, et seq.

6. Contracts 🔑112

A life-long contract between a divorced woman and a married man whereby she agreed to refrain from marrying and to be his companion during the remainder of her life, as long as he lived, to keep and maintain a permanent home to be supplied by him, was, when considered in connection with the personal relationship carried on for sixteen years after the contract was made, contrary to "good morals", and hence in violation of statutes requiring that the consideration must be lawful and enumerating what considerations are not lawful. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Sylvain J. Lazarus, Judge.

Action by Edna Heaps against Harvey M. Toy to recover damages for the alleged breach of an oral agreement. Defendant's demurrer to the complaint, on general and special grounds, was sustained without leave to amend. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff sued for damages for the alleged breach of an oral agreement she claimed defendant had entered into with her some seventeen years prior to the commencement of the action, concerning their future personal relations with each other. Defendant demurred to the complaint on general and special grounds, and the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. Judgment of dismissal followed, and plaintiff appeals. Accepting as true the allegations of the complaint, it is apparent that the trial court was justified in holding that the agreement sued upon was void for two reasons: that it was in restraint of marriage, and was founded on a consideration contrary to good morals.

In said complaint plaintiff alleges that she was divorced in Seattle, Washington, in 1921, at the age of 25, and that there were two children (girls) aged 5 and 3 respectively; that shortly after the divorce was granted she left the children in Seattle and moved to San Francisco where she obtained employment in a candy concession in a hotel owned and operated by the defendant; that while so employed she became acquainted with the defendant; that he was about 38 years of age and married, and that "a strong friendship grew up" between them; that her purpose in moving to San Francisco was to gain a business education, establish herself in business and then bring her children to San Francisco to live with her; furthermore, that she "expected and hoped to re-marry with some suitable and desirable person and to rebuild her family upon such re-marriage"; that in accordance with such plan she attended a business school and afterward procured a notary public commission, and engaged in the business of public stenographer and notary in San Francisco; that meanwhile she became "friendly with certain desirable unmarried men who wished to marry her and with one of whom she could have contracted marriage." She then goes on to allege that in that situation and about the year 1924 defendant represented to her that he was not living with his wife, that they had been separated for a long time and occupied separate homes, but that he had no grounds for a divorce and his wife would not procure one from him; that thereupon he made the following proposal to plaintiff: "that if plaintiff would forego marrying any other person and would give up her business career and would accept employment as a companion to defendant and would accept no other employment and would keep and maintain for defendant a home where he could live when he desired and where he could entertain his friends, and at which plaintiff would remain, that defendant would procure the removal of plaintiff's children to San Francisco and would maintain and support them here"; that he would purchase for and have granted to plaintiff a home, furnish and equip the same, and pay all taxes and insurance thereon; that he would support plaintiff "for the remainder of her life" and maintain and support her two children until they should become self-supporting or marry; furthermore that he would provide in his will for her care "as long as plaintiff should live"; and that he would cause a contract to that effect to be reduced to writing "as a guarantee of the permanency thereof." Continuing, she alleges that she "accepted said proposal of defendant" and "agreed to be thereafter and during the remainder of her life a companion of defendant to be with him at any time that he should desire, and to go with him to any and all places which he should choose, to keep and maintain for him a permanent home in which he could live at any time and to which he could bring any person for entertainment whenever it should please him"; that forthwith they "entered into said agreed relationship; that plaintiff moved to such places as defendant designated and maintained for him such facilities for living and entertaining as he desired and indicated and became his constant companion and accompanied him whenever he desired and forewent any opportunity to marry any other person and abandoned her said business and accompanied defendant on three trips to Europe and one to South America and in general devoted her entire time and efforts to the service of defendant in accordance with her agreement * * *"; also that in pursuance of said agreement defendant brought plaintiff's children to San Francisco and thereafter maintained them, and in the year 1928 purchased for and had conveyed to plaintiff residential property in San Francisco. It is then alleged that about the month of September, 1940, defendant repudiated said agreement and thereafter refused to pay for her maintenance and support, or the unpaid balance of $4,200 on the purchase price of the residential property. By reason of the foregoing plaintiff asked damages in the total sum of $164,200, which was made up of the following items: $60,000 for her future support and maintenance, computed on her expectancy of life, $4,200 to liquidate the unpaid balance on the residential property, and $100,000 as exemplary damages.

[1] Section 1676 of the Civil Code declares: "Every contract in restraint of the marriage of any person, other than a minor, is void." Here under the terms of the agreement as pleaded it was agreed that in consideration of the promises made by defendant to plaintiff she would not marry during the remainder of her life, or at least at any time prior to the termination of the agreement by the death of the defendant; and that "during the remainder of her life" she would be a companion to defendant. Obviously such an agreement falls squarely within the inhibition of the code section above quoted.

[2, 3] Plaintiff contends that the condition that plaintiff refrain from marriage was no part of the contract itself; or if so that it is "a severable part" and consequently does not invalidate the entire contract. It clearly appears, however, from the allegations of the complaint that such condition was not only made part of the contract itself but was the real basis of the entire agreement. That being so it is not within the power of the courts to disregard it; in other words, courts may not, under the guise of judicial construction, rewrite a contract for the parties.

[4, 5] Plaintiff contends that in any event the code section above quoted has no application to "second" marriages; that is, that it does not apply in cases of divorcees or widows. But as will be observed, said section in broad terms is made to apply to "the marriage of any person, other than a minor." (Italics ours.) If the Legislature had intended to exempt also from the operation of the section divorcees and widows, it doubtless would have inserted therein qualifying language to that effect. The several cases cited by plaintiff from outside jurisdictions as supporting her contention are not in point. They involved devises and bequests, whereas here we are dealing with a contract, and of course fundamentally there is a vast difference between the law governing the right of a person to make a voluntary gift, testamentary or inter vivos, and the law governing the rights of two or more persons to enter into a contract. Said section 1676 is made part of the law of contracts of this state. It is placed among other code sections under the sub-title "Unlawful Contracts". Title IV, div. 3, pt. 2, Civ.Code. It is therefore here controlling. Nor are we concerned with the law governing property settlements or agreements for maintenance and support entered into between husband and wife, for the reason that no such relationship existed between these contracting parties.

[6] Regarding the second ground of invalidity of the contract, section 1607 of the Civil Code provides that "The consideration of a contract must be lawful within the meaning of section sixteen hundred and sixty-seven" of said code; and the latter section declares: "That is not lawful which is: 1. Contrary to an express provision of law; 2. Contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited; or, 3. Otherwise contrary to good morals." (Italics ours.) Here, assuming that the allegations of the complaint are true, it would appear that plaintiff entered into a life-long contract with a married man, whereby she agreed not only to refrain from marrying, but "to be thereafter and during the remainder of her life a companion of defendant" as long as he lived, to keep and maintain for him a "permanent" home to be supplied by him, and that she would "be with him at any time that he should desire, and * * * go with him to any and all places which he should choose * * *." Therefore, taking into consideration in connection therewith the allegations of the complaint concerning the personal relationship carried on between the parties during the sixteen or more years following the making of the contract, it would seem clear that the trial court was warranted in holding as a matter of law that the contract pleaded fell within the unlawful class contemplated by subdivision 3 of said section 1667.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Easements 🔑3(1)

Property 🔑4

An "easement in gross" is a personal right or a right attached to the person of another and is an interest in the real property of another but is not personal property, the principal distinction between an "easement appurtenant" and an "easement in gross" being that in the first there is a dominant tenement and in the second there is not.

Property 🔑4

The right to use and maintain a telephone line, acquired by son of deceased farm owner as tenant, was "real property" and an "easement appurtenant" to the farm and was not "personal property" of the son which could be taken under execution by son's creditors.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Personal Property" and "Real Property".

3. Easements 🔑3(1)

Generally an easement is not presumed to attach to the person of the grantee when it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate and whenever the right is in its nature an appropriate and useful adjunct of the land owned by the grantee of the easement and there is nothing to show that the parties intended it to be a mere personal right, it will be held to be an "easement appurtenant" and not an "easement in gross".

4. Adverse possession 🔑71(2)

Although an oral agreement alone is ineffective to convey an interest in real property, a right initiated in parol may become perfect by prescription.

5. Easements 🔑3(1), 9(1)

Where son of deceased farm owner, as tenant, acquired right to use of telephone line by parol agreement and thereafter paid all expenses of making improvements and for a period of ten years the phone was used for the benefit of farm and its tenants, title by prescription to the easement in use of telephone was acquired, became appurtenant to the land and ran with it.

6. Easements 🔑61(2)

Where the right to use of telephone line maintained by defendant acquired by deceased farm owner's son as tenant was real property and an easement appurtenant to the farm, defendant failed to acquire such easement by execution sale under judgment against son, and plaintiffs, as the only heirs at law entitled to any interest in decedent's estate, were entitled to mandatory injunction compelling defendant to restore connection with line.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Anastasia Balestra and others against R. L. Button for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to restore the connection of a telephone line. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for a mandatory injunction commanding and requiring defendant to restore the connection of a certain telephone line to a line known as the "Button and Griffin Line" connecting with the town of Winters' telephone exchange. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant has appealed.

In 1920, Joseph Balestra purchased the land now owned by plaintiffs. At the time of the purchase and for some time prior thereto, defendant R. L. Button, Nancy Button and John Griffin owned and maintained a telephone line, known as the "Button and Griffin Line," extending from their respective farms to the town of Winters. An integral portion of this line was strung along poles attached to the fence on the south and east sides of the premises acquired by Balestra, Sr., at the time he acquired the same, and remained on said fence until 1926 or 1927, when that part of the line on the south fence was placed on Pacific Gas & Electric Company's poles on or about the same route as when the line was on the fence. The line continued this way until the death of Balestra, Sr., in February, 1928. Button and Griffin had, prior thereto, obtained consent in writing from Pacific Gas & Electric Company to put this line on the company's poles. Joseph K. Balestra had been living upon and was in possession of his father's land as a tenant at the time of, and for some time prior to his father's death. He continued to hold over as a tenant until February, 1930.

Joseph Balestra, Sr., had no telephone connections with the "Button and Griffin Line," nor did Joseph K. Balestra until May or June, 1928, after his father's death. Balestra, Jr., was in occupation of the dwelling and buildings on the lands and desired to establish telephone connections with the town of Winters to use same in connection with his business of operating the farm. In May or June of 1928, he applied to both Button and Griffin, and they agreed orally for the consideration of one hundred dollars ($100) to give him the right to connect with the "Button and Griffin Line" and use the same for transmission of messages to and from the Balestra premises, he to pay his portion of the upkeep. He paid the consideration, connected with said line and used it until February, 1930, paying his part of the maintenance thereof.

After his father's death, although Balestra, Jr., continued to hold over as a tenant until February, 1930, the lands went into his father's estate for administration. The descent of title from Balestra, Sr., was as follows: Antonia Balestra, his wife, took a life estate with remainder over to the children of decedent. Antonia Balestra was still living at the time of the trial of this action. Anastasia Balestra and Antonia Balestra are one and the same person. The original complaint filed named her erroneously as "Anastasia," but after judgment and appeal, the error was discovered, and the cause was sent back to the trial court for correction, which correction was made by proper amendment.

In February, 1930, Balestra, Jr., was found to be heavily indebted to the estate. Such indebtedness was caused by non-payment of rent and two notes amounting in all to approximately twenty thousand dollars. He was called to Salinas and made a written assignment of all his right, title and interest of every kind and nature in the estate of Joseph Balestra, Sr. The assignment was made to plaintiffs subject to the life estate of Antonia Balestra, and the consideration for the assignment was the cancellation of his indebtedness to the estate. The rights in the telephone line were not mentioned in the written assignment.

At the trial of this action, over the objection of defendant, evidence was admitted attempting to show an independent, contemporaneous, oral agreement whereby the telephone line and all improvements mentioned were "turned over" to the plaintiffs by Balestra, Jr.; the consideration therefor was also the cancellation of all debts of Joseph K. Balestra to the estate.

Joseph K. Balestra then surrendered possession of the premises, and Antonia Balestra, the life tenant, in March, 1930, entered into a written lease with one Wylie, who now holds possession of the premises as a tenant of Antonia Balestra. Joseph K. Balestra, however, occupies a dwelling on the premises under some arrangement with Wylie, either as an employee or otherwise. This point is not clear from the record.

In 1937 the portion of the Button and Griffin telephone line along the east line of the Balestra property was also placed on the Pacific Gas and Electric Company's line along the same route as the east fence. Wylie, the tenant in possession, paid his part of the cost of removal. In March, 1930, the estate of Joseph Balestra, Sr., was distributed to plaintiffs subject to the life estate of Antonia Balestra.

In May, 1937, defendant and appellant Button, being the owner of a judgment against Joseph K. Balestra, levied an execution upon, and caused to be sold thereunder, all the rights of Joseph Balestra, Jr., in and to the "Button and Griffin Line," as personal property. He purchased the same at such sale and received a bill of sale therefor and now claims title thereto under this bill of sale. Acting on this claim he disconnected the Balestra telephone from the "Button and Griffin Line," precipitating this action.

It is appellant's claim that the right acquired by Joseph K. Balestra to connect with, and in, and to the Button and Griffin telephone line was the personal property of Joseph K. Balestra, and that it was not transferred to plaintiffs by the assignment of his interest in the Joseph Balestra estate, because it never was part of that estate; also that it did not pass by the purported contemporaneous, oral assignment because the evidence was insufficient to show such an assignment; furthermore, that no possession was taken as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code; therefore, that the title remained in Joseph K. Balestra, and passed to defendant by virtue of said execution sale.

Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that they were the owners of the right to attach the telephone line to the Button and Griffin line, and asserted that for more than ten years prior to the filing of the action they used and operated their said telephone line by connecting it with the Button and Griffin line, and that the use of the telephone was and is necessary for the operation of said lands, and for their accommodation and that of their tenants. Button denied any interest in plaintiffs, and in a cross-complaint asserted that plaintiffs had attached their wires to the Button and Griffin line without any right, license or title so to do. The trial court rendered judgment for plaintiffs, finding them to be the owners of the right claimed in their complaint, and enjoining defendant from interfering with same.

On this appeal the first question for consideration is the nature and character of the right claimed by plaintiffs to attach their telephone to the Button and Griffin line. It seems to be conceded by the parties that such right is an easement; but appellant contends that it is an easement in gross and therefore personal property; that it was the personal property of Joseph K. Balestra, Jr., and that as such it was subject to sale on execution.

Respondents contend that it is an easement appurtenant, that when acquired by Joseph K. Balestra as tenant of the Balestra farm, it attached to the Balestra property, and passed to them with the estate of Joseph Balestra, Sr.

We are of the opinion that the right to maintain such a line or to own an interest therein, does not necessarily depend upon the ownership of any lands. The owner of such right may or may not own lands. The right to cross over the lands of another is an easement, but no dominant tenement is necessary to support it, and it may be an easement in gross; but if this right is enjoyed with and used for the benefit of certain premises in such a manner as to be an appurtenance thereto, it may be an easement appurtenant; but whether it is an easement in gross or an easement appurtenant it is not personal property.

[1] An "easement in gross" is defined in volume 14 of Words and Phrases, Perm. Ed. pp. 66, 67, as: "A mere personal interest in the real estate of another." The principal distinction between an easement appurtenant and an easement in gross is that in the first there is a dominant tenement and in the second there is not. Chase v. Cram, 39 R.I. 83, 97 A. 481, L.R.A. 1918F, 444; Weigold v. Bates, 144 Misc. 395, 258 N.Y.S. 695; Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111, 99 Am.Dec. 354. An easement in gross is a personal right, or a right attached to the person; it is an interest in the real property of another; but it is not personal property. This has been definitely decided in this state. In Callahan v. Martin, 3 Cal.2d 110, 121, 122, 43 P.2d 788, 794, 101 A.L.R. 871, it is stated: "Incorporeal hereditaments in gross have been recognized as a species of estate in real property in many decisions in this state, of which we cite a few." (Then follows a long line of California cases holding that an easement in gross is real property.) The opinion continues: "In view of the decisions and the provisions of section 14, subd. 2, §§ 802, 1044 Civil Code, it cannot be held that the provisions of sections 658 and 662, Civil Code, limit incorporeal hereditaments in this state to those only which are appurtenant to a dominant tenement. Section 658 lists land as a species of real property, but it does not attempt to enumerate the various estates which may exist in land, of which an incorporeal hereditament in gross is one."

[2] The easement in gross or appurtenant in the instant case is not only the right to cross the land of another with poles and lines and to maintain the same and to transmit messages thereover, but also the wires, poles, insulators, etc., in place and part of the system partake of the nature of the principal and permanent thing—the easement. The poles and wires wear out, and must be replaced, but the easement, whether in gross or appurtenant, continues on. The poles, wires, etc., of an electric company are real property.

Keating Implement & Machine Co. v. Marshall Electric Light and Power Company, 74 Tex. 605, 12 S.W. 489; Ward County Irr. Dist. v. Western Union Tel. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 254 S.W. 1114; Stearns Lighting & Power Co. v. Central Trust Co., 6 Cir., 223 F. 962, 967, 139 C.C.A. 442; Reynolds v. McLemore, infra. Pipe lines in place on a right of way are real property. Copeland v. Fairview Land, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 148, 131 P. 119; Robinson v. City of Glendale, 182 Cal. 211, 187 P. 741. Therefore we conclude that the right to maintain the telephone line in controversy was real property. We are also of the opinion that it was an easement appurtenant to the Balestra farm.

[3] It is said in Eastman v. Piper, 68 Cal.App. 554, 568, 229 P. 1002, 1007, that "Whether an easement in a given case is appurtenant or in gross is determined mainly by the nature of the right and the intention of the parties creating it. It may be said to be a general rule that an easement is never presumed to attach to the person of the grantee when it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate. Whenever the right in question is in its nature an appropriate and useful adjunct of the land owned by the grantee of the easement, having in view his intention as to its use, and there is nothing to show that the parties intended it to be a mere personal right, it will be held to be an easement appurtenant and not in gross. 9 Cal.Jur., p. 946, tit. 'Easements,' par. 3."

See, also, Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 45 P. 874; Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111, 99 Am.Dec. 354; Nay v. Bernard, 40 Cal.App. 364, 180 P. 827; Gardner v. San Gabriel Valley Bank, 7 Cal.App. 106, 93 P. 900; Jones v. Deardorff, 4 Cal.App. 18, 87 P. 213. Also, see 9 R.C.L. 741; Jones v. Stevens, 276 Mass. 318, 177 N.E. 91, 76 A.L.R. 591; Lindenmuth v. Safe Harbor W., etc., Corp., 309 Pa. 58, 163 A. 159, 89 A.L.R. 1180; Chase v. Cram, supra.

Here the right to maintain the connection with the Button and Griffin telephone was for the benefit of the property upon which it was used; it is in its nature an appropriate and useful adjunct to the land, and the presumption is that it attached thereto as an easement appurtenant. There is nothing indicating a contrary intention of the parties.

In what has been said hereinbefore, the acquisition of the easement has been assumed. Appellants contend, however, that if an easement in gross is real property then no rights were ever acquired by Joseph K. Balestra or by plaintiffs for the reason that there was no conveyance of said easement in writing, the agreement between Balestra and Button and Griffin resting only in parol.

[4] While it is true that an oral agreement alone is ineffective to convey an interest in real property, a right initiated in parol may become perfect by prescription. Barbour v. Pierce, 42 Cal. 657; Alper v. Tormey, 7 Cal.App. 8, 93 P. 402; Crawford v. Lambert, 136 Cal.App. 617, 29 P.2d 428; Reynolds v. McLemore, Tex.Civ.App., 241 S.W. 606; 1 Cal.Jur. 600, § 72; 2 C.J.S. 646, Adverse Possession, § 90-c and d.

[5] Here the evidence shows that the parol agreement was executed, that a consideration of $100 was paid on execution of the agreement, and expenses of maintenance and improvement were thereafter paid; and that for a period of nearly ten years the Balestra telephone was used on and for the benefit of the Balestra farm and its tenants under claim of right. This evidence is sufficient to support a title by prescription (which can be acquired by a tenant for his landlord [1 Cal.Jur. 546]), which, as above stated, became appurtenant to the land and runs with it.

[6] Such being the case it is of no importance whether there was any assignment, either written or oral, made by Joseph K. Balestra to plaintiffs, for the right acquired was real property, and being an easement appurtenant it followed the land without necessity for any conveyance by him, and if he had any interest in it by his written assignment of his interest in his father's estate he divested himself of it. At any event, being an interest in real property Button acquired no interest in or right thereto by his bill of sale.

We therefore conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support the judgment of the trial court, and it is affirmed accordingly.

1. Trover and conversion ⚷40(6)

In action to recover for conversion of furnishings, evidence that at the time of conversion many of the items of furnishings, which originally cost $5,000, were no longer on the premises, the property left was in poor condition and some of it unusable, and it all sold for $300, supported trial court's finding that $800 was value of property converted.

2. Mortgages ⚷330

Where trust deed was dated November 5, 1931, and foreclosure sale thereunder was had February 14, 1936, sections 580a–580c of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to deficiency judgments were inapplicable. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 580a–580c.

3. Limitation of actions ⚷41

In action to recover for conversion of personal property, trial court's allowance of a deficiency, arising out of sale under deed of trust executed by plaintiff, as an offset against damages, was error where claim for deficiency was barred by limitations in that no action for deficiency judgment was brought within three months from date of sale as required by statute. DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

In this action for conversion of personal property, the trial court found the defendant had converted the property without lawful right so to do, and fixed plaintiff's damages at $800. The court then found $732.34 due defendant from plaintiff as an offset growing out of a sale under a deed of trust. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for $67.66, with costs for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from an order of the trial court denying motion under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside and vacate the judgment above referred to and to substitute another and different judgment.

Plaintiff contends that the market value of the personal property was $4,000, which should have been the amount of the judgment, and that the court was in error in finding the offset due from plaintiff to defendant. The personal property involved consisted of furniture and furnishings of a one-story bungalow court.

In a duly settled bill of exceptions appears the following epitome of testimony before the court in respect of the value of the furnishings: November 5, 1935, the plaintiff paid $3,500 for the furnishings and shortly thereafter expended $1,500 in improving the same and in furnishing a new apartment; at the time of the conversion many of the items were no longer on the premises; all of the personal property was in poor condition and some of it unusable; and all of it was sold for $300. The furnishings were under constant and hard usage by subtenants of the court units, and were used up and wore out rapidly. In the opinion of one witness who bought them, they were worth not more than $200.

[1] There is, therefore, substantial evidence in the record to support the finding by the trial court as to value of the property converted. Landegren v. Quilici, 52 Cal.App.2d 213, 126 P.2d 141, and cases therein cited.

We are unable to agree with that portion of the judgment which permitted the defendant to offset $732.34 against the value of the personal property. The offset thus claimed grows out of the following circumstances: When the action was commenced there were two defendants, one a lady, who was the owner of a promissory note secured by a trust deed upon the premises where the furnishings in question were located; the other, her attorney. During the pendency of the action the first defendant named died, and her executors have been substituted in her place. As to the attorney defendant the court found in his favor, and we are not inclined to disturb that finding.

[2] Subsequently to the conversion of the personal property, the real estate was sold under a power of sale in a trust deed, and the offset of $732.34 claimed to have been due to the deceased defendant arose under the terms thereof. If the trust deed had been executed subsequent to the enactment of sections 580a, 580b and 580c of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would have been necessary for the holder to have followed the procedure and secured judgment as required by those sections. The trust deed is dated November 5, 1931. Therefore, none of the sections mentioned are applicable. Birkhofer v. Krumm, 27 Cal.App.2d 513, 81 P.2d 609; Kirkpatrick v. Stelling, 36 Cal.App.2d 658, 98 P.2d 566.

[3] In 1933, section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended limiting the time to bring action for a deficiency judgment upon a sale under a trust deed to not more than three months after the date of the sale. In the case at bar the sale was February 14, 1936; no action for the deficiency was brought within the three months' period of limitations; and therefore the claim is barred. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n v. Dennison, 8 Cal. App.2d 173, 47 P.2d 296.

The findings recite that there never was any act done to attempt to foreclose a chattel mortgage placed on the personal property at the same time the trust deed on the real estate was made. The offset was claimed for a deficiency arising out of a sale under the trust deed on the real estate and not on the chattel mortgage. There is nothing in the record which would support a judgment for an offset based upon any claim growing out of the chattel mortgage. Argument and authorities cited in support of such contention are not in point.

Judgment is reversed and cause remanded to the trial court with instructions to enter judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $800.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Louis McDaniel and others against Carl Clavin to recover overtime wages claimed to be due plaintiffs under provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff Bernard Silver appeals.

Affirmed.

Phillip W. Silver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry Haves, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover overtime wages claimed to be due him by virtue of the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq., on the theory that his erstwhile employer, the defendant, was engaged in interstate commerce during the period of plaintiff's employment, and that, therefore, he was employed in interstate commerce. From an unfavorable judgment plaintiff brings this appeal.

[1] Findings were waived by the parties. It will therefore be assumed that there was sufficient evidence to support the implied findings and the judgment.

Plaintiff first entered the employ of defendant in November, 1937, as a truck driver. In that capacity he continued until January 20, 1940. The act in question (29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq.) became effective October 25, 1938. Section 207(a) thereof provides as follows:

"No employer shall, except as otherwise provided in this section, employ any of his employees who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce —(1) for a workweek longer than forty-four hours during the first year from the effective date of this section, (2) for a workweek longer than forty-two hours during the second year from such date, or (3) for a workweek longer than forty hours after the expiration of the second year from such date, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed."

During the period of plaintiff's employment his duties consisted of driving defendant's trucks, delivering merchandise, cleaning chickens, cleaning the premises, opening cases of frozen poultry taken from the vaults of the Terminal Refrigerating Company and driving into the country in order to collect, transport and deliver such merchandise to the plant of defendant. Following the effective date of the act plaintiff worked long hours for defendant, his days ranging in length from ten to fourteen hours; but inasmuch as our decision is derived from a consideration of whether plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce during his employment we shall indulge in no further comment upon the value of his services and the long, wearisome hours he worked in the execution of his tasks.

The basis of plaintiff's contention that he was employed in interstate commerce is the fact that defendant received by shipment through interstate commerce during the period from November 14, 1938, to March 12, 1940, slightly less than 81 tons of poultry, shipped to him from Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Texas, New Mexico and Utah, and that during the same period he shipped from California to New York three separate shipments of cold storage poultry aggregating eight and one-third tons, and to Arizona three separate shipments aggregating 1,347 pounds. Because of these shipments plaintiff contends that he was engaged in interstate commerce, although he could not remember having worked on more than one shipment that went to New York and one to Arizona. The merchandise imported by defendant from distant states was taken from the railway terminals and delivered to a cold storage warehouse for the account of defendant. Such refrigerated poultry was later transported by plaintiff from the refrigerating plant to defendant's place of business. He there opened the original packages, thawed them out, made them up into orders and delivered them to local retailers.

This, in brief, describes the nature of plaintiff's employment, from which he asks us to determine that his activities were in interstate commerce in contemplation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 and that he is entitled to compensation for overtime as provided by that act.

[2, 3] Commerce is defined by section 203(b) of the act to be "trade, commerce, transportation * * * among the several States or from any State to any place outside thereof." From the authorities we learn that "commerce" is not confined to transportation only from one state to another, but it "comprehends all commercial intercourse between different states and all the component parts of that intercourse. * * * The commerce does not end with the transportation, but embraces as well the sale of the goods after they reach their destination and while they are in the original packages." Dahnke-Walker Milling Co. v. Bondurant, 257 U.S. 282, 290, 42 S.Ct. 106, 108, 66 L.Ed. 239. On another occasion the same court said: "And what is or is not interstate commerce is to be determined upon a broad consideration of the substance of the whole transaction." Federal Trade Commission v. Pacific States Paper Trade Ass'n, 273 U.S. 52, 47 S.Ct. 255, 258, 71 L.Ed. 534.

For the purpose of persuading us that his employment was interstate in character, plaintiff has reviewed a number of pertinent authorities dealing with the subject and earnestly urges that they are controlling in the instant case.

Where the manufacturer and distributor of motion picture films shipped its output from New York to Omaha, at which place the distributors in turn placed the films with exhibitors in Nebraska for display, the films were at all times in interstate commerce because "The intermediate delivery to the agency did not end and was not intended to end the movement of the commodity. It was merely halted as a convenient step in the process of getting it to its final destination." Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, Inc., 263 U.S. 291, 44 S.Ct. 96, 99, 68 L.Ed. 308. In that case the rule was announced that where transportation has acquired an interstate character it continues at least until the load reaches the point where the parties originally intended that the movement should finally end. On the same principle it was held that the buying and selling of cattle in local stockyards, and the practices of the dealers and commission men who negotiate the purchase and sales of such livestock constitute a part of the interstate transportation and are indispensable to its continuity. "Such transactions cannot be separated from the movement to which they contribute and necessarily take on its character. * * * The sales are not in this aspect merely local transactions. They * * * do not stop the flow * * * being indispensable to, its continuity." Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 42 S.Ct. 397, 402, 66 L.Ed. 735, 23 A.L.R. 229.

It is also held that temporary stoppage of merchandise does not destroy the interstate character of the commerce. An importer of cocoanut oil from the Philippines, having its principal place of business in the state of New York, found it to be more economical to import large cargoes in steamer tanks. It thereupon established storage facilities at Point San Pablo, where it stored huge shipments purchased to fill its orders and not for indiscriminate sale. Under these circumstances the oil continued to be in interstate commerce during such storage. Philippine Ref. Corp. v. Contra Costa County, 24 Cal.App.2d 665, 76 P.2d 163. Where milk, having been purchased for transportation to distant markets, is stopped for the purpose of pasteurization and bottling, the temporary stoppage does not terminate the continuous flow of the stream or destroy the interstate quality of the commerce. Pennsylvania Co. v. Cincinnati & L. E. R. Co., D.C., 43 F.Supp. 5.

Plaintiff presents the foregoing and kindred authorities (Fleming v. Alterman, D. C., 38 F.Supp. 94; Drake v. Hirsch, D.C., 40 F.Supp. 290; Thompson v. Daugherty, 40 F.Supp. 279; Pickett v. Union Terminal Co., D.C., 33 F.Supp. 244; Pipal v. Grand Trunk R. R. Co., 341 Ill. 320, 173 N.E. 372) in support of his contention that he was engaged in interstate commerce during the period of his employment by defendant. But while these authorities clearly define the rule that governs in the situations described in the several cases, they do not apply to the facts at hand. All of such cases exemplify the principle that any object shipped by interstate transportation continues to be in interstate commerce until it comes to final rest at its ultimate destination. Also, they establish that merchandise on its way, stopped temporarily for processing or other purpose, continues during stoppage in interstate commerce, and any handling of it there is a labor in interstate commerce.

[4] But the situation presented by the instant case does not come within any of the authorities relied upon by plaintiff. The rule applicable here may be stated as follows: When merchandise has been imported into California from other states by a merchant to meet the anticipated demands of his customers without specific orders therefor from such customers, and comes to rest in a warehouse in this state, it is no longer in interstate commerce after coming to rest. This statement of the rule is supported by many decisions that resound with finality. When chickens shipped from the Middle West to commission men in New York City were sold to a slaughter house operator who in turn trucked his poultry to his slaughtering house in Brooklyn to be there dressed and sold to retail merchants, the interstate character of the commerce, created by the acts of transporting the poultry from western states to the depots of "receivers" in New York, ended with the delivery of the poultry at the slaughter house in Brooklyn. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570, 97 A.L.R. 947. It was there held that the decisions which deal with a stream of interstate commerce and with the regulations of shipments which are continuous do not apply in such transactions as that of the Schechter corporation, in whose custody the merchandise came finally to rest.

Where an oil company was engaged in the retail distribution of its products in Florida and imported its oil from other states and foreign markets by tankers and stored it in the reservoirs of the company for distribution to its various service stations as the demands of its business arose, it passed out of foreign and interstate commerce upon its delivery into such storage reservoirs. Atlantic Coastline Railroad Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 275 U.S. 257, 48 S.Ct. 107, 72 L.Ed. 270. Where a wholesale merchant imported eggs in quantity, uncrated them, candled and classified them according to grade in other boxes and sold them to the retail trade, they then ceased to be in the stream of interstate commerce and were subject to local taxation and other domestic regulation. Gerdert v. Certified Poultry & Egg Co., Inc., D.C., 38 F.Supp. 964. Where a lumberman made an occasional trip outside of Tennessee to bring in materials by truck, such trips were not sufficient to establish that he was engaged in interstate commerce. Whitson v. Wexler, (Chancery Ct. of Tenn.) 3 Labor Cases 60,859, par. 60,283. See, also, Gerdert v. Certified Poultry & Egg Co., Inc., supra. Where goods are uncrated by a wholesaler and the contents placed upon his shelves and commingled with the rest of his stock, they pass out of the stream of interstate commerce that instant. Serio v. Dee Cigar & Candy Co., (Circuit Ct. of Alabama) 4 Labor Cases 62,170, par. 60,734.

[5-7] From the testimony of plaintiff herein it is clear that the poultry shipped from distant states to defendant was not resold by him in the original packages. We have been pointed to no instance of such a sale, neither have we been able to find one. On the contrary, the testimony of the plaintiff is that the frozen poultry was stored in refrigerators for the account of defendant and was thereafter taken to defendant's plant, opened, thawed and made into new packages for sale to the local trade. Each shipment of poultry made to defendant came to rest in his own plant or was stored for his account in a local refrigerator. The fact that in the seventeen months of plaintiff's employment after the act became effective defendant made but three shipments of poultry to New York and three to Arizona cannot characterize defendant as being engaged in interstate commerce. The reshipment of the poultry received by interstate transportation would not defeat the intrastate character of such reshipment within this state, even though it had been in the same cars. Atlantic Coastline Railroad v. Standard Oil Co., supra. Neither will sporadic or isolated shipments into other states in and of themselves constitute a merchant's business totally interstate in character or subject him to the requirements and penalties of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

[8, 9] Under the facts established defendant was not engaged in, nor did he have plaintiff employed in, the production of goods for interstate commerce. The doctrine of de minimis non curat lex applies. Gerdert v. Certified Poultry & Egg Co., Inc., supra. The amount of commerce involved is important. While the federal Constitution definitely vests Congress with the power to regulate interstate commerce in any amounts whatsoever, yet the rule of reason applied to the language of the act requires us to hold that Congress by fair implication intended to exclude commerce of inconsequential volume from its regulatory measures. Goldberg v. Worman, D.C., 37 F.Supp. 778. This must be so where the evidence discloses that the shipper was primarily engaged in an intrastate business. Whitson v. Wexler, supra.

[10] But if the foregoing considerations were not sufficient to demonstrate that plaintiff is entitled to no benefit under section 207(a) of the act, still he appears to be definitely excluded therefrom by the language of section 207(c), which provides: "In the case of an employer engaged * * * in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than fourteen workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged." By no system of computation can it be determined that plaintiff worked fourteen weeks in the aggregate in any calendar year of his employment in slaughtering poultry, or in preparing it, for shipment to other states. Neither did he drive, convey merchandise in or unload it from, his truck nor do other work at his "place of employment" in making such preparations. In the absence of finding or proof that he was engaged for such fourteen weeks in the aggregate in any calendar year in assisting in the preparation of the poultry to be shipped by interstate commerce, he is not entitled to recover for any overtime.

[11] Moreover, if plaintiff had been engaged in interstate commerce by the activities described he could not recover by reason of the inhibition contained in section 213(b), which reads as follows: "The provisions of section 207 shall not apply with respect to (1) any employee with respect to whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service pursuant to the provisions of section 304 of Title 49 [of the Motor Carriers Act, 1935]." By section 304(a) (3), 49 U.S.C.A., § 204(a) (3) of the Motor Carriers Act of 1935 it is made the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission: "To establish for private carriers of property by motor vehicle, if need therefor is found, reasonable requirements to promote safety of operation, and to that end prescribe qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees, and standards of equipment." If plaintiff's hauling of merchandise from the railway depot to defendant's warehouse, thence to his wholesale plant and thence to his customers, places his labors in the category of interstate commerce employment, the quoted language of section 213(b) makes the provisions of section 207(a) inapplicable to plaintiff's case.

[12, 13] Plaintiff denies that section 213(b) applies because the Interstate Commerce Commission has not taken jurisdiction; that it has neither prescribed nor promulgated regulations and maximum hours for the employees of plaintiff's class. But section 213(b) contains no provision that the Commission must have established requirements or prescribed qualifications or maximum hours of service of employees in order to make it applicable. It declares merely that section 207(a) does not apply in the case of any employee with respect to whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish maximum hours of service. The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act for maximum working hours of employees does not, by virtue of the provisions of section 213(b), apply to those employees with respect to whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish maximum hours of service. Rozmus v. Jesse T. Davis & Sons, Inc., Sup., 23 N.Y.S.2d 821, 822; Gibson v. Glasgow, Tenn. Sup., 157 S.W.2d 814. In the Gibson case it was held that what is interstate commerce in contemplation of the Fair Labor Standards Act is likewise interstate commerce for purposes of the Motor Carriers Act. The truck driver, having made only deliveries from his employer's warehouse to points within Shelby county, was not engaged in interstate commerce and could not be exempted by section 213(b). It followed, necessarily, therefore, that he could not be entitled to the benefits of section 207(a) of the act. Likewise, the intrastate nature of Mr. Silver's employment excludes him from the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and at the same time deprives him of the benefits of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Harry Deirup, Judge Assigned.

Action by Elizabeth Hack against Sam Gridley, Jr., and others for injuries sustained when a semi truck and trailer belonging to named defendant struck the rear of a pick-up automobile owned and operated by plaintiff. Verdict for defendants, and, from an order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, defendants appeal.

Order affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke & Harris and Jack Montgomery, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

George R. Freeman and Elmer Laine, both of Willows, for respondent.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict.

The action arose out of a rear collision between a Dodge pick-up automobile belonging to plaintiff and driven by her, and a GMC semi-truck and trailer owned by defendant Gridley and driven by his employee, defendant Edgar (Ted) Hepworth. The accident took place on Highway 99 W about 2½ miles south of the town of Orland in Glenn County about 7 a.m. May 20, 1940. At that time both vehicles were proceeding south on the highway. Plaintiff's vehicle was ahead of defendant's and was traveling at about 20 miles per hour. The GMC truck and trailer was traveling at the rate of about 45 miles per hour. Defendant was overtaking plaintiff and when about one hundred feet behind her, defendant veered to the left to prepare to pass the plaintiff. Plaintiff was approaching a private driveway which was located on the east side of the highway to her left and at this point the GMC semi-truck and trailer struck the rear end of the pick-up, causing the injury that resulted in this action.

There is no dispute in regard to the above facts. The jury found for the defendants apparently on the issue of contributory negligence. On motion of plaintiff a new trial was granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. The main questions are:

1. Whether or not plaintiff failed to give a signal when she was about to make a left-hand turn. If she did fail, she was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Was there other evidence of contributory negligence on her part?

3. Does the evidence sufficiently show defendant guilty of any negligence?

[1] It is a salutary rule in this state, supported by a long line of decisions, that the order of a trial court granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion or prejudice as would interfere with a fair and impartial balance of the evidence. Kehlor v. Satterlee, 37 Cal.App.2d 116, 98 P.2d 759; Shortt v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp., 30 Cal.App.2d 511, 86 P.2d 854; Kelley v. Corcoran, 16 Cal.App.2d 593, 61 P.2d 344, 345.

In the case last cited the defendant appealed from an order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment. On appeal the order was sustained. The circumstances were similar to those in the present case, except that the plaintiff in the Kelley case attempted to pass the defendant's car as it was driven across the highway to enter a lane on the left-hand side. The chief question in that case was whether the defendant indicated his intention of crossing the highway by giving an arm signal. There was a conflict of evidence in that regard. The court said: "It does not appear that the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial under the circumstances of this case. There is a substantial conflict of evidence regarding the material facts of the case. The trial judge is in so much better position to judge of the weight and sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses than is the court of appeal that an order granting or refusing a new trial will not be disturbed unless it appears very clear that he abused his discretion in that regard. That is the invariable rule which is followed on appeal." (Citing several California authorities.)

In this case, the plaintiff, Elizabeth Hack, testified that she saw, through her mirror, the defendant's machine when it was about one hundred yards to the rear of her car, traveling on its proper side of the highway; that she gave the arm signal to indicate her intention to turn to her left, and had just reached the middle white line when her automobile was struck. She testified that "I never got across the white line." The driver of defendant's car, according to his own testimony, apparently did not sound a warning horn until immediately before the collision occurred.

[2, 3] Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not require the trial court, in granting a new trial upon the insufficiency of the evidence, to specify wherein it considers the evidence insufficient as contended for by appellant, but does require the trial court when a new trial is granted on the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, to specify in the order that the new trial is granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The purpose of the 1939 amendment to this section is well set forth in Thomas v. Driscoll, 42 Cal.App.2d 23, 108 P.2d 43. Prior to the amendment if the order granting a new trial did not state that it was on the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence, it was presumed not to have been based on that ground, while after the amendment it was conclusively presumed not to have been based on that ground unless it was so stated in the order. The opinion in that case also sets forth what is required to be set forth in the order. In this case the judge properly specified that the order for a new trial was granted for insufficiency of the evidence.

[4] The evidence does not show that plaintiff could have been guilty of contributory negligence in any other way than by failing to give a proper signal when she made the left-hand turn. There is a conflict of evidence on this point. If she gave such signal, defendant was guilty of negligence in attempting to pass.

[5] In view of the wide discretion vested in a trial court in granting a new trial, it does not seem, in view of the record, that the order of the trial judge in this case granting a new trial should be disturbed.

The order is affirmed.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when struck by the truck while crossing city street, wherein pedestrian contended that he was crossing on cross-walk in accordance with traffic lights, and wherein truck driver and owners contended that pedestrian was attempting to cross street at a point about 25 feet from cross-walk, evidence justified jury's finding that pedestrian was guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William R. McKay, Judge.

Action by Lewis Reed against William F. Stroh and others, to recover for injuries allegedly suffered by plaintiff when struck by a truck driven by the named defendant and owned by the other defendants. From an unfavorable judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Fred N. Howser, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Joseph A. Ball, of Long Beach, for respondents.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

This action is for damages resulting from personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff when struck by a truck belonging to Price Brothers and driven by defendant Stroh. Defendants pleaded a general denial and contributory negligence. On his appeal from an unfavorable judgment plaintiff contends (1) that the evidence does not support the verdict and (2) that certain instructions to the jury materially prejudiced his cause.

The accident occurred on July 26, 1941, at about 10:30 a. m., while plaintiff was walking across Long Beach Boulevard at Plymouth Street in a business district of Long Beach. He received severe bodily injuries. Long Beach Boulevard, 78 feet in width, runs north and south; Plymouth Street, 36 feet in width, running east and west, intersects it. On the south side of Plymouth is a marked crosswalk 10 feet wide over Long Beach Boulevard. Within the crosswalk and at the center of the boulevard was a sign: "Stop for Pedestrians." Long Beach Boulevard has four traffic lanes. At the trial the lanes were numbered from one to four, commencing on the west.

(1) Besides himself, plaintiff presented five witnesses the substance of whose testimony was that plaintiff stepped from the west curbing of Long Beach Boulevard within the marked crosswalk and started toward the east side; that while thus proceeding the truck, 20 feet in length, driven by defendant Stroh, struck plaintiff and hurtled him through the air; that as the truck approached plaintiff it was traveling at about 35 miles per hour. The witnesses who observed the actual impact placed the point of his fall to the pavement at about 20 feet south of the crosswalk. Officer Day of the police force found a pool of blood on the street 28 feet south of Plymouth Street, and the truck was standing 43 feet and 2 inches south of Plymouth and 20 feet east of the west curb of Long Beach Boulevard. Plaintiff testified that after leaving the barber shop at the southwest corner of the intersection he walked to the corner, stopped and waited for the red light at the intersection one block to the north and for the oncoming traffic to pass before he started across the boulevard; that he continued within the crosswalk in an easterly direction, and that his collision with the truck occurred between the west curb and the center of the street.

Before reciting the evidence received on behalf of defendants it is pertinent here to observe that the foregoing testimony may have been discounted by the jury by reason of the following: At the instant of the impact, witnesses Cash and Bentley were 200 feet north of the locus of the collision, and the accuracy of their observations might have been impaired by reason of such distance as well as by the fact of their attention to the matter of their crossing the boulevard; that the witness Mrs. Murray had stopped in the center of Plymouth for an instant only before entering Long Beach Boulevard in order to make a left-hand turn and to avoid peril to herself; that while she corroborated the other witnesses for plaintiff, yet she placed plaintiff at the time of the impact at about 20 feet south of the crosswalk; that the attention of the witness Vermillion was attracted by the collision when he "looked up" and saw plaintiff's body going through the air. As to plaintiff's own testimony, he intended to cross Long Beach Boulevard for the purpose of visiting a store in about the middle of the block south of Plymouth; that he stopped to let some cars pass before starting; that on stepping from the curb he did not look to the north, he never did see the truck and he never stopped at any time or looked out for oncoming traffic.

As against the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses, defendant Stroh testified that he approached Plymouth Street at about 25 miles per hour; that no one was in the crosswalk or at the corner; that he did not see plaintiff or any other pedestrian; that at the time of the collision plaintiff was about 25 feet south of the crosswalk, going eastward, and that about three-fourths of the truck had already passed over the south line of the crosswalk; that he swerved the truck in an attempt to avoid the collision and brought it to a stop in about 20 feet; that on alighting Stroh found plaintiff lying flush with the rear end of the truck. In addition to the foregoing, defendants called Harold Roach and his wife, who were strangers to all parties. The substance of their testimony is that they were driving south on Long Beach Boulevard with the intention of stopping at a photo laboratory the second door south of Plymouth on the west side of the boulevard; that as they crossed the intersection they saw no one in the crosswalk or standing at the southwest corner; that after passing Plymouth they stopped parallel to the second car parked at the curbing, preparatory to visiting the photo laboratory, and then pulled forward to a point between the second and third cars in order to open the door of their car; that they then observed plaintiff for the first time, opposite their car; that Mrs. Roach observed plaintiff steady himself with his right hand on the rear of the second car and step off the curb into the street; that as he did so he obstructed her view so that she could not see the sign on the window; that in a moment Mr. Roach observed plaintiff opposite him in the street, then heard the impact and saw the truck come to a standstill about 35 feet south of the crosswalk; that Mrs. Roach then saw plaintiff lying in the street opposite the front door of their automobile.

[1,2] There is nothing inherently improbable in the testimony of either Mr. Stroh or of Mr. and Mrs. Roach. The testimony detailed by the latter two alone was sufficient to justify the finding of the jury. Plaintiff's unheralded attempt suddenly to emerge from the rear of the second car parked at the curbing and to step into and proceed across the boulevard at a point some 25 feet south of the crosswalk was proof of such negligence as might materially contribute to the collision and to his injuries. We agree that in case of conflict the evidence favoring a verdict must be substantial (Chase v. Jonkey, 12 Cal.App.2d 365, 55 P.2d 1229), but we are satisfied that the evidence presented on behalf of defendants abundantly fulfills that requirement.

[3] (2) Plaintiff has assigned a number of instructions proposed by defendants as constituting prejudicial error. We have carefully reviewed all of them along with the criticisms of plaintiff. While a number of those criticised should have been omitted because they are formula instructions, and others of them might have been improved by omitting argumentative forms, words and phrases, yet we cannot say that any one of them prejudiced plaintiff's case. Each states the law as applied to some phase of the testimony. Each of such instructions was predicated upon the two diverse trends of the evidence: (1) as to whether plaintiff cautiously stepped out into Long Beach Boulevard and continued within the crosswalk to pass over the boulevard, and (2) as to whether he stepped from behind a parked vehicle at a point some distance south of the crosswalk and proceeded across without looking to the north, from which traffic was coming. We again suggest the advisability of conforming instructions with the California Jury Instructions, civil, sometimes referred to as BAJI, prepared by the superior court of Los Angeles county. A more generous use of such forms and a more consistent adoption of the system of stating the law free from unnecessary verbiage, as indicated by such forms, is calculated to diminish the causes for appeals and at the same time will serve as insurance against the confusion of justice. But solely because those forms were not used is not within itself a sufficient ground for reversing a judgment so long as the instructions state the law. A discussion of a few of the assignments will suffice.

[4, 5] Defendants' instruction number 5 stated that the jury was required to find that the driver was under duty to exercise only reasonable care in keeping a lookout ahead and in keeping the car under control. But it was not vicious because it did not define reasonable care or did not reflect the true relationship between a pedestrian and a motorist. Its evident purpose was to emphasize the principle that a motorist is not obligated to anticipate every possible action of persons upon the highway but that it is his duty to act with reasonable care. The term "reasonable care" was not calculated to mislead the jury. The word "reasonable" is an ordinary word and in common use, and is familiar to the average person. It occurs frequently in statutes that were intended for the daily guidance of laymen. Vehicle Code, § 510, St.1935, p. 176. In any event, it means the amount of care exacted of the motorist under the circumstances detailed by the evidence. Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 83, 97, 239 P. 709, 41 A.L.R. 1027. It could have meant nothing other than that the driver was not required to exercise excessive or extraordinary care in the operation of the automobile. Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066; Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., supra. BAJI instructions 108-C and 108-D were both given to the jury.[1] They require that both motorist and pedestrian exercise ordinary care; that the driver must be conscious of operating an engine capable of immense and potential danger, and that the pedestrian must be conscious of the fact that he is in the midst of such dangers on the highway and guard against the possibility of injury apparent to a careful, prudent person.

[6] Defendants' instruction number 7 is criticized because it stated that all that is required of defendants to defeat plaintiff's case is to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that some act of negligence on the part of plaintiff proximately contributed even in the slightest degree to the happening of the accident, and that it is not necessary to establish the contributory negligence beyond all reasonable doubt. The instruction was not confusing because of its failure to define reasonable doubt.

[1] 108-C Degree of Caution Involved in Ordinary Care.

While it is the duty of both the driver of a motor vehicle and a pedestrian using a public roadway, to exercise ordinary care, that duty does not require necessarily the same degree of caution from each. The driver of a motor vehicle, when ordinarily careful, will be alertly conscious of the fact that he is in charge of a machine capable of projecting into serious consequences any negligence of his own. Thus his caution must be adequate to that responsibility—as related to all the surrounding circumstances. A pedestrian, on the other hand, has only his own physical body to manage and with which to set in motion a cause of injury. While, usually, that fact limits his capacity to cause injury, as compared with a vehicle driver, still, in exercising ordinary care, he too, will be alertly conscious of the mechanical power acting, or that may act, on the public roadway, and of the possible serious consequences from any conflict between himself and such forces. And the caution required of him is measured by the possibilities of injury apparent to him in the conditions at hand, or that would be apparent to a person of ordinary prudence in the same position.

108-D Duty of Driver—Vigilance—Control of Car.

It is the duty of the driver of a motor vehicle, using a public highway, to be vigilant at all times and to keep the vehicle under such control that, to avoid a collision, he can stop as quickly as might be required of him by eventualities that would be anticipated by an ordinarily prudent driver, in like position.

Since the reasonable doubt rule was not applicable, there was no occasion for its definition.

[7] Defendants' eighth instruction, after defining contributory negligence and after stating that it must have contributed directly and proximately to the injuries sustained in order for it to bar recovery, advised the jury that plaintiff could not recover if it should be determined from the preponderance of the evidence that he was guilty of a want of ordinary care which contributed in any degree to the injuries sustained. No prejudice could arise because of the failure of that instruction to define want of ordinary care. Its meaning is as well known as is that of reasonable care. Not only is the meaning of the word "ordinary" known to the average person, but its significance was made clear in other instructions defining negligence, given at the request of plaintiff.

[8, 9] Defendants' instruction number 9 consists of two elements: (1) the use of public highways is a privilege to which all citizens are equally entitled; (2) the doctrine of contributory negligence is to control if any negligence of plaintiff contributed to the collision and injuries. If neither party had a superior right to be upon Long Beach Boulevard, no prejudice could have resulted from a statement of the first element. Rush v. Lagomarsino, supra; Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743. Whether the plaintiff had the right of way or exercised a sufficient amount of ordinary care which the circumstances required of a prudent person was for the determination of the jury. Salomon v. Meyer, 1 Cal.2d 11, 32 P.2d 631; Mitrovitch v. Graves, 25 Cal.App.2d 649, 653, 78 P.2d 227; Lavin v. Fereira, 10 Cal.App.2d 710, 712, 52 P.2d 518; Bush v. Southern Pacific Co., 106 Cal.App. 101, 108, 289 P. 190; White v. Davis, 103 Cal.App. 531, 284 P. 1086. They fairly so determined upon conflicting evidence. Because the instructions required the driver to exercise a greater amount of caution (Raymond v. Hill, supra; Dawson v. Lalanne, 22 Cal.App.2d 314, 70 P.2d 1002), such rule did not excuse plaintiff from exercising ordinary care. If he was walking at the place fixed by the testimony of Mr. Roach, he was under positive duty to yield the right of way to the truck (Chase v. Thomas, 7 Cal.App.2d 440, 443, 46 P.2d 200), and hence instruction number 9 was applicable. By sections 562 and 560, respectively, of the Vehicle Code a pedestrian is required to yield the right of way if crossing a street outside of a marked crosswalk, while the motorist is required to yield the right of way to the pedestrian if the latter is crossing the street within a marked crosswalk. Both sections were read to the jury. BAJI Instruction 108-C requires that plaintiff must have exercised ordinary care but that he too should have been alertly conscious of the dangers on the street. It was clearly the meaning of defendants' instruction number 9 that plaintiff could not recover if any negligence on his part contributed proximately and directly to the collision. It did not relieve either of the parties of his duty as defined by BAJI 108-C.

[10] As a final illustration of plaintiff's criticisms of defendants' instructions which were read to the jury, we take defendants' instruction number 10. It consists of two parts, namely (1) an abstract statement of the doctrine of imminent peril, and (2) an application of that doctrine to the evidence presented in this case. It does not purport to include all of the evidence. In order to enable the jury to apply the facts before them the instruction says that if the jury finds that plaintiff appeared in the street in such a manner as to constitute a confusing emergency, the driver, if proceeding with ordinary care, was not required to exercise the highest degree of care to avoid a collision, but only ordinary care. It left for the jury's determination whether the driver was acting with ordinary care under all circumstances, and whether plaintiff's appearance constituted a confusing emergency. The criticism of this instruction that it failed to define ordinary care is utterly without merit. That term was thrice defined elsewhere in the instructions as that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under all the surrounding circumstances.

Thus we might extend the volume of this opinion by a meticulous discussion of each of the criticized instructions and with the same result, towit: that no prejudicial error appears.

[11-17] Throughout his brief plaintiff has proceeded upon the assumption that the evidence was not contradictory and that the jury had found that plaintiff with due caution stepped from the curb into the marked crosswalk and, while lawfully and cautiously proceeding, was run down by the truck. In the first place, the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Roach as to the manner in which plaintiff undertook to cross the boulevard appears from the record to be more convincing than the evidence of plaintiff and his witnesses. But aside from the evidence of the Roach couple, it must be borne in mind that the statutory rules for the guidance of persons using a public street prescribe only the minimum measure of care to be exercised, and that whether a traveler has used sufficient care under the circumstances is to be determined by the jury. Bush v. Southern Pacific Co., supra. As circumstances vary, the amount of ordinary care required of a motorist or of a pedestrian will vary. There is no such thing as absolute rules for the conduct of men in their civil relations. Rights are enlarged and duties are diminished with change of circumstance. A pedestrian may not "proceed blindly and in reckless disregard of obvious danger." Fischer v. Keen, 43 Cal.App.2d 244, 110 P.2d 693, 697. For a pedestrian to yield when outside of a marked crosswalk is not the end-all of his duties. He must at all times be reasonably on the alert. When the pedestrian is within the crosswalk the motorist must yield and let him cross over; but when he crosses the street outside of the marked crosswalk he must yield and let the motorist continue on his way. But in any event neither is ever relieved of his duty to exercise reasonable care. The pedestrian has a duty to look in the direction of anticipated dangers and to continue to be alert to safeguard against injury. Lavin v. Fereira, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re KACHIGIAN'S ESTATE.

KACHIGIAN v. KACHIGIAN.

L. A. 17961.

Supreme Court of California.
Sept. 11, 1942.

1. Homestead 🔑81

The 1929 amendment to the homestead statute providing that property out of which a homestead may be selected includes any freehold title, interest or estate which vests in the claimant immediate right of possession, even though such right of possession is not exclusive, operated to change the former rule prohibiting selection of a homestead from an undivided interest in property. Civ.Code, § 1238.

2. Homestead 🔑84

Tenancies in common and joint tenancies are estates from which a homestead may be selected under the 1929 amendment to the homestead statute. Civ.Code, § 1238.

3. Homestead 🔑5

The policy underlying "homestead" legislation is to provide a place for the family and its surviving members where they may reside free from any anxiety that it may be taken from them against their will, either by reason of their own necessity or improvidence or from the importunity of their creditors, and to this end a liberal construction of the law and facts will be adopted. Probate Code, § 661; Civ.Code, § 1238; St.1929, p. 339.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Homestead".

4. Homestead 🔑137

Where deceased and his brother owned vineyard lands as tenants in common, which they operated together and on which they both lived, the court must on petition of surviving spouse set apart to her a probate homestead from decedent's undivided interest. Civ.Code, § 1238; Probate Code, § 661.

5. Executors and administrators 🔑174

The principle of liberal construction applies in construing statutes relating to setting apart of personal property to a surviving spouse as exempt, the same as in the case of a homestead. Civ.Code, § 1238; Probate Code, §§ 660, 661.

6. Executors and administrators 🔑177

A surviving spouse may have set apart to her, as exempt, deceased husband's undivided interest in farming tools and implements used on vineyard lands owned by decedent and his brother as tenants in common. Probate Code, § 660.

7. Executors and administrators 🔑194(7)

Although the right of surviving spouse to have exempt personal property set apart to her is subject to the discretion of the court, an order denying her petition will be reversed where it is apparent from the order that the court did not purport to exercise its discretion in denying such petition, but that it was based on the fact that decedent held the property only as cotenant. Probate Code, § 660.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Harry Kachigian, deceased, wherein Aghavnie Kachigian filed a petition asking the court to set apart to her as a homestead decedent's undivided interest in real estate and to set apart to her as exempt from execution, certain personal property, opposed by Toros Kachigian. From an order of the probate court denying her petition, petitioner appeals.

Reversed.

For prior opinion, see 121 P.2d 869.

Harold M. Child and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Harry Sarkisian, of Fresno, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

The decedent, Harry Kachigian, and his brother Toros owned as tenants in common forty acres of vineyard in Fresno County and certain personal property consisting of farming tools, implements, and equipment used in cultivation. The brothers had operated the vineyard together, and both lived on the land. There were two houses upon the property, one of which was occupied by Toros and the other by Harry and his wife, Aghavnie, the appellant herein. Harry and Aghavnie had no children, and Harry's interest in the land and personalty was his separate property. Pending the administration of Harry's estate his surviving wife petitioned the probate court to set the above real property apart to her as a homestead and also asked that the personal property, designated as exempt from execution and necessary for the operation of the vineyard, be set apart to her. Toros filed objections to the petition, contending that any order setting apart to the widow the decedent's interest in the property would be prejudicial to Toros' rights as tenant in common. That the property is physically suitable for a homestead was not disputed. The trial court denied the petition, and the widow now prosecutes this appeal from the court's order contending that the probate court erred in refusing to set apart a homestead in the realty and that, if this is true, there was an abuse of discretion in refusing to set aside the decedent's interest in the personal property. The principal question now before us, therefore, is whether the probate court should, upon the petition of a surviving wife, select and set apart a homestead for her use out of her deceased husband's undivided one-half interest in real property held by the decedent and a third person as tenants in common.

Prior to 1929 it was well settled in California that, with certain exceptions where the owners were husband and wife, land owned by persons as tenants in common or joint tenants could not be subject to a homestead. The rule announced in Wolf v. Fleischacker, 1855, 5 Cal. 244, 63 Am. Dec. 121, was first applied to an attempt by a co-owner to create a homestead exempt from execution during his life. Reynolds v. Pixley, 6 Cal. 165; Giblin v. Jordan, 6 Cal. 416; Kellersberger v. Kopp, 6 Cal. 563; Bishop v. Hubbard, 23 Cal. 514, 83 Am.Dec. 132; Elias v. Verdugo, 27 Cal. 418; Seaton v. Son, 32 Cal. 481; Cameto v. Dupuy, 47 Cal. 79; First National Bank v. De La Guerra, 61 Cal. 109; Fitzgerald v. Fernandez, 71 Cal. 504, 12 P. 562; Rosenthal v. Merced Bank, 110 Cal. 198, 42 P. 640; Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 548, 83 P. 999. Subsequently, upon the authority of these decisions, it was held that the probate court could not designate a homestead in such property for the use of the family of one of the owners after his death. Kingsley v. Kingsley, 39 Cal. 665; Estate of Carriger, 107 Cal. 618, 40 P. 1032; Estate of Davidson, 159 Cal. 98, 115 P. 49; Estate of Carraghar, 181 Cal. 15, 183 P. 161.

The statutes pertaining to probate homesteads did not define the property out of which such a homestead could be set apart, simply providing that under certain circumstances the probate court could select a homestead out of the real estate of the decedent (former § 1465 of Code Civ.Proc.; Probate Act of 1851, § 124 and § 121 as amended in 1866 and as construed in Estate of Busse, 1868, 35 Cal. 310), and the courts looked to the earlier decisions relating to homesteads sought under the Homestead Act, and, later, the Civil Code, to determine the nature of the property that might be used. For example, in Kingsley v. Kingsley, supra, the first decision refusing to create a probate homestead out of property in which the decedent held an undivided interest, it was stated at pages 666, 667 of 39 Cal.: "There is nothing in [the probate] sections tending to the conclusion that any property could be set apart as a homestead by the Probate Court which might not have been dedicated as a homestead under the Homestead Act, immediately preceding the death of the deceased." In Estate of Davidson, supra, the court said at page 100 of 159 Cal., at page 50 of 115 P.: "It is, of course, well settled that the court in the administration of the estate of a decedent cannot set apart lands of the estate, as a probate homestead, unless they were lands upon which a homestead could have been impressed in the lifetime of the deceased. * * * So the question presented here is, Could either spouse during the lifetime of the husband impress a homestead solely on his undivided interest * * *? If this could have been done, the court erred in refusing to make the homestead order asked by petitioner." Similar reasoning was expressed in other probate cases. Estate of Carriger, supra; cf. Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 590, 592, 15 P. 290, 2 Am.St.Rep. 834.

The probate homestead statutes have remained substantially unchanged, insofar as the present question is concerned, and the Probate Code, enacted in 1931, now provides that the court must select the probate homestead "out of the separate property of the decedent" if there is no community property or property owned in common by the decedent and the person entitled to the homestead. Prob.Code, § 661. If we find, therefore, that the restrictive rule as to homesteads declared during the life of the owner has been changed by the Legislature, it necessarily follows from the reasoning of the probate cases that a like result must be reached where a probate homestead is sought.

The respondent contends that it must be presumed that the Legislature was familiar with the former decisions and that in failing to change the probate statutes it must have intended to leave the probate law unchanged; but, if we presume that the Legislature was familiar with the former decisions, it would seem improper for us to presume that it was unaware of their basic reasoning and hold that it did not realize the probate rule must change if the basis therefor were changed.

[1, 2] In our opinion the former rule prohibiting the selection of a homestead from an undivided interest in property during the lifetime of the owner has been abandoned. Prior to 1929 section 1238 of the Civil Code read: "If the claimant be married, the homestead may be selected from the community property, or the separate property of the husband, or, with the consent of the wife, from her separate property. * * *" In that year the Legislature added the following sentence: "Property, within the meaning of this section, includes any freehold title, interest, or estate which vests in the claimant the immediate right of possession, even though such right of possession is not exclusive." St.1929, p. 339. In view of the law prevailing at the time of this amendment it seems obvious that the amendment could have referred only to estates such as tenancies in common and joint tenancies, for the cases establishing that law were based upon the theory that because of the nature of such tenancies, in particular, the absence of an exclusive right of possession, it was impossible to segregate and delimit the undivided interest sought to be impressed with a homestead. Estate of Davidson, supra, 159 Cal. pages 100, 101, 115 P. 49; Seaton v. Son, supra, 32 Cal. page 484. The Legislature removed this judicially imposed obstacle. In Watson v. Peyton, 10 Cal.2d 156, 73 P.2d 906, this court, in holding that a husband could without the consent of his wife declare a homestead upon property held by them as joint tenants, cited the earlier cases and said at pages 159, 160 of 10 Cal.2d, at page 908 of 73 P.2d: "The amendment to section 1238 of the Civil Code followed these cases and declared that the 'property' from which a husband could select a homestead was that 'estate' which vests in the claimant the immediate right of possession, even though such right of possession is not exclusive. It is such an estate that the husband has in property held in joint tenancy with his wife—a right of possession though not exclusive, but nevertheless a separate estate upon which he may declare a homestead." Cf., also, In re Sterling, D.C.S.D.Cal., 20 F.Supp. 924; In re Miller, D.C.S.D.Cal., 27 F.Supp. 999. The reasoning in the Watson case seems equally applicable to situations wherein the cotenants are not husband and wife.

[3] The policy underlying all homestead legislation, whether providing for the selection of a homestead by a person during his lifetime or by the court for his family after his death, is as stated in Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 609, 613, 64 P. 995, 997, "to provide a place for the family and its surviving members, where they may reside and enjoy the comforts of a home, freed from any anxiety that it may be taken from them against their will, either by reason of their own necessity or improvidence, or from the importunity of their creditors," and to this end a liberal construction of the law and facts will be adopted by the courts. See, also, Estate of Adams, 128 Cal. 380, 383, 57 P. 569, 60 P. 965; Lucci v. United Credit & Collection Co., 220 Cal. 492, 496, 31 P.2d 369; Greenlee v. Greenlee, 7 Cal. 2d 579, 583, 61 P.2d 1157. Our view that tenancies in common and joint tenancies may now be subject to homestead rights is in furtherance of this policy, and it extends the benefits of the statutes to many families which would otherwise be deprived thereof. The former restrictive rule was early recognized as harsh in its operation, but the court felt bound by its first decision in Wolf v. Fleischacker, 5 Cal. 244, 63 Am.Dec. 121. For example, see Giblin v. Jordan, 6 Cal. 416, 418; In re Carriger's Estate, 107 Cal. 618, 621, 40 P. 1032; Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 198, 199, 103 P. 931, 134 Am.St.Rep. 118, 20 Ann.Cas. 194. Mr. Justice Olney, by a separate concurring opinion in Estate of Carraghar, supra, at page 21 of 181 Cal. at page 163 of 183 P., said: "I concur, but solely on the ground that the question is now determined by the previous decisions of this court. If it were not for those decisions I believe the rule should be that a homestead may be imposed in the instances provided by the statute regardless of the character of the title of the homestead claimant or his or her spouse, the homestead, of course, affecting only the interests of the claimant or spouse, whatever those interests may be. The only requirement of the statute in this respect is that the claimant be residing upon the premises, and to require more than this and make the validity of the homestead dependent upon the character of the interests affected is without statutory warrant, and contrary to the object of the statute. The injustice, I think, is manifest in the present case." Further, the majority of the other jurisdictions have held that no distinction is to be made between estates in severalty and estates in cotenancy. See cases collected in 89 A.L.R. 511, 540, et seq.

It cannot be said that the rights of the other cotenant are in any way prejudiced, as the homestead claimant, or his surviving family, acquires only such rights of occupancy as he had before the creation of the homestead, and the other cotenant's interest is in no way affected; for example, his right to use the property remains exactly as before and he may sell or assign his undivided share. If he objects to his cotenant, his remedy is by partition. Code Civ.Proc. § 752, et seq.; 20 Cal.Jur. 586, et seq.; see, also, other remedies between cotenants enumerated in 7 Cal.Jur. 363, et seq.

[4] We hold, therefore, that the court must select and set apart for appellant a probate homestead from the undivided interest of the decedent in the real property in question.

[5-7] The disposition of the exempt personal property of the decedent is governed by section 660 of the Probate Code, which provides that "the court, on petition therefor, may in its discretion set apart to the surviving spouse * * * all or any part of the property of the decedent exempt from execution * * *." This section, as well as section 661, was derived from former section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as in the homestead provisions, no mention is made of property in which the decedent held only an undivided interest. This court, however, in Estate of Pillsbury, 175 Cal. 454, at page 457, 166 P. 11, at page 13, 3 A.L.R. 1396, in holding that the right to exempt property could be waived, said: "In the matter of the probate of an estate the governing principle in construing section 1465, Code of Civil Procedure, is the same in the case of all other exempt property as it is in the case of a homestead. * * * The absolute identity in principle between the setting apart of a homestead under section 1465, Code of Civil Procedure, and the setting apart of all other property declared to be exempt from execution, is announced and established in Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 446." That personal property held in cotenancy may be exempt from execution is not disputed. Stanton v. French, 83 Cal. 194, 23 P. 355. Thus, in accordance with the principles above discussed with regard to appellant's right to a homestead, she may also have set apart to her the decedent's undivided interest in the exempt personal property. This right, however, is subject to the discretion of the court below. Prob. Code, § 660, supra. In the instant case it is apparent from the face of the order denying the petition that the court relied solely upon the fact that the decedent held the property only as a cotenant and that the court did not purport to exercise its discretion in disposing of the personalty, and we need not at this time determine whether or not, after designating a homestead, a refusal to so set apart the personal property would be an abuse of discretion.

The judgment is reversed.

KENT et al. v. CLARK.

L. A. 17845.

Supreme Court of California.

Sept. 11, 1942.

1. Fraud 🔑31, 34

A purchaser induced by fraudulent representations of the vendor to enter into executory contract for purchase of realty may elect to affirm the contract, retain the realty and sue vendor for damages in an action for deceit and having chosen that course on discovery of the vendor's fraud the purchaser need not continue performance but may properly withhold payments under the contract in an amount necessary to recoup the damages which he has suffered.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑314(2)

Since purchaser's failure to make payments under executory contract for purchase of realty is excused by fraud in the inception of contract, purchaser may set up vendor's fraud as a defense to action for the balance due under the contract by way of answer to the whole demand or in abatement of the damages, according to the circumstances.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚷299(3)

In action by vendor to cancel contract for sale of realty, to quiet title to the property and for possession of the premises, purchaser may plead fraud of vendor in inducing purchaser to enter into the contract.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚷335

A purchaser induced by fraudulent representations of vendor to enter into executory contract for purchase of realty may elect to rescind contract for fraud, restore possession to vendor and recover the purchase money paid less the fair rental value for the use of the property during occupancy, and that right of rescission is available to a purchaser in default.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⚷117

Actual surrender of property received under executory contract for purchase of realty is not a prerequisite to purchaser's suit to rescind contract for fraud in its inception, if purchaser offers to restore the property to vendor provided vendor makes restitution of the purchase money paid. Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⚷299(1)

Where purchaser served notice of rescission of executory contract for sale of realty on the ground of fraud in the inception of contract and offered to restore possession to vendors upon repayment of purchase money paid under contract less reasonable rental value of realty, purchaser thereafter remaining in possession though in default was entitled to set up fraud in the inception of contract as a defense in vendors' action of ejectment, and exclusion of evidence tending to prove such fraud as a conditional defense required reversal of judgment for vendors. Civ.Code, § 1691, subd. 2.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⚷299(3)

In action of ejectment by vendors against a purchaser in default under executory contract of sale, purchaser was entitled to file a cross complaint for rescission of contract on the ground of vendors' fraud in inducing execution of contract and for a judgment representing amount paid under the contract together with reasonable value of improvements placed on the realty less the value of the use during occupancy, since the relief thus sought related to the "transaction" upon which action in ejectment was brought within statute authorizing cross-complaints. Code Civ.Proc. § 442.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Transaction".

8. Pleading ⚷147

Under statute permitting a defendant seeking affirmative relief relating to a "transaction" to file a cross complaint, the facts surrounding the cause of action and not the form of the complaint are determinative of what constitutes the transaction and if the defendant's pleading sets forth matter inextricably related to the matter forming the basis of the complaint, it meets statutory requirements of a "cross complaint" and it is immaterial that the relief sought is independent of that prayed for in the complaint. Code Civ.Proc. § 442.

For prior opinion, see 122 P.2d 521.

Lorrin Andrews and Wm. J. Clark, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Emil H. Koehl, of Hollywood, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The question presented for decision by this appeal is whether, in an action of ejectment brought by a vendor of realty against a vendee in default under an executory contract of sale, the vendee may set up fraud in the inception of the contract, either by way of defense to the action or by way of cross-complaint for rescission or damages. The trial court answered it in the negative and rendered judgment for the respondents, who are the vendors of the property in controversy.

The appellant entered into a written contract with the respondents under which she agreed to purchase a house and lot for the sum of $4,500, of which amount $200 was paid in cash. She agreed to pay the balance in stated instalments, with interest, and also to pay the taxes upon the property. Time was of the essence of the agreement. Although not provided for by the contract, she was given possession of the property.

Three years passed, during which the appellant made all payments required by the contract with the exception of certain taxes. Although these payments were not promptly made, the vendors accepted them. But upon the appellant's failure to pay an instalment which accrued in August, 1939, the respondents demanded, in writing, that she remedy the default immediately. Although there is some dispute as to the amount which was due at that time, the appellant admits that she was then in default so far as the payment of taxes is concerned.

A week later the respondents wrote another letter informing the appellant that unless the delinquent taxes and the balance of the instalment of principal then overdue were paid within three days, a forfeiture would be declared. The day after this letter was written, the appellant served upon the vendors a written refusal to make further payments and a notice of rescission of the contract, offering to restore to them the property upon condition that they return to her all money paid under the agreement, less the reasonable value of the use of the property. One month later, the vendors served a notice advising the appellant that her rights under the contract were thereby declared forfeited and demanding possession of the property. She made no further effort to remedy her default and refused to comply with the demand for surrender of possession. The present action followed.

The complaint alleges the making of the contract, the default thereunder, the vendee's attempted repudiation and rescission, and her refusal to surrender possession after demand. These facts state a cause of action in ejectment upon which the vendors sought no further relief than possession of the property. To this complaint the appellant filed an answer, admitting execution of the agreement, her possession and default thereunder. By way of an affirmative defense, she alleged that the respondents demanded of her more than was due to them, that she was not given a reasonable time in which to remedy her default, and that she was induced to enter into the contract through the false and fraudulent representations of the vendors.

These asserted representations, all of which concern the nature, character and value of the property, are set forth with particularity. The answer also contains an allegation of the appellant's notice of rescission of the contract, her offer of restoration of the property to the respondents upon the condition that they return to her all money paid under the contract less the reasonable value of the use of the premises, and the refusal of the respondents to comply with this demand.

In a cross-complaint, the appellant alleged the same representations, the fact that she had given notice of rescission, and the refusal of respondents to accept her conditional offer of restoration of the property. Under this pleading she prayed for a decree declaring the contract to be rescinded and for a judgment in the sum of $2,219.72, representing the amount paid by her under the contract, together with the reasonable value of the improvements placed upon the property by her, less the value of its use during her occupancy.

At the trial of the case upon these pleadings, when the respondents had concluded the presentation of evidence, the appellant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that she was not in default in the sum demanded by them and also that she had not been given a reasonable time in which to remedy her default. This motion was denied. She then proceeded with the presentation of her defense and offered evidence tending to prove fraud in the inception of the contract, as alleged in her answer and cross-complaint. The respondents objected to this evidence upon the ground that the alleged fraud was neither a proper subject of defense nor cross-complaint to an action in ejectment where possession only was demanded. The court sustained this objection. The appellant then made an offer of proof, to which the respondents interposed the same objection with the same ruling.

Thereafter the court gave judgment for the respondents, based upon findings that the appellant had repudiated, and was in default under the contract of sale; that the contract was not terminated by mutual consent; that the appellant had at all times since her default refused to make further payments under the agreement; that the respondents, as vendors, were entitled to possession of the property, but that the appellant was entitled to a reasonable time in which to remedy her default. The judgment fixed this time as not exceeding 60 days from its entry.

The appellant asserts that the ruling of the trial court in sustaining objections to evidence in support of her allegations of fraud was erroneous, and that the court also erred in failing to make findings of fact upon that issue. She also contends that it was an abuse of discretion to deny her motion for a new trial. The respondents rest their case upon the proposition that in an action of ejectment, the defendant may not set up fraud in the inception of the contract under which he took and held possession either by way of answer or cross-complaint. More specifically, they rely upon the principle, frequently announced in the authorities, to the effect that where a vendee in possession under an executory contract of purchase has failed to perform his part of the contract and is in default with respect thereto without excuse, he may not maintain an equitable defense to an action of ejectment by the vendor.

[1] Two distinct remedies are open to a vendee who has been induced to enter into the contract of purchase by the fraudulent representations of his vendor. Notwithstanding the vendor's fraud, he may elect to affirm the contract, retain the property received under it and sue the vendor for damages in an action for deceit. Having chosen that course upon the discovery of the vendor's fraud, the vendee need not continue performance but may properly withhold payments under the contract in an amount necessary to recoup the damages which he has suffered. In other words, because of the vendor's fraud, he may avoid the obligation stated by the contract and excuse what would otherwise be a default. Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 P. 692; Paolini v. Sulprizio, 201 Cal. 683, 258 P. 380; Pembrook v. Houston, 41 Cal.App. 54, 181 P. 828; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Assn., 65 Cal.App. 727, 225 P. 291; 25 Cal.Jur. 560.

[2, 3] In such a situation, as the vendee's failure to make payments is excused, he may set up the seller's fraud as a defense to an action for the balance due under the contract, by way of answer to the whole demand, or in abatement of the damages, according to the circumstances of the case. Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 P. 550; Field v. Austin, supra; Hunter v. McKenzie, 197 Cal. 176, 239 P. 1090; Paolini v. Sulprizio, supra; Pembrook v. Houston, supra; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Ass'n, supra And, for the same reason, the fraud of the vendor may be pleaded as a defense in an action by the vendor to have the contract canceled, to quiet title to the property, and for possession of the premises. The reason for this rule was stated in Nevada Land & Inv. Corp. v. Sistrunk, 220 Cal. 174, 30 P.2d 389, 390, where the court declared: "There would be little consistency or justice in a rule which, when the suit was for the payments due under the contract, would allow the buyer to set up damage caused by the fraud of the seller in answer to the demand or in abatement of damages, but, when the action was one for possession of the premises and to quiet title, would not allow the same matter to be pleaded as a defense against a forfeiture for failure to make the payments which the law says he may withhold."

[4] But the defrauded vendee has another and alternative remedy. He may elect to rescind the contract for fraud, restore possession to the vendor, and recover the purchase money paid less the fair rental value for the use of the property during his occupancy. This right of rescission is available to a vendee in default. Graham v. Los Angeles First N. T. & S. Bank, 3 Cal.2d 37, 43 P.2d 543; Lombardi v. Sinanides, 71 Cal.App. 272, 235 P. 455.

However, by certain decisions it has been broadly and unqualifiedly held that a vendee who has elected to disaffirm the contract for fraud, may not thereafter remain in possession of the property and defend against an action in ejectment brought by the vendor. Having taken possession by virtue of the contract, it is said, the vendee may retain that possession only by faithfully performing the conditions of the contract under which he entered, and if he desires to rescind, he may do so only by a surrender of the premises to the vendor. To hold otherwise, according to this reasoning, would allow the vendee to assume the inconsistent position of repudiating the contract and at the same time claiming under it. This analysis of the legal principles involved, at least as applied to the facts of the present case, may not be legally or logically sustained.

[5] True, a defrauded vendee desiring to rescind his contract "must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so." § 1691 (2), Civ.Code. But under the express terms of this code section actual surrender of the property by the vendee seeking rescission is not a prerequisite to a suit if he has offered to restore the property to the vendor. Keller, 67 Cal.App. 659, 228 P. 383; Norton v. Rosenkranz, 62 Cal.App. 226, 216 P. 380; Bellone v. Kleinau, 54 Cal.App. 428, 201 P. 977. And the statute declares that the offer to surrender possession of property received under the contract need not be unqualified but may be made conditional upon the vendor's restitution of the purchase money. Accord: Rest., Contracts, §§ 480 (3), 349 (3).

[6] Applying the statutory rule to the facts of the present case, the appellant, upon discovery of the respondents' alleged fraud, served notice of rescission and offered to restore possession of the property to them upon condition that they return to her all money paid by her under the contract, less the reasonable rental value of the premises. If the respondents are guilty of the asserted fraud, this notice and offer established the right of the appellant to avoid the transaction, and as a result of their refusal to comply with her demand, she had the right to retain possession of the property until such restitution was effected and assert that right by pleading and proving the facts establishing the fraud. She does not question the vendor's title to the property, and, in fact, she has offered to restore possession of it. In effect, therefore, by her pleading she has agreed to treat the action as an acceptance of her offer. But she demands, as an incident to her right to rescind, that possession be given the vendor concurrently with his restoration to her of the purchase money. Under these circumstances, if, upon trial, the vendee proves that the vendor is guilty of fraud justifying a rescission of the contract, the court should render its judgment that the vendor is entitled to possession of the property in controversy upon payment of the amount he has received, together with the value of any improvements which the vendee has placed upon the land (Barrows v. Harter, 165 Cal. 45, 130 P. 1050; Worley v. Nethercott, 91 Cal. 512, 27 P. 767, 25 Am.St.Rep. 209; Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 11 P. 489), less the reasonable rental value of the vendee's occupancy. See Rest., Contracts, §§ 481, 354. The ruling which foreclosed the appellant from introducing any evidence tending to prove fraud as a conditional defense to the action is directly contrary to the principles which have been stated and requires a reversal of the judgment.

Insofar as the case of Los Molinos Land Co. v. MacKay, 175 Cal. 305, 165 P. 926, is contrary to these conclusions, it is overruled and Watkins v. Warren, 122 Cal.App. 617, 10 P.2d 500, and Hincksman v. Delacour, 47 Cal.App. 416, 190 P. 832, are disapproved.

[7, 8] The facts relied upon by the appellant also furnish a proper basis for her cross-complaint. Section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract, transaction, matter, happening or accident upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time * * * a cross-complaint. * * *" The more recent cases have approved a broad and liberal interpretation of the phrase "transaction * * * upon which the action is brought." Hanes v. Coffee, 212 Cal. 777, 300 P. 963; California Trust Co. v. Cohn, 214 Cal. 619, 622, 7 P.2d 297; Nevada Land & Inv. Corp. v. Sistrunk, supra. The facts surrounding the cause of action and not the form of the complaint are determinative of what constitutes the "transaction." If the defendant's pleading sets forth matter inextricably related to the matter forming the basis of the plaintiff's complaint, it meets the statutory requirements of a cross-complaint, and it is immaterial that the relief sought thereby is independent of that prayed for in the complaint.

Tested by these principles, it is clear that the alleged fraud of the respondents arose out of the identical transaction which is the basis of their cause of action in ejectment. They demand possession of the property because of the appellant's breach of contract. She charges fraud in inducing the execution of that contract. Were it not for the contract, therefore, neither party would have had occasion to bring suit.

The judgment is reversed.

ENGINEERS, Ltd., v. SUPERIOR COURT OF HUMBOLDT COUNTY et al.

Civ. 6864.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 1, 1942.

1. Prohibition 🔑10(1)

Prohibition will lie only when a court is proceeding without jurisdiction or is assuming an unauthorized power.

2. Prohibition 🔑10(2)

Prohibition would not lie to prevent superior court from proceeding with trial on issues raised by complaint seeking recovery of damages for an unlawful trespass and removal of large quantities of gravel from plaintiffs' premises until after determination of an appeal by one of defendants from an order dismissing cross-complaints involving a controversy between defendants and a third party, with which plaintiffs had no concern, since superior court had jurisdiction to determine as a matter of procedure whether it would try issues raised by complaint and answer first.

Proceeding in prohibition by Engineers, Limited, to restrain the Superior Court of Humboldt County, and Harry W. Falk, Judge thereof, from trying an action.

Writ denied.

Hartley F. Peart and Howard Hassard, both of San Francisco, Blaine McGowan, of Eureka, and George A. Smith and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Chas. Reagh, of San Francisco, and Hill & Hill, of Eureka, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This is a proceeding in prohibition to restrain the Superior Court of Humboldt County from trying an action pending appeal from an order dismissing cross-complaints.

The petition for the writ alleges that Louis Biasci and Marjorie Connick commenced separate actions in the Superior Court of Humboldt County against C. Dudley DeVelbiss and petitioner as defendants, alleging that defendants had entered upon their premises unlawfully and removed large quantities of gravel therefrom; that petitioner filed answers in said actions denying the allegations of the complaints, and setting up as special defenses that if any trespass had been committed, as alleged in the complaints, same had been committed by defendant DeVelbiss acting for himself and as agent for A. Soda & Sons; that two cross-complaints were filed in the action by Engineers, Ltd., the one being directed against defendant DeVelbiss, and alleging that a contract had been entered into between Engineers, Ltd., and DeVelbiss for the delivery by the latter to the former of a quantity of gravel, said contract providing that said gravel should be procured from places other than any point north of the central line of the Eel River, and that without authority of cross-complainant said DeVelbiss had taken gravel from various places situated on the north bank of the Eel River, and that as a direct result of such action appellant was damaged in the Connick case in the sum of $1,500, and in the Biasci case in the sum of $6,000; that in a second cross-complaint defendant DeVelbiss was joined with A. Soda & Sons, it being alleged that the latter had a contract with the state to build approaches to a bridge which was being constructed by Engineers, Ltd., and had a contract with DeVelbiss under which the latter was to furnish gravel for A. Soda & Sons for such work, and that, acting as agent for A. Soda & Sons, defendant DeVelbiss had trespassed upon the property of plaintiffs, and that as a result, Engineers, Ltd., had suffered damages in the amounts alleged in the first cross-complaint; that on motion of plaintiff the court had stricken out said cross-complaints, and petitioner had appealed; that plaintiffs had moved to dismiss said appeals, and that said motions were under submission by the court.

It is further alleged that in disregard of petitioner's rights, and in spite of its opposition, respondent had set the cases for trial, and would proceed therewith unless prohibited by this court; that said superior court had no jurisdiction in said matter for the reason that said appeals are pending, and that any further action by the trial court with regard to same "will materially affect the order appealed from and your petitioner's rights thereunder to have all of said controversy settled among all of the parties thereto in one action."

[1] In Klement v. Superior Court, 21 Cal.App.2d 456, 69 P.2d 869, this court said that it is only when a court is proceeding without jurisdiction or is assuming an unauthorized power, that prohibition will lie. We also held in that case, an action on a contract in which a cross-complaint for damages for defamation of character by cross-defendants was dismissed and an appeal taken from the order of dismissal, that the trial court had jurisdiction to determine, as a matter of procedure, whether it should try the issues raised by the complaint and answer, and leave the issues formed by the cross-complaint to be determined later, or to await the action of a reviewing court to determine whether or not the cross-complaint was well founded, before proceeding with the trial.

In Hayes v. Pierce, 15 Cal.2d 662, 104 P.2d 499, an action was brought by a first mortgagee to foreclose a mortgage on property covered by a contract to sell. A cross-complaint seeking rescission of the contract was stricken out by the trial court, and the foreclosure action was tried over the objection of cross-complainant and pending an appeal from the order striking out said cross-complaint. There, as here, it was contended that the appeal had divested the trial court of jurisdiction to hear and determine the issues raised by the complaint and answer; but the court held that the trial court had power to determine, as a matter of procedure, whether it should try the issues raised by the complaint and answer and leave the issues formed by the cross-complaint to be determined later, or await the action of a reviewing court to determine whether or not the cross-complaint was well founded, before proceeding to trial. It cited Klement v. Superior Court, supra, and added that in deciding that the trial should proceed despite the pendency of the appeal, the trial court exercised a wise discretion.

[2] In the case before us no good reason appears why the rights of plaintiffs to recover for trespass on their lands, if such trespass there was, should await a determination of the controversy between defendants and another, with which controversy plaintiffs had no concern.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Georgia P. Bullock, Judge.

Action by the California Employment Commission against the Betthesda Foundation, a corporation, to recover unemployment contributions for certain years. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Affirmed.

Milan Medigovich and A. G. Fickeisen, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., John J. Dailey, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Maurice P. McCaffrey, Glenn V. Walls, and Doris H. Maier, all of Sacramento, for respondent

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action under the provisions of section 45 of the California Unemployment Insurance Act, Chap. 352, Stats.1935, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 8780d, to recover unemployment insurance contributions for the calendar years 1936, 1937 and 1938. Defendant alleged that it is organized and operated exclusively for charitable purposes and claimed to be exempt from making the contributions. The trial court made findings adverse to the allegations of defendant and gave judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant prosecutes this appeal. There is also a purported appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

We are called upon to determine the question whether the evidence sustains the trial court's finding that defendant is not such an institution as is exempt under the provisions of section 7(g) of the act, which excludes from the obligation to make contributions: "Service performed in the employ of a corporation, community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual."

Defendant corporation was incorporated on October 11, 1935, under the provisions of section 606 of the Civil Code, relating to nonprofit corporations for charitable purposes. On January 1, 1936, defendant began the operation of the Angelus Hospital and the Dr. R. B. Jenkins Clinic. These institutions are located at 1925 Trinity Street and 1901 Trinity Street respectively. The Angelus Hospital is an institution of 110-bed capacity and has been continuously operated as a hospital since its construction in 1904. Before the incorporation of defendant the hospital and the clinic were operated by Dr. R. B. Jenkins directly or indirectly through the medium of R. B. Jenkins Corporation. Dr. Jenkins held the property under a lease from the Washington Holding Company and he subleased the properties to defendant corporation upon the commencement of its operations, the rental price being $500 per month during 1936, $600 per month during 1937 and $650 per month during 1938. Defendant had no assets or liabilities at the time it took over the properties. Dr. Jenkins, the president of defendant corporation, continued to be in charge of the hospital and the clinic.

In operating the clinic and the hospital defendant charged a fixed fee for each service rendered. If a patient could pay the charge it was collected in full but if he could pay only a part of the charge the down payment was taken and an attempt was made to collect the balance at a later date. If the patient was entirely without funds the services rendered were set up at the fixed rate and an attempt was later made to collect the amount of the charge or as much of it as possible. The secretary of defendant corporation testified that some of the nonpaying patients might actually develop later into paying patients and if so the money received was credited to income. Attempts were made to collect all charges for services through an outside collector employed by defendant. During the year 1936 the hospital had a total of 1,782 patients, classified as 1,156 full-pay, 578 part-pay and 48 non-pay. Of the 578 part-pay patients, 519 were school children who were referred to the hospital for tonsilectomies by a Dr. Dryer, who performed the necessary surgical work and paid to the hospital the $2.50 charge for each pupil. During the years 1937 and 1938 a larger number of patients were admitted but the proportion of full-pay and non-pay patients remained substantially the same as in 1936.

Deductions for unemployment insurance were made by defendant from all cash wages paid to its employees but these deductions were not remitted to plaintiff.

[1-3] The general rule that the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal if the record discloses substantial evidence to support them is applicable to the present appeal. All intendments are in favor of the judgment of the lower court. The evidence must be considered in light of the rule that provisions for exemption from taxation are to be strictly construed against the taxpayer. Helping Hand Home v. San Diego County, 26 Cal. App.2d 452, 459, 79 P.2d 778. The trial court could draw reasonable inferences from the facts established and base its findings thereon. In making its findings the trial court was not bound by the articles of incorporation of defendant or the fact that it was organized under section 606 of the Civil Code but it could take into consideration the actual conduct of defendant and its methods of operation. Estate of Dol, 182 Cal. 159, 166, 187 P. 428; Stewart v. California Medical, etc., Association, 178 Cal. 418, 421, 176 P. 46.

[4] In making its findings the trial court could properly take into consideration the fact that defendant was incorporated shortly after the enactment of the statute sought to be enforced by this litigation; that without assets of its own it took over a private institution which it continued to operate with the same staff which had previously operated it; that it received no gifts or donations from individuals or from the Community Chest or any similar organization; that it has no legal obligation whatever to perform any particular act of charity; that the institution under defendant's control was operated and maintained upon revenue derived wholly from fixed charges against its patients.

[5, 6] In order to be exempt from making the contributions it was incumbent upon defendant to prove that it was organized exclusively for charitable purposes; that it was and is operated for charitable purposes; and that no part of its net earnings inured to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual. We are satisfied that the finding of the trial court that defendant failed to establish these points is sustained by the evidence.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by August H. Lindstrom against Douglas B. Palmer and others for fraud and deceit. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant National Surety Corporation appeals

Affirmed.

James H. Sims and Bailie, Turner & Lake, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Erwin H. Haas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Respondent brought the instant action for fraud and deceit against the corporation, Palmer, Miller & Co., a licensed security broker, and joined Douglas B. Palmer, James Crosson Miller, officers and stockholders of the corporation, and Harold Carter, a salesman. National Surety Corporation was also joined as surety for the corporation on its bond in the sum of $5,000.

From the judgment in favor of respondent and against Douglas B. Miller, Palmer, Miller & Co., and the National Surety Corporation, for $4,069.37, the National Surety Corporation prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant urges primarily that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's findings that the transaction here sued upon was a corporate rather than a personal transaction; and secondarily, that the evidence does not disclose that the said transaction was one covered by the surety's bond.

In addition to finding that respondent beginning on November 23, 1938, was a customer of defendant corporation and that he purchased through it as his broker 1,660 shares of common capital stock of Interstate Aircraft & Engineering Corp., and on the 7th of February, 1939, was the owner of said shares, the court also found that on February 7, 1939, defendant corporation, through defendant Palmer acting in his capacity as president and general manager thereof, entered into an agreement to purchase from respondent said 1,660 shares of said Interstate stock, at the agreed price of $4,070, of which the sum of $35 was forthwith paid in cash, the balance payable August 1, 1939, with interest at 6 per cent per annum. That at the time and as a part of the same agreement, defendant agreed that the said corporation would issue to respondent an aggregate of 370 shares of its preferred capital stock and 740 shares of its common capital stock and that on August 1, 1939, said preferred shares would be repurchased at $11 per share plus 6 per cent accrued interest from February 1, 1939. That on April 14, 1939, a certificate evidencing 370 shares of preferred stock of defendant corporation was transferred by defendants Palmer, Miller & Co. and Douglas B. Palmer to respondent, but only 74 shares of common stock were issued; "and it is true that the defendants did not, on August 1, 1939, or at any other time, faithfully and honestly perform their obligation to pay to plaintiff the agreed balance of $4015 together with interest at six per cent (6%) per annum from February 1, 1939, except that it is true that the defendants have heretofore paid to plaintiff the sum of $466 as and for interest for the period from February 1, 1939, to January 20, 1941, and the sum of $182 on account of said principal."

The court found that defendant corporation and defendant Palmer purchased said 1,660 shares of Interstate from respondent "with the purpose of reselling them and of offering them for sale to the public and that all of said shares were thereafter and within a short period of time sold by" defendant corporation.

It was further found that in order to induce respondent to enter into said agreement, "and for the purpose of deceiving, injuring and defrauding the plaintiff, the defendants, Palmer, Miller & Co., and Douglas B. Palmer, concealed from him facts which were particularly within their knowledge and which they knew to be true, to-wit: That the financial condition of Palmer, Miller & Co., was bad and that it had accounts payable which were due and which it was unable to pay and knew that it had a deficit from operations in the sum of $16,000 or thereabouts and knew that the broker's certificate theretofore issued to it was to be cancelled and revoked by the Commissioner of Corporations because of the company's bad financial condition and impairment of capital. * * *

"VII. The court finds that it is true that the defendants Palmer, Miller & Co., and Douglas B. Palmer represented to plaintiff that the defendant Palmer, Miller & Co., was in a good condition and * * * that it had been in business a long time and was going to continue in the brokerage business; * * * that defendants represented that Palmer, Miller & Co. was to be the exclusive broker for the sale of all the stock of the Interstate Aircraft & Engineering Corp., and that if anyone wanted to buy its stock he would have to come to them to purchase it. That said representations were false and untrue and were known by the defendants at the time of making same to be false and untrue and that it is true that said statements and representations were made for the purpose of deceiving, injuring and defrauding the plaintiff and for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff into said agreement for the sale of his 1660 shares * * * that plaintiff believed and relied on said statements and representations and thereupon entered into said agreement and was injured and defrauded thereby."

It was further found that on February 7, 1939, the articles of incorporation of defendant corporation did not provide for any preferred stock and that an amendment to its articles of incorporation creating such preferred stock was not filed in the office of the secretary of state until March 2, 1939, and at the time the said agreement was made on February 7, 1939, said corporation had no permit to sell and issue its preferred stock and at no time was such a permit issued by the commissioner of corporations. "That it is true that plaintiff did not purchase said shares of stock of Palmer, Miller & Co., but accepted same as a guarantee that the defendants would faithfully perform the obligations of their agreement."

As a conclusion of law from the facts found, the court decreed: "That the said transaction referred to in the foregoing findings of fact constituted a brokerage transaction under the terms and conditions of the bond filed and maintained by said defendant with the Commissioner of Corporations and within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act of the State of California."

The agreement heretofore referred to was evidenced by the following letter introduced in evidence as Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2:

"Palmer, Miller & Co., Investment Securities, 650 South Spring St., Los Angeles * * * February 7th, 1939 Mr. August H. Lindstrom, 228 West 30th St., Los Angeles, Calif. Dear Mr. Lindstrom: Attached is my personal note for the amount of $3,700 dated February 1st, 1939 and maturing August 1st, 1939 which bears interest at the rate of six per cent per annum. As collateral security for this note is 7500 shares of Palmer, Miller & Co. Common stock of which there is 25,000 shares outstanding.

"Palmer, Miller & Co. are amending their Articles of Incorporation to create a Six per cent Cumulative Preferred Stock $10.00 par value, callable at $11.00 per share. With each share of Preferred stock will be given two shares of Common stock.

"When the Preferred stock is ready for delivery it is understood you are to return the 7500 shares of Common stock and personal note $3700 to me and receive 370 shares of the Preferred stock of Palmer, Miller & Co., and 740 shares of Common stock.

"Receipt is hereby acknowledged of 1660 shares Interstate Aircraft & Engineering Corp. Common stock @ $2.25 per share, value $3735. Attached is my check for $35.00

"It is further understood I am to repurchase from you the 370 shares of Palmer, Miller & Co. Preferred stock on August 1, 1939 at $11.00 per share plus accrued interest from February 1st, 1939.

"Your very truly, Douglas B. Palmer."

Plaintiff's Exhibit 3 reads as follows:

"Palmer, Miller & Co., Investment Securities, 650 South Spring Street, Bank of America Building, Los Angeles, Calif.

Douglas B. Palmer, Office Feb. 7, 1939

As Principals we have this day Bought from you for our own account:

Assuring you of our appreciation of this business, we are,

The evidence adduced at the trial reveals that defendant Carter, a licensed salesman for defendant corporation Palmer, Miller & Co., sold respondent the 1,660 shares of Interstate Aircraft stock through Palmer, Miller & Co.; that during the early part of 1939 said Carter contacted respondent, at defendant Palmer's suggestion, and had him come to the office of the corporation. Moreover, Cater told respondent he could liquidate his Interstate Aircraft stock for more money.

Defendant Palmer, called as a witness by respondent testified he was the president and general manager, as well as one of three directors of the corporation and owned one-half of its 25,000 outstanding shares of stock, defendant Miller owning the other half; that between January 1 and February 7, 1939, the commissioner of corporations made an investigation of the books of the corporation and took objection to a lot of items which the corporation had in its statement referring to deferred liability; that after the purchase of respondent's 1,660 shares of Interstate Aircraft had been placed in the inventory of the corporation on February 7, 1939, the corporation's assets were above its liabilities and it had an operating loss of approximately $14,000; said witness testified he did not tell respondent that Palmer, Miller & Company had an operating deficit and did not tell him that it had been operating at a loss, but he did tell respondent that the company needed additional working capital for the business; that the company intended making application to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to raise $10,000 through the sale of preferred stock and "I asked Mr. Lindstrom if he would be interested in acquiring some of the preferred stock of the corporation and Mr. Lindstrom said he would see what the situation was, that he had contemplated a trip to the old country, but that he would let me know his situation at a later date. At a later date Mr. Lindstrom was in my office and we again discussed— * * * I told Mr. Lindstrom that the brokerage companies had been rather hard put of late; that the market had been dull; that I didn't know of any houses on the street that were making any money * * * that we had made arrangements to handle such an issue of the American Aircraft Company * * * Mr. Lindstrom came into the office a few days afterwards at which time we went into the market value of his Interstate Aircraft Corporation stock. * * * The market at that time was $2.25. I told Mr. Lindstrom that we would sell his stock at that price; that he would realize $3735 and that he would acquire 370 shares of preferred stock of Palmer, Miller & Company." After some further negotiations, Mr. Lindstrom came to the office of the corporation and told Mr. Palmer that "he had pretty well made up his mind that he desired to go to the old country in a year and therefore wanted to leave without having any securities here * * * he wanted to be sure that anything he bought at this time could be relinquished. I told Mr. Lindstrom that under the laws of the State of California a corporation could not buy back its own stock; therefore, that I could not obligate the corporation in any way, but that if he desired to make a personal transaction with me, that I would buy his stock and give him a repurchase agreement * * * that is in writing (Plaintiff's Exhibit 2)." After said agreement was executed, Mr. Lindstrom turned over to Mr. Palmer the 1,660 shares of Interstate Aircraft stock, with respect to which Mr. Palmer stated: "I gave them into the cashier's department at Palmer, Miller & Company and told them that I had purchased this stock from Mr. Lindstrom and for them to make out statements.

"Q. And immediately received a credit on the books of the corporation for the sale of those 1660 shares of stock to the Palmer, Miller & Company? A. The stock would enter my personal account, Mr. Haas. From my personal account I turned over the stock to Palmer, Miller & Company.

"Q. On the same day? A. Yes." Whereupon, plaintiff's Exhibit 3, heretofore set out, was introduced into evidence.

Respondent testified that early in 1939 Mr. Carter came to see him to find out if he (respondent) wanted to dispose of some stock he owned and if he would be interested in oil stock. "* * * Then he introduced Mr. Palmer of Palmer, Miller Company. * * * He (Palmer) was going to issue preferred stock. He (Carter) asked me how I would like that. Well, I told him I didn't know anything about it but maybe I could look into it. So he wanted me to see Mr. Palmer. Then I talked to Mr. Palmer a little about it. I wanted to sell for cash if I could and get the money. I wanted to invest the money in something else. At that time Mr. Palmer told me, and Mr. Carter I think had told me too, that he was going to have an amendment to their incorporated business, and that they were going to issue some preferred stock in place of the common. And I thought myself that will be all right, but I wanted to dispose of that Palmer, Miller Company stock. * * * The agreement was drawed up and I looked at it and it was all right * * * and we done the business and I was going to get the preferred stock as soon as it was issued but it was not ready yet; I had to wait for a little while. Then he gave me a note and some common stock as the security, or whatever you call it, so that when the preferred stock is all fixed up I will get that and then I have to turn back the common stock I held to Palmer, Miller, and also Mr. Miller's (Palmer's) note. * * * Mr. Palmer never said anything about the company's affairs and business, only that it was all right; they were in that business and was going on with that business, and get all the aircraft corporation stock, and have a sale of that and them alone. And for that reason he insisted upon getting that 1660 shares I held because he was going to get all the aircraft corporation stock himself. * * * They were licensed and had a bond up so that everything was solid. That is what Mr. Carter told me, that they were solid. * * * Mr. Carter and Mr. Palmer both mentioned that to me." On cross-examination respondent was asked:

"Q. Mr. Lindstrom, Mr. Palmer told you that the company could not guarantee to buy this stock back, and that he would handle this matter personally, didn't he? A. No, sir; not that I can remember—never anything said about buying anything personally, but he promised he was going to buy the company's ten dollar preferred stock back in six months, which would be the first of August.

"Q. You knew Mr. Palmer was the one that was going to buy it back? A. He didn't say that he would, but I was doing business with him so naturally I thought he was doing it in the company's name, or his own—I thought it was in the company's name. The head on the paper was 'Palmer, Miller & Company,' and I thought it was all under the company.

"Q. You never had anything signed by the company by Mr. Palmer, did you? A. No, not that agreement.

"Q. They didn't sign the note, did they? A. The note was signed by Mr. Palmer, yes, sir.

"Q. And when you wrote to Mr. Palmer on July 25, you addressed the letter to Mr. Palmer, did you not? A. Yes. I found out his address and he was not in the office down there any more, so I believe I sent it to his home."

Mr. Palmer further testified that when he received the stock mentioned in Exhibit 2 from Mr. Lindstrom "I subjugated the stock to Palmer, Miller & Company. It went into their inventory and they sold the stock.

"The Court: Who got the money when that was sold? A. Palmer, Miller & Company. * * *

"Q. And you had actually turned over the 1660 shares to Palmer, Miller & Company and Palmer, Miller thereby received $3700? A. That is correct."

It was stipulated that the broker's certificate of Palmer, Miller Company was suspended on March 9, 1939.

It should be noted that defendant Miller had ceased to be active in the corporation in July, 1938, and that he and the corporation's secretary had moved away from the office, leaving defendant Palmer in sole charge of the affairs of the corporation, as general manager.

The agreement to purchase the 1,660 shares of Interstate Aircraft stock from respondent was clearly within the ordinary course of business of the corporation licensed to purchase and sell securities in this state. Moreover, the issuance by the Commissioner of Corporations under date of March 6, 1939, of a permit allowing said corporation to issue new common and preferred stock, pursuant to its application therefor, constituted a ratification of the agreement of February 9, 1939.

[1,2] It must not be overlooked that respondent had been a customer of the corporation for several months prior to the transaction here in question; that all of his dealings were with Palmer, as an officer of the corporation, and with Carter as a salesman employed by the corporation. While it is true that Palmer used the personal pronoun in his letters to respondent and that he signed the agreement without any designation of his official capacity or that he was acting on behalf of the corporation, all of these documents were written on the official letter head of the corporation. Moreover, the testimony on the issue as to whether defendant Palmer was dealing with respondent in his personal capacity or on behalf of the corporation is directly conflicting. While appellant urges that this conflict is not substantial, an examination of all of the evidence adduced as well as a consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction reveal that such evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court that the corporation was a party to the agreement of February 9, 1939.

Section 6 of the Corporate Securities Act, in effect when the bond here sued upon was filed with the commissioner of corporations, provided as follows: "* * * Said bond shall be conditioned upon the strict compliance with the provisions of this act, and the honest and faithful application of all funds received and the faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase or sale of securities, by said broker, his agents and employees." Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, Act 3814.

In the case of Bridges v. Price, 95 Cal. App. 394, 396, 273 P. 72, 73, "The evidence showed that on September 29, 1925, respondent Bridges delivered to one Ormond, as agent for Price, 210 shares of capital stock of National Automatic Music Co., to be exchanged for 336 shares of Monolith Portland Cement Company stock. Subsequently Price admitted to Bridges that he had sold his Music Company stock and had not procured the Cement Company stock, and on November 19, 1925, Price persuaded respondent to take his (Price's) promissory note for the value of the stock, payable 27 days after date. The note was never paid, and after its maturity this action was brought on the original obligation, and appellant [surety company] was joined as a defendant upon its bond. Judgment followed against both defendants."

It was there held: "Whatever may be meant by the word 'honest,' the 'faithful performance of all obligations and undertakings' means no more than performance of those obligations and undertakings according to their terms. Bonds conditioned for the 'faithful performance' of a contract have always been construed as being breached by any failure of performance in the principal contract. [Citing authorities.] In fact, such bonds are frequently referred to as 'faithful performance bonds.' Price having failed in the faithful performance of his obligation in the sale and purchase of securities for Bridges, appellant became liable to Bridges upon its bond." The ruling in the cited case is applicable to the facts presented by the case at bar.

There was evidence before the trial court which justified each and all of the material findings upon which the judgment herein was predicated; therefore, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Hearing Granted Nov. 5, 1942.

1. Mandamus 🔑173

Upon petition for writ of mandate to annul state real estate commissioner's order suspending petitioner's license as a real estate broker for ten days on the ground that such order was void and that commissioner exceeded his authority and jurisdiction in making such order, petitioner was entitled to a trial de novo on the issues involved.

2. Appeal and error 🔑781(4)

Question whether state real estate commissioner's order suspending real estate broker's license for a period of ten days was void did not become "moot" upon expiration of the ten day period where hearing on commissioner's order that broker show cause why his license should not be suspended or revoked for violation of the original order of suspension was still pending awaiting outcome of broker's appeal from order of superior court denying a writ of mandate annulling the original order.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Moot Question".

3. Brokers 🔑3

If state real estate commissioner's order suspending real estate broker's license for a period of ten days was without legal justification, broker could not be subjected to the revocation of his license for violation of the terms thereof.

4. Appeal and error 🔑781(4)

If a judgment which is left unreversed will prejudice the party against whom it is rendered as to an act vital to his rights, it cannot properly be held that the question before the reviewing court is "moot".

5. Mandamus 🔑3(11)

Where no hearing had been held on state real estate commissioner's order that real estate broker show cause why his license should not be suspended or revoked for violation of prior order suspending license for ten days, mandamus would not lie to annul the order to show cause since broker had not exhausted his administrative remedies as petitioner for writ of mandate is required to do before seeking aid of courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Proceeding upon the petition of Albert Abraham Sipper for a writ of mandate to annul orders of Clarence Urban, as Real Estate Commissioner, etc., suspending petitioner's license as a real estate broker for a period of ten days from September 29, 1941, and ordering petitioner to show cause why his license should not be suspended or revoked for continuing to operate as a real estate broker during the ten days in which his license had been suspended. From an order denying the writ of mandate, petitioner appeals.

Order reversed.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

This is an appeal by petitioner from an order of the superior court denying a writ of mandate. Respondent, as real estate commissioner of the State of California, after a hearing, on September 19, 1941, made an order suspending the license of petitioner as a real estate broker for a period of ten days from September 29, 1941. On October 23, 1941, an order was issued by respondent ordering petitioner to show cause on November 5, 1941, why his license should not be suspended or revoked for the reason that he had continued to operate as a real estate broker during the ten days in which his license had been suspended. By stipulation and because of the present appeal respondent has continued the hearing on the order to show cause issued on October 23, 1941. In his petition appellant alleges that the findings and order of September 19, 1941, are not supported by any sufficient or competent evidence, that the order is void and that respondent has exceeded his authority and jurisdiction in making the order of suspension.

No appearance was made by respondent in the court below. Attached to the amended petition was a transcript of the proceedings before respondent. The trial court received no evidence and did not conduct a hearing or trial de novo but upon reading the petition and the transcript attached thereto made the following minute order: "The Court having read and considered the entire record of the evidence introduced and the proceedings had before respondent, finds that there is sufficient competent evidence to sustain the decision and the implied findings of respondent and the order suspending petitioner's license and finds no reason for annulling said order. The petition for a writ of mandate is denied."

[1-4] Subsequent to the making of the order from which the appeal is being prosecuted the Supreme Court of California rendered its decision in Laisne v. California St. Bd. of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 844, 123 P.2d 457, a case in which the petitioner sought to have annulled an order of a state board which had revoked a certificate of registration to practice optometry. The court held that, "if the order is questioned in a court of law, then under the Constitution of this state the petitioner must be given a trial de novo on the issues involved." 19 Cal.2d 831, 844, 123 P.2d 457, 465. This ruling is binding upon the present appeal. But respondent contends that the question has become moot, since petitioner was suspended for a period of only ten days and this period has long since elapsed. This contention cannot be sustained, for there must be taken into consideration the fact that respondent has issued an order to show cause for the alleged violation of the original order of suspension and the hearing on the second order is still awaiting the outcome of the present appeal. Clearly, if the original order was without legal justification petitioner cannot be subjected to the revocation of his license for violation of its terms. An affirmance of the order from which the appeal is now prosecuted would leave petitioner in the situation where, without his day in court, he would be bound by an order which he claims to be void and which would subject him to punishment for its violation. If a judgment which is left unreversed will prejudice the party against whom it is rendered as to an act vital to his rights it cannot properly be held that the question before the reviewing court is moot. Hartke v. Abbott, 106 Cal. App. 388, 289 P. 206; 4 C.J. 576; 4 C.J.S., Appeal and Error, § 1354; Clarke v. Beadle County, 40 S.D. 597, 169 N.W. 23. The question now before us has not become completely moot.

[5] From the foregoing it is apparent that the order appealed from must be reversed insofar as it is applicable to the order made by respondent on September 19, 1941. A different situation is presented by petitioner's contention that the order to show cause issued on October 23, 1941, should be annulled, for petitioner's contention runs counter to the rule that petitioner must exhaust his administrative remedies before seeking the aid of the court. Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, 17 Cal.2d 280, 109 P.2d 942, 132 A.L.R. 715. No hearing has been held by respondent on this order to show cause. Respondent has shown no disposition to conduct such hearing during the pendency of this appeal and it is apparent that petitioner's rights will be safeguarded.

The order is reversed.

Dairy and milk production business is essentially one which is affected with a public interest, and as such is subject to governmental regulations. St.1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq.; St.1939, p. 1743, § 491(b).

2. Municipal corporations ⚿592(1)

The provisions of the Agricultural Code authorizing municipalities to provide higher standards for grades of market milk than that provided by state laws, and giving municipalities the right to set up its own dairy system of inspection did not expressly relinquish any other power vested in the state; hence regulations as to inspection by city must not be in conflict with state laws. St. 1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq.; St.1939, p. 1743, § 491(b).

3. Municipal corporations ⚿592(1)

Where the state relinquished to municipalities certain regulation and inspection rights relative to the dairy and milk production business, the relinquished rights could be reasserted by the state at any time as the business was affected with a public interest. 4. Municipal corporations ⚿592(1)

A city ordinance providing that no permit shall be issued to sell milk in the city, unless the dairy is inspected by the health officer of the city, was in direct conflict with provision of Agricultural Code that whenever a producer sells milk within two or more cities or counties the Director of Agriculture shall designate the county or city which shall conduct the inspection. St.1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq.; St.1939, p. 1743, § 491(b).

5. Evidence ⚿83(1)

It must be presumed that a health officer designated by Director of Agriculture to make inspection of dairies selling milk within two or more cities, and who was directed to enforce regulations of municipality calling for higher standards, will do his duty. St.1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq.; St.1939, p. 1743, § 491(b).

6. Municipal corporations ⚿592(1)

The Agricultural Code, dealing with permits to milk producers who sell milk in two or more cities, which provides for inspection by the city or county designated by Director of Agriculture and provides that cities shall "enforce" all local ordinances establishing higher standards of quality, gives cities the coercive power but means that in issuing permits state will "give force to" local ordinances, and that no permits will issue unless the municipal standard of requirements be maintained. St.1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq.; St.1939, p. 1743, § 491(b).

To "enforce" a law usually means to cause the arrest and to coerce by "actual force and punishment" but it does not necessarily imply this; it may mean to give effect to, to cause to have force.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Enforce".

7. Municipal corporations ⚿592(1)

Where state law provided for state inspection and licensing of dairies which sell milk in two or more cities and authorized municipalities to require higher standards of quality than that fixed by state law, a city ordinance providing that no permit should issue to any producer unless inspected by city inspector and unless milk originated in the county, was invalid. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Meridian, Ltd., a corporation, and others against Dr. John J. Sippy, as District Health Officer, for a judgment declaring petitioner's rights and duties with respect to a certain ordinance of the City of Stockton relating to the inspection of milk dairies. From a judgment upholding the validity of the ordinance, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed with directions.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for a judgment declaring petitioner's rights and duties with respect to respondent in relation to a certain ordinance of the city of Stockton. The petitioners assert that certain provisions of said ordinance are invalid. The trial court upheld the validity of such ordinance, and from this judgment petitioners have appealed.

The facts are undisputed. Meridian, Ltd., a corporation, appellant, is the owner of a ranch known as "El Solyo" located principally in Stanislaus County and partly in San Joaquin. It owns and operates a dairy, the buildings whereof are located in Stanislaus County, approximately four or five miles from the southern boundary of San Joaquin County. This dairy is engaged in the production and sale of Grade A milk, and the dairy buildings and the dairy herd are all maintained and operated in compliance with all requirements of the State Department of Agriculture and the ordinances of San Joaquin County. Respondent Sippy is the district health officer of San Joaquin Health District. This district was created under the local Health District Act of 1917, and its boundaries are identical with those of San Joaquin County. The city of Oakland, the city and county of San Francisco, and the city of Los Angeles, all maintain a milk inspection service approved by the director of agriculture of the State of California, and each of said milk inspection services has issued appellant Meridian, Ltd., a permit under the provisions of the Agricultural Code, St.1933, p. 60, § 1 et seq., and said permits are still in force. The San Joaquin local health district also has a milk inspection service approved by the Department of Agriculture.

The ordinance in question, No. 1229 of the city of Stockton, was enacted in 1931. Section 1 thereof designates the district health officer of the San Joaquin Health District as "health officer" of the city of Stockton. Section 5 requires every person engaged in the production, processing, or distribution of milk for retail redistribution, to obtain a permit from the health officer before selling, distributing or offering for sale any milk in the city of Stockton. It also provides that "In no case shall a permit be issued to any person, firm, association or corporation to sell * * * any milk in the city of Stockton unless the dairy, source of supply or place of origin is regularly inspected by the health officer or his authorized representatives." Such ordinance also requires higher standards for the grades of market milk than those required by the Agricultural Code.

Appellant "Cloverleaf Farms" is a limited partnership and maintains and operates a pasteurizing, processing and milk distributing plant in the city of Stockton and holds permits issued by the director of agriculture and the city of Stockton. Appellant, Meridian, Ltd., is selling Grade A market milk in the city of Oakland and delivering market milk for sale to Tracy for pasteurization and cream separation and thereafter for distribution in San Francisco, Oakland, Tracy and elsewhere.

Section 491(b) of the Agricultural Code, as amended in 1939, St.1939, p. 1743, provides that whenever a producer or distributor of milk sells or delivers within the jurisdiction of two or more cities, the director of agriculture, after an investigation and consultation with the health officer of each city and county involved, shall designate a county or city to conduct dairy and milk plant inspection. It further provides that:

> "All market milk and dairy products so inspected may be sold and delivered within the jurisdiction of any county and city; provided, that applicable local ordinances of such county or city are not thereby violated. The county or city designated by the director to render such inspection shall enforce all applicable local ordinances of each county and city into which such market milk and dairy products are sold or delivered."

In compliance with the foregoing provision, the director of agriculture made an investigation and consulted with the health officers of the above-mentioned cities and also with the health officer of the city of Stockton, and thereupon designated and appointed the health officer of the city of Oakland to conduct the dairy inspection of the appellant Meridian, Ltd. The permit said appellant now holds was issued by such authority.

This appellant desires to deliver milk from its dairy to appellant, "Cloverleaf Farms" for pasteurization in the city of Stockton and thereafter for resale through said "Cloverleaf Farms" and other authorized distributors in Stockton holding valid permits, and said "Cloverleaf Farms" desires to receive and purchase such milk. Petitioners made application to respondent for forms for a permit as provided in Ordinance No. 1229, but respondent refused to issue such forms or permits for the reason that appellant's Meridian, Ltd., dairy, the source of the supply of milk, was not regularly inspected by the district health officer of San Joaquin local health district, who is also the health officer of the city of Stockton. The district health officer of San Joaquin local health district does not inspect dairies beyond the external boundaries of his district which are identical with the boundaries of San Joaquin County.

As a result of this Ordinance No. 1229 of the city of Stockton, no dairy, although approved by the director of agriculture, may bring any market milk from outside the boundaries of the county of San Joaquin and sell in the city of Stockton. The effect of the ordinance is absolutely prohibitive.

Respondent maintains that the ordinance is valid as a reasonable exercise of the city's police power to protect and maintain the public health of its inhabitants. He claims that as section 451 of the Agricultural Code, St.1937, p. 1974, provides that "no provision of this division * * * or any rule and regulation of the director is a limitation on the power of a municipality or county to provide for reasonable additional regulations not in conflict therewith requiring standards higher than the minimum requirements for the grades of market milk established in this division," therefore this statute expressly authorizes the city to "require higher standards" and that the Stockton ordinance has done this. He further maintains that it would be idle to require "higher standards" without having some way of checking or method of inspection to determine whether or not the "higher standards" are being maintained, and that inspection is an incidental power necessary to the exercise of the right to have "higher standards"; that the approved and efficient method of milk inspection requires that it be made at the dairy or source of its origin, which makes it necessary that a reasonable boundary of an area within which the inspection may be made, be established, which is the only proper method, and one that has been approved by the courts (citing Whitney v. Watson, 85 N.H. 238, 157 A. 78); that to require any municipality to inspect any dairy wishing to supply its inhabitants with milk located anywhere between Siskiyou and San Diego would make efficiency inspection impossible, and that therefore definite and reasonable areas are necessary; that the city cannot be required to go beyond this area and inspect (citing Witt v. Klimm, 97 Cal.App. 131, 274 P. 1039), and that, because of administrative necessity, innocent and harmless products may be excluded, does not render the ordinance unconstitutional (citing Carolene Products Co. v. Harter, 329 Pa. 49, 197 A. 627, 119 A.L.R. 235); that Stockton is a charter city and the Constitution has conferred upon it full power, unhampered by acts of the Legislature, to legislate upon its own local "municipal affairs," and that the enforcement of its own ordinance for the protection of the health of its own inhabitants is such a municipal affair; that the Constitution of California (§ 6, art. XI) particularly provides that cities and towns are "empowered * * * to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs"; that section 491(b) of the Agricultural Code, supra, cannot be construed to conflict with the constitutional provision giving cities the right to enforce their ordinances relating to "municipal affairs"; that it is more reasonable to hold that the state, after the amendment giving municipalities the right to require higher standards, withdrew from the field of inspection in such cities as may have established higher standards.

These contentions all seem very plausible and logical and are supported by much respectable authority, but we believe that respondents take too limited a view of this important matter. If the position of respondent is sound, it may lead to dire results. It would be possible for every city in the State of California to erect prohibitive trade barriers around the boundary of the county of its locale; not only milk, but many other food products designed for human consumption could be barred in this same manner. The free flow of goods from one community to another is conducive to the general prosperity and economic welfare of the state and nation. Furthermore, milk production is a legitimate business; millions of dollars in this state are invested in this industry, and so long as the persons engaged in this business put out a clean, pure and wholesome product, a way should be found to allow their products to flow freely in the market, unburdened by duplication of inspection and prohibitive trade barriers, and if the present law on our statute books can be given a reasonable construction which will bring about this result, it should be given such construction.

[1, 2] It is now generally recognized that the dairy and milk production business is essentially one which is affected with a public interest, and as such is subject to governmental regulation. 22 Am.Jur. 851. Because of this, many laws have been passed by most states in the Union and held not to be in violation of the Constitution providing for control of milk and its price, and for inspection and certification. In California, a general dairy law was passed in 1923. Stat.1923, p. 849. This law did not purport to cover the entire field of milk production and distribution. It was expanded by amendment. However, until 1937, the state did occupy the whole field of milk inspection and distribution. Pacific Coast Dairy v. Police Court, 214 Cal. 668, 8 P.2d 140, 80 A.L.R. 1217. All parties practically agree on this point. A well-considered superior court decision in Los Angeles in 1935 (Pater v. City of Los Angeles) so held, and in recognition of the soundness of this decision the law was changed in 1937 by amending section 451 of the Agricultural Code, which authorized municipalities to provide higher standards for grades of market milk than that provided by state law. It did not expressly relinquish any other power. It only permitted municipalities to pass ordinances "to provide for reasonable additional regulations * * * requiring standards higher than the minimum requirements for the grades of market milk established in this division." This amendment also provided that this relinquished right must not be in conflict with Division IV of the Agricultural Code. Therefore, assuming that this amendment did give the municipality the incidental right to set up its own dairy system of inspection, this inspection must not be in conflict with the code.

[3, 4] Being a matter of general concern, this relinquished right could be reasserted by the state at any time. If it did not do so before, it did reassert it when, in 1939, section 491 of the Agricultural Code was amended and section 491(b), supra, was added. This section now specifically deals with dairy inspection and provides that whenever a producer or distributor delivers or sells milk within the jurisdiction of two or more cities or counties, the director of agriculture, after an investigation and consultation with the health officers of each county and city involved "shall designate the county or city which shall conduct the dairy and milk plant inspection." Thus it reoccupied this field of inspection, and declared that "milk and dairy products so inspected may be sold and delivered within the jurisdiction of any county and city." Section 5 of Ordinance No. 1229 is in direct conflict with this because it states "in no case shall a permit be issued * * * to sell or expose for sale or exchange * * * any milk in the City of Stockton unless the dairy * * * is regularly inspected by the Health Officer" of the city of Stockton.

[5] It is true that section 491(b), supra, provides that milk inspected by the authority of the director may be sold in any county or city provided the local ordinances of such county or city are not thereby violated, but it also provides that the county or city designated by the director to render such inspection shall enforce all applicable local ordinances of each city and county into which such market milk and dairy products are sold or delivered. Thus if a state permittee sells milk in a city having local ordinances fixing "higher standards," he must comply with these standards, and the state inspector is directed to enforce them. Therefore, the state law provides a method which permits the free flow of whole milk into the market without unnecessary duplication of inspection without depriving the cities having higher standards of their full protection. This inspection by the designated health officer is state inspection. LaFranchi v. City of Santa Rosa, 8 Cal.2d 331, 65 P.2d 1301, 110 A.L.R. 639; Peterson v. Board of Supervisors of Solano County, 65 Cal.

App. 670, 225 P. 28. It must be presumed this officer will do his duty.

[6, 7] To give effect to section 491(b), supra, we must consider the section as a whole. "To enforce" a law usually means to cause the arrest and to coerce by "actual force and punishment," but it does not necessarily imply this; it may mean "to give effect to, to cause to have force." Sharp v. State (Widener v. Sharp), 109 Neb. 766, 192 N.W. 726. Section 491(b) deals with permits and it must mean that in issuing those permits the state "will give force to" local ordinances or "give effect to them"; therefore, that no permit will issue to sell milk in Stockton unless the municipal standard of requirements be so maintained. The coercion and force to be applied to violators still lies with the city. If there were no general law on the subject giving to the people of the city of Stockton the protection of its high standards required by its ordinance, it might be reasonable to hold that Stockton or any other municipality, for the protection of the health of its inhabitants, could establish a reasonable inspection area; but the general law gives the state no right to issue a permit to sell or distribute milk in the city of Stockton, unless the permittee meets the standards of its ordinance. Therefore, it is unreasonable to require double inspection of the distributors, one by the city and another by the state, and also to require that the milk so distributed originate in San Joaquin County.

[8] Any ordinance or statute which prevents any person from engaging in a lawful business cannot be upheld unless protection of life, health or property makes it reasonably necessary. Such is not the case here. The contention of respondent if approved might result in the erection of trade barriers that would affect the economic prosperity of the whole state.

The judgment is reversed, and that portion of section 5 of Ordinance No. 1229, which reads, "In no case shall a permit be issued to any person, firm, association or corporation to sell or expose for sale or exchange, deliver or distribute any milk in the City of Stockton unless the dairy, source of supply or place of origin is regularly inspected by the Health Officer or his authorized representatives," is held to be invalid; and petitioners are declared to have a right to carry on their respective businesses in the city of Stockton, upon compliance with the terms of the Agricultural Code, and the higher standards required by said ordinance.

MISITA v. DISTILLERS CORPORATION, Ltd., et al.

Civ. 12014.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 31, 1942.

As Corrected Sept. 22, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 30, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 29, 1942.

1. Receivers 🔑35(1)

Generally, the power of a court to grant an ex parte order appointing a receiver for a corporation rests in the court's sound discretion, in the exercise of which the court must be governed by the situation as it is presented to the court at the time of making the order.

2. Corporations 🔑557(3)

The appointment of a receiver for a corporation may be made ex parte and without notice, if the imperative necessity or emergency is shown in the petition or supporting affidavits. Code Civ.Proc. § 566.

3. Appeal and error 🔑955

Since the power to appoint a receiver for a corporation ex parte lies in the superior court, the question on appeal is not one of jurisdiction, but of error, and as such is limited to the inquiry whether the trial court abused its discretion. Code Civ.Proc. § 566.

4. Appeal and error 🔑955

An appellate court is never justified in substituting its discretion for that of the trial court sitting nisi prius, with reference to the ex parte appointment of a receiver for a corporation, and the appellate court's power is limited to the determination whether there has been such an abuse of discretion that it has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Corporations ⇨294

A court of equity has the power to appoint a receiver in a stockholder's suit for the purpose of preserving the assets of a corporation and prevent irreparable loss or injury pending suit.

6. Corporations ⇨553(5, 6)

Internal dissensions deadlocking corporation or frustrating it or threatening its purposes, official breaches of trust, mismanagement and waste, are generally regarded as grounds for a receivership to protect rights.

7. Corporations ⇨294

Where receivership proceeding is not directed toward closing the affairs of a corporation or to dissolve it, but is merely directed against the individual directors whom it is sought to remove and place the assets of the corporation in safe hands, the unfaithful directors having abandoned their trust, it is proper for the court through the agency of a receiver, to take charge of the property, if necessary for its preservation, pending proceedings for the removal of the directors.

8. Corporations ⇨553(5)

Dissensions, or honest differences of opinion, which result in making it impossible for a corporation to carry on its business to advantage, or to carry it on at all, are sufficient to invoke the action of a court of equity to appoint a receiver.

9. Corporations ⇨553(6)

Allegations that by reason of restraining orders, board of directors of corporation was not able to function, that corporation was being managed dishonestly by one of the three directors who was the majority stockholder, that such director was raising his own salary and was using the corporation for personal purposes, and that he had refused access to or inspection of corporation's books, justified trial court in appointing a disinterested person as ex parte receiver to control corporation's business, on ground that a temporary restraining order would not give adequate protection. Code Civ.Proc. § 566.

10. Corporations ⇨553(5), 555

A court of equity has inherent power in a proper case to appoint a temporary receiver for a solvent, going corporation, at the instance of stockholders, on the grounds of fraud or gross mismanagement or where there are such dissensions in corporation's governing body as to make it impossible for corporation to carry on its business to advantage.

11. Corporations ⇨552

The power of a court of equity to appoint a temporary receiver for a solvent corporation will not be exercised in a doubtful case, and the remedy being a drastic one, only in case of an urgent necessity, where there is no other adequate remedy.

12. Appeal and error ⇨955

Where trial court decided that temporary restraining order would not give adequate protection, and that order appointing a receiver ex parte for corporation was necessary, and its decision was supported by substantial legal authority, the decision was controlling on appeal.

13. Appeal and error ⇨837(2)

A showing made at hearing of order to show cause could not be properly considered in determining whether on a date several weeks prior to hearing of order to show cause, sufficient legal grounds appeared to trial court to warrant granting of ex parte order appointing a receiver for corporation pending hearing and determination of order to show cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Elmer E. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Peter L. Misita against the Distillers Corporation, Ltd., and others to remove Mitchell L. Misita as director of the Distillers Corporation, Ltd., and to have a receiver pendente lite appointed for the corporation. From a series of orders made by the trial court in the matter of the receivership pendente lite, the defendants appeal.

Orders affirmed.

Hearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

Albert Picard, Ben K. Lerer, and John A. O'Kane, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Defendants appeal from a series of orders made by the trial court in the matter of a receivership pendente lite.

The plaintiff in the action, Peter L. Misita, his sister Danica, and his brother Mitchell L., owned the outstanding capital stock and constituted the board of directors of Distillers Corporation, Ltd., which was engaged in the business of selling liquor, wine and tobacco, and operated three stores and a warehouse in San Francisco under the name of Martell's Wine, Liquor & Cigar Stores. Mitchell, Peter and Danica were respectively the president, vice-president and treasurer, and secretary of the company. There were 350 outstanding shares of stock of the par value of $10 a share. Mitchell owned 175 thereof, and Peter was the record owner of 116 shares, but claimed to be the beneficial owner of 59 additional shares which stood of record in Mitchell's name. The business was operated by Mitchell and Peter, the former receiving a salary of $100 a week and the latter $80 a week. For about two years a bitter, violent quarrel had been carried on between the two brothers concerning the affairs of the corporation and the operation of the business; and on July 16, 1940, Peter filed the present action for the removal of Mitchell as a director, and for the appointment of a receiver pendente lite. He joined as parties defendant the corporation and Mitchell, individually and as president of the company. The complaint was verified, and along therewith there was filed an affidavit made by Danica, wherein she joined in the application for the appointment of a receiver. Upon the presentation of the verified complaint and the affidavits to the trial court, and on July 16, 1940, an ex parte order was granted appointing a receiver, and ordering the defendants to appear on a date specified to show cause, if any they had, why the receivership should not continue until the final termination of the action. The order appointing the receiver was made conditional that plaintiff file a bond in the sum of $5,000. Plaintiff furnished the bond, and the receiver qualified and took charge of the business, but at the end of approximately three weeks the receivership was terminated under the following circumstances: At the hearing of the order to show cause, plaintiff moved to continue the receivership, and defendants moved to vacate the appointment; numerous affidavits and counter-affidavits were introduced and considered, and on August 10, 1940, an order was made continuing the receivership pendente lite and denying defendants' motion to vacate; but immediately following the making of the order and on the same day, to-wit, August 10, 1940, the parties stipulated that the receivership be terminated, that the receiver be discharged, and that an injunction pendente lite be issued whereunder the rights of the respective parties were to be governed and protected. Appropriate orders to that effect were made, and such an injunction was issued, but thereafter defendants appealed from the ex parte order of July 16, 1940, appointing the receiver, and from the order subsequently made on August 10, 1940, continuing the receivership and denying defendants' motion to vacate; also from certain orders made for the payment of the fees and expenses incurred by reason of the receivership.

Defendants state that their purpose in seeking a reversal of the two receivership orders of July 16, 1940, and August 10, 1940, is to place them in a position whereby they can sue on the bond to recover the expenditures made and damage done by reason of the receivership. It is obvious, however, that no expenses whatever were incurred, nor any damage done, as the result of the making of the order of August 10, 1940, continuing the receivership, because, as stated, immediately after such order was made, and on the same day, on stipulation, the receivership was terminated, the receiver was discharged, and the rights of the parties were thereafter protected and the business operated under the terms of the stipulated injunction. The appeal narrows down, therefore, to the question of the validity of the order of July 16, 1940, appointing the receiver; and the determination of that question depends entirely upon the situation as presented to the trial court at the time the order was made, and eliminates from consideration the affidavits or counter-affidavits subsequently made and used at the hearing of the motions on August 10, 1940, to continue the receivership and to vacate the same, because they pertain only to the propriety of the court's later action continuing the receivership pendente lite; which, as stated, becomes an immaterial issue by reason of the fact that on the same day, on stipulation, the receivership was terminated by the issuance of the stipulated injunction.

[1] Directing our attention, then, to the question of the validity of the ex parte order of July 16, 1940, appointing the receiver, it may be stated generally that the granting of such orders rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, in the exercise of which it must be governed necessarily by the situation as it is presented and appears to the court at the time of making the order. Here, according to the allegations of the verified complaint, the condition of the corporation and the operation of the business, at the time the complaint was filed, was and for some time prior thereto had been in a chaotic state. Speaking generally, it appeared from said allegations that certain lawsuits were then pending wherein restraining orders had been issued which prevented the holding of any stockholders' meetings and completely deadlocked the corporate directorate so that the corporation, as such, had ceased to function; that for nearly two years Mitchell had been in control of the business without legal authority, and that he had been and was then committing certain illegal acts in connection with the operation of the business, which, if the allegations were true, would inevitably ruin the business of the corporation; all of which was being done, so plaintiff alleged, for the purpose of wrongfully and fraudulently compelling him to sell his stock for a price far less than its true value.

The complaint is lengthy, covering approximately 50 typewritten pages of the transcript; consequently reference will be made herein only to the more important allegations thereof. With respect to stock transactions it was alleged that on or about the month of July, 1938, Mitchell entered upon "a fraudulent and wrongful scheme" to obtain Peter's stock; that in pursuance of such scheme he illegally caused certain stock certificates to be cancelled, transferred and reissued; that thereupon he assumed control of the corporation and its business and purported to discharge Peter and thereafter refused to pay his salary; that on March 22, 1939, Peter brought suit to establish his claim to the additional 59 shares of stock and obtained a restraining order against the holding of any stockholders' meeting; that two days afterwards Mitchell commenced a suit to prevent the holding of a directors' meeting and obtained a restraining order to that effect. It was further alleged that after Mitchell illegally took control of the corporation and the operation of its business he caused false resolutions to be sent to the banks so that they would no longer cash Peter's checks as vice-president and treasurer of the company; that he instructed the clerks to inform anyone phoning the stores that Peter was no longer connected with the business; that he informed the wholesalers and jobbers that Peter was no longer connected with the stores, and advised the employees they should not follow directions from Peter and encouraged them to pick fights with Peter; that he employed a watchman whose sole duty was to watch Peter and pick fights with him; that he discharged the women cashiers and employed men in order to prevent Peter from balancing the cash receipts of the stores; that he withdrew the cash receipts from the Powell Street store on November 24, 1939, in order to prevent Peter from performing his duties as treasurer of the company; that he changed the locks on the warehouse to keep Peter out; that he threatened to make Peter's interest valueless by payment of bonuses and increasing his own salary unless Peter would accept $4,000 for his stock; that he told Peter he contemplated certain capital expenditures which would prevent the payment of dividends; that he refused Peter's right to examine the books and changed the combination on the safe after Peter had made an examination by means of passkeys, and that it then became necessary for Peter to have the safe drilled and new keys made; that Mitchell engaged a public accountant to audit the books and agreed to furnish Peter with a copy of his report, but failed to do so; that he removed certain books from the office of the corporation and refused to tell Peter where they were; that he prevented and failed to assist the accountants employed by Peter in the making of an audit; that he prevented the making of an inventory and compelled the auditors to leave the premises, and that he furnished false statements of profit and loss. Continuing, Peter alleged that he commenced an action to compel the inspection of the books and for an audit on April 13, 1940, but Mitchell failed to appear in compliance with the order to show cause; that auditors were appointed by the court, and that Mitchell impeded and delayed the making of the audit; that the audit showed that the books of the corporation were inadequate, lacking in accounting control, and that Mitchell had caused the inventory to be understated in the sum of $21,535.97 in the financial reports of the business for the year ending 1939.

With reference to acts of malfeasance, the complaint alleged that in October of 1938 Mitchell claimed to be a creditor of the corporation in the sum of $8,770, which he admitted was not a true liability; that in August, 1939, he increased his salary to $125 a week with an expense account of $30 a month; that he attempted to get the bookkeeper to prepare a false inventory; furthermore, that he changed the accounting control so that there was no control on merchandise received; that he appropriated the property and assets of said corporation to his own use, and had paid certain personal expenses out of corporate funds.

It was further alleged that Mitchell accepted unlawful rebates from transportation companies, resulting in three suits against the corporation; that he accepted unlawful rebates from wholesalers and jobbers; that he had refilled liquor bottles, affixed internal revenue stamps thereto and resold the contents; that numerous physical encounters took place between Peter and Mitchell, and that in September, 1939, Mitchell threatened Peter's life.

The complaint then alleged that the foregoing acts were fraudulent and dishonest and constituted a gross abuse of discretion and that Mitchell should be removed as a director; that ill-feeling, dissension, hatred, mutual hostility and distrust had arisen and existed in the board of directors; that by reason of the discharge of Peter and certain employees it was impossible for the corporation to carry on its business with advantage to its stockholders and said corporation had lost a large part of its good will, and its gross business had decreased in the hands of Mitchell in the sum of over $50,000 from January to April, 1940, and that the business was being mismanaged and would be substantially impaired and diminished unless a receiver was appointed.

[2-8] As held in Lent v. H. C. Morris Co., 25 Cal.App.2d 305, 77 P.2d 301, 302, the appointment of a receiver "may be made 'ex parte' and without notice if the 'imperative necessity' or emergency is shown in the petition or supporting affidavits. Section 566, Code Civ.Proc.; Real Estate Associates v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 223, 227; Nichols v. Nichols, 135 Cal. App. 488, 492, 27 P.2d 414; Huellmantel v. Huellmantel, 124 Cal. 583, 589, 57 P. 582. Since the power to appoint 'ex parte' lies in the superior court, the question on appeal is not one of jurisdiction, but of error, and, as such, is limited to the inquiry whether the trial court abused its discretion. 23 R.C.L., pp. 39, 40; Sunset Farms, Inc. v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.App.2d 389, 405, 50 P.2d 106; Anderson v. Anderson, 124 Cal. 48, 56, 56 P. 630, 57 P. 81, 71 Am. St.Rep. 17. An appellate court is never justified in substituting its discretion for that of the court sitting nisi prius. Its power is limited to the determination whether there has been such an abuse of discretion that it has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const., art. 6, § 4½; Davies v. Ramsdell, 40 Cal.App. 432, 433, 183 P. 702; Sunset Farms, Inc., v. Superior Court [supra]." And beyond question a court of equity has power to appoint a receiver in a stockholder's suit for the purpose of preserving the assets of a corporation and prevent irreparable loss or injury pending suit. In Ballantine on Private Corporations (1927 Ed., § 253) the rule is stated thus: "Under statutes in some states, and independently of any statutes in others, the court may appoint a receiver in a stockholder's suit if the directors and majority of the stockholders are so managing or disposing of its business or assets in their own interest that they will probably be lost or destroyed before a decree can be rendered, or where there are such dissensions within the corporation that its business cannot be honestly or properly managed, or if for any other reason it clearly appears to the court that the appointment of a receiver pending the suit is necessary to preserve the assets of the corporation, and protect the rights of the complaining stockholders." The same doctrine is stated more definitely in California Jurisprudence (vol. 6A, p. 1535) as follows: "Internal dissensions deadlocking the corporation or frustrating it or threatening its purposes and objects, official breaches of trust, mismanagement and waste, are generally regarded as grounds, according to usages of equity, for a receivership to protect rights. Therefore, where the proceeding is not directed toward closing the affairs of the corporation or to dissolve it, but is merely directed against the individual directors whom it is sought to remove and to place the assets of the corporation in safe hands, the unfaithful directors having abandoned their trust, it is proper for the court, through the agency of a receiver, to take charge of the property, if necessary for its preservation, pending proceedings for the removal of the directors. Dissensions, or honest differences of opinion, which result in making it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business to advantage, or to carry it on at all, are sufficient to invoke the action of a court of equity." See, also, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 4th Ed., §§ 1537, 1541, 1543, 1545; Boyle v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 671, 170 P. 1140, 1141, L.R.A.1918D, 226. "These receivers are not appointed," says the court in the case last cited, "to close up the affairs of a corporation, to work its dissolution, but to preserve its properties, and, where possible, continue its corporate functions."

[9] Under the foregoing principles it would seem clear that in the present case there is no justification for holding that the trial court abused its discretion in appointing the receiver ex parte. By the allegations of the complaint it was represented to the court that by reason of the restraining orders theretofore issued the board of directors of the corporation was not able to function as such, nor the stockholders to meet; that the corporation was being managed illegally and dishonestly by one of the three directors who was the majority stockholder; that the other stockholder claimed to be entitled to an equal share of the stock; that the one who had complete control of the management of the corporation was raising his own salary, using the employees, the premises, and the equipment for personal purposes and paying for such out of corporate funds; that he had refused access to or inspection of the books; that he had changed the accounting control; that he was in difficulties with the Railroad Commission for taking rebates from transportation companies; that he was refilling liquor bottles, which illegal act could result in the loss of the corporation's license to do business at all. Under these circumstances, and also in view of all other pending litigation which had not been disposed of, it would seem that the trial court was justified in appointing a disinterested party as receiver to control the business of the corporation, to preserve its assets, and protect the rights of the complaining stockholders, pending the hearing of the order to show cause whereby the court would determine whether the receivership should continue.

[10, 11] Appellants contend that the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver ex parte of a solvent, going corporation, where there is no showing of irreparable injury or drastic emergency. However, it is well settled that a court of equity has inherent power in a proper case to appoint a temporary receiver for a solvent, going corporation, at the instance of stockholders, on the ground of fraud or gross mismanagement, or where there are such dissensions in its governing body as to make it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business to advantage. This power will not be exercised in a doubtful case; and the remedy being a drastic one, only in case of an urgent necessity, where there is no other adequate remedy, will a receiver be appointed for such corporation. Boyle v. Superior Court, supra; Golden State Glass Corp. v. Superior Court, 13 Cal.2d 384, 90 P.2d 75; and see note, 43 A.L.R. p. 242. But the pending emergency and the necessity for the appointment are matters which the trial court is called upon to decide (Lent v. H. C. Morris Co., supra); and in the present case we do not find such an abuse of discretion in appointing the receiver as would warrant this court in setting the order aside, but on the contrary, the facts and circumstances amply justified the trial court's action.

[12] Appellants also argue that other adequate remedies were available to protect the interests of the plaintiff, and that both prior to and after the commencement of the present action he filed several other suits and requested and obtained such remedies; that therefore the court exceeded its jurisdiction in appointing a receiver. The record shows, however, that some of the important litigation instituted by plaintiff prior to the commencement of this action had not been finally determined at the time the ex parte order herein was made. It was a question for the trial court to decide, therefore, whether in view of the serious and numerous charges of misconduct and illegal acts made in the complaint, a temporary restraining order would give adequate protection; and the trial court having decided that question in the negative, and its decision being supported by substantial legal authority, it is controlling on appeal.

[13] It should be here stated in fairness to the defendant Mitchell L. Misita that at the hearing of the subsequent motions to continue and to vacate the receivership, which resulted in the making of the order of August 10, 1940, evidence was introduced by way of affidavit and oral testimony in refutation of most of the allegations of the complaint, and particularly those charging Mitchell with illegal, fraudulent and dishonest conduct in operating the affairs of the company; furthermore, that it appears from the evidence introduced at said subsequent hearing that at the time the verified complaint in the present action was filed, the two lawsuits brought respectively by Peter and Mitchell to restrain the holding of stockholders' and directors' meetings were consolidated and had been tried in another department of said court, and an order made for judgment in favor of Mitchell, but that the judgments had not been entered until after the appointment of the receiver ex parte on July 16, 1940. As already pointed out, however, the showing made at said subsequent hearing of the order to show cause, which resulted in the making of the order of August 10, 1940, cannot be properly considered in determining the question of whether three weeks prior thereto and on July 16, 1940, sufficient legal grounds appeared to the trial court to warrant the granting of the ex parte order appointing the receiver pending the hearing and determination of the order to show cause.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

STEWART v. CONNOLLY et al.

Civ. 13019.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Sept. 10, 1942.

Hearing Denied Nov. 5, 1942.

1. Appeal and error 🔑934(1)

The appellate court, in determining the propriety of a judgment for defendant notwithstanding the verdict, views the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff without regard to any asserted contradiction in the proof.

2. Automobiles 🔑164(2)

Under provisions of Vehicle Code, where there is no marked passenger safety zone at place where street car is stopped to discharge passengers, motorist is required to stop automobile to rear of rear door of street car and remain standing until passenger has reached a place of safety. Vehicle Code, § 571(a), St.1935, p. 189.

3. Automobiles 🔑164(2)

Under Vehicle Code provision prohibiting motorists from passing beyond rear door of stopped street car where there is no marked safety zone and to remain until passenger shall have reached a place of safety, when street car stopped to discharge a passenger, rectangular area between right side of street car and curb of street extending from rear of rear door of street car to front of street car became an area in which it was lawful for passenger who had left street car to be in, to the exclusion of automobiles. Vehicle Code, § 571(a), St.1935, p. 189.

4. Automobiles 🔑164(2)

The purpose of the statute prohibiting motorists from passing beyond rear of nearest door of street car stopped for purpose of discharging passenger, until passenger alighting from street where there was no marked safety zone car shall have reached a place of safety, was to establish an area for the protection of street car passengers in alighting and proceeding to the curb. Vehicle Code, § 571(a), St.1935, p. 189.

5. Negligence 🔑136(26)

Generally, question of contributory negligence of a plaintiff is for trier of facts.

6. Appeal and error 🔑842(4)

Where a law exists, imposing regulation on motorist for protection of pedestrian at scene of accident, question of whether pedestrian, whose knowledge of such law may be considered in determining question of contributory negligence, took due precaution for his own safety, is usually "question of fact" for trial judge and not a "question of law" for appellate court.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Question of Fact" and "Question of Law".

7. Automobiles 🔑164(2)

The statute prohibiting motorists from passing beyond rear door of stopped street car where there is no marked safety zone is for the protection of alighting passengers and founded upon a recognition that passengers alighting from street car in exercise of ordinary care are required to give close attention to car steps in descending and to proceed at least sufficient distance therefrom to be clear when street car started. Vehicle Code, § 571(a), St.1935, p. 189.

8. Automobiles ⚷164(2), 206, 245(76)

Under the statute prohibiting motorists from passing beyond rear door of stopped street car where there is no marked safety zone, motorist owed passenger alighting from street car a special duty of care to remain to rear of street car, and passenger was entitled to rely on the protection afforded by such statute creating a prohibited zone for automobiles between the stopped street car and the curb, but extent to which passenger was entitled to rely upon such protection depended upon all of the attending circumstances and was for the jury. Vehicle Code, § 571(a), St.1935, p. 189.

9. Automobiles ⚷245(76)

Where street car passenger leaving car by front door at stop which had no marked safety zone, who was required, in exercise of ordinary care, in leaving street car to give careful attention to descending steps and to proceed on street sufficient distance to clear car as it started, looked to the rear, but saw no traffic in 10 feet he could see from within the street car and did not again look until he had taken one step from street car when he was struck by defendant motorist who did not apply brakes until she had passed rear end of stopped street car in violation of statute requiring motorist to stop at rear door, whether street car passenger was guilty of contributory negligence was for the jury. Vehicle Act, § 571a, St.1935, p. 189.

Action by William W. Stewart against Betty Connolly, and others, for injuries sustained when struck by automobile driven by named defendant. From a judgment for defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed with directions.

Ralph C. Curren, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Betts & Garrison and John A. Loomis, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,200 damages for personal injuries. Defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was granted and judgment was entered in favor of defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The question upon appeal is whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Defendant Betty Connolly, seventeen years of age, had possessed an automobile operator's license three months at the time of the collision. Defendants Elizabeth Connolly and Frank J. Connolly, the parents of Betty, signed her application for the operator's license which was issued to her and they were included as parties to the action by reason of the liability imposed upon them as such signers by section 352 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 145. Betty Connolly will be referred to hereinafter as the defendant.

[1] Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, without regard to any asserted contradictions in the proof, as the rule requires the court to do in determining the propriety of a judgment notwithstanding the verdict (Neel v. Mannings, Inc., 1942, 19 Cal.2d 647, 652, 122 P.2d 576), the following appears:

On November 21, 1939, about 4:30 p. m., plaintiff was a passenger in the front open section of a street car proceeding west on West Seventh Street in Los Angeles. After the street car had crossed Hoover Street and gone about one-third the distance of 400 feet from Hoover Street to the next street car stop, plaintiff pressed the buzzer to signal the motorman to stop at the next stop. The motorman then commenced to slow up, threw off the power and coasted down the hill about 150 feet. Then, when he was about 150 feet from the place where he stopped, he put on the brakes and commenced to stop. He stopped at an overhead triangle stop sign for street cars about 400 feet west of Hoover Street. He did not make an emergency stop but made an ordinary, usual stop. The overhead stop sign was hanging on a wire which extended from the trolley wire to a post by the north curb and was about 120 feet east of the east curb line of Magnolia Street which intersected the south curb of West Seventh Street. Magnolia Street did not extend across or continue north of West Seventh Street, but ended at the south curb of West Seventh Street. The highest speed of the street car after it left Hoover Street until it started to stop was 16 to 18 miles an hour.

After giving the signal to stop, plaintiff went to the front of the car, stood there, the car stopped, the door opened by breaking in half and folding against the right side of the doorway, plaintiff alighted from the street car and took one step straight forward. When he was about 2½ feet from the street car he was struck by an automobile driven by defendant, was knocked into the air and he landed 18 or 20 feet in front of the street car. The automobile made skid marks 39 feet in length and stopped about 18 or 20 feet in front of and to the right of the street car.

There was no passenger safety zone on the street at the place where the street car stopped. The distance from the curb to the street car track was 20 feet and the street car was 47 feet in length.

While plaintiff was standing at the front door on the north side of the street car about the time the street car came to a stop he looked back to the right or along the north side of the street car toward the rear and could see for a distance of 10 feet toward the rear. He did not see an automobile proceeding on the north side of the street car or at all before he left the street car platform to descend the two street car steps to the street. In leaving the street car platform he gave his attention to descending the steps to the street and proceeding one step on the street toward the curb and did not look toward the rear again until he turned partially to the right immediately before the automobile struck him.

Defendant was about two automobile lengths behind the street car when the street car started to stop about 150 feet from the place where it stopped and she did not decrease her speed of 30 or 35 miles an hour. When the street car stopped she was 180 feet from the front end of the street car and did not stop or decrease her speed. She decreased speed when the automobile was "somewhere near the middle" of the stopped street car, but she continued forward making skid marks 39 feet in length and stopped about 18 or 20 feet beyond the front of the street car.

The above mentioned surrounding circumstances, as shown by the evidence, are those most favorable to plaintiff.

Respondents claim that appellant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law for the reason he did not look toward the rear of the street car for approaching traffic while descending the steps of the street car and proceeding toward the curb. It is conceded on this appeal that respondent Betty Connolly was negligent.

Appellant contends that the question whether or not he was guilty of contributory negligence was one of fact for the jury.

[2] It was the duty of defendant by virtue of the provisions of Section 571, subdivision (a), of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 189, there being no marked passenger safety zone at the place where the street car stopped, to stop the automobile to the rear of the rear door of the street car and remain standing until the plaintiff had reached a place of safety. Said section of the Vehicle Code provided as follows: "The driver of a vehicle overtaking any * * * street car stopped or about to stop for the purpose of receiving or discharging any passenger shall stop such vehicle to the rear of the nearest running board or door of such * * * street car and thereupon remain standing until all passengers have boarded such car or upon alighting have reached a place of safety * * *."

[3, 4] When the street car stopped at said place, a regularly designated and marked street car stop, the rectangular area on the street between the north or right side of the street car and the north curb of the street extending from the rear of the rear door of the street car to the front of the street car, became an area into which it was unlawful for vehicles to enter until plaintiff had arrived at a place of safety. By reason of such provision of the Vehicle Code and such stopping of the street car it became lawful for plaintiff to be in that area to the exclusion of the automobile driven by defendant. That area was established by statute for the protection of plaintiff in alighting from the street car and proceeding in said area to the north curb.

[5, 6] "The existence or lack of contributory negligence must be determined from all the facts of the case, one of which may be knowledge of a law imposing a regulation upon an automobile driver for the protection of the pedestrian at the scene of the accident. When such a law exists, the question of whether a plaintiff took due precaution for his own safety is usually a question of fact for the trial judge and not one of law for the appellate court." Garrison v. Booth, 1935, 10 Cal.App.2d 738, 741, 52 P.2d 535, 536.

In the case of Medlin v. Spazier, 1913, 23 Cal.App. 242, 137 P. 1078, the plaintiff had alighted from a street car, was within an area of four feet next adjoining the right side of the street car and was struck by defendant's automobile. An ordinance provided that automobiles should not be driven within such area of four feet of a stopped street car. Plaintiff had not looked in the direction of the approaching automobile. Defendant claimed that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The court said, at page 244 of 23 Cal.App., at page 1079 of 137 P., "This contention is without merit. 'Negligence' is a comparative term, and hence the degree of care which in one case would constitute negligence might in another be deemed the exercise of more than prudence. Of necessity the question presented is nearly always one of fact for the jury to determine from the circumstances surrounding the case." That case further stated at page 245 of 23 Cal.App., at page 1079 of 137 P.: "Plaintiff had the right to assume that while within such zone she occupied a position of safety; and, in the absence of any warning or reason to believe that defendant would violate the city ordinance, she was not negligent in failing to look up and down the street when she alighted from the car to see if the drivers of approaching vehicles were operating same on that part of the street upon which they were prohibited from traveling. * * * Being lawfully there, she had the right to assume that for the time being she would be as safe from collision with automobiles as she would be upon the sidewalk."

It was claimed in the case of Market Street Ry. Co. v. George, 1931, 116 Cal. App. 572, 3 P.2d 41, that the individual plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. The street car had stopped at the end of the line and it was the custom to discharge passengers from the left side. Plaintiff alighted into the space of about one foot between the left side of the street car and the center of the street and was standing there facing the street car, assisting another person to alight, when he was struck by defendant's truck. At no time before he was struck did plaintiff look for approaching vehicles. The court stated at page 574 of 116 Cal.App., at page 42 of 3 P.2d: "Under such circumstances, can it be said that Harris [plaintiff] was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law? We are satisfied that it cannot. Harris would be entitled to assume that no vehicle north bound on Stanyan Street would be operated upon any portion of the street westerly of the center line. 'There is no positive duty on the part of pedestrians about to cross a street to stop, look, and listen, and * * * the question of negligence * * * must be examined in the light of all the attending circumstances, one of which may be knowledge of the existence of a statute or an ordinance prescribing fixed regulations for observance by automobile drivers.'" In that case the circumstances were comparable to the circumstances in this case. It is to be noted that the case of Medlin v. Spazier, supra, decided in 1913, was cited with approval in the case just referred to, decided in 1931.

In Mann v. Scott, 1919, 180 Cal. 550, 182 P. 281, the plaintiff was struck by an automobile while she was attempting to cross from the sidewalk to a stopped street car. Plaintiff looked for approaching vehicles as she stepped from the sidewalk but did not look again after leaving the sidewalk. An ordinance required drivers of vehicles intending to pass a stopped street car to stop the same at least ten feet to the rear of such street car to protect passengers boarding the street car. The court said at page 554 of 180 Cal., at page 282 of 182 P.: "The question of negligence under the usual rule of ordinary care that devolves upon foot travelers, must be examined in the light of all the attendant circumstances, one of which may be knowledge of the existence of a statute or an ordinance prescribing certain fixed regulations for observance by automobile drivers. And it may be that if the jurors * * * concluded * * * that if she did see the automobile before leaving the sidewalk, she reasoned that its driver would comply with the city ordinance, * * * requiring an automobile traveling behind a street car to stop 10 feet in the rear of the car if it stops to let off or take on passengers, until the passengers have safely alighted from or boarded the car. Whether, if she saw the automobile, respondent would have been warranted in going toward the street car without further watching the automobile approach, relying upon a compliance by the appellants with the requirements of the ordinance, was a question upon which men's minds might well differ, and hence it was properly a case for the jury. * * *"

In the case of Hoffman v. Maguire, 1935, 6 Cal.App.2d 398, 44 P.2d 444, the plaintiff, a newsboy, had been standing in a pedestrian cross walk two minutes and had not looked for thirty seconds in the direction of the approaching automobile which struck him. It was claimed that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The court stated at page 399 of 6 Cal.App. 2d, at page 445 of 44 P.2d: "It is not negligence as a matter of law for a person in a pedestrian zone to fail to look for approaching vehicles for a period of 30 seconds."

In the case of Gornstein v. Priver, 1923, 64 Cal.App. 249, at page 259, 221 P. 396, at page 401, it was stated: " 'While a person who asserts a right of recovery on the ground of negligence must be prepared to show that he exercised vigilance to discover and avoid the danger embodied in the offending instrumentality, he excuses himself for an omission to take active measures—such as looking, listening, and making inspections—by proof that the defendant owed to him a duty of care, and that he relied upon the performance thereof.' "

In respondents' brief it is stated, "That a passenger alighting into a safety zone would not be negligent in failing to look until she was about to leave the zone of safety, cannot be disputed." It is further stated in the brief, "It is undisputed that a person is not required to look where he is not entering a position or place of danger."

Respondents argue that the case now before the court is to be distinguished from Medlin v. Spazier, supra (wherein there was a prohibited zone "four feet wide"), for the reason that in that case plaintiff was standing in a zone of safety whereas in the present case there was no safety zone, no markings were on the pavement to indicate a car stop and plaintiff was moving. The area "four feet wide" in which vehicles were forbidden, referred to in Medlin v. Spazier, supra, also was not marked on the pavement but the stopping of the street car fixed the outline of the protected area in that case. In the present case, the area between the street car and the curb in which vehicles were forbidden likewise was not marked on the pavement but the stopping of the street car fixed the boundaries of the zone for the protection of alighting passengers. It seems to be respondents' position that as a matter of law a passenger in a safety zone "four feet wide" is not required to look for approaching automobiles, but a passenger in an unmarked area in which vehicles are forbidden, extending from the side of the stopped street car to the curb, is required as a matter of law to look for approaching automobiles.

If a passenger alighting from a street car is entitled to rely upon the protection afforded by an existing law forbidding automobiles from entering a safety zone "four feet wide," it would seem that a passenger should be entitled to rely upon the protection afforded by an existing law forbidding automobiles from entering a safety zone not restricted to "four feet wide" but extending from the street car to the curb.

[7] In descending the street car steps, plaintiff was required to use ordinary care to avoid injury to himself which might come in various ways from the act alone of leaving the street car and not connected with automobile traffic, including an unexpected movement by the street car or slipping or stumbling by plaintiff. In the ordinary course of events the street car would have moved forward immediately after plaintiff was upon the pavement and he was required, in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid injury by the moving street car, to proceed at least a sufficient distance on the street to be in the clear of or away from the moving street car. The legislative enactment prohibiting drivers of automobiles from passing beyond the rear door of a stopped street car where there was no marked safety zone was for the protection of alighting passengers and undoubtedly was founded upon a recognition of the fact, among others, that such attention was required of passengers in alighting from a street car.

[8] Defendant owed plaintiff a special duty of care to remain to the rear of the street car. Plaintiff was entitled to rely upon the protection afforded by the statutory provision creating a prohibited zone for automobiles between the stopped street car and the curb. The extent to which plaintiff was entitled to rely upon such protection depended upon all the attending circumstances.

[9] The street car was 47 feet in length; defendant was traveling 30 or 35 miles per hour until she applied the brakes at the center of the stopped street car, about 23 feet from the front door; at that rate of speed she was traveling about 45 feet per second or one-half the length of the street car in one-half second; when the street car stopped defendant was about 180 feet from the front door or in measurement of time about 4 seconds from the front door, or about 157 feet or 3½ seconds from the center of the street car; a fraction of a second elapsed from the time plaintiff alighted upon the pavement until he was struck; plaintiff looked to the rear for approaching traffic before the front door was opened; he could see ten feet and did not see any traffic; he was required, in the exercise of ordinary care in the act of leaving the street car, to devote careful attention to the act of descending the street car steps and proceeding on the street a sufficient distance to clear the street car as it would move forward.

The circumstances presented herein were such that the question as to whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence was one, as stated in Mann v. Scott, supra, "* * * upon which men's minds might well differ, and hence it was properly a case for the jury."

Defendants rely principally upon the case of Bence v. Teddy's Taxi, 1929, 101 Cal. App. 748, 282 P. 392, 283 P. 86, to sustain their contention herein. The plaintiff therein alighted from a street car. There was a safety zone at the place where the street car stopped, four feet wide, outlined on the street and parallel with the street car. The distance from the safety zone to the curb was twelve and one-half feet. Plaintiff had left the safety zone without looking toward the rear of the street car, proceeded toward the curb in a pedestrian marked crosswalk without looking to the right, reached a point eight feet from where he alighted, and was struck by defendant's taxicab. The taxicab driver was not required to stop back of the stopped street car but was permitted to pass the street car in the space between the safety zone and the curb. In the present case the defendant was operating the automobile in an area in which the operation of automobiles was prohibited by statute. That case so relied upon is distinguishable, therefore, from the present case.

The judgment, and the order granting the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, are reversed. It is ordered that the superior court enter judgment in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

PICKERING LUMBER CO. v. WHITESIDE et al.

Civ. 6705.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Aug. 29, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1942.

Hearing Denied Oct. 26, 1942.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑6

Contract that vendor should sell and convey mortgaged land to purchaser under prescribed terms, and that if purchaser would pay for the land, vendor would execute a deed to purchaser to be delivered by bank holding deed in escrow, the contract authorizing vendor to bid on the property on default by purchaser without prejudice to vendor's rights as owner did not pass title to purchaser as a "deed" but was an executory "contract of sale" and title remained in vendor subject to the mortgage.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Contract of Sale" and "Deed".

2. Mortgages 🔑5

A mortgagee has no right of specific performance or to bid on the property and in the event that no bids are received higher than his highest bid to call off the sale, credit the amount bid, and sue for deficiency.

3. Mortgages 🔑29, 137

Where vendor assigned his interest under contract of sale to trustee bank to secure his note issues, the transactions were security transactions as to the contract of sale, and created an equitable second mortgage held in trust by bank, but did not transfer vendor's title which he held as security for purchaser's payments.

4. Accord and satisfaction 🔑23

Where bank held deed of land subject to contract of sale under escrow agreement authorizing delivery upon receipt of the purchase price and bank, as assignee of vendor's rights under the contract to secure vendor's note issues, entered into purported accord and satisfaction with purchaser whereby purchaser transferred its rights to reorganized corporation which issued stock to bank, bank's delivery of deed and attempt to separate its equitable second mortgage from the debt was ineffective to pass title as against vendor's estate, notwithstanding that the land was of little value above the encumbrance.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑266(7)

Although a vendor in an executory contract for sale of land, who retains title as security for payment of the purchase money, sues to recover the unpaid contract price and obtains judgment thereon, which has not been paid in full, such suit and judgment do not affect the vendor's right to foreclose against the land as security for any uncollected portion of the purchase money.

6. Mortgages 🔑5

Where vendor had executed an equitable mortgage on land, subject to contract of sale to bank to secure note issues and assignment of vendor's rights under the contract to bank did not transfer his title to purchaser, that vendor held title to secure payment of purchaser's obligation did not cause purchaser's contract to be a "mortgage" or its obligation to be a mortgage debt, nor did the assignment change purchaser's obligation to a mortgage debt.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mortgage".

7. Mortgages 🔑5

The distinction between a mortgage and an executory contract of sale is that in a "mortgage", the mortgagor holds title to the land and the mortgagee has a lien on the land for payment of the mortgage debt, while in an executory "contract of sale" the vendor holds title to the land as security for payment of the purchase price.

8. Assignments 🔑2

Vendor and purchaser 🔑47

Where vendor of California land assigned his rights under the sale contract to a Minnesota bank to secure note issues, the contract of assignment was to be construed according to Minnesota law, but any contract affecting title to the land was to be construed according to California law.

9. Mortgages 🔑593

An equity of redemption is an "interest in real property" and any contract affecting title to such equities situated in California must be construed according to California law.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Interest in Real Property".

10. Judgment 🔑707

Where vendor had assigned interest under sales contract to bank holding deed in escrow to secure note issues and decree of bankruptcy court in corporate purchaser's reorganization proceeding ordering withdrawal of sale under the assignment by bank dismissed intervention petition of vendor's executors without prejudice, the executors were not "parties" and subsequent decree ordering bank to deliver deed to reorganized corporation for its securities was not "res judicata" so as to bar claim of vendor's executors to the land as against the reorganized corporation. Bankr.Act § 77B, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Party" and "Res Judicata".

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Pickering Lumber Company against Sophia Whiteside and others as executors of the estate of Robert B. Whiteside, deceased. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Reversed with directions.

Wm. M. Abbott, Cyril Appel, and Ivores R. Dains, all of San Francisco, and F. H. De Groat, of Duluth, Minn., for appellants.

Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, and Paul Barnett and Watson, Ess, Groner, Barnett & Whittaker, all of Kansas City, Mo., for respondent.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to quiet title to a large tract of timber land situated in Tuolumne and Calaveras Counties. The appeal was taken by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The various transactions bearing on the problem involved are evidenced by many instruments and records of judicial proceedings. For the purpose of clarity it may be well to set out the matter in controversy before examining the facts and pleadings. The transcript contains a lengthy stipulation of facts. Briefly stated, the problem is this: Plaintiff's predecessor in interest, Pickering Lumber Company, entered into a written contract with Robert B. Whiteside and Sophia Whiteside, his wife, in which said Pickering Lumber Company agreed to pay a stipulated consideration for said tract of land, all of which consideration has been satisfactorily paid, except the sum of $300,000 and interest thereon. Plaintiff contends that this $300,000 obligation and interest thereon was extinguished by an accord and satisfaction consummated by the duly authorized representatives of the parties to the contract, and that, in pursuance thereof the United States District Court in Bankruptcy, at Kansas City, Missouri, having jurisdiction of the subject matter and the parties, approved such accord and satisfaction, and by its final judgment and order directed the delivery of the deed, in evidence of the title which had passed; and that this judgment is a bar to defendants' assertion of any claim to title or interest in the lands.

The essential facts are as follows: Robert B. Whiteside was the owner, subject to a mortgage to the Detroit Trust Company, of this large tract of timber land. On January 5, 1927, he contracted for the sale thereof for $1,804,400 to the Pickering Lumber Company. The price was to be paid, $404,400 cash on execution of the contract, $600,000 by assuming and agreeing to pay the outstanding mortgage, and $800,000 payable in four annual installments of $200,000 each on January 5th of the years 1929 and 1932, inclusive. The Pickering Lumber Company was to have immediate possession, the deed to be placed in escrow with First National Bank of Duluth, Minnesota, for delivery to the purchaser upon payment of the entire purchase price, payments to be made to said bank to and for the account of Whiteside.

On January 5, 1928, Whiteside executed to the First National Bank of Duluth a so-called "collateral trust agreement" to secure an issue of $400,000 of his notes. Thereby Whiteside "sold, assigned, transferred, pledged and set over" to said bank all rights to the installments due under his contract with Pickering Lumber Company on January 5, 1930, and January 5, 1931 (aggregating $400,000), with interest thereon, in trust for the security of the holders of the notes. He also transferred all rights under the contract "insofar as the same may be necessary or applicable to enforcing payment of said amounts from said Pickering Lumber Company." Payments by the said company subsequently reduced the amount due under this agreement to $100,000, the time of payment of which was extended to January 5, 1934.

On July 5, 1928, there was a similar agreement with said bank to secure another issue of Whiteside notes, this time $200,000 in amount. The terms were similar, and the installment of $200,000 due January 5, 1932, under the Pickering contract was assigned as security. The First National Bank of Duluth and American Exchange National Bank of Duluth consolidated under the name of First and American National Bank of Duluth, which succeeded to all the rights, duties and obligations of the First National Bank of Duluth.

Throughout the determinative period, $100,000 of the installment originally due January 5, 1930, and the whole of the $200,000 due January 5, 1932, and interest thereon, assigned to the bank as security for the Whiteside notes, have remained unpaid. Everything else owing by the Pickering Lumber Company to Whiteside has been paid, except this part of the said installments so assigned to the bank.

On September 19, 1931, Whiteside died. His estate is in process of administration in the probate court of St. Louis County, Minnesota, with ancillary administration pending in the probate court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, the defendants being executors under the will of deceased in both courts. The bank's claim on the Whiteside first notes and first trust agreements owned by it was allowed by the Minnesota probate court for $106,986.30, and also the bank's claim as trustee under the second trust agreement in the sum of $212,000. Under the Minnesota law these amounts became judgments against the Whiteside estate.

In May, 1931, a receiver was appointed for the Pickering Lumber Company, by the United States District Court in Missouri. In November, 1934, the company filed therein a petition for reorganization under section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207.

In 1931, after the death of Whiteside, and while Pickering Lumber Company was having financial difficulty, a Whiteside Noteholders' Protective Committee was formed. In 1936 there were negotiations between that committee and the bank, a Pickering Bondholders' Committee which had been formed, and the voluntary committee for reorganization of Pickering Lumber Company, touching the treatment in the plan of organization of the company's indebtedness under the Whiteside contract.

The bank filed three claims against the bankrupt, either on the "Whiteside notes" or the security held thereunder on Pickering Lumber Company's obligation to pay the installments on the Whiteside contract, depending on the construction of the language in the claims. One of these was on the $100,000 obligation "as trustee," reserving its right to the security; another was on this $100,000 obligation "as owner," with the same reservation; the other was on the $200,000 obligation "as trustee," with same reservation. The noteholders' committee filed a claim on the $200,000 obligation, "on behalf of owners," with same reservation. The claims of bank as owner, and of noteholders' committee "on behalf of owners" were allowed, and the other two claims were disallowed.

In May, the Whiteside noteholders made a written proposal, "to release the above mentioned claim against the Pickering Lumber Company, and deliver to the reorganized Pickering Lumber Company the deed in our possession," and receive in return therefor $105,000 of 4 per cent income bonds, $195,000 of 5 per cent non-cumulative preferred stock, and 3,000 shares of common stock of the reorganized Pickering Lumber Company. (The deed should have been in possession of the bank, as escrow-holder, and not the noteholders.) However, it was stated in the proposal that it would be necessary for the representatives of Whiteside's estate to procure approval of the probate court of St. Louis County, Minnesota, of the plan of reorganization. Mr. DeGroat, as attorney for the executor, signed a letter consenting to the plan of reorganization and to the proposal, "subject to the approval of the probate court * * *."

On February 19, 1937, the federal court entered an order of approval of the plan of reorganization, accepting the proposal in regard to the Pickering-Whiteside note obligations. On February 17, 1937, the Minnesota probate court made an order authorizing the executors to consent to the plan for exchange of securities of the reorganized Pickering Lumber Company in return for the deed, and authorizing them to direct the bank to deliver the deed held in escrow on condition that the claims on Whiteside's notes which were judgments against the estate, would be satisfied and discharged.

The bank, holding as trustee, apparently believing it had no legal right to waive a possible deficiency judgment on the Whiteside notes, commenced foreclosure proceedings on the securities it held, and advertised the same for sale. The Minnesota executors of the Whiteside estate then filed a petition in intervention in the bankruptcy court. It set out the probate court order, and asked that the bank be directed to satisfy its claim against Whiteside's estate; that the bank be directed to deliver the deed held in escrow, and that the Whiteside noteholders be directed to deliver the Whiteside notes to Pickering Lumber Company upon the issuance of the stock and bonds of the reorganized company; that the court enjoin foreclosure sale by the bank until after hearing; that the bank be directed generally to do all things necessary to carry out the proposed plan of reorganization; and that the court enter an order upon respondents to show cause why the directions and orders prayed for should not be granted. The sale was ordered withdrawn, and the matter set for hearing.

On March 17, 1937, the bankruptcy court entered an order directing the bank to withdraw the sale without prejudice to respondents' rights. On March 26, 1937, the petition in intervention was heard, and the order of March 17th was reaffirmed. Otherwise the court dismissed the intervening petition "without prejudice, however, to the rights of the said interveners (Whiteside executors) and respondents (First and American National Bank of Duluth, A. C. Weiss, Charles D. Brown, Robert W. Hotchkiss) with respect to the matters and things alleged in said intervening petition." On March 27, 1937, the bankruptcy court entered its final decree in the reorganization proceedings adjudging, among other things, that the bank deliver the deed it held in escrow, and that "the securities issued * * * in exchange for said deed, shall be delivered to said First and American National Bank of Duluth, to be held by said Bank in lieu of the collateral represented by said contract dated January 5th, 1927, and the payments due thereunder."

On April 24, 1937, the bank petitioned the bankruptcy court for protection in making delivery of the deed, and the court, by an ex parte order, directed that the bank deliver the said deed to the judge of said court, to be by him deposited with the clerk of said court, and that said delivery should constitute compliance by the bank, as trustee, with the court order in the final decree of March 27, 1937. The plaintiff, Pickering Lumber Corporation, is the reorganized corporation growing out of said reorganization plan, and is composed of the bondholders, other creditors and stockholders of Pickering Lumber Company. On April 24, 1937, on further order of the bankruptcy court, the clerk of said court delivered said deed to plaintiff. Plaintiff promptly recorded the deed in California and began this action to quiet title.

The bank brought an action in the District Court of St. Louis County, Minnesota, to determine its right to a deficiency judgment on the Whiteside notes in case the proceeds from the sale of the securities received by it in the reorganization proceedings were insufficient to pay the same in full. The district court adjudged that the bank would be entitled to such deficiency, and the Supreme Court of Minnesota affirmed the decision. First & American National Bank of Duluth v. Whiteside et al., 207 Minn. 537, 292 N.W. 770.

[1, 2] The legal questions involved in this maze of facts will now be considered and analyzed. Plaintiff contends that the effect of the contract of January 5, 1927, was to pass title to Pickering Lumber Company; that this contract gave the vendee all the rights of a mortgagor, and reserved to the vendor only the rights of a mortgagee,—that it was, in effect, a deed. With this contention of the plaintiff we cannot agree. It is very plain that the contract was an executory contract of sale, and that title remained in the vendor. The language of the contract permits of no other construction. It states: "Vendors shall sell and convey to the purchaser, and the purchaser shall purchase from the vendors, for the price and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, the lands." It also states: "If the purchaser shall pay for said lands as herein provided, the vendors shall, and they covenant that they will make, execute and deliver to the purchaser, a good and sufficient general warranty deed * * * conveying to the purchaser * * * title in fee simple to all of said lands." It also states: "When the purchaser has paid the entire purchase price as hereinabove provided * * * said bank shall deliver said deed to the purchaser." Also, in providing for rights and remedies, in case of default by the purchaser, the contract states: "The vendors may, without prejudice to their position or rights as owners of the property, make such bid." These clauses, and other language employed throughout the instrument, indicate that the vendor has rights far beyond those of a mortgagee; for instance, "specific performance," "to bid on the property, and in the event that no bid or bids are received from others, higher than the highest bid of the vendors * * * the vendors may call the sale off, credit the amount bid, and sue for a deficiency." No such rights are given to a mortgagee. Fisher v. Chaffee, 49 Cal.App.2d 97, 121 P.2d 51; Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 722, 723, 93 P. 858, 15 L.R.A.,N.S., 359. In fact, the language of the instrument is so plain that it did not transfer title, that it requires no further citation of authority. The case of First & American National Bank of Duluth v. Whiteside, 207 Minn. 537, 292 N.W. 770, supra, speaks of it as a contract of sale. After the execution of this contract, Whiteside still held title, subject to the first mortgage of the Detroit Trust Company.

The next transactions involve the Whiteside "collateral trust agreement" to the Duluth Bank to secure an issue of $400,000 of his notes, by means of which Whiteside "sold, assigned, tranferred, pledged and set over" to the bank all rights to the installments due on the Pickering contract on January 5, 1930, and January 5, 1931, with interest thereon, in trust as security for the holders of the notes, and also transferred all rights "insofar as the same may be necessary or applicable to enforcing payment of said amounts from said Pickering Lumber Company"; and the subsequent agreement, in regard to the loan by the bank of $200,000, by which Whiteside assigned the final payment under the Pickering contract.

[3] These were security transactions insofar as they affected the Pickering contract; they did not transfer Whiteside's title. He held the title to the land as security for these payments. This assignment, being a security transaction, created an equitable lien or mortgage on the Whiteside tract. Roller v. Smith, 76 Colo. 371, 231 P. 656; Farmers & Merchants Nat'l Bank v. Arrington, Tex.Civ.App., 98 S.W.2d 378; vol. 5, Tiffany Real Property, 3rd Ed., § 1573; vol. 4 Pomeroy's Eq.Jur., 5th Ed., § 1259, page 763. These authorities clearly determine that the effect of these transactions, insofar as Whiteside's land was concerned, was an equitable second mortgage on his land, held in trust by the bank. We must bear in mind that the bank owned the mortgage but not the land. The Whiteside notes constituted the mortgage debt, and the land was Whiteside's security that Pickering Lumber Company would pay an amount sufficient to satisfy the Whiteside notes. This was a relationship existing between Whiteside and the bank, to which the Pickering

Lumber Company was not a party. After the contract of January 5, 1927, Whiteside had a debt, claim, or chose in action against Pickering Lumber Company; Pickering Lumber Company was a party to that transaction, and this debt, claim, or chose in action Whiteside transferred to the bank as security for the payment of his notes. The value of this debt, insofar as the Pickering Lumber Company was concerned, depended entirely upon that company's ability to pay. The Pickering Lumber Company held no title to the Whiteside tract to back it up. Its value, insofar as the Pickering Lumber Company was concerned, did not depend upon the value of the Whiteside tract. The bank also received Whiteside's separate personal promise to pay the notes, backed by his financial ability to pay. Whiteside had the right to expect that if the bank required him to pay the notes, it would return his security, consisting of the equitable second mortgage.

At the time the plan of reorganization was proposed, what rights or interests did each party own? Pickering Lumber Company owned an executory contract giving it a right to purchase the Whiteside tract upon payment of the purchase price, and it also had a valuable equity therein for the payments it had already made. Duluth Bank held an equitable second mortgage on the Whiteside tract, as security for the payment of the Whiteside notes, these notes being the mortgage debt. Whiteside estate owned and held title to the Whiteside tract, subject to the equitable second mortgage held by the Duluth Bank, and the contract of purchase held by Pickering Lumber Company.

Who were the parties to the compromise plan or purported accord and satisfaction? The Whiteside estate was not a party thereto, because its acceptance thereof was conditional upon full satisfaction of the Whiteside note obligations, which condition was never complied with. Therefore, the only parties to this compromise, insofar as it affects this case, were the Duluth Bank and Pickering Lumber Company, the bankrupt corporation. The Pickering Lumber Company agreed to transfer, and did transfer to the reorganized corporation, Pickering Lumber Corporation, all its rights and interest in the Whiteside tract, to-wit: Its equity therein, and its right to purchase and acquire title upon full payment of the purchase price; and the reorganized corporation, in consideration therefor, did agree to issue and deliver, and did so issue and deliver to Duluth Bank, a creditor of the bankrupt corporation, certain of its stock and securities, and Duluth Bank did agree to deliver to the reorganized corporation, and did deliver, the deed to the Whiteside tract, which it held in escrow, but was authorized to deliver only upon full payment of the purchase price of the Whiteside tract according to the contract of January 5, 1927; and it also undertook to relieve the bankrupt corporation from any further payments under the contract of January 5, 1927, and to pass to the reorganized corporation, title to the Whiteside tract, which was retained to Whiteside in said contract as security for such payment in full, and to still hold and retain to itself the equitable mortgage debt, to-wit: the Whiteside notes.

[4] We believe that the attempt of the bank to pass title to land it did not own was futile, as was the attempt to separate the mortgage from the mortgage debt. To illustrate: "A" owns a tract of land, subject to an executory contract of sale held by "B," on which X amount will become due, and must be paid before "B" is entitled to title, and for the payment of which X sum, "A" holds the title as security. "A" borrows X amount from "C" on his, "A's" promissory note, and assigns the X amount coming to him from "B" under the contract to "C" as security for the payment of the X amount of "A's" note. This creates an equitable mortgage on "A's" land, held by "C," and "A's" note being the mortgage debt. It is obvious that "C" cannot cancel the amount X, or any part of it, due "A" under "B's" contract, and for the payment of which "A" holds title to the land as security, and pass title to the land to "B" and still hold "A" on his note. Under these circumstances the mortgage debt and mortgage cannot be separated. The fact that the land may have been of little or no value above the encumbrance did not give the parties the right to compromise and to transfer title to this land in the making of the accord and satisfaction. The owner of land, no matter what its value, cannot be deprived of his property without due process, and the law has established the procedure which must be followed.

[5] The equitable mortgage lien will subsist until the debt it was given to secure (Whiteside notes) is paid in full, or the mortgage lien foreclosed in the manner provided by law. Although a vendor in an executory contract for the sale of land who retains title to such land as security for the payment of the purchase money, sues to recover the unpaid contract price, and obtains judgment thereon, which judgment has not been paid in full, the suit for the unpaid contract price, and recovery of such judgment does not affect the vendor's right to foreclose against such land held as security for any uncollected or unsatisfied portion of the purchase money. Longmaid v. Coulter, 123 Cal. 208, 55 P. 791.

[6, 7] The equitable mortgage was executed by Whiteside, to secure his notes, and not Pickering Company's obligation to pay the contract price. The fact that Whiteside held title to the land to secure him for the payment of Pickering Company's contract obligation did not cause the Pickering Company's contract to be a mortgage, nor was the obligation of Pickering Company to pay the contract price, a mortgage debt. 13 Pomeroy's Eq.Jur., 4th Ed., p. 3041, § 1260; Maltby v. Conklin, 50 Cal.App. 201, 204, 195 P. 280. The distinction being, that in a mortgage, the mortgagor holds title to the land, and the mortgagee has a lien on the land for the payment of the mortgage debt, while in an executory contract of sale, the vendor holds the title to the land as security for the payment of the purchase price, which is more effective than a lien. Nor did the assignment by Whiteside of his claim against Pickering Company under the contract, as security for the payment of his notes, change this obligation of Pickering Company under its contract, to a mortgage debt, because this assignment did not transfer the vendor's title to the land to Pickering Lumber Company.

[8-9] The contract of assignment is to be construed according to the laws of Minnesota, but any contract affecting title to real property situated in California is to be construed according to the laws of California. An "equity of redemption" is an interest in real property. Graves v. Arizona Cent. Bank, 205 Cal. 715, 272 P. 1063; Grant v. Cumberland Valley Cement Co., 58 W.Va. 162, 52 S.E. 36.

It is apparent that after the reorganization plan was consummated and approved by the federal court, unless the Whiteside estate was barred by the order and judgment of the said court, Whiteside's estate still held title to the land, subject to the equitable mortgage held by Duluth Bank, and the contract of sale of January 5, 1927, held by Pickering Lumber Corporation.

We will now consider whether or not the judgment of the Federal Court is a bar to defendant's assertion of any claim to the lands in question.

Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act gives the bankruptcy court exclusive jurisdiction over the debtor's property and assets wherever situated. Title 11 U.S.C.A. § 207. Executory contracts may constitute valuable assets, and it is customary in bankruptcy proceedings to either affirm or reject the obligation thereon. Rejection would give the vendor a claim for damages, if any, and affirmance would give him a right to the contract price before title could be taken from him. Consolidated Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. of Baltimore v. United Rys. & E. Co., 4 Cir., 85 F.2d 799; In re Burgemeister Brewing Co., 7 Cir., 84 F.2d 388, 389; In re Ideal Laundry, D.C., 10 F.Supp. 719; In re Lake's Laundry, D.C., 11 F.Supp. 237. In the case at bar the bankruptcy court did not reject the contract. There is no doubt that if it had acquired jurisdiction over the parties, it had the right to require the contract to be performed; and if and when the contract was performed, to direct the delivery of the deed. It also had a right to direct a foreclosure on the securities held in the security transaction, as the security-holder (the Bank), had submitted to its jurisdiction; but it had no jurisdiction over the Whiteside executors without bringing them in by proper process, or unless they voluntarily submitted to its jurisdiction. If it had ordered the bank to foreclose on its securities, the bank could only have sold the equitable mortgage, and the debt secured thereby, together and not separately. If the equitable mortgage and debt were sold and acquired by Pickering Company, it no doubt could then be foreclosed in the bankruptcy court (In re Murel Holding Corporation, 2 Cir., 75 F.2d 941), provided the parties to the mortgage were before the court or submitted to its jurisdiction.

In this case the Whiteside executors came before the bankruptcy court by filing a petition in intervention to enjoin the bank from the threatened sale of securities unless it satisfied the claims which it had filed against the Whiteside estate. It is perhaps true that the bankruptcy court might have then tried, determined and adjudicated the issues between the bank and the Whiteside executors, as to the right to the delivery of the deed. If it can fairly be said it did this, the judgment of the bankruptcy court is res adjudicata, and although perhaps erroneous, is a bar to defendants in this action; but if, as appears to be the case, the petition was dismissed without prejudice, nothing was adjudicated thereby as against interveners (Goddard v. Security Title Ins. & Guar. Co., 14 Cal.2d 47, 92 P.2d 804; North Carolina Ry. Co. v. Story, 268 U.S. 288, 45 S.Ct. 531, 69 L.Ed. 959), and they have no right to appeal and are not barred thereby. Brunswick Tire Corp. v. Credit Tire Stores, Inc., 8 Cal. App.2d 69, 70, 46 P.2d 804.

[10] The question to be determined then, is: Did the bankruptcy court adjudicate the question herein involved? The order of March 17, 1937, was that the bank should withdraw and discontinue the sale, and "that the rights of said respondents (the bank and noteholders' committee), with respect to the matters and things alleged in intervener's petition herein, shall not thereby be prejudiced"; that is, the bank, noteholders and Whiteside executors were relegated to the same situation they had occupied before the notice of sale was started, and the court, in said order, reserved "jurisdiction to hear and determine, insofar as it has jurisdiction to do so, all matters and things set forth in said intervening petition, at the time of the hearing upon the final decree in said reorganization proceedings." On March 26, 1937, further hearing on intervener's petition was had. The court reaffirmed its former order, insofar as it had ordered withdrawal and discontinuance of the sale by the bank, reciting that "it appearing to the court that the other controversies involved in said intervening petition are more properly cognizable in the courts of Minnesota."

What were the other matters? According to the petition in intervention they were the satisfaction of the bank's claim against the Whiteside estate, and the surrender of all Whiteside's notes to the executors, and a direction to deliver the deed in exchange for the securities of the reorganized corporation. The order further continued: "Except as above provided, said intervention petition be, and it hereby is, dismissed, without prejudice, however, to the rights of said interveners and said respondents with respect to the matters and things alleged in said intervening petition." That order meant that except as to the withdrawal of the sale, without prejudice to any rights of the bank of noteholders' committee, the petition was dismissed "without prejudice." After this, the final decree was made, directing the delivery of the deed in exchange for the securities mentioned. But when, as was the case, the intervener's petition was dismissed "without prejudice," interveners were no longer before the court. They were not parties. They had filed no claim in the bankruptcy proceedings. They had no right to appeal, and the court had no power to take title to their land away from them.

Assuming that the bankruptcy court did have a right to order the bank to deliver the deed, which we believe it could not do without having the Whiteside executors as parties to the proceedings, it could not adjudicate their property rights. Therefore, the defendants are not bound by the decree in bankruptcy. In the case of First and American National Bank v. Whiteside, supra, the Minnesota court held this decree was not res adjudicata in that action, and we hold that it is not res adjudicata in this action.

Therefore, we determine that the defendants hold title to the Whiteside tract, subject to an equitable mortgage lien thereon for any unpaid remainder of the Whiteside notes, and also subject to the contract of January 5, 1927; and that the deed of record was delivered without authority, and conveys no title to the lands therein described, and will not become effective to transfer title until the full contract price is paid according to the terms of said contract of purchase.

The judgment is reversed, with directions that a judgment be entered adjudging defendants to be the owners and holders of title to the lands described in the complaint, subject, however, to a lien thereon for any unpaid remainder of the Whiteside notes, and subject, further, to the terms and conditions of the contract of purchase of January 5, 1927.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Sylvain J. Lazarus, Judge.

Action by Jean Lord against Phil C. Katz, as administrator of the estate of John Ryan, deceased, to quiet title to certain shares of corporate stock allegedly given plaintiff by decedent prior to his death. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Cleveland R. Wright, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry F. Boyen, Frank J. Fontes, and Elkins & Wright, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of defendant as administrator of the estate of John Ryan, deceased, in an action seeking to quiet title to certain shares of corporate stock. Plaintiff's claim of ownership of the shares is based upon an alleged gift inter vivos by the decedent of whose estate respondent is administrator. A second count of the complaint sought to enforce payment of a creditor's claim against the estate of the decedent but at the commencement of the trial this count was dismissed on the statement of counsel that he relied exclusively on the first cause of action.

The decedent at the time of his death on January 27, 1941, was a bachelor seventy-nine years of age. He had been retired for more than twenty years, living on the income and proceeds of securities he had accumulated. The plaintiff is a widow. Her husband, Frank Lord, died on June 13, 1937. Frank Lord and the decedent had known each other since the former was a boy four or five years of age. The decedent was about eighteen years his senior. In about 1920 the two met again in San Francisco and Frank Lord invited the decedent to his home for dinner. Thereafter the decedent called for dinner about every two weeks. Commencing a few years later the decedent was almost a daily visitor. About eighteen years ago the Lords moved to a home on Funston Avenue. Thereafter Ryan spent almost every day there puttering in the garden and having his noonday meal with Mrs. Lord. On occasions he would remain for dinner and sometimes spend the night. On holidays and other occasions such as birthdays he was always among the guests. During this period he lived at a small hotel but for about five months after Mr. Lord's death he stayed at the Lord home. He had frequently told Mrs. Lord that he had no relatives except that he might have some "forty-second cousins." In January of 1940 while he and Mrs. Lord were having lunch, no one else being present, the decedent handed her a key and stated that it was the key to his safe deposit. She inquired why he was giving it to her and he replied, "Well, because everything in it is yours." He then said there were 570 shares of Transamerica, 50 shares of Bank of America, 11 shares of Bank of Blair (Bankamerica Blair Corporation) and 26 of Equity Corporation. (These were the only securities found in the box after Mr. Ryan's death. All the certificates bore dates prior to January of 1940.) Subsequent to this time the key remained in Mrs. Lord's possession continuously. Mr. Ryan at no time asked that it be returned to him. Mrs. Lord did not tell anyone of the conversation except that her daughter knew she had the key and she told her daughter what Mr. Ryan had stated was in the box. (The daughter did not testify.) Mr. Ryan dropped dead on January 27, 1941, at Mrs. Lord's home, and was buried in the Lord family plot. The foregoing facts were brought out by the testimony of plaintiff alone except that the intimacy of the acquaintanceship was corroborated by two other witnesses, and the contents of the box after decedent's death was established by the inventory of a representative of the defendant.

After the alleged gift plaintiff did nothing towards reducing the stock certificates to her physical possession, though she had her own safe deposit box in the same bank. During this same period Mr. Ryan visited the box on five different occasions though his purpose in so doing does not appear nor does it appear where or when he obtained the key to gain access. In her briefs appellant apparently concedes that he must have had a second key at all times. Mr. Ryan had been accustomed to receiving his mail at the Lord residence. Subsequent to January, 1940, dividend checks were received by mail which plaintiff gave to Mr. Ryan unopened. She testified that Mr. Ryan would ask her why she had not opened them and when she replied that she would not he would say that it would all be hers anyway. She testified on one occasion that she had told him, "Well, we will wait until it is"; and on another that she told him he would enjoy it. Plaintiff did state that Mr. Ryan owned the stock "all the time" but immediately thereafter she modified this by stating that she meant all the time prior to his giving her the key. She also testified that she felt the stock would be hers after Mr. Ryan's death but this answer she explained by stating that she felt the stock was hers when Mr. Ryan gave her the key but that she would not take anything while he was alive. Though she further testified that even after Mr. Ryan gave her the key he could have given the stock to someone else she also explained this testimony by stating that if he had wanted to do so she would have given the stock back.

After Mr. Ryan's death a representative of the defendant telephoned to plaintiff and at his request she delivered to him the key to the box but the court found that "plaintiff, at the time of said delivery, claimed to be entitled to the contents of said safe deposit box"; and "plaintiff delivered said key to said safe deposit box under protest." This finding is supported by the evidence.

After defendant's appointment as administrator plaintiff through an attorney filed a creditor's claim against the decedent's estate in the sum of $4,620 for services rendered. (The appraised value of the entire estate was $4,603.79) Plaintiff testified that she had gone to the attorney and stated all of the facts to him and that the idea of filing a claim was that of this attorney and was stated by him to be the proper procedure. This claim was rejected. Plaintiff then abandoned the claim and dismissed her attorney. Some time later she met a friend who told her that if decedent had given her the stock and told her the stock was hers she was entitled to it. She then consulted her present attorney and this action was begun.

[1, 2] We have related the evidence in perhaps greater than usual detail because the first and determinative question presented is whether under this evidence the lower court was justified in finding "that it is not true that said John Ryan gave or delivered said certificates of stock, or any of them, evidencing the right to said stock, or any of said shares of stock, or that said John Ryan intended to make a gift of said stock * * * to plaintiff * * *." More properly stated the question is whether as a matter of law the evidence required a contrary finding. The solution of this question must be found in a determination whether the facts presented bring this case within the well settled rule that the court may not arbitrarily reject the uncontradicted testimony of a witness or the equally well settled exceptions to said rule that such testimony may be disregarded when it is inconsistent with surrounding circumstances or whether inconsistencies in the witness's testimony or his manner of testifying or the inherent improbabilities of the testimony justify such action. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 P. 147. In truth this is not an exception to the rule for if there are such inconsistencies or inherent improbabilities the rejection of the testimony is not "arbitrary." This determination must be made in the light of the rule that "every element necessary to constitute a gift must be sustained by explicit and convincing evidence." Sullivan v. Shea, 32 Cal.App. 369, 371, 162 P. 925, 927.

[3] Appellant stresses the fact that at the conclusion of the testimony and before the argument the trial judge stated the facts were proved without dispute and stated among other things that it was uncontradicted that the decedent "handed the key to his safe deposit box to Mrs. Lord and told her that the contents of the safe deposit box belonged to her." Appellant further argues that the judge's express statement and his written opinion (the opinion is not before us) clearly show that the case was decided by him solely on the question of law as to the sufficiency of the delivery. It is true that the statement of the judge is contrary to the finding of fact hereinbefore quoted and it may be that the statement represents his true determination of the facts, but it is settled that inconsistencies between the written opinion of a trial judge or his antecedent expressions and the findings of fact cannot be considered by an appellate court. In Magarian v. Moser, 5 Cal.App.2d 208, at page 210, 42 P.2d 385, the court said: "We have been shown no authority to support appellant's argument that the written opinion of the trial judge constituted a part of the court's decision and that its inconsistency with the findings and conclusions filed deprives the judgment of the support and conformity required by law. It is obvious that the judgment as entered must be supported by, and conform to, the findings (Nestor v. Burr, 124 Cal.App. 369, 12 P.2d 479), but it seems equally clear that a written opinion of the trial court is no more a part of the decision rendered than an oral pronouncement can be and that such opinion, even if inconsistent with the formal conclusions reached by the court, cannot be made the basis for a reversal when the findings, conclusions, and judgment are consistent." In Phillips v. Hooper, 43 Cal.App.2d 467, 470, 111 P.2d 22, 23, the court said: "And no antecedent expressions of the judge can in anyway restrict his absolute power to declare his final conclusion, in the only manner authorized by law, to wit, by filing his 'decision' (findings of fact and conclusions of law), provided in sections 632 and 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Scholle v. Finnell, 173 Cal. 372, 159 P. 1179; Fisk v. Casey, 119 Cal. 643, 51 P. 1077; Montecito Valley W. Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 77 P. 1113; Risinger v. Anderson, 10 Cal.App.2d 455, 51 P.2d 1119." This rule has again been followed and reaffirmed in the recent case of Lawrence v. City of Los Angeles, 53 Cal.App.2d 6, 127 P.2d 931.

[4] It is respondent's contention that appellant's testimony was full of inconsistencies of which the trial court was the exclusive judge in reaching its determination whether a gift was intended. Respondent adds that the fact that the gift would have divested the decedent of his only means of support except for a bank account of about $1,100 makes it improbable that such a gift was made. Appellant endeavors to explain each of those inconsistencies and presents a case which would have fully supported a judgment in her favor. But, as there is some evidentiary support for the findings this court is bound by those findings. Appellant cites Gordon v. Barr, 13 Cal.2d 596, 91 P.2d 101; Braun v. Brown, 14 Cal.2d 346, 94 P.2d 348, 127 A.L.R. 773, and similar cases where findings contrary to those made here were approved or where the decision rested solely on a question of law. In those cases the court was concerned with the question of the sufficiency of the delivery as a matter of law; in none is it held that all the circumstances may not be considered in determining whether the testimony tending to prove delivery and intent may be rejected.

[5] In a case of this kind we cannot say that the conclusion of the trial court was entirely arbitrary, and we cannot say that the court was bound as a matter of law to accept all the testimony of appellant as true. Since the judgment must be affirmed on this ground it is unnecessary to consider any of the other grounds urged by respondent.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is the second appeal in the above entitled action. See Cortopassi v. California-Western, etc., Co. et al., 39 Cal.App. 2d 280, 102 P.2d 1093. After the remittitur in that case went down the cause was tried before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs and from the judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed. In addition to the facts stated in the former opinion other facts will be recited as we proceed.

The defendants contend that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. A consideration of the point requires a more complete statement of the facts. At Fort Bragg in Mendocino County, the Union Lumber Company operates a saw mill and other plants in the manufacture of products of wood. It has many subsidiaries, among others the defendant, California-Western Railroad and Navigation Company (hereinafter called the railroad company), which conducts the greater part of the transportation business for the Union Lumber Company but which is also engaged as a carrier for other persons and is generally engaged in interstate commerce.

The lumber mill of the Union Lumber Company is located close to the ocean shore on the west side of Fort Bragg. Among other appurtenances it has a planing mill in which Joseph Cortopassi, the decedent, was and had been for many years engaged as a planer. The railroad tracks of the defendant extended in a general northerly and southerly direction on a right of way that lies between the lumber mill and the city of Fort Bragg. A part of that right of way is known as the yard. On the east side of the yard is a round house. On the western side of the yard is a shed used as a garage for cars. Between those two buildings is a switch. One railroad track lies between the switch and the round house. Between the switch and the shed are three other tracks. All are practically parallel. The yard has a grade from the south toward the north. The record shows that the brakes being released a car will roll from the north down by the switch toward the south. For a distance of 170 feet from the switch toward the north there are no buildings or other fixed obstructions. A path exists extending from the northwest to the southeast across the tracks at about the north end of the switch.

The decedent, as stated above, was an employee of the Union Lumber Company. His work day was finished at 4 p. m. He was a man of sound health, good eyesight, and good hearing. At about 4:15 p. m. on the afternoon of September 12, 1936, the decedent was on the above mentioned path. He was seen at a point two or three steps west of the western rail of the eastern track. He was then proceeding in a southeasterly direction and had his head turned toward the south. At about that time W. L. King as motorman, and Tom Golden as conductor, were backing a motor coach from the north on the eastern track down toward the switch. The motorman was at his post operating the motor. The conductor was standing on a step on the eastern side of the north end of the motor coach giving signals to the motorman. At about the same time a train of flat cars was being propelled by a steam locomotive from the south toward the north on the western side of the yard. The steam locomotive had reached a point that was practically abreast of the point where the decedent was first seen, as recited above. Except as hereinabove recited, there was nothing to obscure the view of the decedent either to the north or to the south. The steam locomotive was being propelled at a speed of about 25 miles an hour. The motor coach was "coasting" from the north to the south at a speed of about two miles an hour. The bell on the locomotive was ringing continuously. The bell on the motor coach was ringing continuously. The latter bell, according to the testimony, could be heard for a half a mile.

Under the foregoing circumstances the decedent was knocked down and killed as the motor coach backed to the south. McDonald, an employee of the Union Lumber Company, was in the cab of the locomotive. He saw the decedent take two or three steps until he walked over the rail, turned to the south and was struck by the rear end of the motor coach. The witness Burnie was riding on a flat car immediately behind the steam locomotive. He had been making some repairs. He looked up and, as he stated, in a flash he saw the decedent traveling southerly with his face turned toward the witness. He was nearly on the western rail of the east track. He was facing the south. Here the witness indicated to the jury the position of decedent. The witness observed the front of the body of the decedent. He seemed to be walking. The witness was nearly due west of decedent at the time of the collision and was facing east. The witness Saunders was on the same flat car and looking at the motor coach. He first saw the decedent at a point which he estimated to be four feet eight inches from the track. The decedent was walking. He saw him take a step or two, turn his head to the south, when he was struck and knocked down. The decedent was walking toward the motor coach with his head down, but the witness did not see him look toward the motor coach which was then about ten feet away. The witness Emil Nieminen was riding on a flat car estimated to be 150 feet to the south of the place of the accident. He was looking directly at the decedent. He saw the decedent between the rails and testified, "I started to holler and yell all I could and motion him to get off the road." He also testified that he saw the decedent and the motor coach at about the same time. The decedent at no time looked to the rear. Taking all of these facts into consideration it is clear that the question whether the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence is a close one. But, in view of the conclusion we have reached on the point next to be considered, we do not feel called upon to decide the first contention.

[1, 2] Acting upon the request of the plaintiffs, the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that the deceased, Joseph Cortopassi, as he crossed the track upon which he was killed, is presumed in the absence of credible evidence to the contrary, to have exercised ordinary care for his own safety. Under such circumstances, the decedent, Joseph Cortopassi had a right under the law to assume until the contrary appeared that he was not exposed to danger which could come to him only by and through the negligence of those operating the motor coach, and that if he acted upon such assumption he was not guilty of contributory negligence merely by reason of the fact that he did so." The defendants contend it was error to give said instruction. The plaintiffs reply that the first sentence implies that the decedent was acting with due care. Continuing they assert that the remainder of the instruction was based on the first proposition. They conclude that therefore the instruction was properly given. Murphy v. St. Claire Brewing Co., 41 Cal.App.2d 535, 540, 107 P.2d 273. The vice in that reasoning is that the plaintiffs fail to appreciate that their claim is based on the claim that the decedent was hit by an instrumentality operated on a steam railroad track. The distinction is all important. A similar controversy arose in Hoffart v. Southern Pacific Co., 33 Cal.App.2d 591, 92 P.2d 436. On page 598 of 33 Cal.App.2d on page 440 of 92 P.2d, the court said: "The following instruction was given: 'A person about to cross over such crossing cannot rely upon the assumption that the employees operating a train on the track will give the proper warning of approach by sounding the bell and blowing the whistle.' Appellants contend that the foregoing instruction is erroneous, in that the rule applies only where the person about to cross the track is himself negligent, and they also predicate error upon the refusal of the court to give an instruction to the effect that one free from negligence, in approaching a railroad crossing, has a right to anticipate that the law requiring the ringing of a bell and the sounding of a whistle would be complied with. The instruction given correctly stated the law, and the proposed instruction was properly rejected. As stated in Hutson v. Southern California R. Co., 150 Cal. 701–703, 89 P. 1093, 1094: 'It is not the law of this State that a person approaching a railroad crossing is authorized to assume that the persons operating a train will not in any way be negligent in that operation.'" (Petition for hearing in Supreme Court denied.) That the giving of said instruction was highly prejudicial in the instant case is patent from the following facts. It is hardly debatable that the defendant railway company was negligent in backing the motor coach in the manner described above. Its only defense therefore was the contributory negligence of the decedent. Referring to the effect of the instruction on assumption of the decedent it was said: "Such a rule would abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence in all such cases * * *." Hutson v. Southern California R. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 703, 89 P. 1093. See, also, Hamlin v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 784, 89 P. 1109; Larrabee v. Western Pacific R. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 748, 161 P. 750; Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal.App. 72, 78, 173 P. 1117. We conclude, therefore, that the giving of said instruction was reversible error.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Vaughn N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by S. M. Bostock against Ben Hulse and others for breach of employment contract whereby defendants engaged the services of plaintiff as a licensed structural engineer to prepare plans and specifications for and superintend the demolition and reconstruction of a building. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

Appeal from order denying a new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

S. P. Williams, of El Centro, for appellants.

Russell Yeager, of El Centro, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This cause of action arose out of a breach of contract of employment wherein the appellants engaged the services of the respondent, a licensed structural engineer, to perform certain reconstruction work. The case was tried by the court without a jury.

The amended complaint set forth three causes of action. In the first, the plaintiff alleged that between May 23, 1940, and July 19, 1940, he drew plans, specifications, inspected the building to be reconstructed, and made estimates for superintending the dismantling and reconstruction of the building; that for these services defendants agreed to pay 5 per cent of the cost of the building; that its cost was $8,000; and that the sum of $400 became due and payable to him for the services above referred to. For the second cause of action he alleged that on June 27, 1940, he submitted completed plans for the above-mentioned building to the Brawley City Building Department, paid $12 for a permit authorizing the erection of the building, and that the defendants agreed to reimburse him for said payment but that they refuse to do so. The third cause of action alleged that on the 23rd day of May, 1940, plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement whereby the defendants employed the plaintiff to draw plans and specifications for the reconstruction of the above-mentioned building, as well as superintending the reconstruction; that the defendants agreed to pay for the services 5 per cent of the cost of the proposed building; that thereafter plaintiff commenced the performance of these services, drew sketches, designs and plans for the building, oversaw the dismantling of the old building, completed the plans and submitted the same to the Brawley City Building Inspector. This cause of action further alleged that on July 19, 1940, while plaintiff was completing the performance of this contract, the defendants without cause terminated the employment and repudiated the contract. The third cause of action also alleged that by reason of this wrongful termination of employment plaintiff suffered damages in the sum of $100 and that the reasonable value of the services actually performed was $300.

The court's findings in respect to these three causes of action were generally as follows: As to the first cause of action it found that plaintiff performed all of the services alleged therein, except that plaintiff did not superintend the reconstruction of the building because his employment was wrongfully terminated before the reconstruction work commenced, and as a consequence the sum of $400 did not become due and payable to the plaintiff for the services actually performed. The court then found for the plaintiff on the second cause of action to the effect that the defendants should reimburse plaintiff for the $12 fee advanced by the plaintiff for the building permit. As to the third cause of action the court found that the plaintiff did enter into an agreement on the 23rd day of May, 1940, whereby he agreed to prepare plans, sketches, and specifications, make estimates for, and superintend the demolition and reconstruction of the above-mentioned building; that the defendants promised to pay the plaintiff compensation for these services in the sum of 5 per cent of the cost of the building; that the plaintiff did commence the performance of these services; that he drew plans, designs and sketches for the building; that the plaintiff oversaw the dismantling of the old building until such time as the contract was terminated by the defendants; that he submitted the completed plans and specifications to the Brawley City Building Inspector and had them approved. Then the findings go on to state that on the 19th day of July, 1940, while the plaintiff was performing this contract, the defendants wrongfully and without lawful excuse terminated the employment, and that the plaintiff did well and faithfully perform all of the services required of him until said services were terminated. The court found that the plaintiff did not suffer damages in the sum of $100 by reason of the wrongful termination of employment, but the court did find that the reasonable value of the services actually performed by the plaintiff for the defendants was $300.

The issue on appeal has been strictly confined by the appellants to the question of whether there was sufficient evidence presented at the trial to establish the reasonable value of the services performed for the appellants by the respondent. Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of fact that the plaintiff did not suffer damages in the sum of $100 by reason of the wrongful termination of employment of the plaintiff and that said finding is contrary to the evidence. It is argued that respondent was not entitled to recover the full contract price since that would compensate him for labor unperformed and for expenses of performance he did not bear; citing Weichers v. Dehail, 41 Cal.App. 547, 183 P. 187; and Weaver v. Atlantian Const. Co., 84 Cal.App. 154, 258 P. 111.

[1] The record clearly shows sufficient evidence to support the court's finding that $312 was due for services performed and monies advanced. The compensation agreed upon for the completion of the job was $400, or 5 per cent of the cost of reconstruction, which reconstruction cost was admittedly $8,000. As to the actual work performed, respondent testified that "I immediately proceeded to take certain necessary dimensions and investigations of the job, and they were—the preliminary was blocked out—." The record indicates that other men were working for respondent and assisted him in preparing his plans and specifications. These men were paid for their services by respondent. In response to the question "Approximately how much of your work for Mr. Hulse had you completed at the time he terminated your employment?" the respondent answered: "All of the work on the plans. The plans were completed and the permit had been delivered to Mr. Hulse on June 27, and I received his letter on July 19, three weeks later. All of the work with the exception of field—what we call field inspection during the time of construction, and part of that had been done * * *. All that was left was to see that the building—was to go out and supervise the construction of the new building." The plans and specifications and preliminary plans were admitted in evidence and were before the court. The trial court allowed three-fourths of the agreed contract price of $400, which may have been part of the basis for the court's computation of the value of services performed. Appellants themselves submitted in evidence as part of their case in chief a letter sent by respondent to appellants in which he apparently set forth what he considered to be the terms of the agreement and when his claim would be considered to be due. It reads in part as follows: "Full fee, 5% of $7,000, 75% of fee due upon issuance of building permit." It is agreed that the plans and specifications were completed and that the building permit was issued. There was ample evidence submitted to the trial court upon which that court could satisfy itself as to the percentage of work actually performed in relation to the work contracted to be performed, and inasmuch as the total contract price was agreed upon and admitted in the pleadings, the court could, from the evidence, establish what percentage of the contract price was due and owing to the respondent for the work actually performed. Brown v. Crown Gold Milling Co., 150 Cal. 376, 89 P. 86. The cases cited by appellant are not in conflict with this conclusion.

[2] The final argument of appellants must be considered in a lighter vein, i. e., the argument that the trial court erred in finding "that plaintiff did not suffer damages in the sum of $100," by reason of the fact that there was no basis for estimating the profit or loss on the part of the job that the respondent was prevented from performing. It is obvious that appellants cannot assert error in the ruling of the lower court when that error consists of a ruling in their favor. If the trial court had allowed respondent the sum of $100 by reason of the wrongful termination of employment, then the appellants might be in a position to argue that the trial court was in error, but when the trial court ruled against the respondent on that question, the appellants find themselves in the anomalous position of contending that the court erred in ruling in their favor. In re Estate of Funkenstein, 170 Cal. 594, 150 P. 987.

Verdicts for defendants against plaintiff, and for cross-complainant against Gruber, covering the property damage. The named defendant appeals from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict for the named defendant.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

Weinmann, Quayle & Berry, of Oakland, for appellants.

Milo Ayer and Pierce & Sherwin, all of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

[1] The plaintiff, who was riding as a guest in a truck operated by cross-defendant Gruber, was injured when the Gruber car collided with a laundry delivery truck operated by the defendant Kennedy in behalf of his employer the Pioneer Laundry Company. The latter filed a cross-complaint against Gruber for damages for injury to the laundry truck. In a trial of the cause to a jury the defendants had a verdict against the plaintiff, and the cross-complainant had a verdict against Gruber covering the property damage. The trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence. No ruling was made on Gruber's motion for a new trial, and it may be deemed denied under section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] There is no substantial conflict in the evidence. Defendant Kennedy was operating the laundry truck westerly on East 14th Street in the city of Oakland. He stopped near the northerly curb at the intersection with 73rd Avenue in response to a red traffic signal. To his left, or south, in the inner traffic lanes, two other cars stopped at about the same time. When the signal turned green Kennedy started quickly, making a left hand turn in a wide arc, passing in front of the two cars in the inner lanes. The drivers of these two cars saw the movement and stopped to let him pass. Kennedy completed the turn and crossed the two sets of street car tracks in the middle of East 14th Street when he observed Gruber traveling easterly along East 14th Street and about fifteen feet westerly of the intersection. He applied his brakes, but the left front fender and bumper of the Gruber truck collided with the right front fender of the laundry truck at a point about eleven feet easterly from the southwest curb of the intersection. The impact of the collision caused the laundry truck to be pushed out of its course of progress so that when the cars came to a full stop the laundry truck was facing east.

We are unable to perceive in what respect this evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The defendant Gruber testified that he saw the laundry truck stopped at the northeast corner of the intersection with two other cars stopped at the same line in the inner traffic lanes; he saw this laundry truck start with the signal, make the turn to the left, and saw the two other cars stopped to let him pass. He admitted knowledge that the laundry truck was preparing to make a left turn and hence knew that it would come directly across his path. The most reasonable inference that the jury could have drawn from all the evidence was that Gruber failed to exercise any care or to take any steps to avoid a collision, other than a feeble attempt to apply his brakes just before the impact.

[3, 4] But, when the trial court grants a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, that order may not be reversed on appeal, even though the record discloses ample evidence to support the verdict, unless the appellate court finds that the trial court has abused its discretion in granting the order. 20 Cal. Jur. 27. The decisions do not state upon what basis this finding should rest, but the cases cited hold that the burden of showing an abuse of discretion is on the appellant.

We find no reversible error. The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Vaughn N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by J. Lon Cromer against Sam Strieby on an open book account. From an adverse judgment, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Clifford W. Twombly and Ardene D. Boller, both of Arcadia, for appellant.

Darwin H. Wolford, of Beverly Hills, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is an action by plaintiff and respondent against defendant and appellant on an open book account. From an adverse judgment defendant appeals.

On October 28, 1941, the respondent filed a complaint consisting of one cause of action on an open book account alleging that defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $700; that $283.99 was paid thereon; and that there is a balance due in the sum of $416.11 which has not been paid.

On November 10, 1941, the appellant demanded from the respondent a bill of particulars which was furnished on December 15, 1941. On December 6, 1941, appellant filed his answer denying the allegations of the complaint. The trial of the matter was had on January 14, 1942. Judgment was rendered against appellant in the sum of $416.01. Respondent Cromer was called as a witness. Appellant then objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that a bill of particulars had not been furnished, after demand, within the time prescribed by law. The objection was overruled. Cromer then testified and the court found that he had been in the business of cattle feeding for a period of ten years or more; that the method employed by him in carrying on his business was to purchase feed from farmers in Imperial Valley and buy cattle from other states, shipping the cattle in and feeding them; that this food, in the main, was bought several months before it was to be used, and the method frequently used was for the respondent to advance money to a farmer or grower, with which the farmer or grower was to plant and raise the feed; that these advances were made in different sums, as necessity arose; that when the food was grown respondent would pasture his cattle thereon and would credit to the account of the grower or farmer the price of the pasturage until the credit equalled the charges; then respondent would pay the balance, if any, in cash.

In conformity with this verbal agreement respondent testified that he delivered to appellant three checks, one in the sum of $400, dated April 7, 1938, one in the sum of $200, dated April 26, 1938, and one in the sum of $100, dated May 1, 1938; that two credits were made against the charge, one in the sum of $272.06, paid to him by one T. M. Bates, and another credit for $11.93, also turned in to him by Mr. Bates for the account; that as to the nature and method of carrying on his business he testified that his books were kept on all of his feeding business together; that after he had given Strieby the $700 he found that Strieby was growing no feed on the place for which the advance had been made; and he made several demands on Strieby for the pasturage for which he had advanced the money; that had Strieby grown the feed on the place on which the original deal was made he would have "pastured off" according to agreement.

With reference to his books, Cromer testified that one Allen was his bookkeeper at the time of the trial and that Allen had been keeping his books since one Pearson had become ill; that Pearson became ill in December, 1940; that prior to that time and since 1935, Pearson had been keeping the books; that because of a mental illness Pearson could not be brought into court to testify and could not be examined; that respondent made no change or alteration in the books when he took them from Pearson's possession and placed them in the hands of Allen.

Allen testified that he knew Pearson well for many years; that he knew his handwriting, and the entries made in the ledger were in the handwriting of Pearson; and further that the other books of respondent Cromer which were turned over to him under the Strieby account were also in the handwriting of Pearson; that he had worked with Pearson and had come in contact with him and with other books that he kept; and that the handwriting in the journal which was turned over to him by Cromer was the handwriting of Pearson. The rest of Allen's testimony described the entries in the books and identified and explained the charges and credits as they appeared from the books. Cancelled checks in the sums claimed to have been paid to appellant were received in evidence. The ledger sheet containing the account of Strieby, showing the dates of entry, the dates of the credits and balance due were received in evidence.

Appellant first contends that there is no evidence in the case as to how, when, or from what information entries were put into the records. In other words, it is appellant's contention that there was not sufficient evidence to show a proper foundation for the entry of the books into evidence, and he relies upon the case of Chan Kiu Sing v. Gordon, 171 Cal. 28, 151 P. 657. In this respect, appellant argues that even though respondent testified, over objection, that he gave the total sum of $700 to the appellant and that appellant was to grow feed on certain land which he had leased and that this money which he gave to appellant was not a loan, respondent was not authorized to designate this transaction as an open book account but that it amounted only to "gambling with the grower as a sort of hedge should he need or desire fall or winter feed"; that in the light of the testimony of the respondent, "if he had any cause of action against the defendant it would be either for breach of an oral contract, or for money had and received * * * that the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant did not constitute an open book account and no other remedy was open to the plaintiff because of the statute of limitations."

[1] As to the first point raised, it clearly appears from the record that the entries were made in the usual and ordinary course of the bookkeeping business. The cancelled checks respondent himself gave to Strieby and they were regularly entered by his bookkeeper Pearson. It is not disputed that the money was advanced by the respondent himself in the form of the checks in evidence. Mr. Allen's testimony as to his personal knowledge of Pearson's handwriting and that the entries were in the books when he received them corroborates respondent's testimony. The entries were the first permanent entries of the transaction; they were made within reasonable proximity of the transaction; and they were quite evidently correct because neither appellant nor his counsel in the examination of witnesses in reference to the books in court challenged the items claimed therein. There can be no question, from an examination of the checks and the record of account, that appellant received the total sum claimed. If he contended that these amounts were repaid to respondent, which he did not, the burden would have been upon him to establish this fact. Dyer v. Minturn, 47 Cal.App. 1, 189 P. 1046. We are convinced that the evidence sufficiently establishes an open book account with a balance due in the amount found by the court.

[2] In considering the next point raised, the evidence shows that in the ordinary course of business respondent advanced money to appellant for certain feed to be grown upon a certain place. It shows that appellant did not grow such feed and that he did not pay respondent back the money he had received and that he only supplied feed and then only at a different place, to a different person, and to the extent shown by the credit. Appellant now argues that when respondent made the deal the feed was respondent's and any risk connected therewith was respondent's risk; that there might be feed and there might not be feed, and if there were feed respondent might have cattle to feed it to and again he might not. In other words, the sum total of his argument is that appellant and respondent were gambling on the results of this crop and he was therefore not obligated to respondent for any failure to produce a sufficient crop to offset the advance. The court did not find that such was the result of the evidence, but on the other hand justly found that appellant was indebted to respondent for the balance due on an open book account.

[3] The final point raised by appellant is this: Is it an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to allow the introduction of evidence on a common count over the objection of the defendant, where a bill of particulars was demanded of the plaintiff by the defendant and the bill of particulars was not furnished within the ten days period prescribed by section 454 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

In the case of McCarthy v. Mt. Tecarte Land & Water Co., 110 Cal. 687, 43 P. 391, the court construes this section as it existed prior to its amendment in 1939, Stats. 1939, p. 1005. The amendment increased the period within which the bill of particulars had to be furnished after demand from 5 to 10 days. In the cited case it was held that the trial court had the discretion to determine whether or not to exact the penalty of precluding the plaintiff from giving evidence thereof. The reasoning expressed in that case is not affected by the amendment and is a complete answer to appellant's question. See, also, St. John v. Consolidated Construction Co., 182 Cal. 25, 189 P. 276.

In the instant case the bill of particulars was short, consisting only of five entries, and was served upon the defendant 30 days before the day of trial. No motion for continuance was made, no prejudice was shown nor attempted to be shown. The correctness of the items was not questioned other than by the general denial in the answer. Appellant did not even take the witness stand and deny the transaction. In addition to this, the complete account of respondent, contained in the journal and ledger, was in court, and made available to appellant for his examination or any cross-examination. No abuse of discretion appears.

Judgment affirmed.

Where cursory examination of records in divorce action of alleged widow of deceased against husband to whom she was married before marriage to deceased would have disclosed to deceased's mother that divorce decree was void, but deceased's mother did not exercise reasonable diligence to discover that fact before or at time of alleged widow's petition to have deceased's estate set aside to her as widow, deceased's mother was not thereafter entitled to prevail in action to annul decree setting aside estate to alleged widow.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

Petition for rehearing denied.

For prior opinion, see 128 P.2d 617.

Harold B. Pool and Robert G. Johnson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sylvester Isonberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In the petition for rehearing herein respondent contends that the decision is not based upon the portion of the complaint charging constructive fraud or mistake as admitted by appellant's answer. However, it does not appear that appellant has admitted the existence of any fraud, constructive or otherwise. It should also be pointed out that the trial court's finding of constructive fraud is not sustained by the evidence. Neither the relationship, if any, of appellant and respondent nor the circumstances under which appellant petitioned the probate court to have the deceased's estate set aside to her as his wife furnished the basis for such a finding, regardless of the legal effect of the entry nunc pro tunc of appellant's final decree of divorce or of the like effect of the failure to enter the decree earlier. No authority has been offered which would justify a ruling that appellant was guilty of constructive fraud under the circumstances here presented.

As already pointed out in the opinion filed herein, the only proper conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that both parties were laboring under a misapprehension as to the entry of the final decree of divorce. The rule for setting aside judgments because of mistake is well expressed in Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317, which case comes closer to being analogous to the present one than any other cited by respondent. In the Bacon case, at the hearing of the petition for distribution of an estate the original will in the handwriting of the testator was on file, but it was not produced and examined, or read by or to the court. The petition was prepared from one of the typewritten copies of the will, which copy stated the plaintiff's legacy as two thousand instead of ten thousand dollars. The attorney for the executor read this statement to the court and also stated that it was a correct statement of the contents of the will. The mistake in question appeared to have been common to all parties, as well as to the court. The Supreme Court there stated in its opinion (150 Cal. at page 490, 89 P. at page 322): "If the plaintiff had been present at the hearing, contending that the will gave her $10,000, had presented the point to the court, and the court had thereupon read the word 'ten' as 'two,' and had made the distribution as it was made by the judgment appealed from, no doubt she would be precluded from any relief by way of equitable review, no matter how plain the mistake of the court would appear." The court there stated: "The gravamen of the rule * * * lies in the fact that 'the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case,' and, consequently, that there has been 'no adversary trial or decision of the issue,' no 'real contest at the trial,' or, as stated in Pico v. Cohn [91 Cal. 129, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 25 Am.St.Rep. 159], no 'fair submission of the controversy.' Where the unsuccessful party has been thus hindered, he is not to be refused relief on the ground that the fact on which his defense or claim in the original action depended, and by which he expects to bring about a different result in the new suit for equitable relief, was technically in issue in the original action or proceeding, or was necessarily decided by the court in that action and concluded by the original judgment beyond reach on collateral inquiry." The court also stated that the mistake was not caused by the culpable negligence of the plaintiff.

The situation presented by the case at bar, however, is distinct from that in the Bacon case. Unlike the plaintiff in the Bacon case, the respondent here was not misled by any mistake or act of another party. Upon the record, nothing appears to have hindered respondent from ascertaining the facts concerning the decree of divorce in question other than respondent's own failure to exercise diligence in discovering the same. It might also be pointed out that the circumstances here presented would have afforded respondent no grounds to move for a new trial because of newly discovered evidence, since it is plain that with the exercise of reasonable diligence the facts could have been discovered prior to the hearing in probate upon appellant's petition to have the estate set aside to her. Respondent does not complain of any lack of notice of appellant's petition to the probate court. A cursory examination of the records in the divorce action would have revealed the true facts. If the circumstances here presented would not have afforded respondent relief by way of a new trial or hearing, how can they be said to afford respondent grounds for having the decree set aside? From all that appears in the record the equities are in favor of appellant.

It should be emphasized that the opinion of this court is based solely upon the conclusion that the findings of the trial court are not sustained by the evidence and that the evidence presents no justification for setting aside the decree in probate here in question. The legal effect of the entry nunc pro tunc of appellant's decree of divorce has no bearing upon the question here decided.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Limitation of actions 🔑127(4)

Where original complaint against plastic surgeon for malpractice improperly combined causes of action based on negligence and breach of warranty, but was filed before the running of the statute of limitations, cause of action for breach of warranty separately stated in amended complaint subsequently filed which traced its descent directly from original complaint was not barred by two-year statute of limitations. Code Civ.Proc. § 339, subd. 1.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Georgia P. Bullock, Judge.

Action by Fanny Alexander against H. O. Bames, a plastic surgeon, for alleged malpractice in performing an operation. From judgments for defendant on three causes of action, respectively, on the verdict, on the pleadings, and on a directed verdict, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Phillip W. Silver and John Boukather, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred O. Reed, Richard L. Kirtland, Henry E. Kappler, and John K. Ford, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff instituted the instant action against defendant, a plastic surgeon, to recover damages for alleged malpractice. Her original complaint alleges that defendant so negligently performed two operations on her nose as to cause the same to become disfigured and unsightly to her damage in the sum of $25,000. Plaintiff's first amended complaint realleges the cause of action for negligence; sets up a second cause of action on an express warranty and breach thereof by defendant with respect to the first operation performed by him; and also sets up a third cause of action alleging an express warranty as to the second operation and a breach of said warranty by defendant.

The answer denied generally and specifically the allegations of the amended complaint with respect to all three causes of action and set up the statute of limitations as a distinct and separate defense to the second and third causes of action.

The trial court granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings as to the second cause of action on the ground said cause was barred by subdivision 1, of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereafter the jury returned its verdict for defendant on the first cause of action. It also returned its verdict on the third cause of action in favor of defendant, pursuant to the order of the court granting defendant's motion for a directed verdict as to that count. "Judgment on verdict in open court" was entered on June 17, 1941, as to the first and third causes of action, but said judgment made no mention as to the disposition of the second cause of action. On August 30, 1941, plaintiff perfected her appeal from the judgment of June 17, 1941. The omission in said judgment of mention of the second cause of action was later discovered and on July 13, 1942, judgment as to said second cause of action was entered nunc pro tunc as of June 17, 1941, and plaintiff on July 16, 1942, filed her notice of appeal therefrom.

The following facts were developed by the evidence adduced at the trial: On February 21, 1939, appellant consulted respondent plastic surgeon concerning an operation whereby respondent would shorten appellant's nose, remove the hump and bulbous tip and narrow the sides thereof. At that time respondent took photographs of appellant's nose and appellant signed a statement of complaint and correction which described appellant's complaint and the work to be done on her nose, closing with the statement: "I understand that in rendering treatment to me, Dr. Bames undertakes to exercise his best skill and judgment as a physician and surgeon to accomplish the desired result, but does not warrant or guarantee such result."

The fee for the work was $175 including whatever treatments were necessary to secure the desired result.

On March 3, 1939, when appellant again consulted respondent, the latter pointed to a pencil line which he had drawn on one of the photographs above referred to and stated: "You see that hump above the line? I will remove that. * * * I will also remove the bulbous tip and make your nose shorter and straighter." Appellant had an oily skin, but in respondent's judgment she did not have a disease known as seborrhea and in his opinion the degree of oiliness of her nose did not indicate that an operation should not be performed or that the oily skin would have any effect on the case. Before the operation appellant had a urinalysis and a heart and chest examination to determine that she was a fit subject for the operation. On March 20, 1939, respondent operated on appellant's nose before which he gave her a sedative and an anaesthetic and washed her face and the inside of her nose with potassium mercuric iodide, an antiseptic which is alkaline in reaction and dissolves fat. Respondent incised the inside of the nose at the fibrous septum carrying the incision up on both sides inside the nose, lifted up the fleshy section of the nose from the bony section, chiseled away the hump of bone, all of which was accomplished without cutting through the external skin of the nose, and then using a chisel, respondent narrowed the bone on the side of the nose. Through the same internal incision he removed cartilage to reduce the bulbous tip and sutured the internal incision, there being no sutures on the external part of the nose.

Two days after the operation respondent removed the bandages and noticed the nose was not progressing normally—it was red and irritated, with a seeping or weeping from the outside. He applied surgical mercurochrome and rebandaged the nose. On appellant's ninth visit to his office on April 7, 1939, respondent noticed a slight transverse rugae over the lower area of the nose, to wit: "a fairly deep wrinkled field also known as a depression" or hole which represented the merging of several broken pores; also a scar on both sides of the nose. On May 5th respondent told appellant that her nose had not healed the way he thought it should and that it might be necessary to operate again, and that it was possible that inflammation might develop. Appellant informed respondent she was willing to undergo whatever he decided, and on July 13, 1939, respondent made a resection from outside of the nose and removed the depression and scar formation. As result of the second operation, one side of the nose cleared up but a depression remained on the other side. The parties had two conversations on February 15th and 19th when respondent "decided not to risk surgical resection but recommended sparking (electrical treatment) and did spark the two most prominent crags with the suggestion that this be repeated approximately a week later." Appellant submitted to two sparking treatments; "the improvement was all that could be hoped for because it had to be a gradual thing"; but appellant "never returned after the second" treatment, and never again communicated with respondent.

At the trial respondent was asked to describe the then condition of appellant's nose which he did as follows: "In profile you can see two irregular scar lines. A square one near the center of the nose and a rectangular one going laterally sideways about a quarter of an inch long. This quarter of an inch one seems to be about a sixteenth of an inch wide and about a thirty-second of an inch deep. The square one is approximately an eighth of an inch and about the same depth." Respondent testified he did not tell appellant that there was any probability of the development of depressions in her nose following the plastic surgery, although he did state to appellant at their very first conversation when she asked him if he could guarantee the result of the proposed operation: "I can cut and trim down, but I do not do the healing. I do not know which way the healing will go, whether it will be in my favor or part of it be against me. It would be the uncertainty of the healing that I cannot guarantee."

From the time appellant saw her nose after the first operation and continuing until the second operation was performed, she was very much embarrassed and ashamed; would not go out any place because people would stare at her; she was ashamed to return to work and felt "terrible." After the second operation she was very embarrassed because of the condition of her nose; was self-conscious and isolated herself from her co-workers; was very solemn and worried. This state of mind continued until the time of trial.

Appellant urges (1) that the court erred in granting respondent's motion for judgment on the pleadings because the second cause of action of the first amended complaint was not barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that there was substantial evidence from which the jury might have found that respondent expressly warranted to appellant that he would remove the scar formation from her nose; that there was a breach of such warranty and the court erred in directing a verdict for respondent on the third cause of action; (3) the court erred in giving the jury respondent's instructions numbers 18, 27 and 29.

In connection with her first point, appellant argues that in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings the court "concluded that the statute of limitations should be computed from the date of the filing of the amended complaint, rather than the date of the filing of the original complaint." In this regard she claims that her "change from a cause of action based on negligence (as alleged in the original complaint) to include an additional cause of action for breach of warranty (as alleged in her amended complaint) was based on the same operation, and the same attendant results, was a change only in the theory of remedy of the appellant and was not the statement of an entirely, wholly and different cause of action, which was entirely foreign to the original cause of action."

While it is true that appellant's original complaint filed March 14, 1940, is based upon the alleged negligence and lack of skill of respondent in performing the two operations upon appellant's nose, said complaint also alleges "That the defendant represented to the plaintiff that by performing a plastic operation on her nose, he would reshape her nose, making it straight and shorter, also remove the bumps therefrom and thereafter she would have a good looking nose. * * * That the plaintiff believing the representations and guarantees of the defendant, employed the said defendant, as such plastic surgeon, to perform the operation on her nose." (Emphasis added.)

Appellant's amended complaint filed May 26, 1941, by leave of the court realleges the negligence and lack of skill of respondent in performing the two operations, and as a second cause of action (as to which the court granted respondent's motion for judgment on the pleadings), it is alleged as follows: "* * * That the defendant represented and expressly warranted to the plaintiff that by performing a plastic operation on her nose he would reshape her nose making it straight and shorter, also remove the hump. * * * That the plaintiff believing the representations and warranty of the defendant, employed the said defendant. * * * That through and by the said breach of said warranty of said defendant, plaintiff's nose has become disfigured and made unsightly, causing her extreme humiliation, pain and mental anguish, all to her damage in the sum of $25,000.00." (Emphasis added.)

The original complaint was not a model pleading. However, a general and special demurrer thereto was overruled by the court, and a cursory reading of its various allegations reveals that in addition to negligence the pleader was attempting to charge respondent with having made certain representations and guaranties to appellant and that believing and relying upon such representations and guaranties, she was persuaded to employ the respondent. In other words, the pleading sufficiently states a cause of action on warranty.

In holding that an amended complaint which separately stated two causes of action theretofore improperly pleaded as one cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, the court said in Lovelace v. Free, 11 Cal.App.2d 370, 373, 54 P.2d 82, 83:

"The allegations were not made in an approved manner and the cause of action was not separately stated, but they clearly served as a basis for the second amendment and prevented the running of the statute."

See, also, Day v. Western Loan & Bldg. Co., 42 Cal.App.2d 226, 231, 108 P.2d 702, 705, wherein it is said: "Stated another way, if the original complaint defectively states a cause of action, it may be amended after the running of the statute as long as the cause of action stated in the amended pleading can trace its descent from the original pleading."

Since it is the opinion of this court that the amended complaint herein traces its descent directly from the original complaint which was filed on March 14, 1940, it follows that subdivision 1, of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not a bar and that it was error to grant respondent's motion for judgment on the pleadings as to appellant's second cause of action.

Because it is necessary to remand the case for trial upon appellant's second cause of action which is so closely involved with the first and third causes of action that it is impossible to extricate it from them, it is deemed inadvisable to pass upon appellant's remaining contentions, but to await the outcome of the second trial.

For the reasons stated, the judgments appealed from are, and each of them is, reversed.

Victor Noel Alexander was convicted of grand theft of an automobile, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Gladys Towles Root, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

[1] In an information filed by the District Attorney of Los Angeles County, defendant was charged in count one with the crime of grand theft of an automobile, while in count two he was accused of a violation of section 503 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 174, as amended by St.1939, p. 1481, which makes it an offense to take an automobile without the consent of the owner thereof. Following entry of not guilty pleas to both offenses charged, a jury was waived and trial had before the court, resulting in the conviction of defendant on count one and his acquittal of the offense charged in count two. While defendant in his statement of grounds of appeal and demand for phonographic transcript states that the appeal is taken from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the record does not disclose that any motion for a new trial was made, and the appeal therefore must be considered as having been taken only from the judgment.

[2] Stating the facts in the light most favorable to the prosecution, as we are required to do following conviction of the defendant, we find in the record evidence that about noon on Saturday, January 24, 1942, defendant drove into the used car lot of William Henry at Hermosa Beach in the county of Los Angeles. Defendant was driving a Studebaker automobile, and wanted to work out a deal whereby he would transfer the Studebaker to the dealer and purchase a 1941 Buick coupé. He stated that he desired to take delivery of the Buick that same Saturday afternoon, so that he could drive back to San Francisco to be at work the following Monday morning. During the negotiations defendant stated to Mr. Henry, the dealer, that he had purchased the Studebaker as a new car in San Francisco, but did not have the white registration slip on it because that document was in transit to Sacramento in connection with his application for 1942 number plates. In response to a question asked of him by Mr. Henry as to whether he ever had a loan on the Studebaker, defendant stated that at one time he had a loan with the Universal Finance Company in Los Angeles; that at that time the car was registered to an address on 92nd Street, but that the loan had been paid off in full. In an attempt to verify the aforesaid statement, Mr. Henry called the Universal Finance Company on the telephone, but that Saturday afternoon its office was closed.

The dealer then contacted the Hermosa Beach Police Department and learned through them that the Universal Finance Company was the legal owner of the Studebaker automobile and that appellant had made the loan from an address in 92nd Street in Los Angeles. When he was asked to produce the "pink slip" on the Studebaker, defendant replied that it was in San Francisco, but that he could send it down on Monday. The dealer then agreed to take what is called a "buyer's bill of sale" on the Studebaker and to deliver the Buick to the defendant at once after the necessary conditional sales contract was completed in connection with the sale of the Buick. In the conditional sales contract signed by defendant he gave his address at 203 Sutter Street, San Francisco, where he stated that he had lived for about three years, upon property that he owned, and that he was engaged in the business of a roofing contractor in San Francisco.

From the evidence, it appears that defendant first came to the used car lot to look at the Buick a few days prior to the transaction above referred to to-wit, on Wednesday or Thursday of that same week. Upon his return to the lot on Saturday noon, he said to one of Mr. Henry's salesmen on the lot, "I see you still have my Buick," to which the salesman replied, "I am glad to have you come back; I think I have." The salesman then appraised defendant's Studebaker and figured the amount of the contract; the papers in connection with the transaction were completed and signed by defendant with Mr. Henry, the dealer. The salesman testified that in the conversation that occurred among himself, Mr. Henry and defendant, the dealer agreed to deliver the Buick to defendant and take a buyer's bill of sale for the Studebaker, and wait until Monday morning for the certificate of ownership on the latter automobile. The Buick was delivered to the defendant, and he drove it away.

On the following Monday morning the dealer continued his investigation, and as a result of that investigation he was required to deliver the Studebaker automobile to the Universal Finance Company. The testimony shows that on the Saturday in question, when defendant delivered the Studebaker to Mr. Henry, there was due and unpaid a balance of $630 from defendant to the finance company, and his conditional sales contract for the purchase of the Studebaker was in default for three installments of $35 each for the months of November, December and January.

It also appears in the evidence that when a copy of the conditional sales contract on the Studebaker was compared with the original, the number of cylinders had been changed from six to eight, the serial number had been changed, and the words, "used 39 Stude" had been changed to "1941 Buick." Defendant was apprehended in Kansas City, Missouri, and the police officer who returned him to Los Angeles for trial testified that among the personal effects of the defendant at the time of his arrest was a copy of the conditional sales contract on the Studebaker. The officer had a discussion with defendant regarding the erasures and changes that had been made on that form of conditional sales contract. The defendant denied any knowledge of the erasures or changes. He admitted to the officer that at the time he delivered the Studebaker to Mr. Henry and received the Buick he was aware of the fact that he owed a balance on the purchase price of the Studebaker. He further stated that after he had taken the Buick automobile on the afternoon of January 24, he had an accident in Wilmington that night; that after a short interval in California he drove to El Paso, Texas, and had the car painted black and maroon. Defendant also stated that the license plates on the Buick had been stolen; that he found some 1942 Arkansas license plates in a wrecking yard and attached them to the Buick.

Testifying as a witness in his own defense, defendant denied any knowledge of much of the information that appeared on the conditional sales contract and other papers in connection with the transaction involving the Buick, claiming that this information was placed therein after he had signed the document. He admitted in his testimony that he told the dealer's salesman that he had lived in San Francisco at one time, and further admitted that he did give the address of 203 Sutter Street. He denied that he ever made any statement to Mr. Henry or the latter's salesman that he was the owner of the Studebaker or that he had paid off the loan thereon.

[3] Contrary to appellant's claims, the information sufficiently charged the offense of grand theft. Compliance with subdivision 2 of section 950 of the Penal Code does not require that the information state the kind of grand theft with which the defendant is charged. The elimination of the necessity for the district attorney to elect in advance of the proof whether the prosecution will proceed upon the theory of larceny, false pretenses, trick and device, embezzlement, etc., and the reasons for such elimination, are set forth in People v. Fewkes, 214 Cal. 142, 149, 4 P.2d 538.

[4-6] Appellant next contends that the decision of the court adjudging him guilty of grand theft is contrary to law and the evidence; but in reading the arguments advanced in appellant's behalf we fail to find any clear or direct specification of any particular wherein the evidence fails to sustain the court's decision; but a perusal of the testimony persuades us that the decision of the court is fully supported by evidence and sustained by the law. Included in the crime of grand theft is the act of depriving another of his property by means of fraudulent representations. Pen.Code, § 484. Appellant knowingly and falsely represented to the dealer, Mr. Henry, that he was the owner of the Studebaker automobile; that he was in possession of the "pink slip" thereto; that while at one time he had obtained a loan on the automobile, such obligation had been liquidated and discharged. He further falsely represented that he was living and working in San Francisco and owned property in the latter city. Furthermore, appellant signed a bill of sale to the Studebaker car which he knew he did not own, and upon which vehicle he owed some $630 and was in default of three monthly payments. When there is added to the foregoing the conduct of appellant in removing the Buick automobile from the State of California, altering the same and substituting Arkansas license plates thereon, we can see no escape from the conclusion that appellant gained possession of the Buick automobile by means of false and fraudulent representations concerning his ownership of the Studebaker; that he never had any intention of delivering a clear title to the last named vehicle—in fact, could not—, and consequently he was guilty of larceny.

Appellant's contention that Mr. Henry, the dealer, was informed at the time of the transaction that appellant was not the legal owner of the Studebaker automobile and therefore could not have relied to his detriment upon any representations appellant made, is not borne out by the record. True, the dealer was advised through the police department that a finance company was the legal owner of the Studebaker according to the records of the Motor Vehicle Department; but the dealer testified that in about ninety per cent of the transactions involving financing of automobile purchases the legal title is not transferred upon the records of the Motor Vehicle Department when the conditional sales contract is paid out; that "the finance company signs off on the back of the pink slip and mails it to the customer without it being transferred, and it is up to the customer to put it through Sacramento. It costs them $1.00 for a transfer, to get the finance company's name off, and nine out of ten people put it in their pocket or their safe deposit box, with the owner of record showing the finance company still as the owner of record." Further, in answer, to a question, "And therefore you found out through Mr. Murray of the Hermosa Beach Police Department that this car was still owned, as far as the bare legal title was concerned, by the finance company, and you were not alarmed by that?" the same witness answered, "I wasn't, for the simple reason that when I talked to Mr. Alexander he told me the exact address of where the car was registered, according to the records, which I believe was on 92nd Street. I asked him about that particular address and he said that was the address of his wife's folks and it was registered there for convenience only." When, therefore, a check of the records indicated that a loan had been made on the Studebaker car and that it was registered at the address on 92nd Street as claimed by appellant, the dealer believed and relied upon the false representation made by appellant that the loan made on the automobile by the finance company had been fully paid. The evidence received at the trial of this cause, showing as it does a course of conduct on the part of appellant teeming with fraud and replete with intrigue, deception and duplicity, was amply sufficient to warrant the trial court in finding appellant guilty of the charge of grand theft.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action by mother to establish paternity of her minor children, on defendant's contention that plaintiff's testimony was so inherently improbable as to be unworthy of belief, in face of conflicting evidence appellate court would not attempt to determine weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses but would decide only whether upon the face of all the evidence it could be held that sufficient facts could not have been found to warrant the conclusion arrived at by the trier of facts. 4. Appeal and error 🔑1001(1)

On appeal, before a judgment can be set aside on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it must clearly appear that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the trial court's conclusion and before it may be set aside on the plea that it was founded upon "inherently improbable evidence" appellate court must be able to say that to believe such evidence would be to assume that something has been done which it would not seem possible could be done under the circumstances described or that such evidence involved conduct that no one but a person of a seriously calentured mentality would be likely to do.

In action by mother to establish paternity of her minor children, testimony relating to defendant's association with mother was not so "inherently improbable" as to require a reversal of a judgment against defendant. Civ.Code § 196a, as amended by St.1939, p. 1758.

6. Bastards 🔑65

In action by mother to establish paternity of her minor children, in the trial of which court was aided by presence of the children and was enabled to observe their appearance, actions, characteristics and resemblance to defendant, conflicting evidence sustained judgment against defendant. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank M. Smith, Judge.

Action by Consuelo Andrade against George W. Newhouse on behalf of her two minor sons to establish their paternity. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Modified and as modified affirmed.

Melvin Simon, David Licker, and Alexander L. Oster, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

DeForrest Home, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

[1] The plaintiff and respondent, Consuelo Andrade, is the natural mother and parent of George Winfred Andrade and Mario Henry Andrade, minors. Plaintiff brought this action on behalf of said minors, against defendant and appellant, George W. Newhouse, to establish the paternity of said children. After trial before the court sitting without a jury, the court made findings determining that the defendant was the father of the minors, and judgment was entered accordingly. The judgment also provided for the support of said minors and for attorney's fees for plaintiff's attorney in the sum of $600, and court costs of $50. The judgment further provided for medical and hospital expenses incurred by plaintiff at the birth of said two children in the sum of $250 and "the additional sum of $10 per month for the plaintiff herein for her care of said children while she is not working." Respondent concedes the error of this last award, as well as the award for medical and hospital expenses, and at the oral argument of this cause consented that, if the judgment be found otherwise free from reversible error, it might be affirmed as modified by striking therefrom the aforesaid concededly erroneous provisions.

Briefly, the facts testified to and upon which the judgment rests are that plaintiff, an unmarried woman, thirty-five years of age at the time of the trial, and the defendant, an osteopathic physician and surgeon, who was thirty-one years of age at the time of trial, were introduced to each other in the latter part of 1936. The defendant had recently theretofore opened his office in the neighborhood of Watts in Los Angeles County, where the plaintiff was well acquainted, having been employed by several doctors in that locality. Soon thereafter the plaintiff went to work for the defendant as a receptionist during the afternoons, it being understood that she was to be employed without compensation until such time as the defendant could afford to pay her. She told the defendant that she knew many people and that she could help him "build up" his practice. She continued under this arrangement until July, 1937, when she discontinued working for him. During this period, however, the parties became very friendly, and from time to time they engaged in sexual relations. The defendant was married but separated from his wife. A divorce action was pending in February, 1937, when, according to plaintiff, defendant told her he was going to get a divorce and marry her. During the week of August 14, 1939, plaintiff had sexual intercourse with defendant at his office, at which time, she stated, she remained there all night. The next time she saw him was on or about October 1, 1939. In September, 1939, she discovered that she was pregnant, and on May 6, 1940, the first child, George Winfred Andrade, was born. After the first child was born, plaintiff claims that she again had sexual intercourse with the defendant on August 23 and September 13, 1940. From March, 1940, to August, 1940, the plaintiff did not see the defendant at any time. During the months of August, 1939, to November, 1940, when the plaintiff again became pregnant, defendant was living with his wife. Defendant admitted having sexual intercourse with the plaintiff in the years 1936 and 1937, but denied such relations during the years 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941. Plaintiff testified to having had sexual relations with the defendant during the years 1937 to 1940 inclusive.

It is the contention of appellant that the testimony of the respondent is so inherently improbable as to be unworthy of belief, in that she did not contact appellant from March, 1940, to August, 1940, during which time she was pregnant and gave birth to a child on May 6, 1940; that she did not charge appellant with the paternity of the child until August, 1940, at which time she asked him to acknowledge its paternity, which appellant refused to do; and further, that it is not reasonable to assume that after he so refused to sign the "paternityship papers" she would again submit to acts of sexual intercourse with appellant and as a result give birth to a second child.

[2-5] In answer to appellant's contention in this regard, it may well be said that one thing is certain; if the respondent told the truth when she testified that from about the time she first met appellant up to the time of trial she never had sexual relations with anyone other than appellant, then he must be the father of the child, whether or not she is correct as to dates. And in the face of conflicting evidence, this court will not attempt to determine the weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses, but will decide only whether upon the face of all the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found to warrant the conclusion arrived at by the trier of facts. If the circumstances in evidence reasonably justify the judgment of the trial court, the opinion of a reviewing tribunal that these circumstances might also reasonably be reconciled with a verdict for the opposite party will not warrant interference with the determination of the trial court. Before a judgment can be set aside on appeal on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below; while before we can interfere with a judgment on the plea that it is founded upon evidence "inherently improbable," we must be able to say that to believe such evidence is to assume that something has been done which it would not seem possible could be done under the circumstances described, or that such evidence involves conduct that no one but a person of a seriously calentured mentality would be likely to do. We are not warranted in applying any such strictures to the evidence in the case at bar.

[6, 7] In the trial of the case now under consideration, the court was also aided by the presence of the involved children, whereby the court was enabled to observe their appearance, actions, characteristics and resemblance to the appellant. One such characteristic was a birth mark upon the neck of one of the children which corresponded to a like mark of identification on the back of appellant's neck. True, the record herein presents a conflict, but that merely presents a situation in which the trial court is best qualified to make the proper determination. As was appropriately stated in the case of Parker v. Riddell, 41 Cal.App.2d 908, 913, 108 P.2d 88, 91:

"The rule is that an appellate court may not disturb findings of facts based on conflicting evidence. The trier of facts has the opportunity of observing the witness and his general demeanor. The appellate court simply reads the record in cold type and sometimes does not obtain from it the impression received by the hearer of the spoken word. The tongue is simply the means or method of conveying thought. An impulsive or unconscious gesture, the intonation of the voice, a hesitant or an alert answer may possibly exclude an inference otherwise reasonably drawn from the written record. In considering an attack upon the findings, the test is 'not how we would find the facts to be', but whether there was substantial evidence strong enough to justify the conclusion reached. * * *" (Citing cases.)

Appellant's next major contention is that the trial court erred in awarding respondent attorney's fees for prosecuting the action where no award of such fees was made pendente lite. Reference to the history of section 196a of the Civil Code, under which this action was brought, will prove helpful in arriving at its true meaning in the form in which it now appears. The section came into existence by enactment in the Statutes of 1913, page 218, and was amended by the Statutes of 1939, page 1758. Said section is hereinafter set forth, and, for purposes of clarity, the matter added by the amendment is italicized:

"The father as well as the mother, of an illegitimate child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. A civil suit to enforce such obligations may be maintained in behalf of a minor illegitimate child, by his mother or guardian, or by a guardian ad litem appointed upon the written application or with the consent of his mother; provided, that such application or consent shall not be necessary if the mother is dead or incompetent, and in such action the court shall have power to order and enforce performance thereof, the same as under sections 137, 137.5, 138, 139 and 140 of the Civil Code, in a suit for divorce by a wife."

[8] The first sentence of the statute creates the obligation of the father to support his illegitimate child. This portion of the statute has remained unchanged from the time of its original enactment. The case of Arais v. Kalensnikoff, 10 Cal.2d 428, 74 P.2d 1043, 115 A.L.R. 163, holds that inasmuch as this sentence of section 196a of the Civil Code required a father to support his child, the trial court had power to order him to pay attorney's fees in the action brought to enforce that obligation.

The case of Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal.App.2d 122, 132, 100 P.2d 806, 811, in referring to the Arais case, says: "The Arais case determined that it was proper to allow the attorney's fees as part of the judgment. Since they are allowed as part of the judgment it is obvious that they must be allowed after the services have been rendered."

It must be borne in mind that both of these cases interpret said code section before the 1939 amendment became effective; hence the law at that time was that attorney's fees were allowable as part of the final judgment, and the Kyne case specifically held in the following language that they were not allowable pendente lite: "Appellant, while recognizing the holding in the Arais case, contends that it is not proper to make such allowance after the services have been performed. Certain cases involving the allowance of fees in divorce actions have been thus interpreted. See, 1 Cal. Jur., p. 998, sec. 51. This rule has no application here. In cases under section 196a of the Civil Code the allowance of attorney's fee is predicated upon the theory that such legal services are part of the child's right to support. In Schallman v. Haas, 33 Cal.App. 28, 164 P. 336, it was held that the court is without power to allow such fees before judgment. * * *"

The Supreme Court has recently construed the effect of the 1939 amendment to section 196a, supra, in the case of Carbone v. Superior Court, 18 Cal.2d 768, 770, 117 P.2d 872, 874, 136 A.L.R. 1260 wherein it is said:

"Under the plain language of section 196a as amended the court in an action to enforce the obligation of a father to support an illegitimate child has the same power to order the performance of that obligation as it has to order the performance of a husband's obligation under section 137 in a suit for divorce by a wife. Under section 137 the court, when an action for divorce is pending, may in its discretion order the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children or to prosecute the action. Therefore it may likewise in its discretion order the payment of money necessary for the support of the illegitimate child and the prosecution of the action pending its determination. See 28 Cal.L.Rev. 442, 446.

"Not only is the amendment clear and explicit in its terms, but its purpose to provide for an award pendente lite is apparent from the previous interpretation of section 196a. Although it was held that the final judgment might include provision for attorney's fees (Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal.App.2d 122, 100 P. 2d 806; Arais v. Kalensnikoff, 10 Cal.2d 428, 74 P.2d 1043, 115 A.L.R. 163) and support of the illegitimate child from the date of filing the complaint (Kyne v. Kyne, supra; Mathews v. Hornbeck, 80 Cal.App. 704, 252 P. 667), the right to counsel fees, costs, and support pending the final determination of the action was denied. Schallman v. Haas, 33 Cal.App. 28, 164 P. 336. The legislature in adopting the amendment presumably had these decisions in mind and intended to change the law."

Manifestly, the Supreme Court has held that the 1939 amendment by its reference to Civil Code section 137.5 gives the court the power to allow attorney's fees pendente lite, which power the court did not have before the amendment.

The question here presented is whether this amendment precludes attorney's fees as part of the final judgment; that is, whether by reason of the 1939 addition to section 196a of the Civil Code, the law as it existed prior thereto and as it was interpreted by the courts is now obsolete so far as attorney's fees awarded for the first time in a final judgment are concerned, or whether the 1939 amendment gave an added and alternative method by which attorney's fees could be assessed either pendente lite or by inclusion in the final judgment.

[9, 10] The portion of section 196a following the first sentence thereof (and containing the enacted amendments) primarily concerns matters of procedure for the purpose of enforcing the obligation contained in the first sentence. This procedure is permissive and auxiliary to other procedures and is not exclusive. The statute itself thus provides when it says: "A civil suit to enforce such obligations may be maintained * * * and in such action the court shall have power * * *." (Emphasis added.) The mere fact that the court shall have power to enforce performance by virtue of the other clauses set forth in section 196a does not of itself import an exclusive method of enforcing performance of the obligation. Nor is this the holding in the case of Carbone v. Superior Court, supra. That case decided but one point, viz.: that pendente lite awards were proper in an action brought under section 196a. The Legislature left unchanged the basic support law, as contained in the first sentence of section 196a (and which is the foundation of the rulings in the Kyne and Arais cases, supra); but, through the additions in the remainder of said section, the Legislature enlarged the right to receive support and attorney's fees pendente lite. This merely provided an additional remedy for procuring the basic support provided in the first sentence of section 196a. The plaintiff in an action brought under said section might not desire to accept the auxiliary remedy provided in pendente lite proceedings because of the measure of proof necessary. It is practically equivalent to the necessity of two complete trials on the paternity issue. It is not the simple matter of an ordinary divorce case where the validity of the marriage and the legitimacy of children are admitted.

[11] In the light of the foregoing, it seems reasonable to assume that, confronted with the decision in the case of Schallman v. Haas, 33 Cal.App. 28, 164 P. 336, and subsequent decisions following the rule there enunciated, the Legislature by the 1939 amendment, as we view it in the light of the holding of our Supreme Court in Carbone v. Superior Court, supra, simply undertook to permit the allowance of attorney's fees in actions brought under section 196a of the Civil Code not only at the time of the final judgment, but pendente lite as well.

Appellant's final contention is that the award of $600 attorney's fees is excessive, in view of the evidence as to appellant's earnings, and ability to pay; that although the amount of the award lies within the discretion of the court, the discretion exercised must not be an arbitrary one (Arnold v. Arnold, 215 Cal. 613, 12 P.2d 435; and that the award in this case, where the appellant's earnings are between $150 and $200 per month, is excessive and amounts to an abuse of discretion.

[12] In Kyne v. Kyne, supra, the measure by which attorney's fees are to be gauged is thus stated: (1) defendant's financial ability to pay, and (2) the character and amount of services rendered. Appellant testified that he earned from $150 to $200 per month; that his wife was working; that respondent owned, as she admitted, four pieces of property with an assessed valuation of "probably three or four thousand dollars" and from which she enjoyed an income of $60 or $65 per month. Appellant further testified that he was the owner of two automobiles free and clear of encumbrance.

[13] When consideration is given to the nature and extent of the services rendered by respondent's attorney, consisting as they did of filing the action in question, taking the deposition of appellant and being present at the taking of the deposition of respondent; conducting all the necessary interviews with witnesses and others in preparing the case for trial; spending five days in the trial thereof, and performing the necessary services subsequent to trial, coupled with appellant's proven financial ability; and, in addition, the wide latitude and discretion vested in the trial court, we are not disposed to hold that the award of $600 for attorney's fees is so unreasonable as to constitute an abuse of discretion. This is especially so when, as here, the court directed that the attorney's fees should be paid in monthly installments of $50 extending over a period of one year.

It was agreed between the parties that the judgment herein should be corrected and amended to show the date of the birth of George Winfred Andrade as May 6, 1940, instead of May 6, 1941.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is modified by inserting therein the date of May 6, 1940, instead of May 6, 1941, as the date of the birth of the minor child George Winfred Andrade, and by striking from the judgment the provision contained therein reading: "and the additional sum of $10 per month for the plaintiff herein for her care of said children while she is not working"; and by further striking from said judgment the words: "and it is the further order of this court that the defendant George W. Newhouse pay to plaintiff the sum of $250 for medical and hospital expenses incurred at the births of said two children." As so modified, the judgment appealed from is affirmed, neither party to recover costs on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Ernest D. Wagner, Judge assigned.

Mandamus proceeding by Edward I. McAuliffe against Thomas J. Kane, as county controller, etc., to recover salary allegedly due petitioner as justice of the peace of the Third Judicial Township of San Mateo County. From a judgment in favor of petitioner, the respondent appeals.

Reversed.

Gilbert D. Ferrell, Dist. Atty., of Redwood City, for appellant.

John W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, Edmund Scott, of Redwood City, and F. E. Hoffmann, of San Mateo, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

This appeal involves the question of whether petitioner, as justice of the peace of the Third Judicial Township of San Mateo County, is entitled to the increase in salary provided for by a county ordinance enacted more than two years after petitioner's term of office began. The trial court held that he was, and the controller of the county has appealed.

The facts are not disputed, and for all the purposes of the appeal may be stated as follows: San Mateo County is governed by a freeholders' charter, adopted pursuant to section 7½ of article XI of the state Constitution, which provides, among other things, that it should be competent in all charters framed under the authority thereto to provide "For the number of justices of the peace and constables for each township, or for the number of such judges and other officers of such inferior courts as may be provided by the Constitution or general law, for the election or appointment of said officers, for the times at which and the terms for which said officers shall be elected or appointed, and for their compensation, or for the fixing of such compensation by boards of supervisors, and if appointed, for the manner of their appointment; * * *." Pursuant to the authority thus granted the Charter of San Mateo County provides: "Article VIII. Township Officers. Section 1. Judicial Townships and Justices of the Peace. The county shall be divided into five judicial townships, which shall be identical with the existing supervisorial districts. Each such township shall have one justice of the peace, who shall be elected in the manner provided by general law for a term of four years and shall hold office until his successor is elected and qualified. Each justice of the peace shall devote his entire time to the duties of his office, if and when required by ordinance of the board of supervisors. * * * Section 3. Compensation of Justices of the Peace and Constables. The compensation of justices of the peace and of constables shall be fixed by the board of supervisors and must be salaries only and in such amounts as may be commensurate with their respective duties. Such salaries need not be uniform in amount for the several townships nor proportionate to population therein. Their duties and qualifications shall be such as now are, or may hereafter be prescribed by law." Stats. 1933, p. 2972.

Petitioner was elected justice of the peace of the Third Judicial Township on August 30, 1938, for a four-year term which began January 1, 1939. At the time he was elected and on the date of the commencement of his term of office the salary of the office of justice of the peace of the Third Judicial Township was fixed by county ordinance at $2,100 a year. Also at the time he was elected and when his term of office began, section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided: "Justices' courts in cities, towns and judicial townships, having a population of 30,000 or more, shall be known, and may be designated, as 'Justices' courts of Class A.' Justices' courts in cities, towns, and judicial townships having a population of less than 30,000 shall be known, and may be designated, as 'Justices' courts of Class B.' Determination of Population. For the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of any justice's court therein, the population of a judicial township shall be deemed to be above or below thirty thousand as may have been found by the Supreme Court of this State to be the fact in any proceeding in mandamus, prior to January 1, 1931, to compel the justices of such townships to exercise original jurisdiction in certain causes; otherwise such population shall be deemed to be as shown by the last preceding census taken under the direction of the Congress of the United States." In 1939, St.1939, p. 1493, said section was amended by striking out that portion thereof last above quoted and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "to be the fact in any proceeding in mandamus brought in a court having jurisdiction thereof." After petitioner had served more than half of his four-year term, and on May 29, 1941, the board of supervisors of said county enacted an ordinance whereby for the first time it fixed salaries for justices of the peace of Class A justices' courts. They were fixed at $3,600 a year for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1941; and on July 28, 1941, the superior court of said county, in a mandamus proceeding instituted for that purpose under the provisions of section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure (1) determined that the population of said Third Judicial Township was then in excess of 30,000, (2) declared the justice's court of the Third Judicial Township, by reason of the increased population, to be a justice's court of Class A, and (3) commanded petitioner as justice of the peace of said Third Judicial Township to forthwith assume full responsibility and complete jurisdiction of a justice's court of Class A. On September 2, 1941, petitioner demanded that the controller draw petitioner's salary warrant for the month of August, 1941, for $300, the amount provided for by the ordinance enacted after petitioner's term of office began, and the controller refused to issue the warrant for any greater sum than $175, the amount fixed by the ordinance in effect at the time petitioner was elected and began his term of office. Thereupon the present proceeding in mandamus was instituted.

The state Constitution and the Charter of the county of San Mateo prohibit any increase in the salary of a township officer after he is elected and during his term of office. The constitutional provision is as follows: "* * * The compensation of any county, township or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office * * *." § 5, art. XI. The Charter provision reads: "The compensation of any elective county or township officer shall not be increased nor diminished during the term for which he was elected, nor within ninety days preceding his election." § 1, art. XIII. As will be noted, the foregoing provisions are unconditional and prohibit every increase in compensation, without exception; and here the undisputed facts show that the legislative act of the board of supervisors providing for the increased salary to which petitioner claims to be entitled, was passed long after the commencement of petitioner's term of office. Therefore the increase is not available to petitioner.

[1-3] The case presented is the same in principle and similar in most of its essential facts to Kilroy v. Whitmore, 115 Cal. App. 43, 300 P. 851, 853, hearing by Supreme Court denied. There by state law the judicial townships of Stanislaus County were classified according to population, using as a basis of calculation the number of registered voters therein; and the salary of the justice of the peace for each class was fixed by the same legislative act. The petitioner in that case was elected justice of the peace of Turlock township, which then had a population of between 8,000 and 15,000. Consequently it was a township of the second class, and the salary of the justice thereof was fixed at $100 a month. After petitioner began his term of office the Legislature amended the law whereby an additional classification was created, designated as class 1½. It included townships having a population of between 11,000 and 15,000, and the salary of the justice of the peace thereof was fixed at $150 a month. Thereafter the board of supervisors made an order based on the number of registered voters in the Turlock township, declaring that said township belonged to class 1½. The incumbent justice of the peace demanded the larger salary. It was refused, and he instituted a proceeding in mandamus to recover the same. The proceeding was decided in his favor, but on appeal the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the situation fell within the inhibition of the constitutional provision against increase in compensation during the term of office. In so holding the court said: "The Constitution (section 9, art. 11) clearly implies that there must be a law in force fixing the compensation of every county and township officer at the date of his election, and it imperatively forbids any increase of that compensation by a law subsequently enacted. Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 103 P. 199. It has been uniformly and consistently held that, whenever new legislation is made which will have the effect, actually or presumptively, to increase the compensation to be paid to an incumbent officer of a county, such legislation is to be postponed in its effect until the commencement of the new term of office to which the successor of the incumbent may be elected. Williams v. Garey, 19 Cal.App. 769, 127 P. 824." In applying the foregoing legal principles to the facts of that case, the court went on to say: "* * * had the act of the Legislature creating townships of the one and one-half class been enacted before respondent was elected and took office, then the increase in his salary would have been automatic upon an increase of population to the extent required to constitute it a township of the one and one-half class. But the increase in respondent's salary was not brought about automatically, but by an act of the Legislature enacted after his election, and after he entered upon the term of his office." And later the court said: "When respondent was elected justice of the peace of Turlock township, his salary was fixed by law at $100 per month. This was the salary he contemplated receiving when he accepted the office, and it was this salary that the people who elected him contemplated that he would receive during his term of office. By an act of the Legislature, passed after the commencement of his term of office, a new and different classification was made of his township, and an increased salary for the office of justice of the peace for that township was provided." And so here, when petitioner was elected, his salary as justice of the peace of the Third Judicial Township was fixed at $175 a month. "This was the salary he contemplated receiving when he accepted the office, and it was this salary that the people who elected him contemplated that he would receive during his term of office." Kilroy v. Whitmore, supra. The legislative act of the board of supervisors providing for the increase in salary took place, and the judicial classification of the justice court was had, after the commencement of petitioner's term of office. Therefore, as held in the Kilroy case, it was not an automatic increase in salary, and consequently the legislative act of the board of supervisors providing for the increase was not operative during his term of office.

Another case closely resembling the present one and upon which both parties place more or less reliance, and which is reviewed but differentiated in the Kilroy case, supra, is Puterbaugh v. Wadham, 162 Cal. 611, 123 P. 804. That was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the city auditor of the city of San Diego to draw his warrant in payment of petitioner's salary, as justice of the peace of the city of San Diego. He had been appointed to this office in 1909, at which time the said city was a city of the third class and the office of justice of the peace carried a salary of $2,000 per annum. In November, 1910, he was elected for the full term beginning the first Monday in January, 1911. At the time of his election, and when the term of his elective office began, the city of San Diego had passed, by reason of its increased population, from the third to the second class, and justices of the peace, under said last-named classification, were entitled to a salary of $3,600 per annum. It was held that the incumbent was entitled to the increased compensation. But in so holding the court pointed out that the constitutional inhibition against increases in compensation during the term of office is directed against increases brought about by legislative acts, as distinguished from automatic increases; and the court then went on to show that in that case all of the legislation necessary to take care of the contemplated automatic change, to-wit, the statute creating the classification of the court and fixing the salaries of justices of the peace of all classes, had already been enacted and was in full force and effect prior to petitioner's election and the commencement of his term of office. Furthermore, and most important, it was pointed out that at the time petitioner was elected and when the term of his elective office began the city of San Diego had already passed by reason of its increased population into the higher classification; hence it was held that the change was automatic. Here the situation was entirely different. Both the legislative act of the board of supervisors increasing the salary, and the judicial determination classifying the court according to population, took place more than two years after petitioner's term of office began.

[4] Petitioner contends that the "office of justice of the peace of a Class A court is totally different and distinct from the office of justice of the peace of a Class B court, and therefore the change in salary" herein is not affected by either the constitutional or the charter provision; and in support of such contention he points out that the jurisdiction of a Class A justice's court differs from that of a Class B justice's court criminally, civilly, and territorially, and that the qualifications for the office of justice of the peace thereof are different. It appears, however, from an examination of the code sections bearing upon this question and from the history thereof that by the enactment of said section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizing the classification of justices' courts there was no intent to provide for the creation or establishment of any new or separate court and that all the Legislature intended to do was to clarify a situation which had arisen with respect to the matter of jurisdiction; and the following cases may be cited as fully sustaining this view: In re Jacobson, 16 Cal.App.2d 497, 60 P.2d 1001; Shipp v. Superior Court, 209 Cal. 671, 673, 289 P. 825; Los Angeles County v. Justice's Court, 208 Cal. 429, 281 P. 611; People v. Justice's Court, 212 Cal. 603, 299 P. 731; Van Horn v. Justice's Court, 216 Cal. 235, 13 P.2d 704. In other words, as pointed out in In re Jacobson, supra, before the year 1929 the jurisdiction of the justices' courts throughout the state was uniform. In that year the Legislature amended section 1425 of the Penal Code, St.1929, p. 861, by providing different criminal jurisdiction for justices' courts in townships having a population of 30,000 or more, and in 1931 the Legislature amended section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, St.1931, p. 409, by enlarging the civil jurisdiction of the justices' courts having a population of 30,000 or more. Evidently for the purpose of clarifying that situation the Legislature in 1933 added section 81 to the Code of Civil Procedure, St.1933, p. 1810, by which justices' courts were divided into two classes, to be known as Class A and Class B, the line of demarcation being that Class A should consist of courts in those townships having a population of 30,000 or more; and accordingly said section 1425 of the Penal Code and section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure were amended so as to define the jurisdiction of each class. Nothing is to be found in either the wording of the code sections themselves or in the decisions which have been rendered construing them to justify the conclusion that the purpose of the enactment of said section 81 was to provide for the establishment of a new or different court, or a new or different office for the incumbent justice. The office to which he is elected is "Justice of the Peace" of a certain township, not justice of the peace of any designated class of justice's court, and even though afterwards the court of that particular township, by reason of increased population, is classified as a Class A justice's court, the title of his office remains unchanged.

[5, 6] It is further contended that "as a justice of the peace of a Class A court, petitioner has new and additional duties imposed upon him which are without the scope and range of the office of a Class B court, and therefore the salary provided by ordinance 523 does not constitute an unconstitutional or unlawful increase." It has been definitely held in this state, however, that "An officer who accepts an office at a fixed salary or compensation is deemed to undertake to perform the duties thereof for such stipulated salary, though it be inadequate; and if the proper authority increases his duties by the addition of others germane to the office the officer must perform them without extra compensation." Vogel v. White, 134 Cal.App. 252, 25 P.2d 233, 234; Kilroy v. Whitmore, supra. Here the duties imposed upon the justice of the peace in question do not involve performance of duties foreign to or not within the range or scope of the office of justice of the peace. As justice of the peace of a Class B justice's court it was his duty to hear and determine causes within the jurisdiction of that court. As justice of the peace of a Class A justice's court it is his duty to hear and determine causes within the jurisdiction of that court. In substance, there has been no imposition of new duties, but merely an increase in the burden of the existing duties, that is, they are all germane to the duties of the office to which he was elected; therefore, under the doctrine above stated, he cannot claim additional compensation for the discharge of those duties even though the salary may be inadequate remuneration for the work now required of him. Petitioner calls attention to certain cases involving administrative officers wherein it was held that the addition of new duties justified the allowance of increased compensation. But the facts of those cases show that the duties so added were not germane to the duties of the office to which the incumbent was elected. In the decision in one of the cases so cited, San Luis Obispo County v. Felts, 104 Cal. 60, 37 P. 780, certain general language is used which tends to support petitioner's position, but such language must be applied to the facts of that particular case, which are essentially different from those here presented.

[7] Petitioner's final contention is that he is entitled to the increased salary by reason of the provisions of section 5 of article VIII of the county Charter. An examination thereof demonstrates, however, that it has no bearing whatever upon the question here presented. It is therein provided that "If the Legislature of this State shall establish some other system of inferior courts for counties, then the board of supervisors may discontinue the offices of justices of the peace and constables, if such discontinuance be allowed by law, and shall provide for such inferior judicial officers as may be required by such other system." (Italics ours.) Petitioner argues that another system of inferior courts has been established as a result of the classification of justices' courts into Class A and Class B; but as already pointed out there is no merit in such argument. There has been no other system of inferior courts established since the adoption of the county charter.

The judgment is reversed.
